Abstract: Poet, prose writer, theorist, Mircea Cărtărescu navigates with ease, naturalness, and aplomb in the fields of literature, without a trace of artifice or affectation. Mircea Cărtărescu's prose, the most appreciated and publicized dimension of his work, is characterized by forays into the chimerical, autobiographical accents, and poetic iridescence. The epic feeds on the iridescence of the chimera, the effusions of autobiography, and the aromas of books, with the reader acutely feeling the impact of imaginary and anamnestic projections, but also the exultations of spaces imbued with nostalgic, strange, and ritualistic arabesques. The writer's ability to draw archetypal images, paradigmatic symbols, echoes of the original, evocative spaces of childhood resembling labyrinths that camouflage the past of the being in quasi-mythical scents and dreamlike reflections seems exemplary.*

Poet, prose writer, theorist, Mircea Cărtărescu navigates the fields of literature with ease, naturalness, and aplomb, without a trace of artifice or affectation. The highly personal tone of his poetic texts often results from the clash of feeling and idea, thought and emotion, from the coincidence of all possible opposites. In his debut volume, Faruri, vitrine, fotografii (Headlights, Shop Windows, Photographs, 1980), we find elements of mannerism (the figure of the oxymoron, the labyrinthine topos, the verve of cosmogony, the cultivation of the trompe l'oeuil technique). The demythologizing verve, the ability and willingness to defuse pre-established models and themes, to desacralize, is evident in Poeme de amor (Love Poems, 1983). Here, love is transcribed not in the register of gravity and solemnity, but rather in an imaginative-ironic or parodic grid. The de-ritualization of the feeling and of the beloved woman is achieved through a deliberately prosaic language, in which the word defines itself through brutal concreteness. Nevertheless, love is more of a comedy of words, a parodic halo effect of language, and the imperceptible translation of emotions seems to be the result of transplants of archaic words or elements of slang ("let's love each other, let's love each other forever/ because tomorrow we will be prey to floods, landslides, and fierce drunken binges/ because tomorrow a spider-legged hay yesterday will walk in the curls of your hair/ confusing you, annoying you"). In such an atmosphere imbued with literary aromas, everyday life is drawn from bibliographical references, and the poet's being is articulated through reflexes from the books he has read. Fantastical and ironic, mannerist and parodic, Mircea Cărtărescu voluptuously traverses the ages of poetry in a burst of bewildering specularity: in the mirror of the text, paradoxical and labyrinthine, one always sees, as in a suave-allegorical palimpsest, a kind of textualized carnival, from which the temptation of the ludic is not absent, the baroque exercise pushed to the absurd, which makes the translation to the world of the imaginary, with echoes, interconnections, and multiple avatars. Dominant in Levantul are archaic sounds and lexical forms, through which the fabulous world of the Orient is evoked, with fluid contours and a trepidant mechanics of its own metabolism, of a polychromatic diversity, exorbitant in rhythm and composition. The fantasy, virtuosity, and frenzy with which Mircea Cărtărescu dismantles old mechanisms, tics, and languages of literature are inexhaustible. The real world, like its fictional paraphrase, intersects here in a multitude of carnivalesque or playful hypostases and accents. The "comedy" of literature is assumed from the angle of revealing language games, which summon to the page the charm, archaic refinement or, on the contrary, neological coloratura of an invented language, as N. Manolescu observes. Words from different semantic spheres meet, intersect, and contaminate each other in a linguistic spectacle of exuberant vitality. An epic with a complicated plot and delicious language, Levantul can also be considered a text with metatextual valences, insofar as the poet retranscribes the lines of force of Romanian poetry from a playful, ironic, and parodic perspective. The author's stylistic dexterity is astonishing, as is his mastery of registers of language of bewildering diversity. The image of the author sitting face to face with the fictional world he himself manipulates, the bookish insert, the incessant play between text, intertext, and metatext, make Levantul a poem in which comedy and parody, pastiche and irony come together to form a comedy of literature rewritten in a postmodern grid. It is no coincidence that, referring to the way in which Cărtașian's poetic imagination is articulated, Radu G. Țeposu observes that "the author's eye is avid, feverish, sees enormously and gathers on the page the infinity of perceived fragments, which move enigmatically, hyperbolically or microscopically, as if in a plasma. The impression of ontological chaos, of lavish agglomeration, also suggests a mode of imagination: wanting to be realistic in his observation, the poet is a fantasist in his representation. Precision, hyperrealistic meticulousness with the appearance of positivist description push the details towards uncertainty, towards convulsive explosion. The final image is one of delirious perception, of mysterium tremens. Deliberately non-selective observation and description are forms of recovering homogeneity through accumulation, through fabulous agglutination. Vision is style. The poet consistently proceeds to desacralize poetic language, but also the world it evokes. The intention to desacralize the mechanisms of his own poetic universe is achieved through the insertion of a denotative language, strictly contemporary, with terms taken from everyday life, with lyrical “objects” of irrepressible banality. Mircea Cărtărescu's poetry is the most viable achievement of the 1980s, through its real-imaginary translations, its vocation for the fragmentary and its temptation for totality, through its literary inserts and the verve of a language that constructs and deconstructs itself with ease.

Mircea Cărtărescu's prose, the most appreciated and publicized dimension of his work, is defined by excursions into the chimerical, autobiographical flavors, and poetic iridescence. The epic feeds on the iridescence of the chimerical, the effluvia of autobiography, and the aromas of the bookish, the reader acutely feeling the impact of the imaginary and anamnestic projections, but also the exultations of spaces imbued with nostalgic, strange, and ritualistic arabesques. The writer's ability to draw archetypal images, paradigmatic symbols, echoes of the original, evocative spaces of childhood resembling labyrinths that camouflage the past of the being in quasi-mythical scents and dreamlike reflections seems exemplary. In Orbitor. Aripa stângă, the structure of the epic is tertiary: autobiographical (regressus ad uterum, retreat into the elementary, childhood personality profile), metamorphoses of the literary imagination (figurative arabesques, space-time shifts, etc.), and playful, parodic, and ironic paradoxical insertions. To all this is added an abundant inventory of human figures, fragmentary portraiture, feverish descriptions, a fascination with origins, and a reconfiguration of the relationship between the real and the surreal. The author of the novel Solenoid is a builder of visions who recomposes the dreamlike substance of the world from a relativizing perspective, through the exercise of irony, pastiche, or playfulness, the dream forming a labyrinthine self-portrait, placed in the abyss, of the narrator, for whom existence is, in essence, text-existence, the repression of experience into the imaginary or an essential form of initiation as a way of accessing the Center of being. The prose writer thus configures in his texts a space-time in which dreams, chronologies, and confusing surfaces, reflections of the imaginary, illusions and fantasies, symbols and metaphors, sudden metamorphoses, unnatural translations between planes and spheres, shifts between antinomic ontic conditions, the dominant feeling in many prose works being that of heavy nostalgia, of an impossible return to an Edenic past.

The encounter between the narrative imagination and the anamnestic projections of childhood reveals (in Visul, in Travesti, but also in the masterpiece Orbitor) spaces imbued with nostalgia, places with strange or ritualistic appearances. What is fascinating here is the writer's ability to recover matrix images, paradigmatic symbols, echoes of the original. From this perspective, the spaces of childhood resemble labyrinths in which the past of the being is camouflaged, rewriting a time with quasi-mythical scents and dreamlike reflections, resembling the random images of surrealism: "The block was in the final stages of completion. It was attached at one end to a building that always made me uneasy because of its battlements and turrets, the infinite perspectives that I found in Chirico, and on the entire back side, towards the mill (another medieval building, of a sinister scarlet color), the block still had rusty scaffolding stretched across it. Behind the block, the ground was dug up by sewer ditches, which in places reached a depth of over two meters. This was our playground, separated from the mill yard by a concrete fence. It was a new world, full of hiding places, dirty and strange, which we, seven or eight boys between the ages of five and twelve, took over and explored every morning, armed with cheap water pistols, which we bought, blue and pink, from "Little Red Riding Hood," the toy store that existed at the time in Obor, the old Obor, that is, and which always smelled of parsley" (The Dream). The human figures also have playful or dreamlike reflections, and the prototype of the double is emblematic of the overall architecture of the narrative imagination, a recurring, obsessive topos ("In my head, under the vault of my skull, there is a little man who looks exactly like me: he has the same features, dresses the same. What he does, I do. When he eats, I eat. When he sleeps and dreams, I sleep and dream exactly the same dreams. When he moves his right hand, I move mine. Because he is my puppeteer. But the vault of heaven is nothing more than the skull of a giant child, who also looks exactly like me: he has the same features, dresses the same. What I do, he does. When I eat, he eats. If I sleep and dream, he sleeps and dreams the same dream. For him to move his right hand, it is enough for me to move my right hand. Because I am his puppeteer.").

The first part of the novel Orbitor, Aripa stângă, has the same paradoxical, multiply postulated tectonics; it is born from the magma of autobiography, with descents into the abyss of being (regressus ad uterum, retreat into the genesis of the universe), but it also contains a personality profile of a childhood that has passed. The geography of the imaginary thus emerges from a return to originality, from an appeal to the dreamlike register of being and from the incessant metamorphoses of the literary imaginary, with multiple figural arabesques, spatio-temporal shifts, or paradoxical ludic-ironic interferences. The inventory of human figures, fragmentary portraiture, the feverishness of descriptions, the fascination with origins - these are areas of excellence in Cărtărescu's prose. The image of the mother, for example, hyperbolized, has the suggestive power of a myth, of a gigantic, overwhelming projection: "My mother appeared in my poems, walking down Ștefan cel Mare Road, taller than the buildings, overturning trucks and trams, crushing tin kiosks with her huge feet, sweeping passers-by with her cheap chiffon skirt. The whole window was filled with her big blue eye, her frowning eyebrow, which filled me with terror." The reconstruction of the maternal figure is also achieved through the prism of meticulous contemplation, with exasperatingly precise details, of the dental prosthesis, an excursion into infrareality ("I raised the dentures above my head, and the teeth began to glisten yellow like salt flames, while the gums disappeared, melted into the identical color of dusk. 'Ah, mother,' I whispered in the madness of that silence. I stood for a few minutes looking at the dentures in the increasingly dim light, until, as dusk turned scarlet like venous blood, the dental appliance took on a kind of inner light, as if a slightly fluorescent gas had filled the arch of the rubber gums. And around them, ghostly, my mother took shape. First, the skeleton, transparent like the skin of marsh fleas, like a greenish, velvety, delicate X-ray. The skull with the large spots of the eyes and the small ones of the nasal cavities, the rib cage, the translucent butterfly of the iliac bones, the gelatinous tubes of the hands and feet and fingers." The image of Bucharest is also drawn with an instinct for hyperbolic detail, with a hyperrealistic detachment of vision, through the agglomeration of reflections of an ambiguous Referent, half concrete, half dream, relativized by a parodic and ironic instinct, even if the nostalgic embrace is not excluded from this narrative equation: "As far as the eye could see, Bucharest, like a glass model filled with blood, stretched out with its fantastic roofs: huge eggs, donjons, the towers of the Metropolitan Cathedral, the crystal belly of the CEC, the balls at the top of the Negoiu Hotel and the ASE building, the twisted mushrooms of the Russian church, the iceberg embedded with satellite dishes of the Telephone Palace, like the prosthetic leg of a child with polio, the phallus of the Fire Tower, all dotted with a population of statues depicting gorgons and atlases and cherubs and Agriculture and Industry and all the Virtues and Seneca and Kogălniceanu and Bălcescu and Rosetti and Vasile Lascăr, a universe contorted by limestone and plaster and bronze, covered in snow."

Remarkable in this order of poetic, gliding narration, constantly remade and unmade in its subtle articulations, is the figure of the labyrinth in Mendebilul, a feverish reconfiguration of the relationships between the real and the surreal, between dream and reality. Cărtărescu, an "architect of angelic or nightmarish visions" (Dan C. Mihăilescu), recomposes the dreamlike substance of the universe from a perspective that is both relativistic and precise, through the exercise of a luxuriant imagination. Under these conditions, the dream essentially reconstructs a labyrinthine self-portrait, placed in an abyss, of the narrator, for whom existence is, in essence, textistence, the repression of experience into the imaginary or an essential form of initiation, a means of accessing the Center of being. The dream that triggers the fable is a symbolic one, with images and metaphors of confinement, with mechanisms of repression and an imperceptible glissando of perception from the seen to the unseen, from innocence to guilt ("I dreamed about two months ago that I was simply locked in a jar, but one cut as if from rock crystal. I was spinning around in the jar, which occasionally sparkled with rainbows, and I was looking with great satisfaction through its walls at the fluid, flickering world around me. A bird was coming, flapping its wings from the distant mountains, and as it approached, it spread out, arching itself on the curved walls. When it got very close, I saw its huge, almond-shaped eye stretching out like a magnifying glass and suddenly enveloping me from all sides. I covered my face with a terrible feeling of shame and pleasure. When I looked again, I noticed that the thin outlines of a door had appeared in the wall of the jar, which sparkled madly. I rushed towards it, terrified at the thought that it might be open. But I breathed a sigh of relief: a huge, soft, flesh-like lock hung on the door.

Let us also note that time is an essential thematic component of Cărtărescu's prose. What is REM (from the short story of the same name) if not a space-time in which all the dreams of living beings intersect, in which chronologies and confusing surfaces come together, reflections of the most diverse imagination, illusions and fantasies, symbols and metaphors, all gathered in a utopian mechanism, half sacred, half real: "Some claim that REM is an infinite apparatus, a colossal brain that regulates and coordinates, according to a certain plan and for a certain purpose, all the dreams of living beings, from the inconceivable dreams of amoebas and butterflies to the dreams of humans. According to them, dreams are the true reality, in which the will of the Divinity hidden in REM is revealed. Others see REM as a kaleidoscope in which you can read the entire universe at once, from genesis to apocalypse." In fact, sudden metamorphoses, unnatural translations between planes, shifts between antinomic ontic conditions occur everywhere in Orbitor, a novel of the exaltation of writing, of the reduplicated imaginary, and of the recovery of the identity of being through the recoil into dreams, fiction, and eros. At the same time, one cannot ignore the fact that the dominant feeling in much of the prose is one of heavy nostalgia, of an impossible return to an Edenic, archetypal past ("We remain like this, twins reflected in each other, transmigrating into each other, mixing memories and desires, organs and domes [...] until we become what we had always been, what we had never ceased to be: one," we read in Frumoasele străine). Mircea Cărtărescu's prose, in confluence with poetry, imposes a tone, a vision, and an inner architecture of unquestionable unity. The image of a palimpsest with plural and immutable iridescence imposes itself; it is a palimpsest from which emerges the paradoxical creature of an ambiguous being in search of itself and in search of a dominant otherness ("Put together, these texts give the image of a single being: sometimes male, sometimes female, child, adolescent, adult, an innocent and perverse monster, in which all are united, a creature formed of countless angles that meet at a single point where it pulsates"). Mircea Cărtărescu's prose is the most enduring and valuable achievement of Romanian literature since 1989.

Solenoid – writing beyond limits

In a book of the type and nature of Solenoid, trying to find and value the imperatives of realistic prose (plot, fable, character, logically orchestrated plans, etc.) is a complete waste of time. This is a completely different concept of prose, which relies on poetic structures, forms, and registers, with an alluvial articulation of the imaginary. Speculative verve, revelations of the imaginary, and metaphysical stakes replace purely realistic observation, precisely articulated construction, or the illusion of verisimilitude.

The best attempt to define or circumscribe Mircea Cărtărescu's book - by first listing what it is not, and then by agglutinating qualities, representations, and effects - is offered by Vasile Popovici: "There are no adequate critical terms to approximate the strangeness created by Mircea Cărtărescu. It is not a novel, it is not just a book, it is not a creation, that is, a constructed, solid, and definable object. It is a force in motion, pure energy, which uses the author, the narrator, and the reader as media. We are taken in by a breath, a storm beyond these pages, and carried vertiginously through the misery of the communist world we have left behind, and yet not quite, through the heavens and under the earth, through Nervalian worlds beyond the corn and ivory gates of dreams, through insect bodies, through the gelatinous substance of embryos, through the unknowable realms of divinity, through desolate or fairy-tale landscapes, through states of bliss and despair and pain, through tears, blood, animal remains, and stardust."

With a heterogeneous, ambiguous substance, with multifaceted layers and dimensions of the imaginary, in a casual and paradoxical writing style that combines clarity and metaphorical volutes, Solenoid is a book in which the focus is not so much on the drama of an intellectual living in an agonizing, horizonless time - "I was twenty-five years old and had no future on earth. For a year I had been a teacher in the depths of Colentina, where I knew (and still know) that I would retire"—but rather on the epic of the human condition in general, disrupted by the earthquakes of history, in search of its own identity and its own ontological or ethical arguments and justifications. The writing itself in this book seems to be pushed beyond its limits, decentralized and non-homogeneous, dreamlike, esoteric or realistic, bookish and hallucinatory in its concreteness. Of course, it is impossible to decipher all the semantic or symbolic levels of the novel, the mobility of the epic construction expressing the inexhaustible openness of the narrator's visionary eye, attentive to the reality of immediate life (the suburban school, with human specimens of all kinds), and to the reverberations of memory, or to immersions in the abyssal areas of being.

Here we also find the favorite space of Cărtașian imagination (Ștefan cel Mare Road, with the adjacent area), a place where one of the solenoids that feeds a mysterious universe is located, made up of coincidences, revelations, and reveries of the magical imagination, of encounters and sediments of spaces and times, with an occult trajectory and a very pronounced carnation of the fantastic. Between the brutal beginning, with a grotesque tone ("I got lice again, it doesn't even surprise me anymore, it doesn't scare me anymore, it doesn't make me sick anymore. They just itch. I have them all the time, I shake them off when I comb my hair in the bathroom: small, silver-colored eggs, shining black on the sink tiles. Enough remain between the teeth of the comb, which I then clean with an old toothbrush, the one with the moldy handle.

There's no way I can avoid getting lice – I'm a teacher in a suburban school") and the final sentences ("Now, in a few moments, I will set fire to these sheets above the abyss. I will watch for a while as the ash flakes descend in wide spirals toward its unfathomable depths. Then we will leave towards the sunrise. I spoke with Irina and we know what we will do. We will walk along the side of the road, past the village of Voluntari and, towards Afumați, we will enter the small oak forest where we once gathered acorns. There, the ruined chapel awaits us, which will be, as we knew when we found it, our last home. There, among its dilapidated walls covered with frescoes, we will move, there we will love each other and raise our little girl, there we will grow old together. There, I will plunge my head deep into the waters of dreams, and Irina will melt like dusk into my chest. We will remain there forever, sheltered from the frightening stars.") In fact, the hiatus between expectation and illusion, between apathetic resignation and hope unclouded by lucidity, is established.

What has been emphasized, perhaps not enough, in connection with Solenoid, is the intertwining of possible worlds, the entanglement of ontic identities and textual references, from which this immense fictional mechanism is born, with its indiscernible metabolism, its immovable structures, its hallucinatory paths, access routes, innervations of the sordid and the miraculous. It is a universe with thousands of appearances, forms, and dimensions, from the communist space of damnation and inertia (represented by the low humanity of General School No. 86) to the fluctuating territories of dreams, with their subtle energies, culminating in the occult dynamics of the Solenoid, from regressions into filthy infrareality to images of salvation through access to meaning and primordial images, offering a broad opening onto the panorama of human destiny. Confusing, strong images are those of the fall, of damnation, of dissolution, through which the very profile of humanity's hell is drawn in etching, in which the lives of billions of creatures are consumed, seeking an unexpected meaning, an unimaginable understanding, a logic predisposed to absurdity rather than coherence and rationality. A work with a hybrid structure and nature, dominated by an abundant flow of images, fictional hypotheses, and hallucinatory figures, Solenoid alternates between images of the abyssal and the sublime, the hedonism of writing and confession, striking notation and unexpected revelation, solipsistic captivity in one's own self and the need for liberation through visionary detachment. In fact, in his book, Mircea Cărtărescu places, in the mirrors of fiction and dreams, the possible alternatives of his own existence, dominated by choices, options, chances and misfortunes ("Every moment of our lives we make a choice or are blown by a breath of wind, sooner down one path than another. The line of our real life strengthens behind us...").

The poetry in Solenoid is undeniable; there are many pages of pure lyricism here, in which words are dressed in the festive attire of great poetry, suggesting plasticity and subtly incorporating ideas into the flesh of metaphor and symbol (just one example: "Every being we remember is like a statue in a public square, at the crossroads of long spatial, temporal, and psychic boulevards." The journey to truth is, therefore, a journey to the indecipherable center of the Self, an initiatory, sacrificial itinerary, in which sacrifice is the most appropriate path to self-salvation. Fascinated by the sublime, the self ritually descends into the depths of its own being to rediscover its truth, legitimacy, and deep symbolic meaning. This is perhaps the ultimate meaning of a book that is impressive in every respect, through which Mircea Cărtărescu reveals a new dimension, a new identity, of undeniable scope.

The novel Theodoros (Humanitas Publishing House, 2022) stands out in Mircea Cărtărescu's writing in terms of theme, subject, and style, and can be related to Levantul, the heroic-comic and parodic epic in verse of yesteryear. The protagonist of the novel is a picaresque hero from the 19th century, a haiduc (outlaw) of Iancu Jianu, then a corsair in Greece and king of Ethiopia under the name Tewodros II. The evocation of the historical, cultural, and religious climate of the places traversed by the hero is dynamic and fascinating. In a Final Note, the author notes the importance of documentation, through the accumulation of dense details about "the geography and history, religion and culture, customs of the inhabitants, flora and fauna, what people drank and ate" in the places his hero traveled. The geographical regions traversed by Theodoros are represented in a specific picaresque-picturesque formula (relief, onomastics, style, language, mental identities) by a multifaceted narrative voice, with a distinct yet ambiguous tone that overlaps with the various particularities of the text ("Wallachian chronicle" and "Ethiopian chronicle") with a deceptive chronology and some shifts from the past to the present of the narrative ("You had become even bolder, and day by day you walked further and further down the streets, reaching Sărindar and the Mogoșoaia Bridge, and Sfântul Gheorghe, where a century and a half later trams 5, 16, and 21 would turn around." We find temporal contortions and distortions in several revealing fragments, such as the one evoking kites ("There were also kites in the shape of birds, locomotives, space stations, and Coca-Cola bottles, and even a kite depicting the famous German philosopher himself, otherwise impossible to see, hear, taste, smell, and touch by ordinary mortals") or the figure of John Lennon ("And John, who was to be a famous singer (...) had changed the world with his voice and guitar, with his hooked nose and round glasses, with his Japanese girlfriend always crouching beside him, with the boundless drunkenness of his wasted weekend, and finally with the five .38 caliber bullets he would receive in his back on a bloody December evening." The uncertain identity of the narrator(s) actually illustrates the polymorphic aspect of the novel, its divergent, heterogeneous, polychromatic writing, but also the multiplication of narrative voices in a kind of specular and autospecular dialogue: "From our clouds lit by the sun, carried by the winds, scattered and remade by the incessant rustling of matter, we look at you like eagle chicks in their nest on the cliffs, Theodoros. We write your story in the heavens, as it unfolds on earth, to be read at the Last Judgment, and it would be fitting, on such a frightening occasion, to have hearts of stone, but our hearts are neither stone nor ice, and we have sometimes found ourselves weeping, and at other times laughing, and often trembling with horror as we look down on the thread of your life, for your mind is so confused, Theodoros. It is true that man will never understand our hidden ways, just as cattle will never understand a page of deep thought, but neither will we, the almighty and serene and immortal, ever fully understand the human heart, so twisted and restless. For sometimes you are a beast in human form, Theodoros, and at other times a lily with a divine fragrance, and although you have trampled on all of Moses' commandments beyond measure, there is still childishness and wonder in your eyes, and the core of your heart is still tender beneath its rough wooden shell.

A hybrid, complex, paradoxical creature, Theodoros has in his own being a mixture of tenderness and cruelty, delicacy and ferocity, illusion, chimerical grandeur, and labyrinthine imagination. The subject of the novel originates from two letters: a letter from Ion Ghica to Vasile Alecsandri from 1883 and a letter received by Queen Victoria, which mentioned an emperor of Ethiopia, Tewodros II. Added to these letters is a massive, meticulous documentation about Wallachia and Ethiopia. The book stands out for its masterful, musical style, the harmony of its phrasing, and the subtle scaffolding of its language registers, as in the fragment depicting the love between Makeda, Queen of Sheba, and King Solomon, or in the description of Bucharest during the plague ("Near a fence, a man was crouching and straining, shamelessly staring at those who passed by, cursing him. Towards the middle of the alley, the Dâmbovița River began to appear, between the houses whitewashed or merely smeared with mud, where all the city's waste went, along with the effluvia of the tanneries."). The voluptuousness of the narrative, the charm of the abundant speech, the elaborate epic architecture, and the fabulous-epic atmosphere are the strengths of Mircea Cărtărescu's book, in which epic threads of disconcerting diversity, the lyricism of the atmosphere, stories and parables, parables and facts, images and destinies intertwine. The stake of the entire narrative lies in establishing a fictional biography, a destiny with a fluctuating and paradoxical identity, set in various epic contexts and situations, in a chimerical past and a fictionalized history. The protagonist, Tudor/Theodoros/Tewodros, is the son of servants of the Ghica family from Ghergani (Gligorie and Sofiana), and he traverses diverse social environments and strata (pirates, humble people, aristocrats, etc.), with successes and failures accompanying his evolution in the most picturesque settings, not without a dose of cruel and unusual naturalism. The realistic scenes are combined with a literary substratum of language, with parodic evasions and iridescent touches of the fantastic, whose innervations are inserted into the layers of the narrative. The epic architecture is made up of the fantasy and dynamism of the stories "woven together," from the élan of metaphysical propensities and the transgression of space-time limits in a symbolic and allegorical key ("The book spans almost three thousand years of humanity's solitary life, from the biblical times of King Solomon to 2041, when the last events in the book take place. And in terms of spatial extent, it covers half the globe, from Jerusalem to San Francisco and from Indonesia to Ethiopia, but also the micro- and macrocosmos, as far as science, art, philosophy, and the intuitions of the great initiates have made them accessible to us.").

Viewed by the author as "my modest 'century of solitude' and my first true novel," Theodoros presents itself as a sumptuous repertoire of picturesque scenes and characters, themes and motifs remodeled with grace and epic ingenuity, in the volutes of a convoluted and polychromatic, rustling writing, with bookish iridescence, in an original mixture of parody, playfulness, and exoticism. Mircea Cărtărescu's prose represents one of the most enduring and valuable achievements of Romanian literature after 1989.

The diary, by definition a (self-)mystifying literary genre, difficult to credit, is still enjoying a period of popularity. It is true that the more insistent the arguments of verisimilitude and truth in the egographic exercise are, the more distrustful the reader becomes, deciphering manipulations of sensitivity and image in the architecture of the writing. And then: how much legitimacy—from the perspective of authenticity—does an intimate diary made public, or written with a view to publication, have? Through its very intentionality, whether exposed or presumed, the diary is both enchantment and disenchantment, self-revelation and camouflage, mystification and authentication simultaneously. In his diaries, Mircea Cărtărescu notes the consubstantiality of experience and writing in terms of an equation that expresses the fissures of identity, with ontological fractures, blockages, or aporias, an identity with uncertain contours, constantly sliding toward the indeterminate and nostalgic retreat into the past ("I am my diary. I identify neither with my flesh and skin, nor with my memories, nor with my image in the mirror, nor with my name as completely as I identify with these pages, these notebooks"). The diary page, convulsive, tense, resistant to any model of experience, from Zen (2011) records changes in tone, in emotional register, from the exalted expression (in the first diaries) to the deceptive, tense, convulsive message of the present, a shift in emphasis observed even by the diarist himself: “What an immense difference between my old diaries (those from before, let’s say, 40 years ago) and the most recent ones! The former were triumphalist even in despair, the latter – desperate even when life seems kind to me. Now I am at that point where I have reached the furthest edge of my mind, so far away that I have forgotten, along the way, why I am moving forward. I have gathered so much experience along the way that I can no longer do anything with it, because every grain of knowledge cancels out all the others: to do something, you need to know a little. (...) In fact, of all literary genres—or rather, of all ways of writing—the diary is the most absurd. Your left hand gives money to your right hand. You write down, for yourself, what you yourself know much better than the one who writes it down, because the pain is real, while “it hurts” is a convention.

On the other hand, Mircea Cărtărescu's diary promotes a dialectic of camouflage and exposure, imposing a significant distance between the appearances of everyday life and the "essence" of the character who "reveals" himself in the mirror of this abundant, fragmented, and decentralized writing. In fact, the writer himself questions the legitimacy of knowing the truth about the creature that reveals itself on the diary page, suggesting, however, subliminally, a vast space of the unseen, the unshown, the barely suspected: "Those who read my diary do not enter my life, and not (only) because any text mystifies life. But because the meaning of my diary is not to bare my heart, as if at the doctor's. My true life is not accessible to words. The shell is not and does not represent the life of the snail." Beyond the numerous details of concrete existence, beyond the current gestures or the recurrence of data from his external biography, Mircea Cărtărescu's diary reveals the vicissitudes of an outraged conscience, the complexity of a mind exposed to the anguish of degradation, the obsessions of solitude, of the crisis of creation and of old age. The notes are often disillusioned, agonizing, devoid of breath, of illusion or horizon. Any will to power seems to have been evacuated from these tortured notes, while the awareness of degradation, aging, sterility, and exhaustion is increasingly acute ("I wait on my oilcloth chair for the adaptation to old age"; "For some time now, almost all the people I meet are younger than me. And, in fact, I no longer meet them, but their deference to someone who is not only older, but in a different taxonomic box"; "an indolent and lazy mind", "Writing has brought me nothing but the ruin of my mind and this endless burden on my heart. Now the trees of life are entering autumn." The dream world, family life, the register of readings, the odyssey of writing—these are, in fact, the thematic levels of these consistent and paradoxical diary pages, pages that make the theme of creative crisis the starting point and the ideological finality of the textual mechanism.

The excess of grandeur and pride that has been reproached in autobiographical writing is always relativized by a grain of humor or a self-ironic insinuation ("But do these people know what they received? What did they take home with them?"; "Write again after Orbitor? What exactly? Simple: something else, something completely different. For after every book ever written, something else has been written – with absolute shamelessness – after the Bible." or "O_3 is like 'God's slave' descended from heaven: impenetrable, uncollectible"). The diary often records the dramas and vulnerabilities of the one condemned to write, to write himself, with difficulty, with painstaking effort and torment ("I write every day as if I were serving a sentence. Literature for life. I write as if on the day I don't write I won't get food, or my air supply will be cut off. Not out of the joy of my heart, but out of fear of punishment. This can only result in something that smells rancid, forced, fake"). The pages of grace, of the ineffable, of the enchantment of the imagination are noted, but also the pages lacking in grace. The diarist records both the inspired phrase, the suggestive and vivid expression, as well as the platitude, the inexpressive statement, the banal notation, the emotional state with a striking, beatific ontic relief, but also the boredom, the spleen, the disappointment, or the drastic depreciation of identity ("Now there are only black waters, a black mirror over which nothing wanders. A mirror in an empty world, with nothing to reflect" or "I no longer have myself, I am my own widower, who lives his life as a survivor in a daze").

Mircea Cărtărescu's notes oscillate between uncertainties about his own writing ("I write appallingly badly, as if I were completely brainless") and his reaction to those who contest the value of his work (“You have been harassing me for twenty years. I have always written against a backdrop of ironic and contemptuous sneers. I have always felt your opposition, distrust, gossip, envy, and hypocrisy. These pages, stupid and useless, which you will quote in your reviews as new evidence of immorality and paranoia added to the file, have only one meaning: to leave here the burden of suffering, so that I can move on, freed from your hatred and my fear of you"). The reviews of Orbitor 3 prove, writes the diarist, “hatred, brutality, cretinism”; the critics are “those who mocked my book [...] as if my daughter had been raped,” and their articles are “detestable.” The diary also bears witness to the writer's readings (Hrabal, Gogol, Radu Petrescu, Borges, Virginia Woolf, Nabokov, etc.), his cultural habits, so that autobiographical writing, imbued with bookishness, saturated with the effluvia of books, predisposes towards a certain hegemony of the imaginary, or towards a cohabitation of the regime of lucidity with the dreamlike dynamics of the imaginary, through which the diurnal and the nocturnal arrogate to themselves a position of balance and compensation. An unstable network of voids and fullness, of aesthetic density and poetic expression, of expectations and promises, Mircea Cărtărescu's Journal assumes the stakes of an authenticity - half mimicked, half repressed - in which the agonizing image of a creative crisis is reflected in crepuscular and alienating tones. In these succinct and disparate notes, I have attempted to shed light on the front and back of Mircea Cărtărescu's inexhaustible writing, as it reveals and reinvents itself in poetry, prose, and diary entries, emblems of the same self in a continuous, effervescent search for the self and its own limits.

ENGLISH NURSING EPONYMISMS. A CORPUS-BASED LINGUISTIC APPROACH

Floriana Popescu
Prof., PhD, "Dunarea de Jos" University of Galaţi

Abstract: This paper presents a systematized view on the state-of-the-art of eponymisms in the vocabulary of nursing. The definitions of a few basic terms in the first section are complemented with brief overviews of nursing and eponymic nursing literature. The research materials and methods whose outcome created the corpus underlying the whole approach are discussed in section 5, and they are followed by personal observations emerging from the corpus linguistic analysis. As little has been written about the linguistics of medical eponymisms, this paper proposes a few taxa on these denotative tools. As, in their majority, eponymisms comprise a minimum of two elements, their linguistic description will have two foci: the personal name, on the one hand, and the common noun or noun phrases which are associated to a personal name, on the other. A linguistic analysis presupposes references to lexico-semantic relationships. This approach finally makes a brief classification of synonymic eponymisms and draws the conclusions of this research. Eponymisms have been severely criticised by numerous adversaries, who have sustained their exclusion from the medical language, seem to have lost their battle once these lexical units are still actively used in periodicals all over the world.

Keywords*: terminology; nomenclature; multiword lexical units*

Both translation and nursing have been among the occupations practiced since time immemorial, which have continually evolved. Nowadays, they enjoy a prized and complex position being at the same time sciences, arts and crafts. As sciences they make extensive use of theoretical models, principles, methods and criteria. As crafts and crafts, they both rely on the talent, skills and in-depth knowledge of their practitioners. But their shared features stop here because, unlike translation, which might become a job to be practiced in the foreseeable future (almost exclusively) by the AI, nursing will always be practiced by humans. This is because, contrary to any other professional field, the healthcare professions require plenty of humaneness in the doctor/nurse-patient interaction that is mainly based on the feelings of empathy and compassion.

The timeline of nursing starts in the ancient territories of Egypt, India and Greece and it has distinguished the premodern and modern ages of evolution. Greece holds a favoured position in the history of medicine due to Hippocrates of Kos (460-377 BC). Acknowledged as "the father of medicine", he authored Corpus Hippocraticum, which is "the first textbook of medicine containing, among others, the basics of physiology, general and detailed pathology as well as therapy" (Girzelska 2023: 9). Florence Nightingale's book Notes on Nursing: What It Is and What It Is Not (1859) is the milestone that marks the beginning of the second age of nursing. The book enriched this practical field with a theoretical model based on scientific principles, thus lying the foundations of nursing as a science. Florence Nightingale, who was granted the titles of "the mother of nursing" and "the lady with the lamp" founded the Nightingale Training School, which was the first secular school of modern nursing (Turkowski and Turkowski 2024: e66192). Presently, this institution is known as the Florence Nightingale

Faculty of Nursing and Midwifery. Ever since the publication of Nightingale's book and the creation of her school, both the word nursing and its related terms have continually expanded.

2. Terminological specifications

Nursing and eponymism are two of the key words in this approach that need a few lexical and semantic specifications.

Semantically, nursing is a polysemous word, encapsulating both a general and several specialized meanings, is used in everyday speech to name a profession (an occupation or a job). As a specialized term, it conveys a variable number of meanings. Some works describe the word nursing as a noun, which denotes (1) "the work or profession of being a nurse" and (2) "care for sick people provided by a nurse" as well as an adjective which means "providing care as a nurse" (Adams et al 2007: 205). More complex lexicographical works assign five meanings to the nursing, that is used to refer to

(1) "the practice in which a nurse assists" sick or well patients to heal, recover or have a peaceful death;

(2) "the diagnosis and treatment of human responses to actual or potential health problems";

(3) "the professional practice of a nurse";

(4) "the process of acting as a nurse, of providing care that encourages and promotes the health of the person or persons being served" and

(5) a synonym for "breastfeeding" (O'Toole 2017: 1246-7). Set within the comprehensive framework of medical sciences, this three-layered field, accepted as a science, a practice and an art, "has undergone remarkable transformations since its inception" (Williams 2024: 219).

Due to its numerous transformations which took place during the modern age, the timeline of this interval witnessed the following four periods:

(a) Florence Nightingale: the birth of modern nursing,

(b) the early twentieth century: expanding roles and recognition,

(c) mid-twentieth century: advancements in education and technology,

(d) late twentieth century to early twenty-first century: embracing evidence-based practice and patient-centred care (Williams 2024: 219). The evolution of nursing has impacted both culturally and linguistically the society in which it developed. Thus, nursing has been a topic of interest for nursing practitioners and theorists, nursing teachers and researchers.

The English medical nomenclature is replete with eponymisms rooted in personal names of real people and/or fictitious heroes of the Bible, classical mythology books, novels, drama, stories, myths and legends of universal and national literatures. The word eponym, inspired from the Greek eponymos meaning "given as a name, giving one's name to something" was first used in English in 1833, when it meant "one whose name becomes that of a place, a people, an era, an institution, etc."[1]

According to McArthur (1992: 378), the word eponym currently overlaps three senses, i.e.,

(a) "a personal name from which a word has been derived: John B. Stetson, the 19c US hatter after whom the stetson hat was named";

(b) "the person whose name is so used: The Roman emperor Constantine, who gave his name to Constantinople" and

(c) "the word so derived: stetson, Constantinople".

To avoid any possible misreading, eponym is used in this paper as a substitute for the

(a) meaning (i.e., the personal name of John B. Stetson), eponymee is the substitute for the

(b) meaning (i.e., the person bearing the name of John B. Stetson) and eponymism is the substitute for the
(c) meaning (i.e., the stetson hat). In sciences and medicine eponymisms most often consist of at least two elements, the eponym and a noun, i.e., [E] + [N], as in Mach number or Hansen's disease.

3. A brief overview of nursing literature

Nightingale's Notes on Nursing created a scientific space for solid, well-argued, thoroughly documented and reliable professional contributions. Nursing literature is now a comprehensive field with all sorts of contributions related to the theory and practice of nursing.

The two-volume historical monograph by Nutting and Dock, A History of Nursing (1907), and Fitzpatrick and Wallace's Encyclopaedia of Nursing Research (2006) were strong bricks to the foundation of nursing literature. Nowadays, it is in full progress as new works are published almost every year (Bowen 2024). At the same time, plenty of "classical" works in the field benefit from revised and improved editions. Thus, for just one example, O'Toole's Mosby's Dictionary of Medicine, Nursing and Health Professions has reached its eleventh edition in 2021, while McFerran's Oxford Dictionary of Nursing enjoyed its eighth version in 2012. Volumes approaching fundamentals of nursing (McKenna et al 2014, De Laune et al 2024, Potter et al 2025), essentials for/of nursing practice (Potter et al 2019, Delves-Yates 2022), manuals (Nettina 2010, Bench et al 2025), as well as coursebooks (Girzelska 2023), and textbooks (Kumari 2022). A rich collection of worldwide known periodicals, such as Nurse Education in Practice (a six-issue journal published by Elsevier Ltd., ISSN 1471-5953), Journal of Clinical Nursing (print ISSN 0962-1067), Florence Nightingale Journal of Nursing, (ISSN 2147-4923), International Nursing Review (a quarterly published by the International Council of Nurses in Geneva, ISSN 0020-8132), and International Journal of Nursing and Health Care Research (ISSN 2688 9501) provide access to the latest discoveries, innovative methods, techniques and good practices in the field.

The current approach to nursing focused on terminological issues brings to the fore some aspects that have hardly been examined to this date by contributions to specialist literature.

4. A brief overview of eponymic nursing literature

Medical eponymic literature is impressive due to hundreds and hundreds of contributions in the form of monographs (Somford 2018), doctoral dissertations (van Sterkenburg 2012), serial articles (Yale et al 2023a; 2023b, 2024; 2025), articles (Ng, Qin 2025), and a guide (ten Donkelaar et al 2025).

Topically, the field of eponymic literature is as generous as the writing formats it is presented in. Thus, predominant among the topics are the epidemiologic approaches (Anderson et al 2023, Draves et al 2024, Agrawal et al 2025) and presentations of eponymisms in diverse medical branches (Brazel et al. 2022, He et al 2022, Warren 2024).

Despite this diverse and rich eponymic literature, little has been written on the eponymic terminology of nursing, which has its own collection of medical denominations based on or derived from personal names. An earlier contribution to honour the personalities that have left their imprint on the field of nursing was made by Daifullah Al Aboud's (2012).

5. Research materials, methods and questions

The corpus underlying this research was created with both empirical and computer-based methods. The careful reading and manual selection of the entries in a hard copy nursing dictionary (2007) was the basic method further applied in the work with pdf format versions of the following works: Dictionary of Nursing (Adams 2007), Oxford Dictionary of Nursing (McFerran 2021), Mosby's Dictionary of Medicine, Nursing and Health Professions (O'Toole 2017). Semantic Scholar and Google Scholar, the AI-powered research tools for scientific literature as well as the PubMed resources were also used to update my personal data bank with the contributions in the field of medical eponymy published after 2021. My previous research, presented in two co-authored monographs that were published in 2021, accounted for a comprehensive bibliography on the eponymic literature published between 1903, when George L. Richards expressed his opinions on "The Evil of Eponyms" and 2021. As this research furthers my previous contributions, the follow-up of the bibliography was limited to the time interval between 2021 and 2025. The questions that triggered this research were those below:

(a) Is there such an eponymism as the "nursing eponymism"?
(b) To what extant do nursing eponymisms resemble the structure of medical eponymisms used in other branches of medicine?
(c) What is the specificity of nursing eponymisms, if any?

All these questions find their answers indirectly formulated between the lines.

6. Findings and commentary

My search for the words "eponym" and "eponymic" was so extended as to cover the Semantic Scholar and PubMed websites. An obvious polarity strikes at a first glimpse: the former source provided 89 contributions of the published between 2020 and 2025, whose titles comprised eponymisms and the latter pinpointed only 3. The outcome of my eponymism hunting materialized in a corpus containing 431 eponymisms. Only 28 eponymic formations pertain exclusively to the field of nursing, the rest being shared with other branches of medicine. In other words, nursing eponymisms represent a very low percentage of the whole set of medical eponymisms

6.1.Lexico-semantic features of medical eponymisms

According to their linguistic structure, eponymisms are formulaic representations that contain an eponym [E] and a common noun [N]. This basic binomial pattern has revealed the possibility of both the [E] and [N] components to expand both the former and the latter component. This corpus-based structural analysis, which accounts for a two-fold taxonomy, considering either component of the general binomial structure, identified the following typologies:

(a) surname in the nominative, followed by a noun, e.g. Angelman syndrome, Alzheimer plaque, Diogenes syndrome
(b) surname in the genitive, followed by a noun, e.g. Baker's cyst, Battle's sign
(c) adjectivized personal name, followed by a noun, e.g. Haversian system, Malpighian body, Wallerian degeneration
(d) the eponymee's (apparently) full name, followed by a noun, e.g. Pierre Robin syndrome (< Pierre Robin, a twentieth century French dentist and physician), Argyll Robertson pupil (< Douglas Argyll Robertson, a nineteenth century Scottish ophthalmologist and surgeon), Denis Browne splint (< Sir Denis John Wolko Browne, a twentieth century Australian orthopaedic and general surgeon working in Britain)
(e) two-hyphened eponymic elements as one person's names, followed by a noun, e.g. Brown-Séquard syndrome (< Charles Edward Brown-Séquard, nineteenth century French physiologist), Albers-Schonberg's disease (< HE Albers-Schonberg, German radiologist, 1865–1921)
(f) two-hyphened eponyms, i.e., surnames of two persons, followed by a noun, e.g. Arnold-Chiari malformation (< Julius A Arnold, German pathologist and Hans von Chiari, Austrian pathologist), Dandy-Walker syndrome (< W. E. Dandy and A. E. Walker, US surgeons)

(g) three-hyphened eponyms, i.e., surnames of three persons, followed by a noun, e.g. Gerstmann–Straussler–Scheinker syndrome/disease (< Josef Gerstmann, Ernst Sträussler, and Ilya Mark Scheinker) described this familial prion disorder in Austria in 1936, Hand–Schüller–Christian disease (< A. Hand (1868–1949), US paediatrician; A. Schüller (1874–1958), Austrian neurologist; H. A. Christian (1876–1951), US physician), Steele-Richardson-Olszewski syndrome (< J. C. Steele and J. C. Richardson, 20th century Canadian neurologists; J. Olszewski (1913–64), a Polish-born Canadian neuropathologist)

The distinction made under (e) and (f) appears to be linguistically irrelevant. And yet, when the eponyms belong to two persons, as is the case with A. Russell (1914–2003), a British pathologist and H. K. Silver (1918–91), a US paediatrician, dictionaries specify the two variants of a disorder or disease name, such as Russell–Silver syndrome also known as Silver–Russell syndrome (McFerren 2017: 1842).

The second section of the current taxonomy classifies nursing eponymisms starting from the nature and structure of the [N] component. Personal names are associated with nouns that preserve their core, best-known or basic meaning, such as pledge in Nightingale pledge, fracture in Pott's fracture and model in Peplau's model. In sum, all these examples include common nouns [Ns] which belong to the word stock. But other [Ns] pertaining to the same lexical layer show an alteration of their everyday meaning. Thus, solution, in Hartmann's solution is "a chemical solution used in drips to replace body fluids lost in dehydration" (Adams 2007: 127), knife in Beer's knife is a special instrument with a triangular blade, created to be used in eye operations (Adams et al 2007: 30), and method in Ziehl–Neelsen method is a way used to identify the acid-fast bacteria. Similarly, the Pearson bed is a bed, but a special "type of bed with a Balkan frame, a rectangular frame attached to and overhanging the bed, used mainly for people with splints" (Adams et al 2007: 223). Bag, in Politzer bag is an instrument that is "used to blow air into the middle ear to unblock a Eustachian tube" (Adams et al 2007: 236). In line with these, a few other examples are mentioned: body in Barr body, frame in Stryker frame, manoeuvre in Kocher manoeuvre, spot in Roth spot, jacket in Sayre's jacket, layer in Malpighian layer, point in McBurney's point, pin in Steinmann's pin, ring in Bandl's ring and splint in Braun's splint. The [Ns] solution, knife, bed and bag, as well as the examples in the preceding sentence, illustrate the specialization of meaning, i.e., a semantic change, frequently used in the enrichment of professional vocabularies. Included in the word stock but used with a healthcare-related meaning, these words are often referred to as "semi-technical" (Mackay and Mountford 1978: 145).

Common nouns, which co-occur with eponyms and create lexical units with an established meaning, includes specialisms or "technical words" (idem), i.e., words which are peculiar to professional vocabularies, such as:

(a) names of anatomical elements: gland (e.g. Bartholin's glands), foramen (e.g. Magendie's foramen), teeth (e.g. Hutchinson's teeth)
(b) names of diseases: lymphoma (e.g. non-Hodgkins lymphoma), dysentery (e.g. Sonne dysentery), granulomatosis (e.g. Wegener's granulomatosis), ulcer (e.g. Mooren's ulcer), encephalopathy (e.g. Wernicke's encephalopathy)
(c) names of medical procedures or interventions: operation (e.g. Shirodkar's operation), suture (e.g. Lembert's suture), traction (e.g. Russell traction), amputation (e.g. Syme's amputation)
(d) names of medical devices and instruments: clips (e.g. Michel's clips), catheter (e.g. Swan-Ganz catheter), clamps (e.g. Charnley clamps), syringe (e.g. Higginson's syringe),

The eponymisms whose second element is a noun group [NG] are less numerous, and they show the following structures:

(a) [E] + [NG: adj + noun], e.g., Albright's hereditary osteodystrophy, Becker muscular dystrophy, Gesell's developmental chart
(b) [E] + [NG: noun + noun], e.g., Goldmann applanation tonometer, Ishihara colour charts
(c) [E] + [E] + [NG: adj + noun], e.g., Lambert-Eaton myasthenic syndrome.

6.2. Synonymous eponymisms

The huge array of eponymisms which characterize the medical terminology appear as either irreplaceable denominations or as couples or even clusters of synonyms. Synonyms, which are "defined as words with similar or very close meanings and they are rather unwanted phenomena in medical terminology" (Džuganová 2013: 61), have a high frequency of "occurrence in medical language since many languages have adopted Greek/Latin-derived terminology and simultaneously have developed native terminology" (Kujawska-Lis 2018: 84). With the help of the "OR"-relationship Gray would use them in his Anatomy (1858), in numerous alternative constructions, such as "pituitary fossa or sella Turcica" (Gray 1858: 32), "pterygoid process or tuberosity" (Gray 1858: 36), "foramen lacerum posterius or jugular foramen" (Gray 1858: 58).

Synonyms, which include eponyms, are also numerous in present-day medical language and the following taxonomy showcases:

(a) eponymisms with a double denomination, which result from:
i)the use of the eponym in both its nominative and genitive forms, e.g. Aschoff nodules or Aschoff's nodules, Kupffer's cells or Kupffer cells, Marfan's syndrome or Marfan syndrome, Thomas's splint or Thomas splint
ii) the use of the eponym in both its Saxon and prepositional genitive, e.g. Fallot's tetralogy and tetralogy of Fallot or Henle's loop same as loop of Henle
iii) inversion, e.g. Barré-Guillain syndrome or Guillain-Barré syndrome, Abbott-Miller tube and Miller-Abbot tube
iv) the waiving of one eponym in the case of those eponymisms that associate two or three eponyms in their formula, e. g. Henoch's purpura or Henoch-Schönlein purpura, Klumpke's paralysis or Déjerine-Klumpke's syndrome and Prader–Willi syndrome or Prader–Willi–Labhart syndrome

(b) pairs of denominations whose common nouns are interchangeably used:
i) disease and syndrome e.g., Lesch-Nyhan disease or Lesch-Nyhan syndrome, Ménière's disease or Ménière's syndrome, Reiter's disease or Reiter's syndrome
ii) disease and phenomenon, e.g. Raynaud's disease or Raynaud's phenomenon
iii) reaction and syndrome, e.g. Eisenmenger reaction or Eisenmenger syndrome
iv) reaction and test, e.g. Paul–Bunnell reaction or Paul–Bunnell test
v) manoeuvre and test, e.g. Adson's manoeuvre or Adson's test
vi) umour and sarcoma, e.g. Ewing's tumour or Ewing's sarcoma
vii) syndrome or tear, e.g. Mallory-Weiss syndrome or Mallory-Weiss tear

(c) an eponymism can be meaningfully similar to another eponymism e.g. Guillain-Barré syndrome also called Landry's paralysis, Heaf test also called Mantoux test
Manchester operation also known as Fothergill operation
Malpighian glomerulus same as Bowman's capsule

(d) an eponymism can be meaningfully similar to
i) an English clinical denomination
e.g. Angelman syndrome same as happy puppet syndrome Whipple's operation or pancreatomy

ii) a clinical denomination in Latin or transliterated Greek

e.g. Addison's anaemia same as pernicious anaemia

Bazin's disease same as erythema induratum

(e) (e) an eponymism can be meaningfully similar to both other eponymisms and one or more clinical denominations

e.g. Feer's disease = Swift's disease = erythroderma polyneuropathy = pink disease

Hand-Schuller-Christian disease (=HSC) = eosinophilic granuloma = Letterer-Siwe syndrome.

The few eponymisms in the foregoing represent a category of difficult and complex medical denominations whose understanding requires the existence of good explanatory dictionaries and the mastering of in-depth knowledge on such formations.

6.3.Nursing eponymisms

All the examples in the foregoing represent a lexical heritage that is shared by two or more branches of medicine, such as oncology (e.g. Ewing's sarcoma), ophthalmology (e.g. Argyll Robertson pupil), surgery (e.g. Shirodkar's operation) and dermatology (e.g. Kaposi sarcoma). Nursing theories and models contribute to the development of nursing profession by supporting the independent roles of nurses during care delivery in accordance with nursing process (Ozdemir 2019: 1279). The "mother of nursing" is celebrated in the following eponymisms: the Florence Nightingale Medal, nightingale ward, the Nightingale theory and the previously mentioned name of faculty. The denominations of nursing theories or models represent the pure nursing eponymisms, being the only name-including compounds, which are peculiar to this specific field. The excerpt below illustrates a few more nursing eponymisms in a coherent text: "Despite the criticism of nursing theories, they can help us to achieve these requirements. For example, as seen earlier, empowering patient self-care and autonomy is congruent with the theory of self-care developed by Dorothea Orem (1980, 1991). Similarly, supporting patients towards independence in their ADLs is core to Roper et al.'s theory. Callista Roy (1980) emphasised the need for patients to adapt to their environment and to their own abilities" (McKenna et al 2014: 20-21).

The inventory of nursing eponymisms comprises binomial patterns (e.g. Casey's model, Henderson's model, King's model, Orem's model), trinomial structures (e.g. Corbin and Strauss method, Glasser and Strauss method) and multi-word or polynomial eponymisms (e.g. Meleis's transition theory, Im and Meleis transition model, Barnard's model of parent-child interaction, Dreyfus model of skill acquisition, and Benner's Novice to Expert Model Perspective). In addition to all these examples, the corpus includes 15 multiword eponymisms peculiar to the nursing nomenclature. Although nursing eponymisms are rather scarce, they are rich enough to provide examples showing that they follow the same structures as the other similar medical formations. In other words, they include full name eponyms (e.g. Faye Glenn Abdellah's Nursing Theory), two or three eponyms (e.g. Roper, Logan, and Tierney model) as well as compound noun phrases (e.g. Melzack and Wall's gate control theory) or complex noun phrases (e.g. Fawcett's theoretical method of derivation).

Similarly, to Aaron's sign, Aase's syndrome and Abadie's sign, all the model / method / theory-including eponymisms have no synonymic variants. Nursing eponymisms have no synonyms, but medical eponymisms have a different alternative.

6.4.Contribution of the paper

This paper demonstrated that the field of nursing has created its own formations which contribute to the enrichment of the medical vocabulary. These formations have a wide variety of structures, comprising binomial, trinomial and polynomial formations, which associate either two or three personal names with one common noun or one personal name with a complex noun phrase. Medical terminology analysts who have developed a campaign against the use of eponymisms seem to have won a victory: numerous nursing eponymisms have not been included in dictionaries of nursing. Their victory is just partial for many authors appeal to eponymisms in their review and/or research articles, metadata analyses and epidemiologic studies.

7. Conclusions

This approach to the linguistic features of nursing eponymisms proved that they represent a modest percentage within the total of medical denominations which include personal names. This research identified and argued in favour of both formal and semantic similarities and dissimilarities between the classes of denominations. In the latter half of the essay, the formal specificity of nursing eponymisms was emphasized. Eponymization in the field of nursing started its contributions soon after 1859 and it has remained receptive ever since.

PRAGMATIC SAPIENTIAL ASPECTS IN LITERARY WORKS FOR CHILDREN

Larisa Ileana Casangiu
Assoc. Prof., PhD, University "Ovidius" of Constanța

Abstract: In this article, we have chosen to highlight several aspects of great utility and relevance that appear in three literary works for children. Thus, in addition to offering desirable communication models in certain life contexts, we aim to identify possible ways to recognize, understand, prevent or counteract bullying, in the following literary works: Milton's Secret (by Eckhart Tolle and Robert S. Friedman), Billionaire Boy (by David Walliams), and Pollyanna. (by Eleonor H. Porter). Although only the first two of these previously listed works contain episodes subsumable to bullying, the presence of the other book is motivated by the fact that it could provide the opportunity not to equate any undesirable behaviour with bullying, but also to offer solutions to live serenely even in the case of atrocities (real or anticipated).

Premise teoretice și precizări necesare

Literatura sapiențială utilitară actuală valorifică înțelepciunea și experiența umană în contexte actuale de viață, având utilitate imediată, fiind o componentă importantă a unor acțiuni umane „spontane" [1] dezirabile [2].

Termenul „bullying" desemnează un comportament repetat și intenționat prin care agresorul își agresează sau intimidează victima în diverse moduri[3], având trei caracteristici: este intenționat, repetat și realizat printr-un dezechilibru de forțe.

Având în vedere descrierea termenului bullying prezentată anterior, opera Secretul lui Milton (de Eckhart Tolle and Robert S. Friedman) ilustrează parțial bullyingul, dat fiind faptul că Milton este agresat (îmbrâncit și amenințat) intenționat de către Carter, „mult mai mare decât el" [4], însă nu asistăm la o repetare a agresiunii, ci doar la o amenințare în acest sens.

În opera Băiatul miliardar (de David Walliams), gemenii denumiți „Râmătorii" (Dave și Sue Râmătoru) sunt personaje care ilustrează cât se poate de bine comportamentul agresiv specific bullyingului, însă într-un episod secundar al cărții, venit să reliefeze portretul lui Joe Bostan și aspectele negative ale îmbogățirii bruște a familiei acestuia.

În romanul Pollyanna (de Eleonor H. Porter), nu apare deloc bullyingul (în ciuda comportamentului mătușii Polly), însă învățarea jocului bucuriei ar putea contracara vulnerabilitatea celui care, fiind resimțit drept „altfel", ar putea fi o victimă a bullyingului.

Aspecte utilitare în operele literare pentru copii Secretul lui Milton (de Eckhart Tolle and Robert S. Friedman), Băiatul miliardar (de David Walliams) și Pollyanna (de Eleonor H. Porter)

Ceea ce prezintă în comun operele mai sus menționate este, în primul rând, utilizarea limbajului în context social, fapt care conferă scriiturii autenticitate, mai ales pe seama apariției oralității care este cultivată adesea în toate aceste opere în discuție. Fie că este vorba de ilustrarea limbajului colocvial, de jargon, sau de limbaj politicos, literar, micul cititor poate identifica concretizări ale comunicării verbale putând face obiectul pragmaticii lingvistice, dar pe care cel expus la astfel de situații de comunicare le poate diferenția intuitiv și utiliza acolo unde se impune adecvarea la un anumit registru verbal. El poate ușor deduce că modul în care ne exprimăm este necesar să țină seama de context și că, pentru a realiza un anumit obiectiv sau pentru a obține un anumit efect (de exemplu, să obțină o schimbare în comportamentul celuilalt/interlocutorului, să se distreze, să atragă atenția asupra sa sau asupra unor probleme, să inspire curiozitate, să ofere o lecție morală) contează foarte mult atât modul în care se prezintă conținutul mesajului, cât și tonul exprimării [5].

Dincolo de a le dezvolta abilitățile comunicaționale, literatura pentru copii le poate oferi cititorilor săi „ideali" [6] modele posibile de estetică literară, dar și de procedee stilistice și de posibile modalități de construcție epică (uneori, chiar lirică, în fragmentele descriptive).

Totodată, literatura pentru copii de le dezvoltă spiritul justițiar, dorința ca binele să învingă, iar echilibrul afectat temporar să se restabilească. Astfel, în opera Secretul lui Milton (de Eckhart Tolle and Robert S. Friedman), agresiunea comisă de Carter este motivată de către acesta printr-o explicație care, aparent, frizează absurdul[7]: „Milton! Ce nume e ăsta, Milton? Ciudatule!" [8]. Tocmai acest absurd, precum și molestarea fizică imprevizibilă (strângerea de obraji și îmbrâncirea) determină în cel care ia act de aceste comportamente nu doar consternare, ci și dorința de pedepsire a făptașului, concomitent cu reabilitarea victimei. Interesant este că, spre deosebire de numeroasele situații regăsibile cu precădere în basmul tradițional, de data aceasta, deznodământul nu cuprinde niciunul dintre aceste fapte, întrucât prisma prin care este conturat profilul lui Carter deschide perspectiva empatiei față de agresor, dat fiind faptul că apare sugestia că și el era victima cuiva (dată fiind tristețea care îl făcea greu recognoscibil în toaletă), ceea ce îi justifică, din punctul de vedere al Teoriei autodeterminării [9], comportamentul. Putem vedea aici atât o creionare de psihologie practică ce vine să explice comportamentul lui Carter edulcorând judecarea lui aspră, și, totodată, o modalitate ca Milton (și cei asemenea lui) să conștientizeze masca purtată de agresor, care îl făcea să pară dur și stăpân pe situație doar când avea „spectatori", nu și în absența acestora. Amenințarea rostită de el („Pun eu mâna pe tine data viitoare"[10]), care l-a destabilizat pe Milton, se dovedește o simplă modalitate de a se situa pe poziție de putere nu atât față de Milton, cât față de sine, sperând la o validare a acestei puteri pe care, odată ce pare să o obțină, o resimte ca fiind suficientă, fără să simtă nevoia ulterior să îi dea curs. Alterarea dispoziției lui Milton imediat după aceste evenimente este urmată de o ruminație nocturnă privind cauza agresiunii suferite, dar și teama de o întâlnire viitoare, ceea ce-l face incapabil să recepteze realitatea înconjurătoare, dovadă fiind faptul că nu aude miorlăitul înfiorător care se va dovedi chiar al pisicii sale, Ghemotoc. În ziua următoare, constatând că „Ghemotoc fusese snopit în bătaie. Laba dreaptă îi sângera, din urechea stângă părea că-i fusese retezată o parte și, din loc în loc, îi lipseau petice de blană" [11], după ce îi îngrijește rănile, îl întreabă pe bunicul Howard „cum se poate ca Ghemotoc să fie atât de fericit la scurt timp după ce a fost bătut așa rău?" [12], dorind, poate, să facă și el același lucru. Bunicul său îi explică diferența dintre pisici și oameni, arătând că „Ghemotoc poate cu ușurință să lase în urmă ceea ce s-a întâmplat ieri și nu se teme de ce-ar putea fi mâine" [13], pentru că „El trăiește în Prezent" [14]. Deși îi destăinuie bunicului său ceea ce îl apasă, iar discuția cu acesta este întrucâtva liniștitoare, experiențele noi pe care le trăiește, la care se adaugă temerile sale și informațiile filosofice despre „Prezent", se transformă, în noaptea următoare, într-un vis-reminiscență diurnă în care este urmărit de Carter, apoi de Brutus, vis care conține apoi o îndeplinire simbolică a dorinței sale de a trăi în „Prezent", exact când pare că este pe punctul de a ceda, însă își găsește salvarea intrând pe o ușă micuță chiar în cofetăria unde mânca adesea înghețată, iar doamna de acolo îi prezintă sub formă de alegorie o modalitate de a trăi în prezent și, implicit, de a contracara posibilul bullying și, în fapt, orice amenințare. Astfel, dacă bunicul îi vorbise despre exteriorul Prezentului, în vis, doamna care vindea înghețată îl familiarizează cu „Înăuntrul Prezentului": „atunci când simți lumina în interiorul corpului tău, ești în interiorul Prezentului. Și nu-ți mai e frică. Lumina te ajută să te simți puternic."[15]

Pasionații de literatură detectivistă ar putea fi induși în eroare de titlul operei. Aflarea modalității de a pătrunde în interiorul Prezentului este secretul pe care Milton îl deține și pe care nu i-l dezvăluie nici bunicului său, fiind convins că acesta l-ar putea descoperi singur. A intrat în posesia lui într-un chip similar revelației și nu doar că „și-a amintit ce-i spusese în vis doamna care vindea înghețată" [16] („Simte lumina din corpul tău și nu te vei mai teme de nimic." [17]), ci a și a aplicat învățăturile primite, convingându-se de utilitatea lor. Ghidul practic al lucrării „Puterea Prezentului" [18] este astfel accesibilizat micului lector, care poate experimenta, asemenea lui Milton, beneficiile practicării practicilor propuse de autor (spre exemplu, îndemnul: „Concentrați-vă întreaga atenție asupra clipei acum și spuneți ce problemă aveți în acest moment." [19], „Numai prezentul vă poate elibera de trecut"[20], accesarea puterii clipei Acum[21]).

Opera Băiatul miliardar (de David Walliams), invită la reflecție privind dezavantajele îmbogățirii bruște, absurdul plan de învățământ al unei școli elitiste și exclusiviste (apanajul celor foarte bogați), dificultatea identificării adevăratei prietenii, diverse probleme școlare cu mare grad de generalitate (prezența profesoarei hiperexigente numită „domnișoara Țâfnă", corupția, existența „Râmătorilor", meniul scabros al școlii de cartier), incultura și superficialitatea Safirei –„fata de la pagina 5", adevăratele valori umane, aspecte ale parentingului, dar și decăderea etc.[22]

Joe Bostan, un băiat în vârstă de 12 ani, își cumpără tot ce și-a dorit vreodată, atât lucruri utile, cât mai ales inutile, însă, abandonat de mamă și neglijat de tată, trăind într-o casă uriașă („vizibilă din spațiul cosmic"[23]), rejectat de colegii de la Școala de Băieți Sfântul Cuthbert, poreclit „Fulduleanu", „Hârtie de Budă", Miliardarul Fundurilor, Moștenitorul Curpapirului, Conașul Hârtie Căcănie, chiar de către profesori[24], studiind discipline școlare precum Purtarea pălăriilor de paie, Mâncatul de pișcoturi, Legarea papionului, Navigația cu prăjina, Cum să fie afurisit cu servitorii, Știința nasului pe sus, Cum să păşeşti peste un boschetar când ieşi de la operă, Curs de vorbit tare în restaurante, Subiecte de abordat la petrecerile însoțite de cină (de exemplu, cum miros muncitorii) [25], își dorește un prieten, tânjește după școala de cartier, după reintrarea în anonimat, după normalitatea care îi era familiară înaintea îmbogățirii. Imitarea fără discernământ a obiceiurilor bogaților, inclusiv al consumării alimentelor pe care papilele lor gustative nu le apreciau, le produc lui Joe și tatălui său disconfort, izolare, snobism și nefericire. Sunt aspecte pe care puțini copii le identifică drept asociate bogăției, cărora li se adaugă intensificarea bullyingului și a tentativelor celor mai mulți dintre cunoscuți de a obține bani de la cei care dețin foarte mulți, și care le pot face viața un calvar, reliefate la modul caricatural de către autor. Toate acestea se constituie în adevărate lecții de viață nu doar pentru copii, ci și pentru părinții care cred că bunăstarea materială se poate substitui conexiunii afective într-o familie sau petrecerii timpului împreună.

Nu doar obezitatea, ci și bogăția se constituie în aspecte care îi fac pe „posesori" să fie percepuți drept „altfel", ceea ce îi predispune la a fi victimele bullyingului [26], categoria aceasta fiind reprezentată de indivizi care sunt „supraponderali sau subponderali, au abilități sociale scăzute, au puțini prieteni sau nu au prieteni, sunt săraci sau bogați, au religie sau rasă diferită, sunt scunzi sau prea înalți, au slabe abilități sportive, sunt inteligenți, talentați, au dizabilități fizice, sunt persoane noi din grup, au părinți divorțați sau sunt pur și simplu «diferiți» de ceilalți" [27].

Totuși, cât timp Joe și Bob sunt prieteni și arată similar, bullyingul pare atenuat atât de faptul că ei pot discuta despre ceea ce îndură, cât și pentru că atenția agresorilor se diminuează (comparativ cu situația în care ar fi o singură victimă).

Romanul Pollyanna (de Eleonor H. Porter) nu prezintă niciun episod de bullying, în ciuda faptului că Polly Harrington își tratează nepoata orfană cu glacialitate și chiar cu severitate, în mod intenționat, repetat și de pe poziția de putere dată de vârstă, stare materială și de statutul de tutore legal (al nepoatei sale). Este interesant și de reliefat faptul că aceste trei caracteristici ale comportamentului mătușii Polly nu fac totuși din ea o agresoare, fiind motivate atât de dorința disciplinării nepoatei sale, cât și de dorința de a i se recunoaște autoritatea, rezultat al conduitei foarte rigidă a mătușii Pollyannei, împietrită sentimental și aparent lipsită de empatie, dornică să-și conserve locuința și bunurile materiale, dar și confortul cu care se obișnuise.

Despre „jocul bucuriei" ca instrument soteriologic am mai scris, însă dintr-o altă perspectivă [28], astfel că acum ne limităm la reliefarea succintă doar a valențelor care se subsumează temei sugerate de titlul prezentului articol.

Cunoașterea „jocului bucuriei", explicat de protagonista romanului („jocul era pur și simplu să găsești în orice ceva de care să te bucuri - nu contează ce" [29]) este de natură să atenueze traumele celor care îl joacă, exersând gândirea pozitivă și optimismul, întrevăzând în aproape orice situație gravă sau neprietenoasă aspecte pozitive menite să contracareze efectele receptării acelei situații sau să le diminueze impactul.

Practicarea jocului bucuriei îi repoziționează în chip dezirabil pe jucători față de provocarea sau dificultatea pe care o au de înfruntat, dar ar putea avea și virtuți apotropaice, de ținere la distanță a forțelor malefice, dat fiind faptul că o atitudine pozitivă, optimistă, plină de încredere în existența binelui și că el poate fi conținut chiar în aspectele negative, permite mai degrabă identificarea cât mai multor aspecte benefice în detrimentul celor negative[30]. Mai mult, practicarea lui este posibilă în prezența cuiva, iar în condițiile în care „prezența altuia poate îmbunătăți performanța individuală" [31], se subliniază utilitatea acestei practicări.

Lectura operelor menționate nu doar că pregătește cititorul pentru diverse provocări ale vieții, dar îi furnizează și instrumente pentru a relaționa adecvat în cazul în care un seamăn al său s-ar afla într-o situație similară cu a personajelor acestor opere. În plus, dacă „stările noastre de spirit au consecințe importante asupra muncii noastre" [32] și chiar asupra creativității („oamenii veseli sunt mai creativi decât ceilalți"[33]), practicarea conștientizării prezentului, a luminii interioare, a relaționării cu semenii și a jocului bucuriei pot inspira micii lectori în activitățile cotidiene desfășurate, dar și procesul învățării și al dezvoltării personale și, ulterior, profesionale.

Totodată, indivizii motivați de satisfacția intrinsecă a acțiunilor pe care le desfășoară nu doar că experimentează wellbeingul, dar și perpetuează astfel de activități de care se bucură mulți alți beneficiari direcți sau indirecți.

A FAIRY TALE MORE SUITED FOR ADULTS: CUNNING ILEANE (BY IOAN SLAVICI)

Larisa Ileana Casangiu
Assoc. Prof., PhD, University "Ovidius" of Constanța

Abstract: This article aims to critically re-evaluate the story Cunning Ileane, highlighting some aspects that show it to be more of a licentious literary work than a work suitable for children. This approach is made both based on the symbols in the text and the analysis of the characters' behaviour, and considering the cognitive evolution of children who, especially after the year 2000, manifest the desire to express their perplexities and observations, but also their value judgments. The fairy tale "Cunning Ileane" can convey to young readers that somebody can lie, tempt, deceive, destroy, but if he/she is authentic, this is appreciated and rewarded at some point.

Premise și subiect

În ciuda faptului că atât în edițiile letrice, cât și online[1], povestea Ileana cea şireată de Ioan Slavici este subsumată literaturii pentru copii (regăsibilă între „povești pentru copii"), opera prezintă o serie de abateri de la ceea ce s-ar cuveni în chip dezirabil să recepteze micii lectori care, în special în ultimele două decenii, mai ales sub influența evoluției civilizației, își exprimă la modul tranșant judecățile de valoare pe care le emit, dar și reflexivitatea, cu privire la conținuturile la care sunt expuși, dovedind interes și spirit analitic față de aceste conținuturi, fie că sunt produse artistice, aspecte moral-civice sau științifice.

Așa cum etichetarea unui produs artistic digital drept „desen animat" nu atrage automat după sine drept spectator ideal copilul (unele desene animate fiind exclusiv pentru adulți), nici încadrarea în specia literară a poveștii și incipitul „A fost odinioară un împărat..." nu s-ar cuveni să conducă la ideea că respectiva operă este una adecvată audierii sau lecturii de către copil. Ileana cea şireată ar putea să se adrese cel puțin cititorului adolescent, însă provocările pe care această operă le conține sunt mai degrabă adecvate cititorilor adulți, atât prin subiectele aduse în discuție, cât și prin dilemele pe care le suscită.

Succint, firul epic poate fi relatat astfel: un împărat, tatăl a trei fiice, pleacă la război cu împăratul vecin, lăsându-le prințeselor câte trei obiecte cu grade diferite de perisabilitate, pentru ca, la întoarcerea sa acasă, starea în care se vor prezenta respectivele obiecte să-i spună lui dacă posesoarea și-a păzit sau nu „credința". Nu se precizează despre ce credință este vorba, nici cum s-ar cuveni să fie aceasta păzită, însă, în vreme ce primele două fiice acționează cu frică de împărat și se distanțează de „ispite", foarte puțin abătându-se de la conduita moral-civică, mezina încalcă adesea o multitudine de precepte morale, uneori chiar nejustificat (gratuit), pentru ca, în final, ea să fie singura care și-a păzit „credința", atât pentru că „obiectele" indică acest lucru, cât și pentru că împăratul le pedepsește grav pe surorile ei mai mari, în vreme ce pe ea o gratulează verbal și faptic, încântat de conduita ei („o lăudă și o sărută și multă vorbă bună și împărătească făcu cu ea"[2]).

Adecvarea poveștii Ileana cea șireată (de Ioan Slavici) lecturii de către adolescenți și adulți (și nu de către copii) se poate demonstra, în primul rând, pe baza interpretării semnificației celor trei „obiecte" simbolice pe care împăratul, înaintea plecării la război, le lasă celor trei fiice ale sale – „câte o floare frumoasă, câte o păsărică veselă și câte un măr fraged"[4], împreună cu avertismentul: „A cărei floare se va veșteji, a cărei păsărică se va întrista și al cărei măr va putrezi, despre aceea voi ști că nu și-a păzit credința"[5].

În realitate, împăratul le lasă fetelor aflate la vârsta nubilă mai mult (chiar altceva) decât obiectele concrete, dacă avem în vedere și sensurile secundare (pe lângă cele de bază) ale denumirilor acestor „daruri".

Deopotrivă simbol estetic, al perfecțiunii (prin forma corolei), floarea este și simbol al castității, așa cum arată dr. Justin Neumann[6]. Că este așa se poate demonstra și prin faptul că deflorarea este sinonimă cu pierderea castității.

Dacă „Sfântul Ioan al Crucii face din floare imaginea virtuților sufletului"[7], pentru Novalis este simbolul dragostei, al armoniei și al idealului, în vreme ce, dimpotrivă, „La populațiile maya, floarea de frangipanier este un simbol al depravării"[8].

Totodată, floarea este apanajul primăverii și al tinereții, nu întâmplător sintagma „în floarea vârstei" desemnând această perioadă a vieții.

Simbol prin excelență feminin, mai cu seamă că, prin diminutivare („păsărica"), în limba română, în limbaj colocvial, desemnează organul genital feminin al fetițelor, pasărea se constituie și ea într-un obiect care trimite mai cu seamă la sfera sexuală, având însă și multe alte semnificații.

Astfel, în Rig-Veda, este un simbol al funcțiilor intelectuale („Inteligența este cea mai iute dintre păsări"[9]).

Tot în textele vedice (și nu numai!), pasărea este și un mesager (intermediar) între zeu și om, aducând celui din urmă soma/ ambrozia de pe un munte inaccesibil.

De asemenea, „păsările sunt într-un fel simbolurile vii ale libertății divine, eliberate de contingențele pământești"[10].

În Coran, termenul pasăre este sinonim cu destin („De gâtul fiecărui om am legat pasărea lui"), o idee similară fiind conținută și în reflecția autohtonă „Fiecare pasăre pe limba ei piere".

În arta africană, pasărea simbolizează puterea, fecunditatea și chiar viața.

În tradiția ezoterică, corbul, pasăre neagră, este simbolul inteligenței; păunul albastru și cel verde semnifică aspirațiile erotice; lebăda albă ar fi simbolul libidoului care zămislește viața corporală și, prin logos, viața spirituală; fenixul roșu ar fi simbol al sublimității divine și al nemuririi[11].

În cadrul creațiilor populare/orale autohtone, în special în doine, cucul simbolizează dragostea nefericită, tristă, este asociat stării de neliniște și îndemn la dragoste, dar și prevestirii de nenoroc. El este uneori mesager de jale al fetei înstrăinate. Mierla este un simbol al dragostei superficiale, dar și al dragostei adulterine și al necredinței. Turturica sugerează delicate sentimentele erotice - dragoste curată, credință în iubire, atașament[12].

Întristarea păsării echivalează cu prejudicierea feminității, a bucuriei de a trăi, cu afectarea funcțiilor intelectuale, a legăturii cu divinitatea, a puterii, fecundității și chiar periclitarea vieții (personale și a perpetuării ei), prin îndreptarea destinului spre făgașe nedorite. În funcție de contextul în care apare sau de perspectiva din care este interpretat, mărul poate simboliza ispita și păcatul (fructul interzis din Grădina Edenului), cunoașterea și înțelepciune, chiar iluminarea (Newton formulează teoria gravitației după ce vede un măr căzând dintr-un pom), frumusețea și discordia (Mărul discordiei), dar și sănătatea și vitalitatea (pentru că, dacă este consumat zilnic, „ține doctorul la distanță), tinerețea și nemurirea (denumirea insulei Avalon, devenită legendară, derivă din celticul afal/abal ce se traduce cu înțelesul „măr”[13], acolo zeitățile oferind mere cu virtuți magice pentru menținerea tinereții și a nemuririi), și chiar un simbol al recunoașterii valorii și a aprecierii erudiției (având în vedere electronicele Apple, dar și merele dăruite în chip de apreciere în domeniul educațional).

În zodiacul arboricol, mărul fraged este simbolul senzualității, în general, al ispitei, al dorinței sexuale[14], fiind, totodată și un simbol al revelației, al veșnicei prospețimi.

Putrezirea mărului trimite, astfel, la pierderea senzualității, a carismei și a instinctului de conservare a speciei/de procreare (de aceea, în final doar mezina se va căsători), a posibilității cunoașterii binelui și răului, la pierderea vitalității, a recunoașterii valorii și chiar a grației divine.

Sintetizând, la plecare, împăratul le lasă fiicelor sale tinerețea, frumusețea, jovialitatea, virtutea, dorința și bucuria de a trăi, doar prin șiretenie Ileana fiind singura în stare să-și păzească credința, dintr-un anumit punct de vedere ea denotând virtuți de Șeherezadă (prin inițierea unor aventuri menite să mențină suspansul și interesul feciorului de împărat: „numai dup-aceea să grăim vorba și să gustăm pomana și să începem dragostea”[15]).

Astfel, putem considera că fiica cea mare și cea mijlocie nu își păzesc „credința” în sensul că nu sunt congruente cu propriile valori, adică nu trăiesc și nu acționează în armonie și concordanță cu principiile și credințele lor fundamentale, că nu își calibrează comportamentul, deciziile și modul de a fi cu ceea ce consideră drept important, corect și moral. Altfel spus, între ceea ce sunt ele lăuntric și ceea ce exprimă (în exterior) există o puternică discrepanță.

Dimpotrivă, Ileana trăiește în concordanță cu valorile și credințele sale intime, crezul ei fiind transpus în acțiune.

Aspecte moral-civice reprobabile ale conduitei personajelor

Fiica cea mare și sora ei mijlocie acționează din frică față de împărat, rostesc anateme („flori să-ți crească în cale și spini să-ți rămână pe urmă”; „spini să-ți crească-n cale și flori să-ți rămână pe urmă”; „Să n-ai parte de altul!”[16] – de alt sărut [n.n.]), mint (se prefac bolnave, cerându-i mezinei drept leacuri fie mâncare, băutură de la împăratul vecin, mere de aur).

Abaterile comportamentale ale mezinei sunt însă mult mai numeroase și mai consistente decât cele ale surorilor sale. În primul rând, Ileana îl ademenește pe mezinul împăratului vecin, prin complimente și sugestia de receptivitate la farmecul lui („Cel voinic frumos cu față de împărat”, „De ți-ar fi năravul cum îți este vorba, de ți-ar fi sufletul cum îți este fața, mândre și frumoase, blânde și drăgăstoase, te-aș chema în casă, te-aș pune la masă și te-as ospăta și te-aș săruta.”[17]), pentru ca, apoi să-i anunțe testarea/cercetarea lui printr-o serie de probe („Să văd mai înainte: ești ce-ar fi să fii? Și numai dup-aceea să grăim vorba și să gustăm pomana și să începem dragostea”[18]).

Întrebările Ilenei pot fi în egală măsură metaforice, să probeze capacitățile științifice ale prințului, să-i verifice onestitatea, sau să-l caracterizeze simbolic: „Poți tu face să-nflorească din brusture trandafir?”, „Poți tu face ca să cânte liliacul în glas frumos?”, „Poți tu face să rodească măr pe iarba lupului?”[19]. Cum la primele două dintre acestea se declară incapabil să le realizeze, fata îi atribuie drept floare „scaiul”, iar drept „zi”, „noaptea”, în vreme ce, pentru că afirmă că poate să facă „să rodească măr pe iarba lupului”, îi urează ca aceea să-i fie pomana.

Scaiul sau ciulinul simbolizează deopotrivă dificultatea și rezistența la condițiile aspre ale vieții, protecția (în unele culturi fiind un mijloc apotropaic), instrumentul suferinței christice, dar și mândria, tăria de caracter și patriotismul (dacă avem în vedere că scaiul este conținut în logoul Scoției), dar și conexiunea (expresia „a se ține scai de cineva” este grăitoare în acest sens). Așadar, scaiul desemnează acele lucruri și evenimente care, dacă nu îl doboară, îl fac mai puternic pe cel care le-a experimentat.

Noaptea este răstimpul destinat odihnei, tranziției, aparentei izbânzi a întunericului, a morții, asociat misterului, spiritualității, pericolului, dar și revelației și regenerării.

Faptul că prințului i se urează ca mărul să-i fie „pomana” trimite la reflecție asupra simbolisticii mărului (simbolistică deja redată de noi mai sus), însă dilema se naște între a opta pentru înțelegerea pomenii ca fiind prințul beneficiarul ei (cel care o primește și se bucură de ea) sau ca fiind prințul donatorul[20], cel care o oferă...

Ileana, după ce îl ademenește pe prinț, face astfel încât el să cadă în visteria regelui, după care tot ea alertează argații precum că „cineva în pivniță ca să fure comoara împăratului”[21]! Și mai ciudată și neortodoxă este pedeapsa pe care aceasta o rostește: „Douăsprezece fete pedepsite să-l scoată afară din țară și când vor ajunge cu el la marginea țării fiecare să-i dea câte un sărutat.”[22]. Cum, oare, am putea explica unui copil ce se poate înțelege prin „fete pedepsite” sau de ce sărutatul lor la despărțire ar putea fi asimilat pedepsei?

În continuare, prefăcându-se că își crede surorile bolnave, fură mâncare și băutură de la împăratul vecin, însă, dacă gestul ei ar putea fi pardonabil din perspectiva dorinței de a-și însănătoși surorile (chiar când leacul este atipic), nu la fel poate fi acceptată dauna pe care ea o face familiei păgubite, căreia îi aruncă restul mâncării și al băuturii. Poate fi aici vorba de a atrage atenția asupra dejucării planului prinților de a o pedepsi, însă, pentru un copil animat de dorința de dreptate, este greu de explicat acest gest greu justificabil.

Ileana își ia apoi identități false, se deghizează, practicând meserii pentru care nu este calificată: pe cea de vrăjitoare și pe cea de preot. Mituiește atât vrăjitoarea, cât și preotul, pentru a se putea substitui lor. Află „taina spovedaniei” prințului și se folosește de ea. Le ajută aparent pe surorile ei, împrumutându-le obiectele sale, însă nu acționează în niciun fel să le salveze după pronunțarea pedepsei de către împărat.

În final, asemănător situației unei farse, dar în spiritul formulei finale a basmului, Ileana se căsătorește cu prințul, însă premeditează totul conform informațiilor obținute de la el în cadrul „spovedaniei”, iar ei vor trăi fericiți mulți ani și „împărățiră peste țară cu pace și cu noroc”[23].

Povestea „Ileana cea șireată” le poate transmite micilor cititori că poți să minți, să ispitești/ademenești, să înșeli, să distrugi, să-ți iei o identitate falsă, să fii arogant, chiar să practici meserii pentru care nu ești calificat, dar, dacă ești autentic, congruent cu propriile valori, acest lucru este apreciat și răsplătit la un moment dat.

În plus, statutul de mezină și de cea mai frumoasă dintre fiicele împăratului ar putea fi perceput ca privilegiat, în condițiile în care, spre deosebire de situația din basmul clasic, mezinul și mezina nu erau caracterizați doar de frumusețe și istețime, ci și de onestitate și generozitate în modul în care acționau.

În ciuda faptului că există anumite situații în care încălcarea anumitor principii etice poate fi acceptată, pardonabilă, în povestea de față motivarea limbajului, gesturilor și comportamentului Ilenei poate fi o grea provocare chiar și pentru receptorul adult, motiv pentru care o astfel de poveste nu s-ar cuveni să fie subsumată literaturii pentru copii.

REVIEW AND INTERVIEW ANALYSES ON GERMAN-LANGUAGE TRANSLATIONS OF ROMANIAN LITERATURE

Oxana Chira
Assoc. Prof., PhD, "Alecu Russo" State University of Bălți

Abstract: This article examines the reception of Romanian literature in the German-speaking world through an analysis of reviews and interviews dedicated to its German-language translations. The study highlights the growing critical awareness that translations are not mere linguistic transfers, but culturally and aesthetically formative acts that shape how Romanian literature is understood, valued and canonised in Germany, Austria and Switzerland. Reviews of works by authors such as Tatiana Țîbuleac, Liliana Corobcă and Oleg Serebrian show that translators—including Ernest Wichner, Sevghin Mayr and Anke Pfeifer—play a decisive role in recreating the emotional, cultural and historical texture of the original texts. Critics repeatedly emphasise that successful translations preserve lyrical density, narrative rhythm and psychological subtlety, while also making culturally specific elements accessible to German readers.

Interviews with translators reveal translation as an interpretive practice situated between fidelity to the source text and clarity for the target culture. Title adaptations such as „Der erste Horizont meines Lebens (Kinderland)" and "Tango in Tschernowiz (Woldemar)" demonstrate how translation strategies respond to cultural expectations and readerly horizons in the German context.

Overall, the article argues that German-language translations of Romanian literature function as autonomous literary events and essential sites of transnational cultural negotiation. The visibility, quality and interpretive depth of these translations have become key factors in the international recognition of Romanian literature, revealing translators as indispensable agents in the evolving European literary landscape.

Einleitung

Die Analyse von Rezensionen und Interviews zu deutschsprachigen Übersetzungen rumänischer Literatur eröffnet einen komplexen Einblick in die Weise, wie diese Literatur im deutschen Sprachraum aufgenommen, kontextualisiert und bewertet wird. Dabei zeigt sich, dass die Rezeption häufig nicht nur den übersetzten Text selbst betrifft, sondern ebenso die Rolle der Übersetzerinnen und Übersetzer, deren Entscheidungen, Strategien und ästhetische Prioritäten im Mittelpunkt literaturkritischer Diskussionen stehen. Die deutschsprachige Kritik weist ein wachsendes Interesse an der Übersetzungsleistung als eigenständigem kulturellem und interpretativem Akt auf, wodurch die Übersetzerinnen und Übersetzer zunehmend sichtbar werden als Vermittler und Mitgestalter literarischer Sinnproduktion.

In den Rezensionen zu Autor*innen wie Tatiana Țîbuleac, Liliana Corobcă oder Oleg Serebrian wird immer wieder hervorgehoben, dass die Übersetzung nicht lediglich eine sprachliche Übertragung darstellt, sondern eine Neuerschaffung, die die emotionale, kulturelle und historische Dimension des Originals im Deutschen zum Klingen bringen soll. Besonders im Fall von Tatiana Țîbuleac betonen Kritikerinnen und Kritiker die Fähigkeit von Übersetzern wie Ernest Wichner oder Sevghin Mayr, die lyrische Dichte, die psychologische Feinheit und das erzählerische Tempo der Originaltexte in der Zielsprache aufrechtzuerhalten. In Rezensionen in Perlentaucher, Spiegelungen oder literaturkritik.de wird häufig hervorgehoben, dass die Sprache von T. Țîbuleac in der deutschen Fassung nichts von ihrer Intensität, ihrer poetischen Sprengkraft oder ihrer emotionalen Rohheit einbüßt. Hervorzuheben ist, dass die Kritik gerade die innere Stimmigkeit dieser Übersetzungen betont: Die deutsche Fassung wirkt nicht wie ein Abklatsch oder eine Distanzierung vom Original, sondern wie eine zweite, kohärente Version desselben literarischen Universums.

Übersetzer*innen als kulturelle Mittler in der Kritik

In Interviews mit Übersetzerinnen und Übersetzern, insbesondere mit Ernest Wichner, wird immer wieder die besondere Herausforderung der rumänischen Literatur thematisiert. Wichner beschreibt Übersetzen als „Balanceakt zwischen Treue und Klarheit", eine Aussage, die in zahlreichen Rezensionen als Schlüsselzitat herangezogen wird, um die Qualität seiner Übertragungen zu erklären. Aus diesen Interviews lässt sich schließen, dass gerade die stilistische Komplexität rumänischer Texte – ihre rhythmische Struktur, ihre poetische Verdichtung, die spezifische Idiomatik und die kulturellen Referenzen an postsozialistische Realitäten – besondere Anforderungen an Übersetzungen stellt. Gleichzeitig wird deutlich, dass Übersetzerinnen und Übersetzer sich als Mitautorinnen und Mitautoren verstehen, die das literarische Erleben eines Textes im Deutschen überhaupt erst ermöglichen. Die Kritik übernimmt diese Perspektive zunehmend und würdigt Übersetzungen als kreative, kulturell bedeutsame Akte.

Übersetzerinnen und Übersetzer bilden die unverzichtbare Verbindungsstelle zwischen der rumänischen Literatur und dem deutschsprachigen Publikum. Sie sind jene kulturellen Mittler, die die Zirkulation von Ideen, ästhetischen Sensibilitäten und Bildern der rumänischen Welt über sprachliche und geografische Grenzen hinweg ermöglichen. Es lässt sich feststellen, dass Persönlichkeiten wie Gerhardt Csejka, Ernest Wichner, Eva Ruth Wemme, Ingrid Karsunke, Peter Grob oder Jan Cornelius maßgeblich dazu beigetragen haben, dass die rumänische Literatur im deutschsprachigen Raum Sichtbarkeit und kulturelle Legitimität erlangt hat. Ihre Arbeit besteht nicht nur im sprachlichen Transfer, sondern im Aufbau subtiler Brücken zwischen zwei kulturellen Universen. Sie rekonstruieren Erzählrhythmen, stilistische Feinheiten und identitätsbezogene Nuancen, sodass deutschsprachige Leserinnen und Leser die atmosphärische Tiefe rumänischer Texte als authentisch und zugleich zugänglich erleben können.

Literarisches Übersetzen ist damit weit mehr als die bloße Übertragung von Wörtern. Es handelt sich um einen Prozess der künstlerischen Wiedererschaffung und um ein anspruchsvolles Übungsfeld interkultureller Sensibilität. Übersetzerinnen und Übersetzer müssen sowohl die klangliche Textur als auch die semantische Dichte des Originals erfassen, das Rumänische in seiner kulturellen Spezifität sichtbar lassen, ohne es für die Zielkultur opak zu machen, und gleichzeitig stilistische Spannungen, Bilder, affektive Register und kulturelle Referenzen so vermitteln, dass der ästhetische Effekt erhalten bleibt. Besonders herausfordernd ist die Wiedergabe von Regionalismen, Archaismen und folkloristischen Elementen, für die es im Deutschen häufig keine unmittelbaren Entsprechungen gibt. Auch Idiomatik, Humor, Wortspiele und lokal codierte Anspielungen verlangen kreative Lösungen, die den Charakter des Originals wahren, ohne unverständlich zu werden. Hinzu kommt die Schwierigkeit, stilistische Experimente moderner und postmoderner Autorinnen und Autoren sowie polyperspektivische Erzählweisen so zu übertragen, dass die narrative Mehrstimmigkeit erhalten bleibt, ohne die Lesbarkeit zu beeinträchtigen. Es ist zu betonen, dass die rumänische Literatur in ihrer Struktur oft stark vom sozialhistorischen Kontext geprägt ist – von Kommunismus und Exil über die konfliktreiche Transformationszeit bis hin zu kollektiven Traumata und fragmentierten Erinnerungen einer Gesellschaft zwischen Tradition und Moderne. Übersetzerinnen und Übersetzer müssen Wege finden, diesen Hintergrund für das deutschsprachige Publikum verständlich zu machen, ohne ihn durch übermäßige Explikation zu didaktisieren und damit die narrative Authentizität zu schwächen. Daraus lässt sich schließen, dass Übersetzen hier nicht nur ein linguistischer Akt ist, sondern eine Form der Interpretation, kulturellen Aushandlung und Sinn-Neuschöpfung, die entscheidend dazu beiträgt, welches Bild die rumänische Literatur im deutschsprachigen Raum projiziert.

Eine Schlüsselfigur dieser Vermittlungsarbeit ist Ernest Wichner, Schriftsteller, Herausgeber und Übersetzer, der 1952 im Banat geboren wurde und seit 1975 in Deutschland lebt. Er hat sich im Laufe mehrerer Jahrzehnte zu einer zentralen Stimme in der internationalen Sichtbarmachung der rumänischen Literatur entwickelt und wesentlich zur Auswahl, Übersetzung und aktiven Förderung rumänischer Autorinnen und Autoren in den kulturellen Räumen Deutschlands, Österreichs und der Schweiz beigetragen. Seine langjährige Tätigkeit am Literaturhaus Berlin, das er über mehr als zwei Jahrzehnte leitete, hat diese Institution in einen wichtigen Knotenpunkt des rumänisch-deutschen Literaturdialogs verwandelt. Dort organisierte er Lesungen, Debatten und Begegnungen mit rumänischen Autorinnen und Autoren und trug so erheblich dazu bei, den Austausch zwischen rumänischer Literatur und deutschsprachigem Publikum zu intensivieren und das Interesse an zeitgenössischer rumänischer Prosa und Lyrik zu stabilisieren.

Als Übersetzer hat E. Wichner maßgebliche Werke von Norman Manea, Mircea Cărtărescu, Max Blecher, Ana Blandiana, Nora Iuga, Dan Lungu, Matei Vișniec und Mihail Sebastian ins Deutsche übertragen. Sein Stil ist geprägt von großer Aufmerksamkeit für stilistische Präzision, affektive Nuancen und den Erhalt einen unverwechselbaren Autor*innenstimme. Er selbst hat mehrfach betont, dass „jede Übersetzung ein Balanceakt zwischen Treue zum Original und Klarheit für die Zielkultur“, sei – eine Formel, die seine Haltung im Umgang mit rumänischen Texten treffend zusammenfasst. Die Herausforderungen, denen er in seiner Arbeit begegnet, sind exemplarisch für die Übersetzung rumänischer Literatur insgesamt: die angemessene Wiedergabe von Regionalismen und Archaismen, die Übertragung idiomatischer Wendungen und lokaler kultureller Referenzen, die Bewahrung formaler Experimente und komplexer Erzählstrukturen sowie die sensible Vermittlung des politisch-historischen Hintergrunds von Kommunismus, Exil und traumatischer Erinnerung. Es lässt sich feststellen, dass Übersetzen bei Wichner gerade dort zu einer Form künstlerischer Empathie wird, wo es um die Verbindung zwischen individueller Poetik und kollektiver Geschichte geht. Seine Leistungen sind daher zu Recht mit zahlreichen internationalen Auszeichnungen gewürdigt worden, darunter dem Chamisso-Preis und mehreren Übersetzungspreisen deutscher und rumänischer Institutionen; seine Tätigkeit bildet einen wichtigen Referenzpunkt sowohl für die Übersetzungswissenschaft als auch für die Rezeptionsgeschichte der rumänischen Literatur im Westen.

Kritische Stimmen zu Tango in Tschernowiz

Die Rezeption von Oleg Serebrians Roman Tango in Tschernowiz, der deutschen Ausgabe von Woldemar, macht exemplarisch sichtbar, wie Übersetzungen rumänischer Literatur im deutschsprachigen Raum bewertet und kontextualisiert werden. Kritikerinnen und Kritiker wie Ingrid Baltag, Thomas Mahr oder Tobias Larenz betonen die Präzision, mit der die Übersetzerin Anke Pfeifer den historischen Kontext, die atmosphärische Dichte und die psychologische Feinstruktur des Textes in die Zielsprache überträgt. Hervorgehoben wird dabei besonders die Balance zwischen persönlicher Erzählung und historischer Tiefe, die dank der sorgfältigen Übersetzungsarbeit erhalten bleibt.

Die deutsche Presse unterstreicht ähnliche Beobachtungen. Ingrid Baltag spricht von einer „feinen Figurenzeichnung, die nie in Stereotypisierungen abdriftet“ (Baltag, https://literaturkritik.de/serebrian-tango-in-czernowitz,30096.html, abgerufen am 01.12.2025), Thomas Mahr hebt „die Erzählkunst, die an große Gesellschaftsromane des 19. Jahrhunderts erinnert“ (Mahr, 2023) hervor, und Giulia Fanetti betont, „wie bemerkenswert der Autor Zeit und Ort atmosphärisch einfängt“ (Fanetii, 2023).

Zentrale Bedeutung kommt der titelstrategischen Neusetzen des Romans zu. Während der ursprüngliche Titel Woldemar im Deutschen kaum kulturelle Resonanz erzeugt hätte, aktiviert Tango in Tschernowiz sofort ein dichtes historisches und literarisches Assoziationsfeld – von der Bukowina über Paul Celan bis hin zur spezifisch mitteleuropäischen Vielsprachigkeit. Die Verbindung mit dem Wort „Tango" verleiht dem Text zugleich eine symbolische Dimension, die die emotionalen und historischen Spannungen der Handlung aufnimmt. Die deutschsprachige Kritik würdigt diesen Titel als präzise kulturelle Rahmung, die die Erwartungshaltung des Publikums lenkt und den Zugang zu einem komplexen historischen Stoff erleichtert.

Der Roman spielt im Czernowitz des Frühjahrs 1944, in einer Phase politischer Instabilität und wechselnder Herrschaften. Vor diesem Hintergrund entfaltet Oleg Serebrian die vielschichtige Geschichte von Marta und Filip Skawronski, deren privates Leben sich unauflöslich mit den dramatischen politischen Ereignissen verschränkt. Der Text ist den Hunderttausenden Menschen aus Bukowina und Bessarabien gewidmet, die den Exodus der 1940er Jahre durchleben mussten. Mario Kluge beschreibt dieses verlorene Czernowitz als einen „Phantomschmerz", der für die Bukowiner jedoch keineswegs imaginär, sondern eine reale Erinnerung an Verlust und Zerstörung sei (Kluge, 2023, https://wp.stimmederddr.de/wp3/?p=4462, abgerufen am 1.12.2025).

Aus der Zusammenschau der Rezensionen ergibt sich ein klares Bild: Übersetzungen wie Tango in Tschernowiz fungieren im deutschsprachigen Raum nicht lediglich als sprachliche Übertragungen, sondern als eigenständige literarische Ereignisse, die kulturelle Brücken schlagen und historische Erfahrungsräume neu erschließbar machen. Die Rolle der Übersetzerinnen und Übersetzer wird dabei zunehmend als konstitutiver Bestandteil der literarischen Rezeption erkannt. Die Qualität und interpretative Tiefenschärfe ihrer Arbeit prägen maßgeblich, wie rumänische Literatur wahrgenommen, diskutiert und in den europäischen Literaturdiskurs integriert wird. Die deutsche Fassung des Romans wurde von Dr. Anke Pfeifer übersetzt, einer in Berlin geborenen Romanistin und Literaturwissenschaftlerin, die sich bereits als Mitherausgeberin der Anthologie Das Leben wie ein Tortenboden. Neue rumänische Prosa (2018) und als Übersetzerin von Texten unter anderem von Marin Preda, Gabriela Adameșteanu, Mircea Cărtărescu, Nora Iuga, Lavinia Braniște und Constantin Abăluță profiliert hat.

Tatiana Țîbuleac im deutschsprachigen Raum

Besonders deutlich wird die Komplexität dieses Vermittlungsprozesses an den deutschsprachigen Ausgaben der moldauisch-rumänischen Autorin Tatiana Țîbuleac, die 1978 in Chișinău geboren wurde und zu den markantesten Stimmen der Gegenwartsliteratur aus dem rumänischsprachigen Raum zählt. Ihre Romane liegen inzwischen in mehreren Sprachen vor, wobei im Deutschen vor allem zwei Titel hervorstechen: Der Sommer, als Mutter grüne Augen hatte, die Übersetzung von Vara în care mama a avut ochii verzi, erschienen 2021 bei Schöffling & Co. in der Übertragung von Ernest Wichner, und Der Garten aus Glas, die Übertragung von Grădina de sticlă, deren deutsche Ausgabe 2023 erschien. Beide Romane dokumentieren eindrucksvoll, wie Țîbuleac Themen wie Identität, Migration, Trauma und Erinnerung mit einer außergewöhnlich dichten, introspektiven Sprache verbindet. Es lässt sich feststellen, dass die Übersetzungen dieser Texte nicht nur die Handlungsebene vermitteln, sondern vor allem die emotionale Intensität, die poetische Verdichtung und die spezifische Perspektive – etwa eines Jungen, der einen letzten Sommer mit seiner todkranken Mutter in Frankreich verbringt und dessen familiäre und emotionale Wurzeln zugleich in einem osteuropäischen Kontext verankert sind. Durch diese Übersetzungen wird Țîbuleacs Werk einem deutschsprachigen Publikum zugänglich, das auf diese Weise in die Erfahrungswelten post-sowjetischer Gesellschaften eintreten kann, ohne den universalen Charakter der erzählten Konflikte zu verlieren. Die Resonanz in der deutschen Kritik hebt besonders hervor, dass die Autorin gesellschaftliche Transformationsprozesse und komplexe Identitätsverschiebungen darstellt und damit maßgeblich zur literarischen Repräsentation des osteuropäischen Wandels beiträgt.

Der Roman Der Sommer, als Mutter grüne Augen hatte, hat seit seinem Erscheinen im deutschsprachigen Raum breite Aufmerksamkeit auf sich gezogen. Die Pressestimmen aus der Neuen Zürcher Zeitung, der Frankfurter Allgemeinen Zeitung, der Frankfurter Rundschau und Deutschlandfunk Kultur zeigen ein vielfältiges, aber in zentralen Punkten konvergentes Rezeptionsbild. Franz Haas von der Neuen Zürcher Zeitung betont die erzählerische Fähigkeit der Autorin, eine zerrüttete Familienkonstellation in Bewegung zu setzen. Er spricht von einem „kaputten Mutter-Sohn-Verhältnis", das auf einem „Sterbetrip nach Südfrankreich" eine überraschende Wendung nimmt. (siehe hier https://www.perlentaucher.de/buch/tatiana-tibuleac/der-sommer-als-mutter-gruene-augen-hatte.html, 1.12.2025).

Wolfgang Schneider beschreibt den Roman in der FAZ als „nicht von der Stange". Damit grenzt er Țîbuleacs Werk klar von geschlossenen Mustern herkömmlicher Coming-of-Age-Literatur ab (siehe hier https://www.perlentaucher.de/buch/tatiana-tibuleac/der-sommer-als-mutter-gruene-augen-hatte.html, abgerufen am 1.12.2025).

Auch der zweite ins Deutsche übertragene Roman Der Garten aus Glas zeigt, wie fein austariert das Verhältnis zwischen wörtlicher und symbolischer Übersetzung sein kann. Die Umformung von Grădina de sticlă in Der Garten aus Glas bewahrt den semantischen Kern, wirkt im Deutschen aber poetischer und natürlicher als eine Zusammensetzung wie „Glasgarten", die zu artifiziell klingen würde. Der Roman erzählt die Geschichte eines Mädchens, das unter äußerst prekären Bedingungen in der Moldauischen Sozialistischen Sowjetrepublik der 1980er-Jahre aufwächst; die deutsche Ausgabe wurde unter anderem in Lesungen vorgestellt, etwa am 22. Januar 2025 in der Buchhandlung Lehmkuhl in München. Dieser Abend, moderiert von Dr. Enikő Dácz (IKGS) mit der Sprecherin Julia Cortis und einer Lesung aus der deutschen Übersetzung von Sevghin Mayr, wurde vom Institut für deutsche Kultur und Geschichte Südosteuropas an der LMU München, von der Kulturreferentin für Siebenbürgen, den Karpatenraum, Bessarabien und die Dobrudscha am Siebenbürgischen Museum Gundelsheim/Neckar, vom Doktoratskolleg Austrian Studies der Universität Innsbruck sowie von der Deutsch-Rumänischen Gesellschaft für Integration und Migration (SGRIM e.V.) in Kooperation mit der Buchhandlung Lehmkuhl veranstaltet. Solche Veranstaltungen sind ein wichtiger Bestandteil der literarischen Zirkulation, da sie Übersetzungen nicht nur als Texte, sondern als Anlässe für Dialog, Interpretation und kulturelle Begegnung sichtbar machen. (vgl. https://www.ikgs.de/veranstaltungsarchiv/, abgerufen am 01.12.2025)

Liliana Corobcă – Wirkung und kulturelle Neuakzentuierung

In den Rezensionen zu Romanen von Liliana Corobcă wird deutlich (vgl. https://www.perlentaucher.de/buch/liliana-corobca/der-erste-horizont-meines-lebens.html, abgerufen am 28.11.2025), wie direkt die Übersetzungsleistung die Wahrnehmung der Autorin im deutschsprachigen Raum prägt. Ihre Bücher gelten häufig als Stimmen einer „osteuropäischen Moderne", ein Eindruck, der maßgeblich durch die gelungene Übertragung ihrer poetischen Sprache, introspektiven Erzählweisen und sensibel dargestellten postsozialistischen Erfahrungsräume entsteht. Besonders hervorgehoben wird der deutsche Titel Der erste Horizont meines Lebens, der – anders als Kinderland – die thematische Tiefenstruktur des Romans präzise spiegelt und dem deutschen Publikum eine angemessenere emotionale Erwartungshaltung vermittelt. Dies zeigt exemplarisch, wie entscheidend Titelgestaltungen für die Rezeption rumänischer Literatur sind und welchen Einfluss sie auf die inhaltliche Einordnung und interpretative Offenheit eines Werks im Zielkulturkontext haben.

Das Gesamtwerk von Liliana Corobcă verdeutlicht darüber hinaus, wie eng thematische Tiefe und titelbezogene Übersetzungsstrategien miteinander verknüpft sind. Als Prosaautorin und Forscherin, die Zensur, kulturelle Identität, Exil und Kindheit in post-sowjetischen Gesellschaften thematisiert, hat sie in den vergangenen zwei Jahrzehnten maßgeblich zur wachsenden Sichtbarkeit der rumänischen und moldauischen Literatur im deutschsprachigen Raum beigetragen. Ihr Roman Un an în paradis, in Ernest Wichners Übersetzung als Ein Jahr im Paradies erschienen, markierte den Auftakt ihrer Rezeption in Deutschland. Die Kritik würdigte besonders das authentische Frauenporträt und die psychologische Differenziertheit des Textes.

Im Fall von Kinderland, das ebenfalls von Ernest Wichner übertragen wurde, zeigt sich die translatorische Gestaltungsmacht in besonderer Weise. Während der rumänische Titel eine bittere Ironie über die vermeintliche Welt der Kinder transportiert, wäre Kinderland im Deutschen mit kommerziellen und spielerischen Assoziationen belegt gewesen, die den ernsten, sozialkritischen Kern des Romans verfälscht hätten. Der gewählte Titel Der erste Horizont meines Lebens trifft die metaphorische Struktur des Romans deutlich präziser: Kindheit erscheint nicht als freies „Land“, sondern als begrenzter, fragiler Horizont, geprägt von Elternabwesenheit, prekären Lebensverhältnissen und erzwungenem Erwachsenwerden.
Im Sinne der Skopostheorie von Reiß und Vermeer (1991) zeigt sich hier, dass nicht die formale Übereinstimmung, sondern die Wirkungsäquivalenz in der Zielkultur leitend ist: Entscheidend ist, dass der deutsche Titel bei den Leserinnen und Lesern eine ähnliche emotionale und interpretative Resonanz hervorruft wie der rumänische Titel im Ausgangskontext. Die Romane eröffnen dem deutschsprachigen Publikum damit eine seltene Perspektive auf einen Kulturraum, der zwischen Ost und West, Nostalgie und Moderne, Überleben und Sinnsuche oszilliert, und verdeutlichen exemplarisch, wie Übersetzungen zur nachhaltigen Verankerung einer Literatur im europäischen Diskurs beitragen. (siehe hier https://www.perlentaucher.de/buch/liliana-corobca/der-erste-horizont-meines-lebens.html, abgerufen am 28.11.2025)

Fazit

In der Zusammenschau all dieser Beispiele wird deutlich, dass deutschsprachige Übersetzungen rumänischer Literatur nicht nur Vermittlungsleistungen im engeren Sinn darstellen, sondern aktiv an der Formung des Bildes beteiligt sind, das sich die Öffentlichkeit von dieser Literatur macht. Übersetzerinnen und Übersetzer wie Ernest Wichner, Eva Ruth Wemme, Anke Pfeifer oder Sevghin Mayr agieren dabei nicht als bloße Dienstleister im Hintergrund, sondern als Mitgestalter literarischer Rezeption, deren Entscheidungen – von der Mikroebene der Wortwahl bis zur Makroebene der Titelgestaltung – maßgeblich bestimmen, wie rumänischsprachige Texte im deutschsprachigen Raum gelesen und verstanden werden.

Ebenso entscheidend ist die Rolle der literaturkritischen Öffentlichkeit. Rezensionen, Essays und Interviews fungieren als interpretative Instanzen, die Übersetzungen einordnen, bewerten und für ein breiteres Publikum sichtbar machen. Kritikerinnen und Kritiker setzen Akzente, öffnen Rezeptionshorizonte und beeinflussen, welche Themen, Formen und ästhetischen Besonderheiten in den Vordergrund treten. Dadurch entsteht ein dialogisches Zusammenspiel zwischen Übersetzungsleistung und kritischer Wahrnehmung, das maßgeblich zur Kanonisierung rumänischer Literatur im deutschsprachigen Raum beiträgt.

Daraus lässt sich die Schlussfolgerung ziehen, dass die Rolle der Übersetzerinnen und Übersetzer im transkulturellen Dialog ebenso konstitutiv ist wie jene der Kritik: Erst das Zusammenspiel aus translatorischer Gestaltung und kritischer Vermittlung ermöglicht die Sichtbarkeit, Differenziertheit und nachhaltige Verankerung rumänischer Literatur im europäischen Literaturbetrieb. Ohne diese doppelte Vermittlungsarbeit wäre die rumänische Literatur im deutschsprachigen Raum weder so präsent noch so facettenreich wahrnehmbar, wie es heute der Fall ist.

THE GENLISIAN CASTLE AS AN ENLIGHTENMENT PEDAGOGICAL SPACE : TALES OF THE CASTLE AND TALES OF THE COTTAGE BY MADAME DE GENLIS

Abstract : This article examines the symbolic and functional role of the castle in the pedagogical work of Madame de Genlis, particularly in "Tales of the Castle" (1782) and "Tales of the Cottage" (1823). By analyzing the transformations of these narrative spaces through the French Revolution, we prove that the Genlisian castle incorporates the Enlightenment ideals and that it functions not only as a setting, but as a catalyst of the moral and intellectual transmission. This study highlights how Madame de Genlis, unlike her contemporary adepts of the gothic aesthetic, preserves an "enlightened" representation of the castle, in which the place values the formation of virtues rather than the reception of irrational fears.

1. Introduction

Le château constitue l'une des thématiques majeures de la littérature française, traversant les périodes du Moyen Âge à nos jours. Symbole polymorphe, il reflète l'évolution des mentalités culturelles et des structures sociales auxquelles il appartient. Cependant, la critique littéraire contemporaine, comme en témoigne le colloque « Château et littérature[25] » organisé en Périgord en septembre 2025, a longtemps négligé une figure essentielle : Madame de Genlis. Cette absence dans les analyses des représentations châtelaines révèle une lacune significative, puisque l'écrivaine propose un avatar unique du château, intrinsèquement lié aux idéaux humanistes du dix-huitième siècle.

Stéphanie-Félicité Ducrest de Genlis (1746-1830) se distingue comme auteure de romans éducatifs majeurs publiés à la charnière de l'Ancien Régime et de l'époque contemporaine. Son œuvre traite de manière systématique la question de l'éducation et de la transmission des vertus, particulièrement envers les générations aristocratiques destinées à assumer des responsabilités publiques. Ainsi, l'étude du château dans ses textes offre une fenêtre privilégiée sur les transformations idéologiques et socio-politiques du tournant des dix-huitième et dix-neuvième siècle.

Cette recherche se propose d'examiner comment Madame de Genlis réinvente le château comme espace pédagogique, opposant systématiquement sa conception rationnelle de cet édifice aux représentations gothiques et terrifiantes qui connaissent un succès croissant auprès de ses contemporains. En étudiant la transition entre Les Veillées du Château[26] (1782), écrit avant la Révolution Française, et Les Veillées de la Chaumière[27] (1823), composé longtemps après, nous révélons comment cette évolution narrative reflète les bouleversements socio-politiques majeurs du contexte français.

2. La pédagogie genlisienne : principes et méthodes

2.1.L'éducation comme projet philosophique

L'éducation constitue le cœur battant de l'ensemble de l'œuvre genlisienne. Malgré les perturbations causées par les transformations socio-politiques, Madame de Genlis maintient cette préoccupation centrale tout au long de sa carrière littéraire. Son statut de gouvernante des enfants du duc d'Orléans confère une légitimité pédagogique à ses écrits, faisant de l'écrivaine avant tout une pédagogue accomplie.

La critique contemporaine reconnaît unanimement cette dimension fondamentale. Valeria de Gregorio Cirillo affirme que « la vocation pédagogique joue chez Madame de Genlis un rôle central[28] », manifestée « de façon plus ou moins dissimulée[29]» dans chacune de ses productions. Ann Schroder prolonge cette observation en identifiant l'originalité de l'écriture genlisienne au « statut de pédagogue[30]» de l'auteure. Cette convergence critique souligne que la pédagogie ne constitue pas un élément accessoire de l'œuvre, mais son fondement structural.

2.2.La littérature comme instrument pédagogique supérieur

Madame de Genlis s'oppose radicalement aux approches pédagogiques théoriques de son époque. Contrairement aux traités laborieux et indigestes, elle conçoit la littérature comme un médium privilégié pour transmettre les connaissances morales. Dans la préface des Veillées du Château, elle formule une véritable apologie de la fiction pédagogique : « Ce ne sont point de froids raisonnements qui rendront les hommes meilleurs ; ce sont des exemples frappants, des tableaux faits pour toucher et s'imprimer fortement dans l'imagination : c'est enfin la morale mise en action[31]».

Cette philosophie met l'accent sur l'affectif et l'imaginatif plutôt que sur l'abstrait. L'écrivaine considère que parler du cœur garantit l'écoute attentive du jeune public. En enchâssant les enseignements moraux dans des récits attractifs et narrativement structurés, la littérature effectue une synthèse remarquable du contenu pédagogique, le rendant accessible et mémorable.

La transmission du savoir moral s'opère également par le biais de la communication interpersonnelle. Madame de Genlis valorise les parents capables de maîtriser l'art de la conversation et du récit, outils essentiels pour former les futures générations à l'éthique et à la morale. Cette approche dialogique place la relation humaine au cœur du projet éducatif.

2.3.Critique de l'imagination irrationnelle

Bien que Madame de Genlis reconnaisse le pouvoir de l'imagination, elle se méfie profondément du conte merveilleux. Marie-Emmanuelle Plagnol-Diéval observe cette méfiance : l'écrivaine relègue le merveilleux « du côté de l'inutile, et plus grave encore, de l'imagination futile, voire des superstitions[32]». Cette critique repose sur une conception de l'éducation comme « harmonieuse alliance des savoirs et de la morale[33]», alliance incompatible avec l'irrationnel.

Ce positionnement reflète profondément l'idéologie des Lumières, pour laquelle l'éducation vise à cultiver la raison critique et à combattre les préjugés et superstitions. L'instruction authentique s'oppose ainsi aux manifestations de l'imaginaire gratuit, considéré comme contraire au développement intellectuel équilibré des enfants.

3. Le château de Champcery : une forteresse éclairée

3.1.Contexte socio-historique et lectorat

Les Veillées du Château, publié en 1782, s'inscrit dans les dernières années du règne des rois de France, peu avant la Révolution Française. Genlis écrit explicitement pour les enfants de la noblesse, reproduisant dans le texte l'univers familier des petits aristocrates privilégiés de cette époque. Le récit met en scène la famille du marquis de Clémire, composée de la baronne, des marquis et de trois enfants, habitant le palais parisien et le château de Champcery en Bourgogne.

Cette inscription sociologique s'avère cruciale : durant les années 1780, seul le milieu aristocratique accède à une éducation de qualité. Madame de Genlis adresse donc son ouvrage à des lecteurs destinés à perpétuer et à diriger les institutions sociales, d'où l'importance accordée à leur formation morale et intellectuelle.

3.2.La transmutation du château : du repoussoir au havre éducatif

La première évocation du château dans le récit demeure discrète et négative. L'édifice se présente initialement comme un élément désuet, remplacé dans la résidence aristocratique moderne par le palais somptueux parisien. Le texte en parle seulement comme d'« une terre située dans le fond de la Bourgogne[34]», dénuée de nom précis ou de localisation exacte. Pourtant, cette annonce provoque des réactions contradictoires. Mademoiselle Victoire, femme de chambre, exprime des lamentations face à l'idée de quitter Paris pour « un vieux château qu'on n'a jamais habité[35]». Les enfants reprennent l'opinion commune : le château serait « bien vilain, bien triste[36]». Cette initial négativé découle d'une absence d'expérience directe : les enfants, d'une vulnérabilité remarquée par Genlis, absorbent les opinions circulantes sans capacité critique.

La baronne de Clémire fournit une explication rationnelle à cette relocalisation : devant les dépenses extraordinaires liées au service militaire du marquis, l'économie impose un séjour provincial. Cette justification pragmatique s'oppose au rejet émotif des enfants, révélant le fossé entre le raisonnement adulte et la réceptivité enfantine aux impressions sensorielles non éclairées.

La description initiale du château confirme ces appréhensions : « vieux château délabré, entouré d'étangs, et dont les rigueurs de la saison rendaient encore l'aspect plus agreste et plus sauvage[37]». Objectivement, la ruine semble justifier l'ennui et la détresse anticipée des habitants.

3.3.Les veillées : de la ruine à la transformation pédagogique

Or, un événement catalytique inaugure la métamorphose du château. La marquise de Clémire et sa belle-mère adoptent une pratique divertissante : raconter des histoires durant les soirées. Les veillées, ainsi nommées, se présentent comme « liées au plaisir et se présentant comme le meilleur remède contre l'ennui[38]». On qualifie opportunément le château de Champcery de « lieu d'apprentissage des vertus morales[39]».

Ces récits enchâssés possèdent une fonction véritablement pédagogique. Dissimulés sous l'habillage fictionnel, ils transmettent des connaissances et des leçons morales. L'habitacle en ruine devient progressivement un espace d'enseignement et de formation intellectuelle, dominé par des figures maternelles/grands-maternelles cultivées et bienveillantes. L'efficacité transformatrice de cette pratique demeure spectaculaire. Les enfants « commencent à ne plus regretter Paris[40]», inversant radicalement leur jugement initial. Le lieu sauvage et isolé acquiert désormais une connotation positive : refuge loin des agitations urbaines, espace propice à la méditation et au renforcement des liens familiaux.

3.4.Le château comme représentation de l'idéal des Lumières

Le château de Champcery ne brille point par ses splendeurs architecturales, mais par l'inoculation des valeurs morales qui y circulent. L'édifice s'illumine non par la beauté physique de ses murs, soumis à la dégradation naturelle, mais par l'activité intellectuelle et morale qu'il contient. Le monument incarne l'humanisme du dix-huitième siècle en privilégiant l'instruction et la formation du caractère à l'ornement ou au luxe.
Cette représentation s'oppose catégoriquement aux tendances littéraires contemporaines dominantes. Tandis que le roman gothique se développe, incarné notamment par Ann Radcliffe et le Marquis de Sade, Madame de Genlis reste fidèle à une conception rationnelle du château. Nulle manifestation du surnaturel ne trouble Champcery ; l'expérience quotidienne normale, enrichie par le récit et la conversation, suffit à dissiper les terreurs nocturnes. Comme l'indique l'analyse comparative ultérieure : « l'expérience du jour peut toujours effacer les peurs de la nuit[41]».

4. La transition révolutionnaire : du château à la chaumière

4.1.Les mutations socio-historiques et paysagères

Les Veillées de la Chaumière, publiée en 1823, paraît quarante ans après Les Veillées du Château et témoigne des transformations radicales survenues lors de la Révolution Française et des décennies suivantes. Madame de Genlis adapte son projet pédagogique au contexte nouveau, tout en préservant les principes fondamentaux de son éthique éducative.
Le déplacement spatial du château à la chaumière symbolise ces mutations. Alors que Champcery ne subissait que la dégradation naturelle du temps, le château tourangeau des Veillées de la Chaumière porte les stigmates du vandalisme révolutionnaire. Chapelles détruites, jardins dévastés, ormes abattus : le paysage aristocratique s'efface systématiquement. Cette destruction, perpétrée consciemment contre les symboles du pouvoir féodal et aristocratique, marque profondément les lieux et les êtres qui les habitent.
On souligne l'impact psychologique sur les émigrés qui reviennent d'exil après vingt ans : « Amertume et désenchantement donnent la tonalité de ce retour au pays[42]». Les propriétaires retrouvent non seulement leurs châteaux ruinés, mais aussi une hiérarchie sociale ébranlée, des privilèges abolis et l'ascension inexorable de la bourgeoisie.

4.2.L'universalisation de la pédagogie genlisienne

Malgré ces bouleversements, Madame de Genlis persiste dans son projet moral. Cependant, elle l'adapte à une société transformée. Les Veillées de la Chaumière propose des histoires éducatives appropriées pour l'instruction universelle, adressée à tous les enfants, peu importe leur provenance modeste. Le projet pédagogique devient démocratique, s'adressant au-delà de la seule noblesse éclairée.
Le passage du château à la chaumière n'implique pas un abandon des principes pédagogiques, mais leur généralisation. La vertu, la morale et l'instruction demeurent les objectifs centraux, applicables désormais à la nouvelle audience composée de enfants issus de toutes les catégories sociales. Madame de Genlis redéploie son stratagème narratif dans un contexte égalitaire en devenir.

5. Polarisation bachelardienne : la cave et le grenier

5.1.L'esthétique des Lumières versus le gothique

La fin du dix-huitième siècle témoigne d'une polarisation esthétique et idéologique remarquable. D'un côté s'affirme l'héritage rationaliste des Lumières ; de l'autre émerge une littérature noire explorant les ténèbres psychologiques et les manifestations du surnaturel. Cette dichotomie se manifeste particulièrement dans la représentation du château.
Gaston Bachelard, s'appuyant sur la psychanalyse jungienne dans La Poétique de l'espace, propose un cadre analytique pertinent : la polarité de la cave et du grenier. La cave symbolise l'inconscient, la profondeur, le secret et l'irrationnel ; le grenier représente la conscience, la clarté, la rationalité et la transcendance.

5.2.Le château genlisien comme grenier

Le château de Champcery s'inscrit sous le signe du grenier. Il exprime les aspirations rationnelles et éclairées de la pensée humaine, incarnant « une lutte accentuée pour la rationalisation des peurs[43] ». Dans cet espace, l'expérience diurne, lucide et réfléchie triomphe systématiquement des terreurs nocturnes. Le surnaturel y demeure absent ; le quotidien normal, enrichi par l'instruction morale, constitue l'unique substance narrative.
Cette esthétique diurne privilégie la transparence, l'accessibilité et la perfectibilité par l'éducation. Elle refuse l'obscurité gratuite ou l'horreur purement émotif, préférant l'élucidation rationnelle et la formation du jugement critique.

5.3.Le château gothique et sadien comme cave

À l'inverse, les châteaux d'Ann Radcliffe et du Marquis de Sade fonctionnent selon la logique de la cave. Le château d'Udolphe, monument du gothique, et le château de Silling, dans Les Cent vingt journées de Sodome (1785), s'enfoncent dans l'obscurité et l'isolement. La monumentalité même des édifices, leur inaccessibilité et leur atmosphère étouffante engendrent une terreur systématique.
Marilyn Mallia analyse le château radcliffien comme corrélatif topographique du développement psychique féminin : l'héroïne traverse l'espace labyrinthique du château en parallèle de son évolution émotionnelle et morale. L'édifice devient matérialisation de la conscience perturbée.
Le château sadien de Silling offre une variation encore plus extrême. Il incarne le microcosme d'un monde aristocratique dépravé où l'isolement facilite l'expérimentation de violences sexuelles contre les enfants, catégorie la plus vulnérable et la plus pure. Annie Le Brun identifie justement cet espace comme manifestation de « la première violence poétique perpétrée contre la raison raisonnante[44] ». Le noir et l'ombre dominent ; la conscience subit une rationalisation moins rapide et moins claire, jamais définitive.

5.4.Significations symboliques de la polarité

Cette opposition bachelardienne révèle l'enjeu idéologique fondamental du tournant des dix-huitième et dix-neuvième siècle. Le château genlisien apparaît comme bastion de la rationalité et de l'humanisme pédagogique face à l'assaut de l'irrationnel, du sadisme et de la terreur irréductible. Madame de Genlis maintient une vision du château comme espace civilisé et civilisant, résistant aux pulsions destructrices que libère la fin de l'Ancien Régime.

6. Discussion et implications

6.1.L'originalité genlisienne dans le contexte littéraire

L'absence de Madame de Genlis dans les analyses contemporaines du château littéraire constitue une lacune historiographique significative. Contrairement aux figures dominantes du moment, Genlis refuse l'esthétique gothique triomphante pour maintenir un projet pédagogique rationaliste. Cette fidélité aux principes des Lumières, bien après leur déclin relatif, confère une originalité remarquable à son œuvre.

Son projet moral persiste même face aux transformations révolutionnaires majeures. Tandis que d'autres écrivains exploitent le désenchantement et la ruine pour produire des effets esthétiques sombres, Madame de Genlis redéploie simplement les principes éducatifs dans un contexte démocratisé. Cette continuité idéologique, en dépit du changement de décor du château à la chaumière, révèle une philosophie pédagogique profondément ancrée.

6.2.Le château comme catalyseur de transformation morale

L'analyse détaillée des textes genlisiens démontre que le château ne fonctionne jamais comme simple coordonnée spatiale inerte. Il constitue plutôt un élément définitoire de la mentalité culturelle des Lumières, chargé de valeurs symboliques aristocratiques. Cependant, Genlis le transforme en agent actif de formation morale.

La ruine physique du château de Champcery s'efface progressivement dans l'expérience narrative, remplacée par la richesse de la vie intellectuelle et affective qui s'y déploie. Le monument architectural cède le pas au monument de la transmission morale. Cette alchimie narrative révèle comment l'espace physique peut incarner et faciliter les processus pédagogiques.

6.3.Genlis comme figure tardive des Lumières

Madame de Genlis demeure l'une des dernières figures marquantes de la littérature française du dix-huitième siècle ayant réussi à représenter des châteaux éclairés. Elle traite le sujet avec une originalité propre à son projet moral et pédagogique, refusant les concessions aux modes gothiques dominantes.

Cette résistance témoigne d'une conviction inébranlable dans le pouvoir formatif de la raison et de l'éducation. Même confrontée à la dévastation révolutionnaire et à la transformation radicale des structures sociales, Genlis maintient que la transmission morale et intellectuelle dépasse les crises politiques temporelles.

7. Conclusion

Madame de Genlis redessine fondamentalement le château littéraire français en le repositionnant comme espace pédagogique des Lumières. À travers Les Veillées du Château et Les Veillées de la Chaumière, elle démontre la capacité de la fiction narrative à transformer l'expérience spatiale en processus de formation morale et intellectuelle. Le château ne demeure plus le réceptacle de terreurs irrationnelles ou le monument de puissance aristocratique, mais devient havre de sagesse bienveillante et de transmission générationnelle des vertus.

En refusant l'esthétique des caves, Genlis maintient une vision optimiste de la perfectibilité humaine par l'éducation. Cette philosophie, ancrée dans les principes des Lumières, persiste remarquablement au-delà de la Révolution Française, s'adaptant aux contextes nouveaux tout en préservant ses fondements humanistes.

L'intégration systématique de Madame de Genlis dans les analyses critiques du château littéraire s'avère indispensable pour une compréhension complète de la littérature française de transition. Sa contribution distinctive offre un contrepoint essentiel aux narrateurs gothiques et sadiens de son époque, révélant la coexistence de projets esthétiques radicalement incompatibles dans la même période historique.

La réhabilitation critique de Genlis enrichira nos compréhensions des rapports entre idéologie pédagogique, espace narratif et transformation socio-politique dans la littérature française de cette époque cruciale.

TEMPORAL ADVERBS IN IDIOMATIC EXPRESSIONS OF GERMAN AND ROMANIAN: SEMANTIC, PRAGMATIC, AND CULTURAL PERSPECTIVES

Oxana Chira
Assoc. Prof., PhD, "Alecu Russo" State University of Bălți

Abstract: This article examines the semantic and cultural functions of temporal adverbs in German and Romanian idiomatic expressions. The analysis shows that adverbs such as heute, morgen, immer and astăzi, mâine, mereu go beyond indicating time and act as semantic intensifiers, narrative condensers, and cultural markers. While German idioms tend to reflect a linear and order-oriented concept of time, Romanian idioms reveal a more flexible, cyclical and context-dependent temporal worldview. Overall, the study demonstrates that temporal adverbs play a crucial role in shaping idiomatic meaning and provide insight into the culturally embedded conceptualizations of time in German and Romanian.

Furthermore, the study highlights the role of temporal adverbs as narrative mechanisms that construct notions of repetition, sudden change, and cyclical recurrence. Temporal negation (nie, niciodată) is shown to possess significant rhetorical force, expanding the conceptual horizon of human possibility and moral agency. Overall, the findings illustrate that temporal adverbs in idiomatic expressions operate as culturally encoded meaning generators that model perceptions of order, change, expectation, and agency. Their contrastive analysis provides valuable insights into the cultural conceptualizations of time that shape the German and Romanian linguistic worlds.

1. Einleitung

Die Präsenz von Zeitadverbien in idiomatischen Einheiten des Deutschen und Rumänischen eröffnet ein faszinierendes Forschungsfeld, in dem sich semantische Verdichtungen, pragmatische Effekte und kulturelle Muster überlagern. Bei näherer Betrachtung zeigt sich, dass Zeitadverbien in Phraseologismen weit mehr leisten, als bloß temporale Relationen zu markieren. Sie wirken als semantische Katalysatoren, die Bedeutungen zuspitzen, evaluative Nuancen verstärken und kulturelle Vorstellungen von Zeit, Ordnung und sozialer Praxis transportieren.

Der folgende Beitrag zeichnet den Weg dieser Funktionen nach und zeigt, wie Zeitadverbien ein feines Netz kultureller Bedeutungen spannen, das in beiden Sprachräumen unterschiedlich gewebt ist. „Eine der Idiomatik verwandte bis identische linguistische Disziplin ist die Phraseologie. In dieser Disziplin werden Idiome im Prinzip als Phraseme geführt, die allerdings meist etwas weiter gefasst werden. Im Anklang an die grammatische Einheit „Phrase" sind Phraseme in solchen Untersuchungen stärker grammatisch orientiert und kategorisiert. Dies zeigt etwa die Gliederung in Donalies (2009): Substantivphraseme, Adjektivphraseme, Verbphraseme, jeweils benannt nach dem syntaktischen Kern" (Heringer, S.12). Genauso können wir auch Adverbphraseme fassen, die analog nach ihrem syntaktischen Kern – dem Adverb – bestimmt und innerhalb der phraseologischen Kategorien entsprechend eingeordnet werden.

2. Zeitadverbien als semantische Katalysatoren in Idiomen

Zunächst fällt auf, dass Zeitadverbien in idiomatischen Kontexten häufig ihren ursprünglichen temporalen Charakter verlieren und in den Dienst expressiver oder metaphorischer Bedeutungen treten (vgl. Pittner, 1999). Wörter wie immer, oft, einmal, noch oder endlich im Deutschen und mereu, totdeauna, odată, mai târziu oder de acum înainte im Rumänischen werden zu semantischen Knotenpunkten, die das Idiom als Ganzes prägen. Ein Ausdruck wie ein für alle Mal erhält seine endgültige, resolute Bedeutung erst durch das Zeitadverb Mal, das aus der konkreten Wiederholungsangabe zu einem Marker der Irreversibilität wird. Ähnlich verhält es sich mit der rumänischen Wendung odată pentru totdeauna, in der die Zeitadverbien eine emphatische, fast zeremonielle Finalität ausdrücken.

Im narrativen Gefüge der phraseologischen Bedeutungen fungieren Zeitadverbien häufig als Verdichtungsinstrumente: Sie bündeln Ereignisse, komprimieren Handlungsfolgen oder intensivieren den affektiven Gehalt eines Ausdrucks. Wenn ein Sprecher im Deutschen sagt, dass „immer wieder dieselbe Leier“ vorgetragen werde, signalisiert das Adverb „immer wieder“ nicht nur Wiederholung, sondern verweist auf eine kollektive Alltagserfahrung von Ermüdung, Überdruss und rhetorischer Routine. Das rumänische Pendant mereu aceeași poveste transportiert eine ähnliche Emotionalität, jedoch mit einer subtil anderen kulturellen Färbung: Die rumänische Konstruktion wirkt weicher, persönlicher, weniger formalisiert und bettet die Situation stärker in eine narrative Alltagsszene ein.

Der Charakter der Zeitadverbien zeigt sich besonders deutlich in idiomatischen Einheiten, die abrupt eintretende Veränderungen oder unerwartete temporale Brüche beschreiben: „von heute auf morgen“ oder „de azi pe mâine“ illustrieren, wie kulturell geteilte Vorstellungen von Plötzlichkeit und Unvorhersehbarkeit durch temporale Marker strukturiert werden. Interessant ist, dass beide Sprachen dieselbe Metapher nutzen – den Übergang zwischen zwei Tagen –, sie jedoch in unterschiedlichen kommunikativen Situationen präferieren. Im Deutschen wird der Ausdruck häufig in institutionellen und organisatorischen Kontexten verwendet, während er im Rumänischen stärker im familiären und informellen Umfeld verankert bleibt.

3. Pragmatik: Zeitadverbien als Mittel der Gesprächssteuerung

Auf pragmatischer Ebene dienen Zeitadverbien in Idiomen nicht zuletzt der Gesprächssteuerung. Sie strukturieren Erwartungen, markieren Dringlichkeit oder signalisieren Gesprächsfortschritte. Wenn im Deutschen „nun aber endlich“ verwendet wird, kommt im Adverb „endlich“ eine kumulierte Ungeduld zum Ausdruck, die auf eine lange Zeitspanne verweist, ohne diese explizit zu benennen. Ein ähnlicher Effekt lässt sich im Rumänischen beobachten, wenn Sprecher „în sfârșit odată“ nutzen, um einen Wendepunkt im Gespräch herzustellen. In beiden Fällen fungiert das Zeitadverb als semantischer Ankerpunkt, der die kommunikative Dynamik bündelt und rhetorisch lenkt.

Kontrastiv betrachtet zeigt sich, dass beide Sprachen zwar häufig strukturelle Parallelen aufweisen, diese jedoch unterschiedlich kulturell aufgeladen sind. Während das Deutsche in idiomatischen Zeitadverbien tendenziell Ordnung, Klarheit und argumentative Präzision abbildet, inszeniert das Rumänische über dieselben sprachlichen Mittel stärker Erfahrungsnähe, narrative Offenheit und eine situativ geprägte Weltwahrnehmung. Die Gemeinsamkeiten liegen auf der formalen Ebene, die Unterschiede jedoch auf der semantisch-pragmatischen Tiefenstruktur, in der kulturelle Werte und kommunikative Gewohnheiten sichtbar werden.

Die Analyse der Zeitadverbien in idiomatischen Einheiten macht somit deutlich, dass Sprache nicht nur ein Instrument zur Beschreibung von Welt ist, sondern auch ein Raum, in dem kulturelle Vorstellungen, habitualisierte Denkweisen und soziale Praktiken sedimentiert sind. Die Zeitadverbien fungieren als feine, aber wirksame Marker dieser kulturellen Codierungen. Sie erzählen Geschichten über Zeit, über Geduld und Ungeduld, über Erwartung und Enttäuschung, über Ordnung und Flexibilität – und diese Geschichten unterscheiden sich in den beiden Sprachräumen, auch wenn sie sich manchmal formal gleichen.

4. Kulturelle Temporalitätsmodelle im deutsch-rumänischen Vergleich

Die kulturbezogenen Funktionen der Zeitadverbien treten besonders hervor, wenn man die jeweiligen Zeitkonzepte der beiden Sprachgemeinschaften berücksichtigt. Das Deutsche setzt traditionell auf ein lineares, strukturiertes Zeitverständnis, das Planung, Ordnung und Pünktlichkeit hoch bewertet. In phraseologischen Einheiten spiegelt sich dies in Adverbien wider, die Kontinuität (immer), Genauigkeit (rechtzeitig) oder begrenzte Dauer (auf Dauer) hervorheben. Das Rumänische hingegen weist eine stärker zyklische und situativ-flexible Zeitauffassung auf, in der Wiederkehr, Kontinuität und situative Anpassung eine größere Rolle spielen. Adverbien wie din totdeauna, mai târziu oder când o fi timpul verweisen auf eine Zeitauffassung, die weniger mechanistisch, dafür stärker kontextualisiert ist und Offenheit für situative Fluidität signalisiert.

Sprichwörter stellen eine der konservativsten und zugleich dynamischsten Formen sprachlicher Wissensspeicherung dar. Ihre Struktur zeichnet sich durch Kürze, Rhythmus und hohe Bildlichkeit aus, wodurch sie generational weitergegeben und in unterschiedlichen kommunikativen Situationen funktional aktiviert werden können. Innerhalb dieser kompakten Formeln spielen Zeitadverbien eine zentrale Rolle, denn sie verleihen dem sprichwörtlichen Inhalt eine spezifische temporale Perspektivierung, die semantische Verdichtung, moralische Generalisierung und kulturelle Modellierung zugleich ermöglicht.

Die Zeitadverbien wie immer, nie, bald, öfters, sogleich oder endlich fungieren in Sprichwörtern häufig als universalisierende Marker. Sie transformieren konkrete, einmalige Erfahrungen in Aussagen mit Geltungsanspruch über die gesamte menschliche Existenz. Ähnlich verhält es sich mit dem deutschen Sprichwort „Immer ist der Faule müde". Das Adverb immer hebt den Ausdruck auf die Ebene generalisierter Wahrheit, wodurch eine individuelle Beobachtung in eine kollektiv akzeptierte Lebensweisheit verwandelt wird. Sein rumänisches Pendant „Cine-i leneș, mereu e obosit" zeigt, wie das Zeitadverb mereu dieselbe Funktion erfüllt, wenn auch mit einer etwas flexibleren, narrativ-alltagsnahen Nuancierung. Durch beide Adverbien wird eine stabile, quasi-naturgesetzliche Verbindung zwischen Charakter und Verhalten hergestellt.

Darüber hinaus zeigt sich, dass Zeitadverbien in Sprichwörtern nicht ausschließlich generalisierend eingesetzt werden, sondern häufig auch kontrastive Bedeutungsgegensätze markieren. In „Heute rot, morgen tot" erzeugt das enge Nebeneinander der Zeitadverbien eine dramatische Spannungsfigur, die vom plötzlichen Wandel menschlicher Lebenslagen erzählt. Auch in rumänischen Sprichwörtern wie „Azi în sat, mâine în alt sat" oder „Azi ești pe val, mâine la pământ" verdeutlichen die temporalen Marker die Instabilität sozialer Positionen und verweisen auf die Vergänglichkeit des Erfolgs. Hier wird die Zeit nicht als lineare Ressource, sondern als Bühne für drastische Veränderungsmomente inszeniert.

5. Zeitadverbien in Sprichwörtern: Universalität und Variation

In vielen Sprichwörtern fungieren Zeitadverbien auch als Marker zyklischer Wiederkehr. Der deutsche Ausdruck Morgenstund hat Gold im Mund verknüpft die Tageszeit morgen mit einer kulturell tief verankerten Vorstellung von Fleiß und Produktivität. Das rumänische Sprichwort Cine se scoală de dimineață departe ajunge zeigt, dass das Zeitadverb dimineață eine ähnliche moralische Rahmung erzeugt, allerdings stärker narrativ eingebettet und weniger komprimiert. Die Zeitmarkierung verweist hier auf einen kulturellen Rhythmus des Alltags, in dem Morgenzeit mit Ordnung, Klarheit und Neubeginn assoziiert wird.

Interessant ist zudem die Rolle der Negation in Verbindung mit Zeitadverbien. Sprichwörter wie Es ist nie zu spät, etwas Neues zu lernen oder das rumänische Niciodată nu

e prea târziu să-nveți entfalten ihre persuasive Kraft gerade durch die absolute temporale Negation. Das Adverb nie (niciodată) eröffnet paradoxerweise einen unbegrenzten Horizont menschlicher Handlungsmöglichkeiten. Zeit wird nicht als einschränkender Faktor wahrgenommen, sondern als moralischer Raum des ständigen Neubeginns. So etwa in der Wendung Verlorene Zeit kommt nie(mals) wieder; Jugend und verlorene Zeit kommt nie wieder in Ewigkeit beziehungsweise im rumänischen Äquivalent Timpul pierdut nu se mai întoarce (Mantsch et alii, 1979, S. 589).

Die kulturelle Dimension der Zeitadverbien lässt sich besonders deutlich beim Vergleich deutscher und rumänischer Sprichwörter erkennen. Während im Deutschen viele Sprichwörter mit Zeitadverbien einen linear-strukturierten Zeitbegriff widerspiegeln – Pünktlichkeit, Ordnung, Abfolge –, zeigt das Rumänische eine stärkere Orientierung an zyklischen, adaptiven oder situativ flexiblen Modellen. Das lässt sich an Sprichwörtern erkennen, wie Mai bine mai târziu decât niciodată, das Geduld und Realismus betont, im Gegensatz zu der deutschen Variante Besser spät als nie, die denselben strukturellen Kern hat, jedoch oft in Kontexten erscheint, in denen die Verzögerung trotz allem als Abweichung vom Idealfall wahrgenommen wird.

Insgesamt stellt sich heraus, dass Zeitadverbien in Sprichwörtern nicht lediglich grammatische Ergänzungen sind, sondern semantische Verdichter, die kulturelle Weltbilder artikulieren. Sie modellieren Vorstellungen von Ordnung, Moral, Wandel, Wiederkehr und Handlungsoffenheit und tragen maßgeblich zum Charakter der sprichwörtlichen Aussage bei. Durch sie wird das Sprichwort nicht nur zeitlich, sondern auch kulturell situiert: Zeit wird metaphorisiert, moralisiert und stilisiert – und gerade dadurch zum zentralen Bestandteil menschlicher Lebensweisheit.

6. Gegenwartsadverbien, zukunftsorientierte Adverbien und Vergangenheitsadverbien

Die Gegenwartsadverbien heute und jetzt verankern die Handlung im unmittelbaren Moment und rufen zu unmittelbarem Handeln auf (vgl. Imo, 2010). Sie markieren eine zeitliche Dringlichkeit und dienen häufig der moralisch-pragmatischen Belehrung. Beispiele wie: Was du heute kannst besorgen, das verschiebe nicht auf morgen; Heute rot, morgen tot; Heute König, morgen Bettler; Jetzt oder nie u. a. zeigen, wie stark die Gegenwart mit der Vorstellung von Handlungsspielraum, Veränderbarkeit und Dringlichkeit verknüpft ist. Während heute einen konkreten Zeithorizont eröffnet, verstärkt jetzt den Imperativcharakter und ruft zu unmittelbarem Handeln auf. Die Sprichwörter dieser Kategorie arbeiten oft mit der Idee der Zeitknappheit und der Notwendigkeit, den gegebenen Moment zu nutzen. Rumänische Entsprechungen (astăzi, acum) erfüllen dieselbe zeitliche Funktion, jedoch wird in rumänischen Sprichwörtern die Gegenwart oft indirekt, metaphorisch oder moralisch-normativ markiert: Ce poți face azi nu lăsa pe mâine, Acum ori niciodată.

Zukunftsorientierte Adverbien wie morgen, bald oder später strukturieren Sprichwörter, die auf Erwartung, Prognose oder Warnung zielen. Beispiele wie Morgenstund hat Gold im Mund, Wer heute nicht spart, hat morgen nichts, Später ist zu spät, Was du heute nicht tust, ärgert dich morgen verknüpfen Zukunft mit Konsequenzlogik. Entscheidungen in der Gegenwart bestimmen zukünftige Ergebnisse. Die Adverbien morgen und bald markieren eine zeitlich absehbare Zukunft, während später eine Warnung vor Aufschub signalisiert. Die Sprichwörter dieser Kategorie betonen den kausalen Zusammenhang zwischen Gegenwartshandlung und Zukunftsergebnis und verstärken kulturelle Werte wie Fleiß, Weitsicht und Verantwortungsbewusstsein. Zum Beispiel für mâine: A trăi de azi pe mâine (Roman, 1997, S. 255).

Vergangenheitsadverbien wie früher, einst, damals dienen der Einordnung von Erfahrungen in einen kulturell geteilten historischen Horizont. Beispiele wie Früher Vogel fängt den Wurm, Wie man in den Wald hineinruft, so schallt es hinaus, Einst war mehr Lametta zeigen, dass Vergangenheitsadverbien sowohl moralische Generalisierungen („früher“) als auch humoristische oder nostalgische Bewertungen („einst“) ausdrücken können. Die Vergangenheit wird häufig als Quelle bewährter Weisheiten und Normen dargestellt, wobei diese Adverbien einen zeitlichen Kontrast zwischen „damals“ und „heute“ markieren. Die Vergangenheit erscheint als Referenzrahmen, aus dem heutiges Handeln abgeleitet oder bewertet wird. Rumänische Beispiele (odinioară, demult, pe vremuri) betonen die Weisheit der Alten, oft mit moralischem oder sozialkritischem Unterton: Cine se scoală de dimineață departe ajunge, Pe vremuri era altfel.

Ein besonders aufschlussreicher Fall für den kontrastiven Vergleich deutscher und rumänischer Sprichwörter sind jene Strukturen, die zwei Zeitadverbien enthalten und dadurch eine explizite temporale Opposition aufbauen. Ein paradigmatisches Beispiel stellt das deutsche Sprichwort dar: „Was du heute kannst besorgen, das verschiebe nicht auf morgen“ (Roman, 1997, S. 273). Hier treten die beiden Zeitadverbien heute und morgen in ein deutliches antithetisches Verhältnis. Die semantische Struktur basiert auf einer kontrastiven Tempuslogik, die die Dringlichkeit des gegenwärtigen Handelns (heute) in Opposition zur Gefahr des Aufschubs (morgen) stellt. Durch diese binäre Konstruktion entsteht ein zeitlich geschlossenes Argumentationsschema: Der gegenwärtige Moment gilt als einzig legitimer Handlungsrahmen, während die Zukunft als potenziell unsicher oder risikobehaftet erscheint. Die rumänische Entsprechung reproduziert diese Struktur nahezu vollständig: Ce poți face astăzi, nu lăsa pe mâine (Roman, 1997, S. 255). Auch hier erscheinen astăzi und mâine als direkt korrespondierende Zeitadverbien. Die semantische Relation bleibt identisch:

Das Sprichwort formt einen Imperativ, der den Vorrang der Gegenwart vor der Zukunft betont. Interessant ist, dass das Rumänische typischerweise – im Vergleich zu vielen anderen Sprichwörtern – dieselbe syntaktische Parallelität wie das Deutsche beibehält. Beide Sprachen nutzen eine antithetische Temporaldeixis, die als fundamentale argumentative Struktur dient. Beide Varianten bestätigen jedoch, dass Sprichwörter mit zwei Zeitadverbien besonders effektiv darin sind, kulturelle Werte wie Fleiß, Verantwortung und Disziplin zu vermitteln. Sie operieren mit einer streng binären Zeitstruktur, die als performative Instruktion wirkt, indem sie die Gegenwart als den richtigen Zeitpunkt für Handeln und die Zukunft als den Ort potenzieller Fehler oder Versäumnisse markieren.

Fazit

Die Analyse zeigt, dass Zeitadverbien in idiomatischen Einheiten des Deutschen und Rumänischen weit über ihre temporale Grundfunktion hinausreichen und zu zentralen semantischen und kulturellen Verdichtungsstellen werden. Sie verleihen idiomatischen Wendungen eine besondere Ausdruckskraft, indem sie Wiederkehr, Dringlichkeit, Plötzlichkeit oder Dauer markieren und dadurch moralische, narrative und evaluative Bedeutungen erzeugen. In beiden Sprachen entwickeln Zeitadverbien eine generalisierende Wirkung, die individuelle Erfahrungen in kollektive Lebensweisheiten überführt.

Die analysierten temporalen Adverbien tragen wesentlich zur Konstruktion kultureller Vorstellungen von Zeit bei: sei es als rhythmische Wiederholung (noapte de noapte, Nacht für Nacht), als absolute Kontinuität (dintotdeauna, seit Jahr und Tag), als zeitliche Beschleunigung (la fiecare minut, im Minutentakt), oder als ununterbrochene Intensität (zi și noapte, Tag und Nacht). Sie strukturieren idiomatische Wendungen und feste Ausdrücke nicht nur in temporaler Hinsicht, sondern ebenso emotional und kulturell, sodass sie zu markanten Indikatoren der jeweiligen Zeitkonzepte in den beiden Sprachräumen werden. Zwillingsformeln werden auch als Paarformeln oder, internationaler, als Binomiale bezeichnet. Typische Beispiele mit Antonymen sind etwa „Tag und Nacht“. Sehr viele Zwillingsformeln entstammen der Rechtssprache, etwa „Jahr und Tag“. Weitere Beispiele finden sich im entsprechenden Artikel.

Gleichzeitig wird deutlich, dass Zeitadverbien kulturelle Weltbilder widerspiegeln und unterschiedliche zeitbezogene Denkhaltungen modellieren. Die deutschen idiomatischen Einheiten tendieren zu einer linearen, präzisen und ordnungsorientierten Zeitauffassung, während die rumänischen Wendungen stärker narrativ, flexibel und situativ geprägt sind. Dadurch entstehen unterschiedliche pragmatische Profile: Was im Deutschen klar strukturiert und argumentativ zugespitzt wirkt, erscheint im Rumänischen stärker alltagsnah, erzählerisch und emotional eingebettet. Sprichwörter mit doppelten Zeitadverbien – etwa heute ... morgen und astăzi ... mâine – verdeutlichen besonders eindrücklich die normative Kraft der Temporalität.

Die kontrastive Gegenüberstellung von Gegenwart und Zukunft fungiert als moralischer Imperativ und macht Zeit selbst zum argumentativen Zentrum. Der richtige Moment ist jetzt, nicht später. Gleichzeitig zeigt sich, dass das Rumänische diese Struktur zwar formal spiegelt, ihr jedoch eine stärker moralisch-didaktische Note verleiht.

Die Untersuchung legt zudem offen, dass Zeitadverbien als narrative Mechanismen wirken, die Plötzlichkeit, Wiederholung oder zyklische Abläufe sprachlich bilden und zu symbolischen Bildern verdichten. Sie dienen nicht nur der Beschreibung von Zeit, sondern strukturieren Wahrnehmung, Handlung und soziale Erfahrung. Auch temporale Negationen – nie, niciodată – entfalten eine bemerkenswerte persuasive Kraft, indem sie einen unbegrenzten Horizont moralischer und lebenspraktischer Möglichkeiten eröffnen. Insgesamt wird deutlich, dass Zeitadverbien in idiomatischen Einheiten als kulturelle Marker fungieren. Sie modellieren Vorstellungen von Ordnung, Wandel, Erwartung, Geduld und Handlungsspielraum und verleihen sprichwörtlichen Formeln ihre kulturelle Tiefe. Ihre kontrastive Analyse zeigt, wie eng semantische Struktur, pragmatische Wirkung und kulturelle Rahmung miteinander verflochten sind. Zeit wird in diesen Einheiten nicht nur benannt, sondern interpretiert, bewertet und kulturell codiert – und damit zu einem zentralen Bestandteil sprichwörtlicher Lebensweisheit.

LINGUISTIC CONSTRUCTIONS OF LOVE: RADU PARASCHIVESCU'S CU INIMA SMULSĂ DIN PIEPT

Alexandra Mărginean
Assoc. Prof., PhD, "Romanian - American" University of Bucharest

Abstract: In this study, we are looking at the way language is used to construct love in Radu Paraschivescu's novel Cu inima smulsă din piept. We realize that these constructions are concentrated mostly in the first half of the novel, as the rest of the work is mainly concerned with the political plots in the story. We start from the very striking images thrown at us in the introductory fragments, which also constitute due justification for this research. We analyze the different ways in which love is presented, starting with the poetic, lyrical, philosophical, spiritual and elevated one at the beginning, then plunging into the medieval Court world to notice a vulgar, carnivalesque, jesters' outlook on it, combined with a practical-minded, strategic one, which makes us derive the notion of love being downgraded in this environment in more ways than one. The Conclusions summarize the findings at both content and stylistic levels. The approach is discourse studies, linguistics combined with cultural and identity studies.

1. Introduction

In this research, we are setting the goal of investigating Radu Paraschivescu's novel Cu inima smulsă din piept in order to see how love is constructed through language therein. The idea is occasioned and supported by the obsessive love images involving stone cast at us in the first few pages, a certain intriguing violence and rawness that characterizes them, the peculiarity of the multiple valences associated with this hard material in its use for the creation of imagery relative to the above-mentioned warm feeling, and the reverence detected with respect to love, which places this emotion at the center of the writing from the very start. The intensity and multitude of images surrounding love help us predict future further references to it and provide justification for an exploration of this aspect in the novel. We are made curious to see where the love analysis goes, if the register will change and, as we read, we realize that it indeed does and the interest is worthwhile. The language surrounding the considerations on love is exquisite, rich and impactful, satisfying the choice of this topic. Let us see how exactly the building of this abstract concept of love gets accomplished.

2. From Philosophical Depictions to Court Love

From the very first, in the prologue part, what strikes us is the rawness of the imagery related to the imprint and effects of love as enduring in time. There are extremely vivid images describing the power of love, involving stone and which are on the threshold of a brutal and at the same time warming beauty. The images that we are invoking contain unexpected contrasts. To use stone to achieve metaphors related to love is arresting and unusual to begin with, as there is an inherent and violent contrast between the two notions. Stone is material, cold, kind of immovable and difficult to mold, whereas love is something immaterial, abstract, invisible, pertaining to the realm of feeling and/or the spiritual, experienced as warm/hot. Also, stones are dead and static, whereas love makes one feel alive, it is fluid and dynamic. Stone becomes the recorder and reminder of love, proof of it through time, and somehow guarantor of its endurance by the testimony that it provides for its existence. We can say, analyzing the first fragments in the story, that love is set or etched in stone in more ways than one. Love needs the stone as a suitable material to stand the test of time, solid enough to be able to function as evidence and support for it. Stone helps love be propagated through centuries.

The insistence on imagery focusing on stone at the beginning reveals its full development soon. Stone is, on the one hand, the bearer of the centuries-old love story. However, on the other hand, the very first references to stone introduce it as an extremely versatile reality. In Coimbra, the rocks seem abused by the elements – "heated by the sun and slapped by the wind", but they are also durable – "Water flows, but the stones remain" (Paraschivescu, 2025: 5, my translations)[1]. They are "palimpsests of the love stories clumsily and feverishly scratched in the stone made to bear" (ibidem: 6). As the sun sets, the stone "gets darker, just like the face of an abandoned bride" (ibidem). Bearing the imprint of the love stories invoked here, it simultaneously appears as an extremely hard-to-break material, persisting in time, but acquires, if we examine the metaphors closely, the connotations of a living, feeling, sensitive creature. It is as if, doubly impressed with the respective story – i.e. literally chiseled with it and, in the figurative sense of the verb impressed, touched by it, similar to a human being, as if as a result of a mysterious contagion – the stone comes to life, empathetic with the story and its feminine protagonist, identifying with the heroine in love or with any woman and her condition of sufferer, atemporally. The impressed stone becomes the female lover, gets personified, and embodies, moreover, an abused woman, weak and strong at the same time. The stone is subjected to similar treatments as the woman: it/she is warmed to the brink of hotness by emotions, then molested physically and psychologically through turmoil in the throes of violent sentiment and, perhaps, by additional abuse resulting from unrequitedness, abandonment and other possible mishaps, all brought by the state of being in love and vulnerable. These mishaps seem to synthesize the condition of woman in general, who has always been seen as prey to other forces and entities. To sum up, stone is a very ambiguous reality, representing a surviving proof of love, as well as the very woman in love at the same time. Despite its initial immovable character, it gets transformed, as if love as an experience were infectious and could corrupt even the stone, in spite of its hardness and coldness, inviting it to transformation, dynamism, warmth, responsiveness and evolution. This is the first evidence of the power of love.

As far as the narrator's language is concerned, what is transparent in these first lines is an interesting combination of rawness and refinement, of crudeness and subtlety, and violence and tenderness. The references that we have mentioned make up a very sophisticated aesthetic and special type of lyricism, surprising and effective through the unusual potpourri of emotions and reactions that it triggers. A sense of violence and abuse is transferred to the reader as well, through the abruptness of the imagery and the feelings that it evokes. Once we read these passages, we feel abused in a certain manner as well.

All these poetic, literary and somewhat spiritualized images concerning love and how its essence can be best rendered are replaced, as we go back in time in what follows in the story, by a quite different type of imagery, pertaining to another register. Love-related images become coarser and humorous once we penetrate the historical time and sphere of medieval Court love. The elevated language is pulled down to earth, just as the noble quality of the feeling degrades. Love becomes worldly, bawdy, carnivalesque, under scrutiny in its lavishly available version of carnal, occasional and cheap form, which is, sometimes, deprived of feeling. In its decadent version of debauchery, it occasions funny references, being also mocked at and viewed as comical.

Prince Pedro's father, King Afonso Sánches IV of Portugal, compares his son, because of his romantic excesses, with a "fiery stallion" which needs to be "trained, saddled" (ibidem: 12), a "stud for mounting" (ibidem: 16). These images connote appeal, majestic poise, wilderness uncontained and untamed, and preserve a certain nobility while suggesting that the romantic excess is in the boy's nature and somehow a consequence of his unchiseled charm. However, this perspective becomes altered once the element of humor gets introduced, and the initially-connoted majestic quality gets perverted to some extent. Since the young man is perceived as about to be "tethered in the conjugal team" (ibidem: 13), in the "ménage manege" (ibidem: 12), the poetic aura surrounding his vice thus becomes mocked at, and places him in a different light, a comic one about to become one of downright ridicule. The play upon words used in Romanian with the last description, which I have tried to preserve in the English translation by resorting to the French term for a love triangle ménage, does exactly this, because it signals the young man's announced characteristic feature as a topic for making fun, gossip and even scorn, proven by the alliteration that the Court bard comes up with intentionally to stir laughter. Alliterative phrases can be used to create "great fun", as in tongue twisters (Coelho, 2025), also serving the function of determining the phrase stick to one's mind, making it "memorable" (Cove, 2024). We notice the use of vocabulary related to horses, masculine-gendered terms suggesting a stallion's vigor, breeding capabilities and resulting majesty, and a certain type of strength and power – at the beginning – then its mere usefulness for the perpetration of the species and its reduction to this reproductive function, features that all get transferred to Pedro. His proneness to sexual excess is about to be contained and his wild nature in this respect reined in – metaphorically – as his father has arranged for him to marry the Castilian princess Constancia, Juan de Peñafiel's daughter.

Pedro's fall from grace and from the initial grandeur of majestic virility is even more marked when the associations with the animal kingdom are continued by his father, who compares him to a "rooster having hot pepper under its tail" (Paraschivescu, 2025: 13). From the stallion to the rooster there is indeed a fall from majesty, the metaphorical parallel with the rooster being downright comical, let alone the additional particularization. Other men benefit, in inverted commas, from parallelisms with the animal world based on their sexual performances and behavior. Afonso IV and his wife, Beatriz, also have a daughter, Maria, whom they marry, for the sake of strengthening political alliances, to Alfonso XI of Castille. The man is a brute, he mistreats Maria to the point of being violent with her in public, which determines Afonso to wage war against Castille eventually ending up with the Treaty of Seville. Before Maria, Alfonso XI was married to Constancia, who uses less than kind or flattering references to describe her former husband. She remembers him as an "impotent buffalo", a depiction meant to capture his coarseness having compensatory functions for inability on a sexual plane (ibidem: 25). Another depiction, from the narrator's part, confirms this function, presenting the two aspects as interconnected: "the strength of his fist and the limpness of his willy" (ibidem: 16). The use of the colloquial and vulgar expression with a rustic, countryside nuance is a form of advanced irony, rather than meant to be merely humorous. It hints at this type of violent behavior, especially when coming from helplessness in other areas and thus serving a compensatory value, as condemnable, degrading and worthy of disdain. Pedro is also characterized by Constancia as "playing the breeding bull" (ibidem: 33), so we notice the change of animal from stallion to bull to suggest sexual potency for the two men. These connotations, of virility and/or intense sexual activity, while comparing some men with either a breeding stud or a bull are recognizable and part of general knowledge and folklore, as they are based on the reality of the existence of the respective habits, of raising and keeping such animals especially for mating and reproductive purposes. These euphemisms, therefore, fall within the readers' horizon of expectations. They apply to women as well, as those who show eagerness for intimate encounters and possess charms are likened to "frisky fillies", while feeble, depressed Constancia evokes a "nag" (ibidem: 38).

Humor and irony are not everything that is done to Pedro's image, though. The kind of love that he practices is described from an even worse angle, as his excess is made to look cheap and dirty. When his debauchery is depicted as happening in hidden and less than salubrious places such as pubs, inns and barns, where the space then carries the smell of sexual intercourse, i.e. the "stench of rut" (ibidem: 21), not even humor may save the reference. We are plunged into a nose-turning – both literally and symbolically – reality, with no positive trait to be called to its defense. A character that contributes to this impression is the prostitute and inn-keeper Fabiana, one of Pedro's mistresses or "hussies" called, in Romanian, "farfuzele" (ibidem: 33). The light in which Fabiana is presented carries humor into lewdness, through references to expressly vulgar sexual behavior. What we may infer from the most recent examples is that love is not only decadent and excessive, but the mentions of physical dirt are meant to suggest love as symbolically dirty, deprived of any feeling, reduced to physical contact, merely instinctual and even potentially involving perversions or deviances. This preoccupation with the lower part of the body, vulgarity of references as well as loud laughter when it comes to such matters remind us of Bakhtin's comments of Rabelais and His World. The "extra-official life", "bodily images" abounding in men's speech, and laughter and mockery in discourse bearing on such matters are mentioned as interconnected and reflecting the world of carnival (Bakhtin, 1984: 319). Excess is also a characteristic of sexual activity in our context, which is a feature of the carnivalesque grotesque body, into the category of which the bodies of the men and women engaged in this type of activity in the medieval times Court in the story can fall: "Exaggeration, hyperbolism, excessiveness are generally considered fundamental attributes of the grotesque style." (ibidem: 303)

We have already seen above that Maria is given in marriage only to establish and seal political alliance. Pedro's marriage to Constancia is also a practical arrangement, as the young man is reluctant to get united to a woman whom he considers an unappealing bride. Constancia's lack of charm is highlighted on various occasions, more than just a couple of times. She is already marked by her unpleasant experience with Alfonso XI, which – we are told through the narrative voice – has left her with a "bitter aftertaste" and an "undying distrust" in the institution of marriage (Paraschivescu, 2025: 16). In terms of appearance, she is also wanting, as her face looks unusually pale and sunken against her dark hair, she is frail, sickly and sad, appearing as gnawed on the inside or consumed by a sorrow that cannot be relieved. Her portrait is supplementarily made unflattering as it is contrasted with that of her lady in waiting, Inès, who is blonde, beautiful and full of life. Next to Inès, Constancia appears as a "meek, impersonal and lifeless shadow", the opposition culminating with the narrator stating that a stranger would assume, seeing them next to each other, that their roles and statuses were in reverse (ibidem: 27). This comment announces the future love affair between Pedro and Inès. Constancia's portrait is important because it reflects the compromise – especially from Pedro's perspective, given his chase for physical beauty – of a marriage of convenience, which is the rule at the Court, and which is said to be a "ballet of matrimonial diplomacy" that "sacrifices dreams, reshapes careers and shatters destinies" (ibidem: 16). Arranged marriages may, therefore, build one's life or destroy it. An opposition is suggested between constructing lives in a pragmatic style, socially and economically, and their destruction from a sentimental point of view, and these ways may be competing, with practicality winning and taking precedence unfalteringly and indisputably. Fates are changed, and the process is hinted to be impersonal, cynical and cold, happening to the detriment of one's true feelings and inclinations. Court love is also one of pragmatic marriages and is thus perverted in a second, new way as well, devoid of feeling in yet another manner than the one explained above.

We have two other instances in which the idea of politics trumping love at the Court gets clearly highlighted. Afonso, the king, warns his son, Pedro, in one of their contradictory discussions over the young prince's desire to choose a different woman than the one recommended to him by his father and by duty, that only free people can afford to love, meaning that a patriot king or prince has a higher purpose than being true to his feelings – that of protecting the land with alliances, which comes before and above love interest. In a way, the monarch's remark suggests that royal figures do not belong to themselves, they are their peoples', body and soul. Since the Court is a space where love matters so little and is perverted in this additional way as well – of being subsumed to and sacrificed for other, practical interests – Constancia's thought, as she is in the church getting married to Pedro, that a world in which one gets married a second time without having loved at least once is upside-down, is entirely justified.

Those who look critically upon Pedro and Inès' love and adulterous relationship (subsequent to Pedro and Constancia's marriage) have further parallelisms for the protagonists with the inanimate world (including the new bride, who observes their carnal trespassings from the castle balcony, using a spyglass). Inès is called "mătrăguna cu ochi aluncoși" (a "belladonna with a roving eye") (ibidem: 61), a "blonde snake" (ibidem: 62) (also referred to as a "viper" by Afonso (ibidem: 106)) who has "picked up Pedro's scent of stirred he-goat" (ibidem: 66); they are like "O cățea stârnită și un taur năvalnic." – "An aroused bitch and an impetuous bull." (ibidem: 69). On the other hand, Constancia is aware that the Court sees her as a "gloabă răpciugoasă" ("mangy hack") (ibidem: 67) and "iepuroaică" (a "pregnant rabbit/doe") (ibidem: 76). The animal analogies used for Constancia are meant to connote her lack of sexual attractiveness and beauty, as well as, respectively, her reduction to the condition and role of a royal breeder. For these reasons, an animal such as a hack is used for the former quality, based on the common features of being devitalized and repelling, and a rabbit or doe, in the second case, based on the function of expected fertility and reproductive penchant. On the other hand, the animals resorted to for comparison in Inès' case, i.e. the snake and the bitch, are meant to send us to very different features: slyness, playing the part of an enchantress successfully, as well as being sexually active and available.

In this context, I believe the term "belladonna" would be an inspired choice for translation for mătrăguna instead of other, more English variants such as "dwale", "banewort" or even "deadly nightshade", given its ambiguity supplied by the fact that in Italian belladonna translates as "beautiful woman", which in our case captures more of the contextual meaning. The plant invoked has extremely rich and diverging connotations. Its popular names include "the Good Lady", "the Grand Lady" or "Empress", and it is used for both medicinal purposes and the casting of spells and magic rituals (Mătrăguna, 2025, Antropoflora). Its ambivalence resides not only in its usage, but also in its types, as there is, traditionally, a black one growing in dark areas of the forest and a white variety living in the sunny places, where "nothing bad can endure", or even three kinds, not to mention that its name has been used, moreover, for an even wider range of similar plants, much like "Mandragora" has been a generic name for narcotic plants, as Mircea Eliade explains – all these making it a highly versatile flower (ibidem). Madness and becoming mad is associated with having ingested this plant, the Romanian saying "Parcă i-a dat cineva (sau a mâncat) mătrăgună" ("It is as if (s)he had eaten belladonna") automatically connoting (temporary) madness being telling for this aspect (mătrăgună, mătrăgune, substantiv feminin, 2025, dexonline). This relies on the scientific fact that the plant contains toxins causing "delirium and hallucinations" (Mătrăgună, 2024, Wikipedia).

Coming back to the selection of animals for Inès, it also reflects the notion of being full of vitality and life, and enticing and inviting in this way, an idea illustrated by Constancia's depiction of the two lovers seeming "fresh, alive and detestable", especially to somebody who is struggling with her health and being set aside and ignored by her husband for someone else who displays the exact opposite, desirable – in regular perception – features and personality traits than her own (Paraschivescu, 2025: 77). We again notice, in the characterizations above, the not only pragmatism and practicality of the communards in talking about love, but also crudeness, vulgarity and even a certain synthetic frankness and cruelty in their depictions, sometimes accompanied by a tinge of humor or satire. This effect is obtained phonetically as well, through the use, in Romanian, of numerous words containing strong consonants, grouped together, and next to a multiplicity of diacritics, which give a whipping quality to the sonority of their pronunciation, and thus harshness and weight to the respective descriptions in terms of how they sound like. Alliteration – sequential terms beginning with the same consonant – and assonance – similitude in the middle part of neighboring words in a sentence – can create "a sense of foreboding, of danger", which is part of the effect targeted in our case, the overall atmosphere the narrator aims at being aggressiveness, violence, shock and doom (Coelho, 2025).

So far, the language of love has had a rustic, folkloric, archaic quality, because it has mostly referred to how the masses perceive love. At the beginning of the novel, the court bard has looked for a pun and an alliteration to describe Pedro's becoming hinged in marriage, so his depiction is atypically recherché, reflecting a cultivated man of letters. Bishop Hernan of Hastings of Lisbon has the manner of a religious person in the way in which he conceives of Pedro, whom he considers a "detracat" (Paraschivescu, 2025: 37) through the lens of his deeds. The term reflects a tendency to judge everything taking into account and function of a fixed reference point representing a landmark and an echelon, from which one can derail if one becomes oblivious of it. This centric and perhaps rigid outlook is natural, given his profession and calling, which is based on a belief in something immovable and the existence of a right way. Hence, the word that he uses for Pedro mirrors his idea of measuring a person's worth based on one's closeness to a faithful fixed role model, and someone like Pedro has diverged from that center, getting farther and farther away, at considerable distance. A suitable English translation for the bishop's term that preserves these spatial and moral implications could be difficult to find, to encompass the semantic traits of both having gone astray, losing one's way, changing course and depravity, "derailed" seeming the best option in this case, though.

However, there is a lyrical component and poetry in some descriptions of Court love as well, to counter this suffusion in a pragmatic and vulgar outlook permeating the story. This romantic stance is provided mostly by the female characters – Constancia less, because of her bitterness, and Inès de Castro more, because she really loves Pedro, after all. First, she describes their love as a powerful natural phenomenon, wondering: "Can man stop the movement of clouds, the eagle's flight or the flow of the waterfall?" (ibidem: 48) Her rhetorical question emphasizes the inevitability of this sentiment and one's lack of control over it. It also points to a philosophy of a firm belief in fate, thus excusing the adultery under the aura of the star-crossed lovers. Her comment is an attempt to exonerate them and purify their connection, making it nobler. The absence of the loved one is felt as a profound and corporeal loss or split. To Pedro, she declares that being without him feels as if "somebody had ripped my heart out. A bloody void remains. A place where nothing can exist any longer. A barrenness not even the sun risen in the sky can light up." (ibidem: 54) He confesses to having the same sensation as soon as Inès leaves his side – feeling "his heart ripped out of his chest" (ibidem: 60). With these references coming from the two lovers, we are relaying to both the title of the novel, as well as the initial light in which love was presented at the beginning of the literary work, as all-conquering, all-powerful and enduring in time, set in stone in more ways than one.

Another instance of lyricism is introduced unwillingly by Pedro's father, king Afonso, while he is thinking about the charms exercised by Inès in a rather intrigued as well as a bit spiteful manner, while talking to his priest and confessing to having given the killing order for the young woman. He also uses a foreign language phrase to refer to the girl's neck, "colla de garza", out of which he says he wants a piece of, literally, to examine and verify why it is said to be so beautiful and whether it raises up to its reputation (ibidem: 106). The phrase is in Spanish, more exactly in Catalan, as "colla" only makes sense as originating "perhaps from coll ("neck")" in this dialect (colla, 2025, Wikipedia). It is a graceful and elegant image, compensating for the rudeness and crudeness encountered beforehand.

Pedro and Inès are called, at some point, "Two fakirs of sex, two shamans of rut." (Paraschivescu, 2025: 69) A fakir is, in its first meaning, "a wandering Hindu or Muslim holy man" (Longman Dictionary of English Language and Culture, 2003: 463). However, a more detailed definition introduces additional meanings, among which those of a trader or street vendor, and, through this type of activity, the derived sense and connotations of "swindler, a confidence trickster; a fraudster", as well as "actor" and "magician" (fakir, noun, 2023, Oxford English Dictionary). We notice the antagonistic realities contained in the same term, sending to religiousness and holiness, on the one hand, and deceit and materiality, on the other. A shaman "works in the world of spirits […] curing the sick and gaining important knowledge" (Longman Dictionary of English Language and Culture, 2003: 1235). Hence, what the two personalities have in common would be spirituality, access to a superior type of knowledge, a certain kind of holiness, as well as the attribute of being magical or beyond common understanding. With these two analogies, a definition of love as comprising these elements and thus being out-of-the-ordinary relays to the initial veneration of it that we find in the opening scenes of the book. A spiritualized, superior outlook is regained, adding mystique and mysteriousness to the nobility already claimed through the redemptive comments on love from above.

In the end, Inès is killed at the order of Pedro's father, the king, but Pedro finds the girl's – his new wife's, actually, as they have gotten married in secret – murderers, and his revenge is fierce. Having recently ascended to the throne after Afonso's death, Pedro orchestrates a so-called celebration, forcing the courtiers – his wife's assassins amongst them – to pay homage to the rotting corpse of the deceased woman, which he drapes in rich garments and seats on the throne next to him. Then, he rips their hearts out himself, throwing the organs in a boiling bowl of chickpeas and eating them half-raw before a terrified crowd – a metaphor for the way the lovers felt in each other's absence, as if missing their heart, as well as for what the plotters took from him. This poetic justice takes a horrific, gory form, made a spectacle for the new king's subjects. The impetuousness and passion of love as a feeling has a certain violence to it, and the loss of love transfers and channels this violence into revenge, adding this horror, histrionic component to what the lover perceives, in his grief, as a form of restoration of balance and justice, in what is in fact a compensatory mode for his suffering. This final dramatic scene reunites a few elements of the grotesque under the umbrella of manifest madness. This "'festive' madness" is regenerative, as it provides closure and a modicum of peace for the tormented soul of the lover, as well as what he sees as justice, also constituting a "gay parody of official reason", because it offers a new way of seeing things, free from the encumbrance of formality and hypocrisy (Bakhtin, 1984: 39); his act is folly, but a folly that has wisdom to it, despite being maniacal, reflecting the carnivalesque "ambivalence" between these two mental extremes that become one and interchangeable (ibidem: 361).

3. Conclusions

After having analyzed the instances in which love is described in various contexts and manners in the literary work under scrutiny, we can say that there are different angles that it is approached from in Cu inima smulsă din piept. First, there is a clearcut difference between the way in which love is seen in retrospect in the narrative present, compared to the way in which it was conceptualized at the Court, in the medieval past. In the now of the story, love is revered as almost something sacred, having left its mark that is timeless, the way love is itself, lasting and enduring over centuries. Love is presented here in a sentimental and philosophical outlook, as more powerful than almost anything else, and thus the tone is serious and reverent, as this feeling imposes; it demands respect and is worthy of it. The one contemplating love is almost in awe of the grandeur of this reality. However, Court love is a different matter. It is perceived as unserious, for two main reasons. On the one hand, it is usually reduced to carnal encounters and thus trivialized, and, on the other, it is always subsumed to other interests related to politics, economy and the welfare of the land one reigns over, thus being, from this stance, a strategic liaison or business transaction devoid of feeling. In the first case, love affairs become the object of frivolous laughter, in the Rabelaisian carnivalesque sense. In either of these two perceptions, medieval love is downgraded. However, the lovers' universe repositions love to the heights of the initial vision of the present. To them only, it is noble, pure and enlightening. This makes us conclude that there is a common thread over time uniting the two perceptions of love as something extraordinary, superior and spiritual, and something that prompts personal evolution.

The medieval vision of the masses on love, which is vulgar in a two-fold way, as it is literally that of the common people, or vulgus, and unrefined and base, contains, as we have seen, a marked tendency towards mockery. This manifests in the proneness to comparisons and other stylistic figures involving parallels with the animal world, mainly based on traits related to sexual behavior, attractiveness (or lack thereof) and reproductive patterns. These parallels with animals mirror the instinctuality of the people in those times overall. The combination of mockery, laughter, the emphasis on the illicit or unofficial side of life, as well as excess of the senses and the dealings of the lower body makes the discourse carnivalesque, and the bodies of the medieval young men and women congruent with what Bakhtin has named the grotesque body.

The language used by the author is colorful, filled with richly-connoted terms, the preservation of which in translation may raise problems. There is a recourse to archaic terms that create a rustic atmosphere. The narrator is fond of unexpected imagery, often obtained through oxymoronic phrases. Meaning is rendered even at the phonetic level, because alliteration is, for instance, used in order to create the impression of either humor or harshness and coarseness. Hence, style is indeed key for the creation of meaning, down to the simplest linguistic elements, which justifies a linguistic study once more.

There is a noticeable intention to shock the reader. Initially, it is visible in the search for unexpected imagery, and the raw quality of the images. Then, it is present in the ludic, often vulgar and explicit references to love in its less spiritualized forms. Finally, it culminates in the final scene of Pedro's glorious – for him – revenge, where we may speak of an aesthetic of the ugly and a cinematic, horror movie quality of the descriptions.

Overall, the message that we are left with is of love being an everlasting reality, defying and defeating class, material and practical considerations, one's own will and control, as well as death and time. We remember the language used in the novel to refer to love as equally stunning, vivid and shocking as the feeling that it describes, as if in an attempt to mirror its nature. The ability to make the language seem alive only illustrates the author's skill and craftsmanship, for which Cu inima smulsă din piept stands proof.

POPULAR CUSTOMS AND BELIEFS IN THE PUBLICATION "FOAIA DIECEZANĂ"

Abstract: Studying the traditions of the Romanian people, collecting folklore and publishing it in various publications of the time were the desires of many writers, as well as people of culture, professors or teachers from the country, but also from Banat. Whether we refer to teachers who taught at the Theological Institute or the Pedagogical Institute in Caransebeș, or to people with training in other fields, our attention was drawn to the scientific documentation and the illustration of the contents with representative examples of the traditions or customs presented. Last but not least, we mention the willingness of the editors of the publication "Foaia diecezană" from Caransebeș to publish in its pages materials rich in information, studies that are still interesting today. We propose to present some of the Romanian customs and traditions as they appear in the aforementioned publication.

Keywords: customs; traditions; carols; holidays; popular literature

Apărută din nevoia evidentă de comunicare în cadrul eparhiei Caransebeșului, publicația „Foaia diecezană" a reprezentat, vreme de mai bine de șase decenii, mijlocul prin care enoriașii erau informați despre evenimente din toate sferele vieții: religie, limbă, literatură, medicină, administrație etc.[1] De altfel, obiectivele exprimate în articolul program, obiective stabilite și de alte publicații ale vremii în articolele lor program[2], vor fi respectate întru totul de-a lungul timpului, acest lucru fiind posibil și datorită redactorilor și colaboratorilor. Legătura pe care publicația din Caransebeș o stabilește cu Țara, prin prezența a numeroase articole preluate din reviste apărute aici: „Convorbiri literare", „Candela", „Telegraful român", „Biserica și școala", „Gazeta Transilvaniei" etc., conferă o largă deschidere către ideile care animau societatea românească la vremea respectivă.

Prin apariția „Daciei literare" și, mai apoi, a „Convorbirilor literare", publicația Junimii, s-a demonstrat prețuirea folclorului de către scriitori, Alecsandri, Russo și Eminescu fiind doar câteva dintre numele demne de menționat. Acesta din urmă avea să menționeze în „Timpul" din 28 martie 1882: „Credem că nicio literatură puternică și sănătoasă, capabilă să determine spiritul unui popor, nu poate exista decât determinată ea însăși la rândul ei de spiritul acelui popor, întemeiată adică pe baza largă a geniului național".

De altfel, activitatea de la Junimea nu le era străină oamenilor de cultură din Banat. Episcopul Ioan Popasu, întemeietorul publicației „Foaia diecezană", nu era altcineva decât unchiul dinspre mamă al lui Titu Maiorescu, relația acestuia cu Banatul și bănățenii putând fi analizată din trei perspective: a prietenilor sau apropiaților tatălui său, Ioan Maiorescu, a rudelor sale și, în sfârșit, a colaboratorilor săi[3].

Ioan Paul, unul dintre autorii articolelor, își îndemna colegii să considere Junimea un model de limbă, iar culegerea folclorului și valorificarea tradițiilor, deziderate majore ale tuturor oamenilor de cultură.

Elena Voronca a publicat articolul Să nu stricăm datinile și obiceiurile poporului nostru (20, 21/1892), în care constată, cu părere de rău, tendința de renunțare la datinile și tradițiile poporului: „E trist a vedea cum de secole clasa inteligentă și privilegiată la noi, Românii, a fost totdeauna gata a-și părăsi datinele, obiceiurile, limba, portul, ba și legea dacă ar fi fost de trebuință și le-ar fi cerut interesele ori moda". Dacă ele totuși există, e meritul poporului, creația populară fiind aceea care s-a transmis, de-a lungul timpului, din generație în generație, sporind astfel avutul național: „Și de n-ar fi fost poporul să ni le păstreze cu sânțenie, noi azi n-am avea nimic al nostru. Lui trebuie să-i mulțămim că avem o limbă curată care ne arată originea, lui trebuie să-i mulțămim că se mai găsește la noi un port frumos, cu care ne putem mândri în lume, la superstițiile, povestele și obiceiurile lui alergăm pentru a ne descoperi urmele istoriei de sub dărămăturele timpului, iar cântecele, melodiile și producțiunile geniului său sunt fala geniului nostru național" (p. 6).

Este prezentă și în acest articol ideea de „geniu al limbii", idee răspândită în epocă începând cu Școala ardeleană. O altă idee este aceea a unității naționale pe care o conferă datinile și obiceiurile: „Să nu stârpim credințele din inima sa, să nu stricăm datinile și obiceiurile [...], să nu sfărâmăm hramurile, jocurile și petrecerile lui, cari l-au întărit și unificat" (p. 5). Dominația străină de-a lungul timpului asupra Țărilor române n-a făcut altceva decât să ne izoleze de lumea civilizată; aceasta pare a fi, în concepția E. Voronca, explicația tendinței de renunțare la credințele din inima poporului: „Și aici zace tot răul: e nenorocire că am fost depărtați de Apus, că n-a străbătut mai demult civilizația în țările noastre și acum suntem crescuți în spirit străin, nu în felul caracterului nostru". (nr. 21, p. 4).

Tocmai de aceea, pentru a-și recâștiga identitatea națională, se impune întoarcerea către popor, către spiritul limbii populare: „Aruncați-vă cu nesaț asupra poesiei populare, ea ne va arăta fizionomia cea mai fidelă a spiritului poporului nostru, ea ne va spune ce iubește poporul nostru și ce urăște el, ea ne va arăta idealul poporului nostru. [...] Căci un popor care și-a uitat de datorințele sale n-are drept să existe nici înaintea lui Dumnezeu, nici înaintea oamenilor". Aceasta este părerea lui G. Pop, exprimată în nr. 46/1892, p. 6-7.

Superstițiile reprezintă un subiect dezbătut în paginile publicației „Foaia diecezană". Articolul Despre superstițiuni al lui Emilian Voințchi se dovedește un studiu temeinic, științific. Stăpânind „viața poporului nostru într-un mod contrar moralei și științei, superstițiunea e una din cele mai importante și în multe sfere mai mare decât însăși religiunea", ea avându-și originea „în viața spirituală a oamenilor" și fiind, în fapt, „o calamitate morală"[4]. Catalogată astfel, „superstițiunea nu e numai pentru sine o rătăcire grea și păcătoasă, pentru că ea înseamnă deodată negațiunea credinței și rațiunii, ci ea face și pe om brutal și îi impune cele mai sângeroase jertfe, tocmai pentru că ea e o religiune a temerii și a spaimei și în urma corupțiunii sale fataliste împedecă și privirea în condițiunile naturale ale vieței omenești și distruge energia și voința" (41/1892, p. 5). Autorul face o clasificare a superstițiilor, prin raportarea acestora la trei factori. Astfel, „superstițiunea privitoare la raportul omului față cu natura" abordează cunoașterea semnelor sorții din astrologie; observarea semnelor lunii; numărul 13; starea somnambulismului; epilepsia, isteria; formulări de tipul Abracadabra; formule de vrăjitorie. La capătul acestor considerații, autorul formulează următoarea concluzie: „Pe lângă o necunosciință grosolană a legilor și forțelor naturei, lumea bâlbăe de amulete, simboale, talismane, filacterii, formule cabalistice și alte producte de artă de acest fel" (42/1892, p. 5). „Superstițiunea în privința raportului omului cu lumea spiritelor" face referire la vampiri, descoperirea de comori („iarba ferelor" fiind cea care are puterea de a descuia toate încuietorile), spiritele necurate nefiind decât sufletele morților. În sfârșit, „superstițiunea relativă la Dumnezeu și la cele dumnezeiești" are în vedere apa botezului, „cu efect vindecătoriu la boale de copii" și „mușchii ce cresc pe biserici au efect vindecătoriu", iar „cu încingătoarea unui călugăr omul poate să bată pe dracul" (44/1892, p. 5).

Cu toată activitatea pe care a desfășurat-o, Enea Hodoș este considerat „în primul rând un folclorist. I se atribuie pe bună dreptate această calitate, ținându-se seama de părerile sale cu privire la literatura noastră populară și de preocupările folclorice pe care le-a avut"[5]. Raportându-se și la alte popoare, E. Hodoș este de părere că „fără poezia populară literatura cultă n-a luat nicăieri un avânt mai puternic. Literatura populară nescrisă este lucrarea unui popor întreg sau a mai multora și se naște involuntar, iar literatura scrisă e a unui individ și se naște premeditat... Producțiile literaturii populare nescrise ne dau forma pentru o limbă adevărată națională bazată pe expresiuni și ziceri frumoase românești"[6]. Multe dintre părerile sale au putut fi cunoscute la sfârșitul secolului al XIX-lea și datorită publicației „Foaia diecezană", care i-a publicat, între altele, articolul Cântece poporale din Bănat (44, 45/1892), ca parte din prefața unor Poesii poporale ce se aflau la vremea respectivă sub tipar. Aici prezintă autorul aspecte fonetice ale graiului țăranului din Banat, evidențiind satira din cântecele populare, cele mai înțepătoare fiind strigăturile și chiuiturile; majoritatea poeziilor din volumul prefațat sunt poezii de dragoste: „Țărance și țărani, la șezători, la lucrul câmpului, la jocuri și nunți își cântă fericirea dragostii sau jalea ei, când în versuri pline de gingășie, când în versuri puternice, fără perifraze" (45/1892, p. 6).

Sărbătoarea cea mai îndrăgită de români este Nașterea Mântuitorului nostru Iisus Hristos. Preluat din „Gazeta Transilvaniei", articolul Din datinile de Crăciun (1/1901, p. 2-6) încearcă o clasificare a datinilor legate de evenimentul amintit. Astfel, N. Sulica semnalează: a. credințele religioase: pomana cu împărțirea de colindețe, umblarea cu icoana, steaua; b. datini în viața domestică: tăierea porcilor, libertatea dată servitorilor; c. viața publică: colindele la moș-ajun, vicleemul-brezaia; d. moravuri tradiționale: ospătarea bună, împărțirea de daruri în lucruri de mâncare. Reținem și îndemnurile din finalul articolului: „Nouă ca creștini și în același timp cu sânge latin în ale noastre vine, aceste moravuri ni-s scumpe, ni-s cel mai prețios tezaur, ni-s razele ce ne luminează originea cu o dulce aureolă, ne sunt sigilul, semnul de distincțiune al latinității noastre, precum limba ni-e un semn de nobleță în mijlocul barbarilor, cum zice Edgar Quinet. Deci să nu le uităm, să nu lăsăm a se șterge aceste datine, aceste instituțiuni, căci ar fi să ni se stingă însăși viața noastră națională", această ultimă frază aparținând lui G. D. Teodorescu.

Tot legat de sărbătoarea Nașterii Domnului este articolul Colinda. Originea și însemnătatea ei astronomică și calendarică, studiul lui Simeon Mangiuca, în nr. 50, 51 și 52 din 1902. Îndemnat de Atanasie M. Marienescu să studieze mitologia, Mangiuca era convins că românii au păstrat vechea mitologie greco-romană de-a lungul veacurilor. În felul acesta el încearcă să explice și să identifice toate datinile, sărbătorile, descântecele și poveștile poporului român cu cele din mitologia clasică[7]. Simeon Mangiuca explică: „Originea colindei trebuie căutată chiar în înțelesul cuvântului acestuia în limba română. Verbul a colinda înseamnă pretutindeni în graiul românesc «a umbla giur împregiur», «a încongiura» un loc căutând ori lucrând ceva".

În acest sens, autorul recurge la exemplificări din folclor: „Astfel, în poveștile (basmele) române se zice cum că feciori de împărat au colindat toată lumea, umblând după Ileana Cosângeana ori alte zine spre a le lua loru-și de soție. Dar în graiul de toate zilele, se zice despre orișicine, care umblă împregiurul unui loc căutând pe cineva, ori ceva: cum că a colindat tot locul respectiv și nu a aflat ce a căutat. Drept aceste, ideea și conceptul colindei este și nu poate fi altul, decât «a umbla giur împregiur» căutând ori efeptuind ceva. Acest concept al colindei se adevereşte şi din acea împrejurare, cum că colinda şi a colinda este cult de soare şi nu înseamnă alt ceva, decât soarele personificat ca Zeu în curgerea sa giur împregiur prin zodiac". Prin urmare, considerate un cult de soare, colindele poate fi, din punctul de vedere al autorului, clasificate astfel: a. colinda colindătorilor; b. colinda plugușorului; c. colinda pițereilor ori pizereilor; d. colinda colindeților; e. colinda junilor. Țurca (Turca), Cerbuțul, Bresaia și Vâsilca țin și ele de cultul de soare, adică de cultul colindei, dar cuprinzând în sine mai mult o propunere dramatică, decât colindare în înțelesul strâns. Colinda este definită ca „o propunere retorico-lirică a cultului de soare, a soarelui personificat ca Zeu, iară Țurca (Tiurca), Cerbuțul, Bresaia și Vasilca formează mai mult partea dramatică a colindei, adecă a cultului de soare".

a. Colinda colindătorilor în înțeles restrâns. Aceștia, „după datina din Bănat unde umblă și «pițierei» spre desclinire sunt juni și oameni în vârstă, ba și moși bătrâni, cari în decurs de 50-60 de ani în viața lor, totdeauna la Crăciun au umblat în colindă. Colindătorii colindează în seară și noaptea spre Crăciun". Urările colindătorilor „se acomodează mare parte după împrejurările familiare și a averei omului, așa d. e. fetelor mari se grătulează măritare cu feciori frumoși; [...] bătând unul dintre colindători pe un feliu de coabză, adecă pe un instrument anumit – cam în formă de jumătate de dobă, ori pe un ciur cu mâna (degetele) tactul, în noaptea spre Crăciun sub timpul până când umblă colindătorii și colindează la toate ferestrile cu luminări iluminate, așteptând pre colindători, carii după colindare devin dăruiți".
b. Colinda plugușorului. „Domnul Teodorescu, Colinde, datini şi moravuri ale poporului român, București, 1874, pag. 59, ne spune, cum că în orașe băieții, iară la țară junii colindează cu plugul. Băieții își fac un plug în miniatură, imitând pe cât se poate adevăratul plug, îl înfrumusețează cu artii (hârtii) colorate și flori, și-i pun un clopoțel sau doaue în coarne, iară junii de la țeară iau chiar adevăratul plug, cu un clopot mai mare, îl târăesc, și astfeliu merg la fieștecare casă de urează următoarea colindă:

Hăi, hăi!
Plugușor cu doi-spre-zece boi
Hăi! hăi !
Plesniți, măi !
Hăi ! hăi !
Plecarăm într-o sfântă joi
Cu plugul cu doi-spre-zece boi :
Boii din nainte,
Cu coarnele poleite
Boii din mijloc
Cu coarnele de foc,
Boii de la roate
Cu coarnele belciugate.
în frunte străinei
în coade codălbei
Se aibă (cutare) parte de ei!
Hăi, hăi !
Trosniți, măi! Etc.

c. Colinda pițereilor ori pizereilor. „Aceștia sunt copii, băieți (școlari) până la 12-14 ani. Pițereii ori pizereii colindează începând des de dimineața (pe aiurea încă de după mezul nopții) în ziua ajunului până pe la ameazi ori și până seara. «Pițerei» se numesc în Bănat și în părțile muntelui Vulcan din Transilvania, și în munții Abrudului. «Pizerei» se numesc în mai multe părți ale Transilvaniei, anume în tot comitatul Unedoarei și în valea Hațegului apoi pe Ternave în părțile Blajului, în comitatul Sibiului și în părțile Făgărașului. Acești «pițerei» se împart în mai multe cete, alegându-și fiește care ceată câte un vătav (conducătoriu), și asemenea colindătorilor umblă giur împregiur prin sat, de la casă la casă, poftind și gratulând ziua lui «Ajun», adăugând: «că-i mai bună a lui Crăciun». Pițereii de regulă devin sloboziți să între în casele oamenilor, căci după credința poporului se cred aducători de norocire și fericire. Pițereii când întră în casă, deloc sgânderă (escitează) focul din căminul ori din vatra casei cu bâtele ce se afla în mânile lor, numite pre alocurea «colinde».

Numele „Pițereii" rostit cu „ț" în silaba din mijloc are în singulariu „pițerel" și se vede a deriva de la cuvântul: „pețire" cu înțeles: de bine voitoriu și poftitoriu. „Pizerei" se răspunde cu „z" ca în limba magiară, iar nu ca în limba germană.

Cuprinsul versurilor pițereilor colindători sună de regulă pre scurt cam astfel:

„Bună ziua lui ajun !
Că-i mai bună (a) lui Crăciun!
Ațâți mei, ațâți purcei
Cu copiii după ei".

d. Colinda colindeților. „Acești numai cu numirea se deschilinesc de pițerei. Se numesc astfel în părțile Făgărașului. Colindeț este evident diminuitiv de la colindă și înseamnă colindător mic. Marienescu în tractatul său «Saturnalia și Pițereii», publicat în «Familia» din Pesta 1874, p. 457, ne spune că în Ciclova Română se numește pițereul și «colindat».

e. Colinda junilor. Acești juni încă colindează în ziua de Crăciun (nu în ziua lui Ajun, nici în noaptea spre Crăciun: ca colindătorii în înțeles strâns – și ca pițereii)".

Concluzia lui Mangiuca este: „Deci iată dovedită până la evidență și revindecată originea română a colindei noastre, care mai puternic decât chiar limba mărturisește de originea romană a Românilor, deoarece serbătorile vechi, datinile și credințele unui popor sunt mai tenace și durabile decât chiar și limba".

Profesorul dr. Petru Răzuș din Caransebeș publică în nr. 52/1939 un material despre Crăciunul românesc. Între afirmațiile profesorului reținem: „De Crăciun, creștinii sărbătoresc un moment unic în istoria omenirii: nașterea unui Dumnezeu între noi oamenii. Divinitatea împlinește timpurile de educare ale omenirii prin propria Sa întrupare în chip de om. Crăciunul românesc are o haină a sa populară folclorică, care-l deosebește de toate celelalte sărbătoriri ale ginților. Geniul poetic și muzical poporan al poporului nostru și-au dat mâna, creând capodopere rare de armonie și frumusețe artistică. Românul de pe întreg cuprinsul Țării a colaborat solidar la înveșmântarea Nașterii Domnului în haina cea mai variată în nuanțe, melodii și forme. Românul trăiește și petrece Crăciunul cu datini și obiceiuri, care se țin lanț. El primește iată sensul adânc creștin al nașterii Domnului nostru Dumnezeu Iisus Hristos între noi oamenii: Dumnezeu nu avea nevoie să se nască, El preexistând din eternitate, lumea avea nevoie, însă, de naștere, de libertate și de viață. [...]

Impresiunile hereditare ale unei lumi păgâne, de dinaintea fenomenului creștin al nașterii, răbufnesc în creații alăturea spiritului creștin, dar care în caracteristice distincte rasiale, pe Moș Ajun cu: „Ian, sculați și nu dormiți" e colindă de ziua întâia a lui Crăciun, umblă toate sărbătorile cu steaua și Vicleimul, se produce pe marea scenă a tuturor străzilor și caselor cu Irozii, binevestește și urează de Anul Nou și Sân-Vasile, brăzdează simbolic glie mănoasă cu Plugușorul, bineventează cu Sorcova, ori hălăduiește după preot „chiraleisa" de Bobotează. Românul la toate participă, cântând, colindând și primind cu duioșie colindă la geam, stea în casă și pe masă, irozii cu teatrul, vicleimul cu nașterea. Voci tinere ori bătrâne, minți fragede ori serioase colaborează împreună la mitificarea și la Introducerea în basm și legendă a Nașterii Domnului Nostru Iisus Hristos. Rare sunt colindele unde a intervenit Biserica cu norma ei autoritară de credință. Și de astă dată receptivitatea poporului a fost uimitoare:

Naşterea Ta, Hristoase, Dumnezeul nostru,
Răsărit-a lumii lumina cunoştinţei;
Că întru dânsa cei ce slujeau stelelor,
De la stea s-au învăţat să se închine
Ţie soarelui dreptăţii
Şi să Te cunoască pe Tine, Răsăritul cel de sus, Doamne, mărire Ţie,

Colinda aceasta se întâlneşte peste tot pământul românesc: în Ardeal şi-n Bucovina, în Muntenia ca şi-n Basarabia. Ea cuprinde în sine sinteza tuturor cuprinsurilor folclorice din jurul Crăciunului, cât şi sinteza cultă a doctrinei creştine.

Naşterea lui Dumnezeu între oameni este lumina cunoştinţei noi faţă de negura întunericului păgân. Ţăranul român nu trivializează, nici nu scoboară ideea religioasă în cadre nepermise. Decenţa caracteristică poporului nostru nu îmbracă Naşterea Domnului decât cu plugăritul, decât cu oieritul sau păstoritul, o altă scenă nu admite decât viaţa sătească, alţi actor nu foloseşte de cât cei biblici, la care adaogă câte un plugar, sau un cor de păstor. Nota specifică poporană rămâne şi în ceea ce priveşte preocupările: Moş Ajun urează de bine plugarilor şi ară brazdă nouă, steaua vesteşte roadă multă, la fel sorcova, în Bădica Traian, cel cu grânarele bogate, face pâne multă, pentru mari şi mici. Câteva exemple vor fi şi mai grăitoare: în ele colindătorii se adresează celor bogaţi, anunţându-le vestea cea mare. Nota socială, natural, nu lipseşte, săracul face şi aici comparaţia indirectă cu belşugul, chiar cere direct:

Bună dimineaţa la Moş Ajun,
Ne daţi ori nu ne daţi;
Sculaţi, sculaţi boieri mari,
Că vă vin colindători,
Noaptea pe la cântători,
Să v-aduc pe Dumnezeu
Să vă mântuie de rău...
sau plânge:
Moş Crăciun, moş Crăciun,
La casa de om sărac
S-a gătat făina-n sac
Şi n-avem să-ţi dăm colac
Moş Crăciun, moş Crăciun...

Geniul poporan nu şovăie să cânte în formă de colindă chiar Balada Mioriţei. Şi iată, că geniului divin, ce află deslegare problemei mântuirii în naşterea unui Dumnezeu sub timpuri, i-se alătură geniul poporan, care cântă acest eveniment cu creaţia sa supremă.

Ambele, într-o fericită acordare, colaborează la o colindă, cum nu o cântă nici un neam de pe pământ Domnului nostru Iisus Hristos. Rare sunt popoarele cu atât de fericite posibilităţi artistice ca poporul român, de aceea şi rare sunt creaţiile artistice, care să fie asemenea alor noastre. De aceea şi Crăciunul românesc este şi sinteza cea mai profundă adoratoare şi fericită ca espresie a unui popor, faţă de evenimentul crucial în viaţa omenirii: Naşterea Mântuitorului său. Dar, să ne sfârşim modestele noastre încercări de prezentare a sărbătorii Naşterii Domnului printr-o prismă curat românească, cu vorbele poetului:

Colinde, colinde,
E vremea colindelor,
Când ceriul se-ntinde,
Asemeni oglindelor ..."

În concluzie, trebuie să remarcăm preocupările românilor din această parte de ţară aflată sub Imperiul Austro-ungar de a descoperi, interpreta şi valorifica literatura populară, prin publicarea rezultatelor cercetărilor în presa timpului sau în volume de poezii şi proză populară.

Ele se aliniază în acest fel preocupărilor existente la nivel național. Să menționăm și contribuția adusă astfel de bănățeni la sporirea tezaurului literaturii populare naționale, în acest sens „Foaia diecezană" rânduindu-se la loc de cinste între publicațiile vremii în ceea ce privește „găzduirea" producțiilor literare populare.

CIORAN, THE SCHOLAR-READER: FROM THE COLLECTION OF MATERIALS TO READING-WRITING

Dumitra Baron
Assoc. Prof., PhD., "Lucian Blaga" University of Sibiu

Abstract: The study examines the portrait of Cioran (1911-1995) as a reader, focusing on the practices and mechanisms of his interaction with other texts, as recorded in his reading notes and Cahiers 1957-1972 (1997). According to the Romanian-born French writer, reading is a deliberate approach to collecting materials rather than just an act of survival and it is inextricably linked to and prolonged by writing. The analysis focuses on Cioran's formal note-taking techniques, such as the inscription of citations (often in the original language and sometimes translated) and the use of underlining to select elements based on stylistic quality or intellectual interest. A significant aspect of this practice is the personal commentary that follows the recorded fragments, serving as an ironic sentence, an immediate critical response or a thoughtful explanation of his reading method. By applying the model of reading gestures (solicitation, accommodation, highlighting and ablation) as defined by Antoine Compagnon, the article demonstrates that Cioran's reading is a selective act of appropriation that involves a necessary decontextualization of fragments that are then re-inscribed into his own work, with new meanings, conforming Cioran as an 'uchronic' reader who systematically reactualizes memory and intertextuality.

Keywords*: Cioran; reading practices; citation and commentary; intertextuality.*

Le rapport de Cioran à la lecture est fondamentalement double : il constitue à la fois un « exercice de survie » et une stratégie active de recherche et de collecte de matériaux pour son œuvre à venir. En étudiant la figure du lecteur[1] Cioran, tel que révélé par l'examen de ses Cahiers 1957-1972 (1997) et notes de lecture, il est possible d'identifier les éléments d'une personnalité de lecteur expert, méthodique, rigoureux, qui ressemble à un véritable « érudit » de la lecture. Nous nous proposons d'analyser les mécanismes précis par lesquels Cioran s'approprie les textes lus, prolongeant de cette manière l'acte de lecture par une pratique d'écriture visiblement intertextuelle. Suivant la problématique soulevée par Roland Barthes autour de la « Notatio », nous prendrons d'abord en compte les pratiques formelles de Cioran, comme la prise de notes, la consignation des citations (en langue originale ou en traduction) et les soulignements. Notre attention se concentrera ensuite sur le rôle du « commentaire » personnel qui accompagne souvent les citations dans l'espace des Cahiers, que ce soit dans le but d'exprimer des impressions, de formuler une critique ou de proposer des synthèses des ouvrages lus. Enfin, en s'appuyant sur les cinq figures de lecture identifiées par Antoine Compagnon (la sollicitation, l'accommodation, le soulignement, l'ablation et la signification), nous démontrerons que la lecture chez Cioran représente un processus créateur qui conduit à une décontextualisation et une réactualisation constante de la mémoire et de l'intertextualité, faisant de l'auteur un véritable lecteur « uchronique ».

En rappelant la signification que le verbe « lire » avait pour les Anciens, Julia Kristeva insiste sur l'importance de l'acte de lecture en vue d'une meilleure compréhension de l'acte de création : « 'Lire' était aussi 'ramasser', 'cueillir', 'épier', 'reconnaître les traces', 'prendre', 'voler'. 'Lire' dénote, donc une participation agressive, une active appropriation de l'autre.

Pendant ses lectures, Cioran fait toutes sortes de notations, de commentaires qu’il marque dans des agendas, des blocs-notes, des carnets et des cahiers ou sur des bouts de papier. Il « avait l’habitude, dans une écriture à peine lisible, de griffonner ses pensées, des impressions, des réminiscences de lectures » (Cioran, 2000 : 7), écrivant dans ses Cahiers des citations en original, qu’il s’efforçait de les traduire en français. Ainsi l’auteur prolonge-t-il la lecture par l’écriture : « il notera des lieux, constituera des carnets de citations ou des supports de mémoire (les hupomnèmata), autant de traces de ses lectures qui serviront sa méditation. » (Piégay-Gros, 2002 : 29)

Dans l’opinion de Roland Barthes, la pratique de « noter » se situe à plusieurs niveaux : le « réel » (quoi choisir), le « dire » (« quelle forme, quel produit à la Notatio »), le temps et le sens : « La Notatio apparaît d’emblée à l’intersection problématique d’un fleuve de langage, langage ininterrompu : la vie – qui est texte à la fois enchaîné, filé, successif, et texte superposé, histologie de textes en coupe, palimpseste – et, d’un geste sacré : marquer (isoler : sacrifice, bouc émissaire, etc.). » (Barthes, 2002 : 46) Nous retrouvons cette problématique au sein des Cahiers cioraniens qui représentent l’endroit où l’écrivain inscrit des citations, des commentaires ou des projets de textes, ainsi que brèves caractérisations, voire des synthèses des livres lus. Pour Cioran, noter se traduirait par marquer, cocher, souligner, mais aussi par « écrire pour mémoire », consigner, enregistrer. La notation suppose en même temps un indice à fonction de « nota bene », un jalon de lecture.

Cioran est un lecteur attentif à tous les indices des livres, les titres bien formulés l’attirent, malgré le contenu qui se révèle parfois illisible : « The Anatomy of Melancholy de Robert Burton. Le plus beau titre qu’on ait jamais trouvé. Qu’importe après que le livre soit illisible ? » (Cioran, 1997 : 39) Après la lecture du livre de Ruskin, Ethics of the Dust, Cioran prend la décision de ne jamais lire un livre qui est en dessous du titre, « si beau qu’il se suffit à lui-même et vous dispense de lire le livre » (Cioran, 1997 : 887). Ces titres répondent aux attentes de Cioran car ils contiennent des termes qu’il apprécie (la mélancolie, la poussière) et correspondent parfaitement à sa vision de vie. Pourtant, le contenu n’est pas à la hauteur du titre et la déception est d’autant plus grande.

En tant que lecteur acharné, il fait la lecture des revues et des magazines dont il saisit les éléments qui suivent ses préoccupations intellectuelles. Il lit pour s’informer sur des sujets de civilisation, domaine auquel il a accordé toujours une importance particulière : « J’ai lu dans une revue anglaise la liste des monuments démolis par le fait du baron Haussmann. Ce qui est effarant, c’est que la population l’ait laissé faire, qu’il n’y ait pas eu d’émeutes, etc. – On n’a jamais défiguré, en temps de paix, une ville autant que Paris. » (Cioran, 1997 : 205) Il cherche des informations sur les auteurs et sur les personnages historiques qui l’intéressent : « Dans le Sunday Times de cette semaine je viens de lire un article de Raymond Mortimer contre Marc Aurèle, qui aurait été un « prig » (pédant), un philistin, un hypocrite. Évidemment on peut tout dire. Je me suis foutu en colère et j’ai failli écrire une lettre d’insultes à l’auteur. Puis en pensant à l’empereur, je me suis calmé. Quel besoin aussi de lire des journaux ? » (Cioran, 1997 : 381) On doit remarquer la tendance de Cioran de suivre le modèle choisi dans les gestes et les attitudes. Parfois, il s’arrête sur les images qui parlent d’elles-mêmes et qu’il décrit et commente en adoptant la posture de critique de civilisations : « Sur la première page du Herald Tribune, une photo : dans une école du Sud, aux États-Unis, des enfants blancs, autour d’une table ; à une autre table, une petite négresse seule, le regard infiniment triste. Ces écoliers blancs la rejettent, ne veulent pas lui adresser la parole. Un jour l’Amérique devra payer cher ce préjugé terrible, explicable et pourtant inadmissible. » (Cioran, 1997 : 783)

La lecture des articles sur divers auteurs le fait réfléchir davantage sur ses écrits, parfois c'est une occasion de se repentir de ses actions passées : « 30 décembre Lu hier avec le plus grand malaise dans une revue anglaise, une 'exécution' d'Eliot qui ressemble à celle que j'ai faite de Valéry. C'est vraiment trop commode d'être injuste. Comment ai-je pu commettre si allègrement un tel péché de facilité ? » (Cioran, 1997 : 891) Cioran fait évidemment allusion à la « condamnation » écrite qu'il a infligée à Valéry, lors de la rédaction d'une préface aux œuvres de Valéry traduites en anglais, article demandé par un éditeur américain. La fameuse « affaire Bollingen » finit par le refus de la part de l'éditeur de publier une telle préface ; pourtant, cet article a été repris et publié par Cioran dans le livre Exercices d'admiration (1986). En fait, il déteste son engouement pour l'œuvre de Valéry, son ancien modèle, et pratique un exercice de défascination. On voit aisément, qu'il catalogue cette entreprise comme un « péché de facilité », en argumentant qu'il est plus facile de commettre des injustices que de garder une position neutre lors de l'exercice d'une lecture critique.

Dans ce contexte, nous insisterons sur la manière dont l'écrivain « cite » ses lectures, en retenant pour l'instant les procédés formels. Les citations notées sont accompagnées au moins par le nom de l'auteur : « … 'Hope without an object cannot live'[2] - (Coleridge) » (Cioran, 1997 : 86). Parfois, les références du livre sont indiquées ou seulement le titre est précisé sans aucun autre indice relatif au nom de l'auteur[3].

La lecture et la prise de notes des fragments des œuvres anglo-américaines ne diffèrent pas de celles appliquées aux œuvres françaises ou allemandes. Il faut observer que Cioran lit tantôt dans la langue originale (« Dans un livre sur le bouddhisme zen de A.W. Watts, je lis ceci : 'But the anxiety-laden problem of what will happen to me when I die is, after all, like asking what happens to my fist when I open my hand, or where my lap goes when I stand up' » (Cioran, 1997 : 283-284)[4], tantôt dans la traduction (« Dans son essai sur Poe et la France, Eliot écrit : 'Une complète inconscience du style peut signifier que la poésie n'a pas encore fait son apparition ; une complète indifférence au sujet peut signifier que la poésie est arrivée à sa fin'. » (Cioran, 1997 : 769)[5] Les notes qu'il prend des écrivains anglais renvoient aux citations en original, accompagnées parfois d'une traduction française (officielle ou faite par Cioran) ou directement aux ouvrages traduits. Les citations sont marquées typographiquement par des guillemets, ou, s'il s'agit d'un syntagme ou d'un seul mot retenu en langue étrangère, ils sont mis en italiques : « A. qui a proposé mes 'Définitions de la Douleur' à une revue anglaise s'est vu répondre : 'It's too depressing' » (Cioran, 1997 : 210) ou entre guillemets : « […] Un texte aussi passionné ne peut être 'cursory', je l'ai porté en moi pendant des années. » (Cioran, 1997 : 533)

Pendant l'acte de lecture et de prise de note, Cioran écrit de petits commentaires qui portent soit sur ses impressions de lecture, soit sur la critique de la citation. Le commentaire figure parmi les quatre types de discours critique que Tzvetan Todorov analyse dans le chapitre « Comment lire ? » du livre Poétique de la prose (1971). Ces quatre discours, la projection, le commentaire, la poétique et la lecture, sont « tous hétérogènes au discours littéraire lui-

2 « L'espoir sans objet ne peut vivre » dans Work without Hope (1828).

3 « Il est dit dans le Zohar : 'Tous ceux qui […]' (dans Franck, La Kabbale, p. 183) » (Cioran, 1997 : 169) ; « 'Je suis un lâche, je ne puis supporter la souffrance d'être heureux.' (Keats) à Fanny Brawne » (Cioran, 1997 : 177).

4 « But the anxiety-laden problem of what will happen to me when I die is, after all, like asking what happens to my fist when I open my hand, or where my lap goes when I stand up », The Way of Zen. Pantheon, 1957, p. 56. « Me demander avec angoisse ce qu'il adviendra de moi quand je mourrai revient, après tout, à me demander ce qu'il advient de mon poing quand j'ouvre la main, ou de mon giron quand je me lève. » (Alan W. Watts, Le Bouddhisme Zen, PB Payot, 1960, traduit de l'anglais par P. Berlot, p. 24).

5 Nous pensons que Cioran a lu directement la version traduite, puisque le fragment correspond parfaitement à celui qui figure le volume français : Essais choisis, Paris, Seuil, 1950, trad. Henri Fluchère, p. 405. Il s'agit de la conférence prononcée à la Faculté des Lettres d'Aix, en avril 1948 par T. S. Eliot, portant sur « Edgar Poe et la France ». Cioran a lu cet article en 1969, à l'époque de la rédaction de son texte sur Paul Valéry. D'ailleurs, même si la citation en cause n'est plus reprise dans ses livres publiés, l'article sur Paul Valéry contient certaines traces de cette lecture.

même », c'est-à-dire qu'ils permettent de « lire un langage à travers un autre » (Todorov, 1971 : 252). Le commentaire ne doit pas être regardé comme un texte secondaire, un « après-coup », un « discours d'accompagnement », car « toute l'activité de commentaire renouvelle sa visibilité » (Schlanger, 1992 : 144). Il représente un texte à statut propre, bien défini, la lecture attentive d'un livre n'étant qu'un « commentaire continu, une succession de notes échappées à la voix intérieure. Les notes marginales sont une partie des notes purement pensées »[6]. Prenons un exemple de citation suivie par un commentaire fait par Cioran : « Dans le livre d'Alan Wood sur Bertrand Russell, je trouve ceci : 'Bertrand Russell was a child who began asking questions, as soon as he could speak – in fact, three days after he was born, his mother wrote that 'He lifts his head up and looks about in a very energetic way.[1]' Quand on veut à tout prix avoir de l'humour, on tombe inévitablement dans la niaiserie. » (Cioran, 1997 : 323) (1. « Bertrand Russell enfant commença à poser des questions dès qu'il put parler – en fait, trois jours après sa naissance, sa mère écrivait : 'Il lève la tête et regarde autour de lui de façon très énergétique' »)

Observons qu'il introduit très brièvement la citation, après avoir toutefois précisé le livre et l'auteur qu'il cite ; il est intéressant de voir déjà dans cette introduction très expéditive que l'écrivain désapprouve le fragment choisi, la phrase « je trouve ceci » indiquant déjà au lecteur une certaine méfiance de sa part. La citation est donnée dans la langue d'origine et le commentaire qui s'en suit ressemble à une sentence ironique, signe de son penchant pour condamner de cette façon la pratique de certains biographes d'ajouter à leur œuvre des détails insignifiants ou ridicules sur la vie des auteurs qu'ils décrivent.

Pour en rester à Bertrand Russell, Cioran considère que la conclusion-testament de son Autobiographie (livre publié en 1967) n'est pas en concordance avec son attitude existentielle : « Que de naïveté de la part de quelqu'un qui, toute sa vie, a fait profession de scepticisme. » (Cioran, 1997 : 797) Davantage, il développe des commentaires en partant d'une pensée de jeunesse de Bertrand Russell. Ces considérations sont introduites seulement par le marqueur qui indique le nom du philosophe américain, le livre étant complètement ignoré. Cioran se résume à présenter cette pensée : « Jeune, il écrivit qu'il allait exterminer le plus grand nombre de gens possible, pour que la somme de conscience diminue dans l'univers. » (Cioran, 1997 : 941) Cet exemple lui apparaît comme « la plus belle et la plus forte » que Bertrand Russell ait conçue : « Pour moi, elle a plus de poids que le reste de son œuvre, pourtant considérable. (Vingt-cinq mille articles !) » (Cioran, 1997 : 941) Nous pouvons voir la tendance de l'écrivain d'accorder de la valeur à un livre s'il y trouve une phrase ou une pensée digne d'être retenue. De tels fragments sont en mesure de sauver le livre : « Dans le Journal d'exil de Trotski, entre des opinions politiques qui datent forcément, il intercale cette remarque, qui rachète tout le reste : 'La vieillesse est la chose la plus inattendue de toutes celles qui arrivent à l'homme'. » (Cioran, 1997 : 991)

Après la lecture de chaque livre, Cioran écrit presque toujours ses conclusions personnelles : « L'écrivain véritable aime passionnément les apparences, il ne cherche pas la Vérité. (Après avoir lu quelques pages de Saint-Simon). » (Cioran, 1997 : 138) Nous constatons qu'un rapport productif et créateur, accompagné d'un effet esthétique, s'instaure entre le texte et le lecteur. Celui-ci indique ses incertitudes relatives à l'auteur d'un certain fragment (citation inscrite dans ses Cahiers ou citation de mémoire) : « Ma passion pour ce que je croyais être des découvertes m'a fait négliger les règles élémentaires de la prudence ; et puisque je ne me suis pas refusé les satisfactions habituelles des inventeurs, il n'est que juste que j'éprouve aussi leurs déboires ». (Hume (?) (Cioran, 2008 : 23) On constate aussi l'inscription de se réminiscences de lecture notées dans un souci de vérification professionnelle : « Quel roi wisigoth qui, au VI[e] siècle, écrivit un commentaire sur

l'Apocalypse ? Le manuscrit a été publié, par qui et quand ? Souvenir vague d'une fiche lue en hâte dans je ne sais plus quelle bibliothèque. » (Cioran, 1997 : 38)

Dans ces commentaires, Cioran essaie de proposer une explication de sa méthode de lecture. Ainsi « « écrire, lire et écrire sur la lecture sont des actes créateurs qui relient l'homme à la vie » (Béguin, 1973 : 9), Cioran faisant l'expérience de ces aventures profondément ontologiques, expériences inséparables de sa conscience artistique.

Certains livres sont lus superficiellement en raison du fait que l'écrivain et le sujet ne comptent pas beaucoup à ses yeux : « Je viens de feuilleter un livre sur Bernard Shaw. Quand on pense qu'on le comparait avant la guerre à Shakespeare ! Les auteurs à succès devraient, pour devenir modestes, pratiquer ce genre de biographies. Il n'y a pas un atome de poésie dans la vie, ni dans l'œuvre de Shaw. » (Cioran, 1997 : 748) En se référant à l'écrivain anglais, ses propos portent en général sur le refus de toute ressemblance entre l'œuvre de celui-ci et celle de Shakespeare. Les écrits du premier manquent la « poésie », élément fondamental chez le deuxième. À ses yeux, Shaw n'est pas un poète, comme Shakespeare, ni un grand écrivain, comme Tacite, ni même un littérateur, mais plutôt un « journaliste extrêmement doué », chez qui l'humour était « automatique, presque à l'état de réflexe ». (Cioran, 1997 : 748)

Toutes ces observations montrent d'une façon exemplaire que la lecture occupe une dimension fondamentale pour l'existence et pour l'œuvre de Cioran, ce qui nous amène à nous interroger sur les mécanismes proprement dits de la lecture.

Si la poïétique concerne notamment les gestes de l'écriture, de la création, la lecture, en tant que « création dirigée » (Sartre, 1948 : 48), comprend à son tour plusieurs mouvements, orientés eux aussi vers l'écriture. Le découpage et le collage constituent ainsi des « expériences fondamentales du papier » (Compagnon, 1979 : 16) accompagnant le geste de lecture et le prolongeant par un geste d'écriture.

Dans son livre portant sur les mécanismes et sur les fonctions de la citation, Antoine Compagnon identifie quatre figures distinctes de la lecture. Dans l'ordre chronologique, la sollicitation est celle qui intervient d'abord. Elle se définit comme « un petit coup de foudre parfaitement arbitraire, tout à fait contingent et imaginaire » et représente plutôt une affaire de chance, de hasard : elle est « essentiellement fortuite » (Compagnon, 1979 : 17) et peut s'exercer par plusieurs indices d'un livre : le titre, un certain mot ou un certain syntagme. Chaque élément peut donner lieu à une attirance inexplicable, à un désir d'approche de la part du lecteur.

La sollicitation est suivie par l'accommodation. Le fragment qui a retenu l'attention du lecteur doit être repéré et marqué en tant que lieu de reconnaissance et de retour. C'est grâce à ce genre de rencontre hasardeuse que la lecture peut devenir créatrice : « En un sens donc l'événement de lecture – ou ce que j'appelle ainsi et que je retiens en essayant de l'analyser, en l'écrivant – est déjà écrit ou plutôt inscrit dans le texte que je lis, comme programme par la disposition des phrases, des mots, des lettres. Mais, en un autre, c'est mon regard lisant qui le fait éclater : que de fois ai-je lu cette page sans que rien ne se produise. L'espace de l'événement, le faisceau du regard parcourant la page, le regard, un lieu incertain mobile, labile entre les yeux qui lisent et la page lue, un écart, où ces yeux ouvrent un intervalle sous leurs pas désaccordés. » (Marin, 1999 : 16)

Une fois le fragment choisi mentalement, se produit une autre opération : le s*oulignement* (d'habitude mental, car, en tant que lecteur respectueux du livre, nous ne voulons pas le tacher par le crayon et nous mémorisons une phrase, une expression, un mot). Quand même, « lire, un crayon à la main, comme le recommandait Érasme dans le De duplici copia, ainsi que tout l'enseignement de la Renaissance, (…) est un geste récurrent qui paraphe, qui surcharge le texte de ma propre trace. » (Compagnon, 1979 : 19-20)

Après la consultation du fonds Cioran[7] et en nous appuyant sur les informations trouvées dans les études portant sur quelques-unes de ses notes de lecture[8], nous pouvons affirmer que l'écrivain lisait le crayon à la main, tout en prenant des notes sur des calepins ou sur des bouts de papier. Il faisait parfois des soulignements directement sur le livre et les transcrivait ultérieurement dans ses cahiers. Il est intéressant d'observer que ces soulignements portent parfois sur des extraits qui ont dû avoir été choisis en fonction de leur pertinence syntaxique, des modèles de paragraphes bien écrits, des formules, voire des styles d'une bonne écriture. Ainsi, dans la première étude de Charles Darwin, De l'origine des espèces par sélection naturelle, en deux volumes, nous identifions peu de soulignements. Du point de vue du thème, l'hérédité compte parmi les sujets auxquels Cioran s'est beaucoup intéressé, néanmoins, compte tenu des soulignements opérés, il nous semble que l'écrivain avait lu ce livre pour des raisons stylistiques également. Nous identifions à la page 3 du premier volume le fragment suivant : « Ils n'ont raison qu'en un sens très limité, comme nous le verrons bientôt ». Cette phrase contient plutôt des expressions générales à employer dans la rédaction logique d'un essai que des idées fondamentales sur la question générale de l'ouvrage. Vers la fin du même paragraphe dont est extraite la phrase précédente, nous observons un autre soulignement : « [Il est évident] qu'on ne saurait attribuer la structure de ce parasite, et ses rapports si compliqués avec plusieurs êtres organisés distincts, à l'influence des conditions extérieures, des habitudes, ou de la volonté de la plante elle-même. »[9]

Cioran était probablement déjà attentif aux problèmes linguistiques de la langue française, son penchant pour le repérage des phrases bien construites, voire grandiloquentes, étant évident. La façon même de souligner est sélective, dans un fragment choisi, car il existe des syntagmes omis, comme c'est le cas du texte choisi par Cioran à la page 4 du même livre : « Nous verrons ainsi qu'une somme considérable de modifications héréditaires est au moins possible, [et, ce qui est au moins important], nous verrons tout ce que peut l'homme en accumulant, au moyen de sélections successives, [des variations légères] ».

En ce qui concerne l'autre ouvrage qui comporte la signature autographe de Cioran, William James, Précis de psychologie (traduit par E. Baudin et G. Bertier, 7e édition, Paris, Marcel Rivière, 1927), nous pouvons nous appliquer à une étude plus vaste des techniques de soulignement pratiquées par l'écrivain lecteur. Les soulignements sont plus fréquents cette fois-ci et il est évident que la lecture a été faite notamment dans des buts d'apprentissage des notions et des phénomènes de psychologie. Cioran s'intéresse aux citations d'un certain professeur Ladd (dont il souligne aussi le nom), citations qui définissent par exemple la psychologie (ch. I, p. 1). À part les soulignements, le lecteur écrit de petites notices, une sorte d'aide-mémoire afin de pouvoir mieux se repérer dans le livre. On peut voir à la page 3 du livre, les deux postulats de la psychologie, que Cioran souligne, au même niveau spatial du premier postulat, dans la partie de gauche, il inscrit « Postulats Psh ». Parfois le soulignement est signe de non-compréhension du sens du terme, le mot étant marqué afin qu'il puisse ensuite être recherché dans les dictionnaires. C'est le cas de « roucoulements », nom souligné et comportant en-dessus l'explication en roumain. Le soulignement n'est plus toujours horizontal, suivant phrase après phrase, mais il est aussi vertical, indiquant par une barre verticale un certain paragraphe.

8 Il s'agit de l'analyse de quelques-unes des notes de lecture de Cioran datant de la période où il fut étudiant en philosophie à l'Université de Bucarest (1928-1932). Nous renvoyons précisément à l'étude d'Eugène van Itterbeek, Cioran, lecteur de Spengler (2002) et à l'article « Cioran et le romantisme allemand. Notes de lecture sur Georg Mehlis, Die deutsche Romantik » (2000).

9 Nous avons mis entre crochets les syntagmes qui n'ont pas été soulignés.

Nous ne devons pas absolutiser cette pratique, il est clair que le soulignement est une façon de marquer l'acte de lecture, de choisir les éléments qui lui attirent l'attention, mais Cioran ne l'applique pas de manière systématique. Il existe des fragments du livre de William James, qui ne comportent aucune trace de lecture et pourtant on les retrouve d'une manière fragmentaire, incomplète, imprécise même dans ses écrits. Il est possible, qu'une partie de ces fragments ait été directement notée dans des fiches de lecture et qu'ensuite, en travaillant ses propres textes, il les ait consultées ; ou, vu leur caractère fragmentaire, inexact parfois, qu'il les ait inscrites dans sa mémoire et qu'elles revenaient dans son texte comme une sorte de réminiscences de lecture. Pour illustrer cette deuxième hypothèse, nous proposons la lecture d'un fragment du livre de William James, fragment qui ne comporte aucune marque de lecture de la part de Cioran : « Au contraire, un jour où l'on ne fait qu'attendre et désirer quelque événement nouveau qui ne survient pas dure une éternité. Tœdium, ennui, Langeweile, boredom sont des mots dont l'équivalent se retrouve sans doute dans toute langue humaine, pour exprimer l'état d'une conscience qui, n'ayant rien d'autre à quoi s'occuper, porte toute son attention sur le passage du temps lui-même ; on attend anxieusement du neuf, on s'y prépare, mais rien ne vient qu'un temps vide ; de telles expériences indéfiniment répétées nous donnent une conscience effroyable de la longueur du temps. » (p. 371)

Nous retrouvons une partie des concepts écrits en italiques dans le texte original, dans un fragment des Cahiers de Cioran : « Boredom, Langeweile, aburrimiento, plictisealã, - n'ont pas de valeur poétique ; seul l'ennui a réussi à conserver ses multiples fonctions. » (Cioran, 1997 : 853) Nous observons comment Cioran fait usage des quatre mots-clés mis en exergue par William James : « Tœdium, ennui, Langeweile, boredom ». Ils sont décontextualisés, Cioran garde seulement trois des quatre termes, il change leur ordre, leur ajoute des équivalents en espagnol et en roumain, et les recontextualise dans son écriture, tout en se référant à leur valeur poétique, qui n'a plus rien à voir avec leur signification dans le contexte d'origine.

Cette étape de soulignement représente, selon Antoine Compagnon, « l'épreuve préliminaire de la citation (et de l'écriture), un repérage visuel, matériel » (Compagnon, 1979 : 21), le droit du lecteur sur le texte et anticipe le mouvement d'ablation. Que signifie le soulignement sinon une ablation, une excision du fragment élu, isolé de son contexte, qui se convertit lui-même en texte : « non plus en morceau de texte, membre de phrase ou de discours, mais morceau choisi, membre amputé, organe découpé, mis en réserve, pas encore 'greffe'. » (Compagnon, 1979 : 18) Choisir un mot ou fragment du texte signifie déjà que la lecture procède par « coupure, incision », « opération quasi-chirurgicale » (Lisse, 2001 : 25) qui a trait à une certaine volonté de violenter le texte. C'est une violence qui surgit du besoin ressenti par le lecteur d'approfondir la signification du morceau choisi, d'en comprendre la totalité de sens. À ces quatre gestes de lecture (sollicitation, accommodation, soulignement et ablation), Antoine Compagnon ajoute un cinquième, nommé « la cinquième roue du carrosse », qui est représenté par la signification (le sens) : « La sollicitation fait partie du sens, de la valeur dont j'investis le texte : elle en est une composante authentique, produite par l'acte de lecture. » (Compagnon, 1979 : 26) Le plaisir de lecture est lié au plaisir de la signification d'un passage qui retient l'attention du lecteur, en lui faisant désirer sa présence dans son propre espace (celui constitué par la notation) : « qu'est-ce que citer sinon produire un lieu ? – 'lieux d'énonciation', c'est-à-dire où la virtualité énonciative s'énonce en pro-duisant, en énonçant, une figure en forme de moi du sujet qui s'énonce : ce réseau de lieux d'énonciation ou cette topique énonciative construit, 'schématise', (…), le portrait du sujet en moi. » (Marin, 1999 : 117-118) La « solli-citation » et l'« ex-citation » contiennent le geste même d'appropriation : la citation. L'essentiel de la lecture est représenté par ce qui est « cité », découpé », puisque la citation « tente de reproduire dans l'écriture une passion de lecture, de retrouver l'instantanée fulgurance de la sollicitation, car c'est bien la lecture, solliciteuse et excitante, qui produit la citation. La citation répète, elle fait retenir la lecture dans l'écriture : c'est qu'en vérité lecture et écriture ne sont qu'une seule et même chose, la pratique du texte qui est pratique du papier. » (Compagnon, 1979 : 27)

L'écriture serait dans ce sens la continuation logique et obligatoire de la lecture, une manière d'empêcher l'oubli et de maintenir actifs tous les souvenirs. Cioran est ainsi non seulement un lecteur herméneute, qui travaille le sens et admet la polysémie de l'intertexte, mais aussi un lecteur uchronique, parce qu'il privilégie la dé-temporalisation des textes et réactualise systématiquement sa mémoire à partir des lectures actuelles ; dans ce sens, il s'agit de l'actualisation de la mémoire, d'une intertextualité qui ne date pas, d'une « fusion des horizons » de sa « bibliothèque intérieure » (Samoyault, 2001 : 71-72).

En conclusion, l'étude des pratiques de lecture de Cioran, telles qu'elles se manifestent dans ses gestes de notation, de soulignement et de commentaire, confirme la dimension fondamentale et existentielle que la lecture occupe pour l'homme et pour l'œuvre. Loin d'être un simple exercice passif de réception, la lecture cioranienne est une stratégie de survie et une quête d'appropriation, faisant du lecteur un « érudit ». Le processus s'apparente à une véritable poïétique de la lecture : le choix attentif des indices formels (titres, phrases bien construites) est suivi par l'ablation du fragment élu, une opération qui l'isole de son contexte d'origine pour mieux l'investir d'une nouvelle signification. Cioran se révèle ainsi un lecteur uchronique et herméneute, il décontextualise et détemporalise les textes et les réactualise dans ses Cahiers, où la citation, le commentaire et la sentence personnelle s'entremêlent pour former un espace de méditation et de production. En marquant le texte pour mémoire, Cioran construit non seulement une œuvre, mais schématise également son propre portrait de lecteur, où le texte de l'autre devient un lieu d'énonciation pour sa propre pensée.

ASPECTS OF THE BIOGRAPHY OF SAINT MAXIMUS THE CONFESSOR IN THE CONTEXT OF THE MONOTHELITE CRISIS

Marius Telea
Assoc. Prof., PhD, "1 December 1918" University of Alba Iulia

Abstract: Saint Maximus the Confessor was without doubt the most important Christian writer of the seventh century and, at the same time, one of the most profound patristic authors of all time. He centered the entire existence of the world on its relationship with God. He succeeded in constructing an effective theology, with concrete exemplifications, in an academic language that bears the imprint of the symbiosis between the great classical culture and the Christian tradition, especially in the field of Christology. He distinguished between the natural will and the gnomic will, developed theories concerning the logoi of created things, the divine energies, and the deification of man—all in a mystical-Christological manner. With him, one era of Christian theology comes to an end and another begins.

Keywords: Maximus the Confessor; biography; theology; symbiosis; God.

Preliminary Remarks

In 1997, in an essay, Andrew Louth perceptively and objectively identified the essential role of the Palestinian connection in relation to both the inspiration and shaping, as well as the subsequent Byzantine destiny and reception, of Maximus' thought and work. The Palestinian monastic tradition indeed played a decisive role in configuring Maximus' theology and writings. Yet the English historian leaves us with two unresolved clarifications: he does not specify the precise spiritual content of the Palestinian monastic tradition, beyond its simple fidelity to Chalcedon and to the origins of its founders; nor does he provide a convincing explanation of the concrete manner in which the Palestinian connection was realized in the biography of Saint Maximus. Closely interrelated and far from being mere archaeological details, the resolution of these issues is of decisive relevance for any substantive evaluation of Maximus' theology.

I. Reassessment of a Constantinopolitan Hagiography

All contemporary scholars agree that we know discouragingly little about the biography of Saint Maximus prior to his involvement in the Christological controversies around the year 630. On the other hand, as shown by the chronology established by Dom Polycarp Sherwood (1952), the overwhelming majority of Saint Maximus' great theological and spiritual works - "Ambigua", "Responses to Thalassios", and the "Mystagogia"- were certainly written before 634, more precisely within a span that can be approximately set between 626 and 634. With the exception of a few extremely brief and interpretable hints present in Maximus' own letters and writings, the beginnings of his monastic life and theological activity remain shrouded in a mystery that both irritates and provokes scholars. Admittedly, we have at our disposal the "Greek Life"[1], but the scenario of Maximus' early monastic and theological years proposed there is far too summary and far too stereotypically hagiographic to provide conclusive clarifications.

The personal life of Saint Maximus reflects the ecclesiastical situation of his time. For him, as for the entire epoch, it was clearly a matter of choosing between political compromise and martyrdom for the true faith and its confession. Nevertheless, to consider him fundamentally only as a dogmatician and polemicist who served the ecclesiastical power interests of his age would be to misinterpret the symbolic relevance of his life. He secured a special and authoritative place in Christian consciousness as a contemplative monk and theological visionary. Indeed, the distinctive feature of his life lies in the fact that his enemies from ecclesiastical and political circles accused him more of political offenses than of heresies, since his spiritual theology, monastic status, and integrity as a thinker were so widely recognized that any accusation of heresy would have been ineffective and would have seemed simply ridiculous[2].

According to the account of the "Greek Life", Saint Maximus, sometimes also known as Maximus of Chrysopolis[3], was born around the year 580 in Constantinople, at a time when the Byzantine Empire enjoyed a relative state of harmony that softened existing tensions and conflicts. There he led a life devoted to imperial service, monastic practice, and ecclesiastical politics, marked by profound theological insight and traversed by dramatic events.

According to his first biographer, the Studite monk Michael Exabulites, who lived in the IX-th century[4], Maximus came from a devout and wealthy family directly in the service of the imperial household[5]. From the same biographer we learn that he received a complete classical education (in other words, he fully completed the cycle of encyclopedic formation characteristic of Late Antiquity and the early Middle Ages, consisting of the disciplines included in the so-called trivium-quadrivium). During his training he devoted himself with great interest and dedication especially to the study of philosophy[6]. Indeed, his own works testify to the quality of his studies in rhetoric and philosophy, which proved to be at the highest level of his time[7].

His good reputation eventually attracted the attention of Emperor Heraclius I (610-641), who elevated him to the rank of his chief secretary (protoasekretis)[8]. It is possible that during this period he also won over Anastasius, the private secretary of the empress, as his disciple[9].

Nevertheless, after some time, around the year 614, Saint Maximus left the imperial palace to devote himself to monastic life, entering the monastery of Chrysopolis, founded in 594 by Philippikos, the brother-in-law of Emperor Maurice (582-602), located on the Asiatic shore of Constantinople. He nevertheless maintained good relations with those at the imperial court, as we can deduce from his correspondence with John the Chamberlain. The motivations for this decision to leave the imperial court seem to have been the inner dissatisfaction of the young nobleman of Constantinople both with the restless life at court (which he preferred to exchange for a life of quiet, ἡσυχία), and with the increasingly ambiguous theological developments and tendencies toward compromise in the official imperial and ecclesiastical policies promoted by Emperor Heraclius I and Patriarch Sergius. These favored efforts to restore the [7]Based on recent research, Polycarp Sherwood has shown that when the biographer stated that Saint Maximus received the ἐγκύκλιος παιδεύσις, this meant that his education lasted from the age of six or seven until the age of twenty-one, and included grammar, classical literature, rhetoric, and philosophy (including arithmetic, music, geometry, astronomy, logic, ethics, dogmatics, and metaphysics). It also comprised his first encounter with Aristotle and with the Neoplatonic writers (through the commentaries of Proclus and Iamblichus). See also Polycarp Sherwood, „Notes on Maximus the Confessor", in American Benedictine Rewiew, I, 1950, p. 347.

[8] Ibidem, col. 72 C. His biographer goes further, stating that Saint Maximus was exceptionally gifted, perceptive of the demands of any situation, able to offer sound advice, and well prepared to express his opinion without hesitation. Thus, both the emperor and his court delighted in his presence and were deeply impressed by his personality.

politico-dogmatic unity of the Empire at the cost of sacrificing the doctrinal rigor of Chalcedonian Christology. In the monastery, his zeal for the ascetic life was fully rewarded and stirred even greater admiration in the hearts of the other monks[10]. Even though Monothelitism - in the form of Monoenergism - can be found as early as before the year 619[11], it could not have had any significant influence at the time when Saint Maximus became a monk. In this context, it is noteworthy that his biographer, when describing his life in the monastery, places no emphasis on his well-known struggle against the Monothelite heresy, but rather on his remarkable progress in asceticism and in the life of prayer[12]. Following his biography, we find an account of how his fellow monks, deeply impressed by his religious zeal, persistently tried to persuade him to accept becoming their abbot, and eventually succeeded in convincing him, though with considerable reluctance on the saint's part. Yet it seems that this account is not entirely accurate[13].

It is not known exactly how long he remained in this monastery; what is certain, however, is that he stayed for a time at the Monastery of Saint George in Cyzicus, which he left after the years 626–627, due to the Persian invasion that had reached the gates of the Byzantine capital[14]. Thus, in 632 we find him in North Africa, at Carthage[15], after a sea voyage together with his disciple Anastasius, during which he passed through Greece, probably visited the islands of Cyprus[16] and Crete[17], and also traveled through Egypt. In Carthage he lived, most likely, in a monastery called Eucratas (οἱ Εὐκρατάδες), where Saint Sophronius was abbot and where other exiled monks were also present. Saint Sophronius was to be elected, in 634, Patriarch of Jerusalem, being the first to oppose the Monothelite heresy. Saint Maximus and Saint Sophronius lived there together for a time, before the latter departed for Alexandria to take part in the discussions concerning the "Tome of Union" in 633[18]. It appears that, as a disciple of Saint Sophronius, Saint Maximus himself was drawn into the theological protest initiated by His biographer tells us that Saint Maximus subjected his body not only through fasting and other ascetic exercises, but also by standing in prayer throughout the entire night. Concerning the year of his entry into the monastery, an earlier chronology drawn up by E. Montmasson, "La Chronologie de la vie de saint Maxime le Confesseur", in Échos d'Orient, XIII, 1910, pp. 149-154) places his monastic profession around the year 630. This view was convincingly refuted by Venance Grumel, "Notes d'histoire et de chronologie sur la vie de Saint Maxime le Confesseur", in Échos d'Orient, XXVI, 1927, pp. 24-32; see also col. 128. The year 614 was also accepted by Polycarp Sherwood, op. cit., p. 349.

[13] It is hard to believe that Saint Maximus held an office or was anything other than an ordinary monk, though one who was highly respected. Those who argue the opposite base their claim on the well-known fact that Saint Maximus was called abba Maximus in the monastery. Cf. Venance Grumel, art. cit., p. 32.

[14] Regarding the time of Saint Maximus' settlement in Africa, E. Montmasson, in art. cit., p. 113, states that he left the monastery temporarily, going to Alexandria in 633, and then definitively, departing for Africa in 640. Venance Grumel, op. cit., pp. 24-32, is not entirely certain about this date, but believes that it took place around the year 633. The issue was definitively clarified by Robert Devreesse, "La fin inédite d'une lettre de Saint Maxime: un Baptême forcé de Juifs et des Samaritains à Charthage en 632," in Revue des Sciences Religieuse 17, 1937, pp. 25-35, who demonstrates that the year of his settlement in Africa is 632.

The victory of Emperor Heraclius I over the Persians (627-628), confirmed by the peace of the year 630, brought back into the Empire the Monophysite provinces of Syria and Egypt, which the Empire had lost for more than a decade. In order to reconcile these heretics with the Church, Patriarch Sergius of Constantinople (610-638) proposed, as a formula of agreement, the confession that "in Christ, after the union of the two natures, there exists only a single will and a single energy". This formula was accepted by the Egyptian and Syrian Monophysites but was rejected by Saint Sophronius, the future Patriarch of Jerusalem, as well as by many monks and clerics who considered it heretical. In the year 633, the formal pact between the Orthodox and the Monophysites was concluded in Alexandria through the acceptance of this heterodox formula.

the Alexandrian hierarch against the Monoenergist compromise represented by the union of Alexandria (633) and the imperial decree called „Ekthesis" of 638.

Saint Maximus lived as a monk in Africa for quite a long time. We have no indications suggesting that he left the monastery there for several years. He maintained good and close relations with the imperial governors in Africa, such as Peter the Illustrious and George, who held power from around 634[19] until the years 642/643[20].

Following the death of Saint Sophronius on March 4, 639, in the Holy City - occupied in February 638 by Arab troops under Caliph Omar - Saint Maximus became the soul of the Orthodox resistance against the Monothelite heresy.

After the death of Emperor Heraclius I in 641, his son and successor, Constans II (641-668), attempted to resolve the Monothelite controversy by promulgating the "Typos" (648), drafted a year earlier by Patriarch Paul II of Constantinople (641-653). Yet earlier, in July 645, Saint Maximus had engaged in a disputation, probably in Carthage, with Paul's predecessor, Pyrrhus (638-641), who was then in exile. As a result of this debate, Pyrrhus admitted defeat and returned to Orthodoxy, being recognized as patriarch by the bishop of Rome. However, in 646 Pyrrhus once again changed his position, despite several synods held in the same years that condemned the Monothelite heresy. At the end of that same year, Saint Maximus arrived in Rome, where he quickly distinguished himself as the most important opponent of Monothelitism. He succeeded in mobilizing the Church of Carthage and of Africa against Constantinople. Pyrrhus[21] was also in Rome, where he was excommunicated by Pope Theodore I (642-649) once it became clear that he had altered his stance. Despite this, in 654 he was reinstated, for a short time, as Patriarch of Constantinople, leading to a complete rupture between Rome and Constantinople[22].

The new pope, Martin I (649-655), went even further than his predecessor and, at the suggestion of Saint Maximus, convened in October 649 a synod in the Lateran Palace, at which Saint Maximus participated as a simple monk[23]. This synod condemned the Monothelite heresy and anathematized those who adhered to it. The decisions of the synod were sent throughout the Christian world[24].

Emperor Constans II reacted immediately, but the exarch sent to Rome to take the necessary measures adhered instead to the papal doctrinal line. This meant that both the pope and Saint Maximus were not arrested until June 653. Eventually, both were brought to Constantinople, where the pope was tried in 654, exiled to Cherson in 655, and died in September of that same year[25].

The trial of Saint Maximus, together with that of his disciple Anastasius, took place in three stages: 654, 656, and 662. It seems that the authorities sought to impute to him political charges rather than heresies, and this required much time[26]. All these efforts failed completely, yet Saint Maximus was exiled to Bizya in Thrace[27]. A new attempt to persuade him to adopt a more flexible attitude was undertaken at Bizya in 656 by a court bishop, Theodosius, who had been sent by Peter, the new Patriarch of Constantinople. But Saint Maximus did not change his convictions[28]. On September 8, Saint Maximus was summoned to the Monastery of Saint Theodore in Rhegion, where he was asked to renounce his uncompromising stance, but he refused[29]. He was then sent a second time into exile at Perberis, also in Thrace, where he remained for six years[30].

The final attempt by the imperial court to persuade Saint Maximus and his disciples - Anastasius the apocrisiarius and another monk named Anastasius - to abandon their position took place at a synod in Constantinople in 662. When they refused, they were condemned and tortured (their tongues and right hands were cut off so that they could no longer speak or write against Monothelitism). They were then exiled, this time to the southeastern shore of the Black Sea, in the region of Lazica.

Saint Maximus died in suffering, at nearly 82 years of age, on August 13, 662, in the fortress of Schemalion, near the present-day town of Muri[31]. His life remained an example of steadfastness in true faith. He was a resolute monk who preferred suffering and death rather than abjuring the true faith concerning the person of our Lord Jesus Christ, in whom subsist two natures, divine and human, corresponding to two wills and two operations or energies.

As noted above, the life and theological activity of Saint Maximus is relatively better known beginning around the year 630; by contrast, the indications offered by the Greek Life for the earlier period fail to clarify in any way an essential stage in the formation of Maximus' thought and work.

II. A Hagiographic Version from the Palestinian Sphere and the Data It Reveals

In this context, an unexpected light came from a document discovered and published in 1973 by the Oxford professor of Syriac literature, Sebastian Brock, under the title "An Early Syriac Life of Maximus the Confessor"[32]. This Syriac "Life" of Saint Maximus is preserved (unfortunately not in its entirety, as the end of the manuscript is damaged) in a single manuscript housed at the British Museum in London (B.M. Add. 7192, ff. 72b–78b), dated to the end of the seventh century and the beginning of the eighth. This "Life" concludes a manuscript that also contains three other opuscula of clearly Maronite origin: an anonymous text entitled "Why Do We Censure the Sixth [Ecumenical] Council?" and two sets of problems-questions to be posed to the Maximians concerning their belief in two wills and, respectively, two operations in Jesus Christ.

The author of this "Life" gives his name twice: Grygwry [Gregory] of Reshaina and Gywrgy [George], presenting himself as a disciple and, respectively, as a bishop under the jurisdiction of Patriarch Sophronius of Jerusalem (634-638). In the editor's opinion, this is none other than Bishop George of Reshaina, known as the author of a Monophysite and Monothelite florilegium, also preserved at the British Museum (B.M. Add. 14535, ff. 1–20). The author was therefore an adversary of Saint Maximus, whom he considered responsible for drawing their common teacher, Sophronius of Jerusalem, into the anti-Monoenergist and anti-Monothelite polemic[33].

The purpose of composing this biography - which undoubtedly belongs to the genre of anti-heretical contra-hagiography - was the systematic denigration of its hero: Maximus is presented as the generic product of an adulterous union between a Samaritan merchant and a Persian slave (thus belonging to a marginal community) and as the result of a theological-spiritual formation deemed heretical (Origenist). Clearly, none of these claims can inspire confidence in an objective researcher. On the other hand, one of the principal characteristics of George of Reshaina's "Life" - beyond its heretical clichés - is its remarkable care in specifying his sources of information concerning the Palestinian childhood and youth of Saint Maximus, which he reports concisely, with details explicitly stated as verifiable by contemporaries. It is also clear that the author of the Syriac "Life" was himself Palestinian, a very good connoisseur of the province and of Jerusalem, and an important local figure. In some of the events described - such as the synod of Cyprus (634) - it is evident that he was an eyewitness. Much less precisely informed, however, does the author of the "Life" appear with regard to the frequent and extended wanderings of Saint Maximus throughout the Mediterranean basin that followed the Arab invasion of Palestine in 638. The date of composition of the "Life" is placed somewhere between the death of Saint Maximus (662) and the Sixth Ecumenical Council (681). It is possible that it was written precisely in proximity to the Sixth Ecumenical Council, probably with the aim of demythologizing and discrediting Saint Maximus. Indeed, the name of Saint Maximus never appears in the official acts of the Council of 680-681. An explanation could also lie in the political character of his condemnation and in the desire of the synodal fathers to spare the memory of its principal instigator, Emperor Constans II (641-668), father of Constantine IV Pogonatus (668-685), who convened and presided over the council[34].

If we set aside the uncharitable formulas customary in controversies with those considered heretics, we must acknowledge that the information supplied by the author concerning the youthful years of Saint Maximus remarkably clarifies both numerous aspects of his thought and certain relationships that he continued to maintain, especially with the monk and future Patriarch Sophronius[35], and even more so with Anastasius, who remained inseparable from him in his doctrinal struggles until death.

In essence, the Syriac "Life" relates the following: that he was born in 580 in the town of Hesfin in Tiberias (northern Palestine), as the product of an adulterous union between the Samaritan merchant Abna of Sychar and a Persian slave belonging to a Jew named Zadok of Tiberias. The two married but being unable to remain in Samaria - where they were threatened with death by the merchant's relatives - they came to Hesfin. There they stayed for two years with the priest Martyrios, who baptized them both, changing their names to Theonas and Maria, while also offering them protection, being related to Gennadios, governor of Tiberias. The fruit of their love received at baptism the name Moschion. At the age of nine, the boy's father died of dropsy, and only a year later his mother also died. Then the priest Martyrios took the young Moschion to the monastery of the Old Lavra, entrusting him to the care of Abbot Pantoleon. In memory of his own nephew who had died young, the abbot changed the boy's name from Moschion to Maximus[36].

Abbot Pantoleon initiated the young Maximus into Origenism. By his sharp intelligence, the young Maximus attracted the attention of the venerable monk Sophronius, who for a time resided in the Old Lavra[37]. Moreover, it is said that Sophronius later took Maximus as his theological adviser in his undertakings. The author of the Syriac "Life" gives a detailed account of one of these initiatives of Maximus: the attempt undertaken by Sophronius - probably already Patriarch of Jerusalem, though recognized as such only by Rome - to achieve reconciliation with Constantinople, which for decades had been engaged in supporting a [36] The hypothesis of the Palestinian, rather than Constantinopolitan, origin and formation of Saint Maximus the Confessor has also been accepted by Romanian theology. Dumitru Stăniloae, in Introducere to the work "Ambigua", in Scrieri – Partea întâi, col. „Părinți și Scriitori Bisericești", vol. 80, follows this version. We can find it also to Olivier Clement, Source. Les mystiques chrétiens des origines, Paris, 1982, p. 332.

[37] All the chronologies of the life of Saint Sophronius clearly attest that between the years 594 and 603 he was in Palestine, visiting the Fathers of the Jordan desert, from the Lavra of Saint Sabbas to the New Lavra.

unionist policy with the Monophysites of the Empire on the basis of Monoenergist (later Monothelite) formulas, against which he had protested both in 633 and through the Synodicon of 634. Sophronius now wished to ease the tensions between the Palestinian and Constantinopolitan hierarchies by means of a synod convened on the island of Cyprus. The Syriac "Life" describes at length the proceedings of this synod. Following its failure and the officialization of Monothelitism through the imperial decree of 634, Maximus is said to have shut himself in a small cell together with his disciple Anastasius, until the appearance of the Arabs in Syria and Palestine. After the invasion of these provinces, Maximus departed for Africa, the homeland of his disciple Anastasius, and later went to Rome, where he succeeded in stirring ecclesiastical resistance and political revolt in these provinces against the authorities of Constantinople. As a result of these subversive acts and incitements to rebellion, Maximus and Pope Martin I were arrested and brought to Rome, where they were accused of treason and of facilitating, through their destabilizing actions, the Arab occupation of the East and North Africa. The "Life" breaks off with the account of Maximus' anti-imperial and anti-hierarchical actions in Constantinople while awaiting his trial. The lost portion of the "Life" can, however, be reconstructed from the summary preserved in two later Syriac chronicles. These describe the condemnation and the well-deserved end of Maximus but indicate as the reason for his condemnation not his Christology, but his Origenism[38].

The significance and documentary value of the Syriac "Life" is connected - as its editor affirms - "…to the dramatic difference between the Syriac and the Greek Life in the account of Maximus' early years. According to the 'Greek Life', he was born in Constantinople into an aristocratic family, after a solid education being called into imperial service as chief secretary; later he became a monk in a monastery at Chrysopolis (situated on the Asiatic shore of the Bosphorus). In the 'Syriac Life', by contrast, he is of humble origin, born and raised in Palestine, where he became a monk in the famous monastery of Saint Hariton. We are now in possession of two sources, one written by an admirer, the other by an enemy, and in principle each must be treated by the historian with equal suspicion … My impression is - and its subjective nature must be emphasized - that there are no obvious reasons to reject the author's credentials, and that the overall tone of the account seems in perfect consonance with his claims"[39].

Despite its polemical accents and undeniable subjectivity, the general framework composed of objective events - thus verifiable even by contemporaries - is far too well documented to be dismissed as mere defamatory fiction and therefore has every chance of being real. The author of the Syriac "Life" is an adversary of Saint Maximus, but one who is documented and, above all, contemporary and compatriot with him; whereas the Constantinopolitan author of the Greek "Life", though favorable to the saint, does nothing more than fill a considerable documentary gap concerning the first five decades of Maximus' existence outside Constantinople with a scheme compiled from the commonplaces of monastic hagiography, clearly modeled (in its first part) on the "Life" of Saint Theodore the Studite. It must therefore be acknowledged that the scheme offered by the Studite hagiographer Michael Exabulites neither satisfies scientific curiosity nor explains the necessary framework for the emergence of one of the most remarkable theological works of patristic and universal thought.

Upon closer reading, and when correlated with all the historical data available from other sources concerning Maximus' biography, it becomes evident that the Syriac "Life" is something more than "a mixture of bizarre, even impertinent details," as Robert Devreesse characterized its summary from the Syriac chronicles in 1928[40]. Clearly, "much depends on whether one accepts or not the author's claim to have been a contemporary of Maximus. If one accepts it - and to me there seems no valid reason to reject it - then the Syriac 'Life' is a source of great importance regarding the events of Maximus' life and age, since it must have been composed only within a few decades, at worst, after his death. Even if the author's credentials are not accepted at the value of his claims, the Syriac 'Life' is nevertheless not a late compilation, for it is found in a manuscript plausibly dated to the eighth - or even the seventh - century, and thus must be placed at least on the same level as the panegyric we have in the Greek Life"[41].

Despite its heretical provenance and its tendentious character as contra hagiography, and being practically contemporary with the age of Saint Maximus, the Syriac "Life" succeeds, through the quantity of precise information it provides, in revolutionizing our knowledge concerning the exact location of Maximus' origins and spiritual formation. At the same time, it presents certain previously ignored details regarding the practically unknown period of five decades in which Saint Maximus was spiritually and intellectually formed, and during which his great biblical and patristic exegeses were composed.

All these assumptions remain, unfortunately, uncertain in the absence of more precise attestation. We are reduced to gleaning a few plausible indications, which are at least strikingly convergent: the particular attention devoted to Origenist texts, as well as the remarkable knowledge of the scriptural interpretations of the great Alexandrian; the familiarity with the thought and works of the Cappadocian Fathers - not only with Saint Gregory of Nazianzus, explicitly and abundantly cited and commented upon, but perhaps even more with Saint Gregory of Nyssa, discreetly employed in several places in his work. The same figure demonstrates an exceptional mastery in handling Aristotelian terminology and methods of argumentation which, however, must already be qualified as scholastic.

It is further established that, during most of the sixth century, the Palestinian monasteries were astonishingly vibrant and often effervescent centers of philosophical and theological speculation, as well as of meditation on the great scriptural themes, nourished by the works of Origen and Evagrius. Indeed, the entire thought and work of Saint Maximus Spring forth precisely from these sources.

Rather, therefore, than continuing to search in Constantinople for the framework in which this thought might have been formed, it seems preferable to grant at least relative confidence to what is reported by a contemporary, however hostile he may be and however questionable some of his assertions might appear[42].

Conclusions

Saint Maximus the Confessor is one of the most important Fathers of the Eastern Church and without doubt one of the most profound Christian thinkers. He left us a vast and exceptionally valuable body of work, at a time when many of the teachings of the Christian faith had not yet been clearly defined by the Church.

Thus, "the vision of the world that Maximus the Confessor has left us in his writings is, in more than one respect, the summit and the synthesis of Greek thought, both theological and mystical, as well as philosophical"[43].

The rediscovery of the true dimensions and authentic depth of the theological thought of Saint Maximus the Confessor is a relatively recent phenomenon, due in large part to the historical, philological, and theological investigations of the past century. These investigations have led to the unanimous recognition that Saint Maximus represents the culmination, the unparalleled giant of the Greek patristic tradition, comparable only to Saint Augustine or Thomas Aquinas in the West. In this light, the enormous discrepancy between the theological achievement embodied in Maximus' work and its comparatively limited influence in both the Christian East and West remains an especially enigmatic phenomenon.

The entire theology of Saint Maximus is a great hymn dedicated to the unity of all things, accomplished through the creative and saving love of God: the union of man with God and of God with man, the union of all creation in man when he fulfills his vocation of being at once microcosm and mediator - that is, the one in whom all created things are lifted up to God, from whom they came.

DOCTOR VICTOR SEGALEN, PRECURSOR OF EXISTENTIALISM

Mirela Radu
Assoc. Prof., PhD, „Titu Maiorescu" University of Bucharest

Abstract: The French linguist and physician Victor Segalen (1878–1919) is a good example of the intertwining of interests in science and literature. At the same time, the Frenchman Segalen was concerned with archaeology, ethnography and became an appreciated literary critic. Born in western France, in Brest, Segalen attended the medical faculty in Bordeaux. He spent most of his life in Polynesia and China. The 19th century brought to literature a new genre - exotic literature by writers who recounted their travel experiences. Among them we mention the naval officer Pierre Loti who described Istanbul, Gérard de Nerval who described his travels in Cairo, Constantinople, Malta and Italy in Voyage en Orient (1851), François-René Chateaubriand who described the native Amerindian populations in Voyage en Amérique (1826), etc. In this social and cultural context, Segalen was aware that he had to bring a breath of novelty to his travel diaries. And the literary path that the doctor adopted was that of authenticity, of immersion in the cultures visited and of familiarizing the Western reader with these exotic cultures. But, the literary merit of the doctor is that of having dressed these travel diaries, true ethnographic memories, in the scholarly form of novels without losing anything of the essence of sacredness.

Keywords:, literature; anthropological value; literary existentialism; authenticity; symbolism

Segalen's first literary work (1902) is his final thesis for medical studies and is an original approach that combines medicine and literature L'observation médicale chez les écrivains naturalists. Initially, this thesis was conceived, as the author admits, as an attempt at medical-literary criticism in order to ultimately take the form of highlighting the value of neuroses considered artistic materials. Even if Segalen's experience in writing had not been evident, his thesis demonstrates an extraordinary sagacity. Starting from science, which in the mid-19th century aimed to bring people useful and pragmatic knowledge of the truth, Segalen moves on to aesthetic values, sensing the need for society to free itself from the utilitarian tendencies of science. Thus, according to Segalen, the new scientific methods were to be applied in art. A particularly fertile category, full of pathological documents that the French doctor analyzed is the literature of naturalists.

The explanation is obvious - the naturalists exploited the anxieties of the human being in their literature, were interested in pathological cases and based much of their writings on medical casuistry. Segalen, without limiting himself to this literary trend, also includes in his analysis the writings of Shakespeare, Wagner and Ibsen, applying in his thesis the clinical technique to an entire literary school. A first similarity of literary writings with science is the capacity of the authors selected by Segalen to detach themselves, since the naturalists showed impassiveness and objectification. In the case of literature, Segalen observes, we are dealing not with a lack of sensitivity, but with a transmutation of values, becoming meta sensibility. The common denominator of art and medicine is justice and goodness, both of which converge towards the consolation of suffering. This parallelism between medicine and literature is compensated by differences. Thus, if the sole purpose of medicine and science in general is to identify the truth, literature turns Objective Reality into an artistic instrument.

Another difference is that the doctor takes into account all the details, because they could be relevant in establishing the diagnosis, while the writer makes a decantation of the elements, retaining only what his work can highlight. And these selection criteria applied by writers over the centuries create what we call literary schools. Segalen managed in this thesis to combine the medical clinic with the philological study, more precisely "a clinique objective, la clinique subjective et la documentation indirecte."[1]

Among the naturalists that Segalen analyzes are Gustave Flaubert, Xavier Aubryet, Adolphe Belot, Alphonse Daudet, Edmond de Goncourt, Sainte-Beuve who even worked in the hospital for a year, Henrik Johan Ibsen, Émile Zola, Jean Richepin, etc. Degalen perceives medicine as an intellectual gymnastics that endows the writer with the power of deduction, with objective analysis and with a suite of analytical tools without which literature would be poorer. The conclusion of Segalen's study of naturalistic literature is that these authors succeeded much better than other literary movements in applying impartiality in their writing, based on objective observation; naturalistic writers have a precision and clarity that approaches scientific language. The writings of naturalists have the character of clinical documents and through precision and veracity these writers become, as Segalen calls them, "authentic clinicians of literature."[2]

In the same year, Segalen published Les Synesthésies et l'école symboliste (1902) where he analyzed the authenticity of synesthesia facts with applicability in literary symbolism. Thus, Segal identified sensory correlations with literary applicability since the Vedic era.[3]

The next to attempt to interconnect the senses, according to Segalen, was the abbot Bertholon de Saint-Lazare (1741–1800), a Jesuit priest, mathematician, and scientist who created the Magnetic Harpsichord, an early acoustic carillon-type instrument, operated by magnetic attraction inspired by the Ocular Harpsichord of the Jesuit Louis Bertrand Castel (1688–1757), a French naturalist philosopher and writer. Segalen goes through the history of literature and comes to another writer who implemented synesthesia in his writings - Goethe in The Theory of Sounds and Colors (1810). Goethe perceived the sound of the cello as indigo blue, the violin was ultramarine blue, the clarinet was yellow, the trumpet was bright red, the flute was kermes red, the oboe was pink, the flageolet was purple, and the hunting horn was purple.[4]

Segalen leaves aside synesthesias as a medical manifestation of these unique associations and analyzes them from an artistic point of view. This is precisely the novelty that the French doctor proposes - the way in which synesthesias become from a clinical manifestation of artistic technique "d'efficaces et bénins excitants aux cerveaux de poètes sommés toujours d'exprimer du Nouveau, de faire œuvre créatrice ; quelque chose, en un mot, comme des forceps figurés, aidant à l'enfantement parfois douloureux de nouveaux Êtres, dans le monde des Idées et des Sensations."[5] Segalen focuses his analysis on how synesthesias become aesthetic material, more specifically the expressive power of correlations.[6] The one who poetically experienced these novel associations was the precursor of symbolism - Arthur Rimbaud. What Segalen observes is the subjective character of these synesthesias. None of the associations can be reproduced identically by another author because it is intimately connected o the individuality of the one who emits it, like an egoistic music as the French doctor expresses it.

In 1902 Segalen embarked as a doctor on board the ship La Durance. His journey would last three years and included exotic places - California, then the Pacific, which he traveled until 1904 in the footsteps of Gauguin. He returned from the trip via Ceylon, India and Egypt. His travel diary, Journal des Îles Suivi de Vers les sinistrés (1903), is not only an account of the French doctor's journey but also a documentation of the lifestyle, geography and people he met. During his stay in Tahiti, in 1903, the French doctor visited Hiva-Oa, the place where Gaugain had lived. At the same time, the doctor met with the people the painter had met in order to reconstruct the thread of the experiences of the post-impressionist who had died only a few months before Segalen's arrival in Tahiti. The following year, in 1904, Segalen published Gauguin dans son dernier décor in the Mercure de France (June 1904). Segalen was deeply impressed by Gaugain's life. The words the doctor uses to describe the post-impressionist may shock the reader, but as we delve deeper into the painter's description, we can identify the veneration that Segalen had for Gauguin: "Gauguin fut un monstre. C'est-à-dire qu'on ne peut le faire entrer dans aucune des catégories morales, intellectuelles ou sociales, qui suffisent à définir la plupart des individualités. Pour la foule, juger c'est étiqueter. On peut être honorable-négociant, magistrat-intègre, peintre-de-talent, pauvre-et-honnête, jeune-fille-bien-élevée ; on peut être « artiste », voire « grand artiste ». Mais c'est déjà moins permis, et il est impardonnable d'être autre chose que tout cela ; car il manquerait, pour être classé, le cliché requis. Gauguin fut donc un monstre, et il le fut complètement, impérieusement. Certains êtres ne sont exceptionnels que dans un sens, vers un axe autour duquel tourbillonnent, semble-t-il, l'ensemble de leurs forces vives ; et, pour le reste, la vie courante (…) mais il apparut dans ses dernières années comme un être ambigu et douloureux, plein de cœur et ingrat ; serviable aux faibles, même à leur encontre ; superbe, pourtant susceptible comme un enfant aux jugements des hommes et à leurs pénalités, primitif et fruste ; il fut divers, et, dans tout, excessif.[7]

The doctor's fascination probably came precisely from this dual nature of Gauguin, from his ability to be sublime and vulgar, sentimental and primitive at the same time. But the painter delighted his viewers with his color palette, Segalen managed to translate this enchantment of color into words. The way in which the doctor manages to express Gauguin's paintings in writing is the measure of his literary mastery. The finesse of feeling combines with the lively color, the metaphor with the personification, making the citator a spectator of a grandiose spectacle that combined the visual with the bookish "Et dans ces barrières strictes, un fouillis de masses vertes, de palmes ocreuses frissonnant au vent, de colonnades arborescentes hissant vers la lumière les efflorescences pressées. De l'eau bruit partout, crève sur la montagne, détrempe le sol, serpente en rivières au lit de galets ronds. Tout vit, tout surgit, dans la tiédeur parfumée des étés à peine nuancés de sécheresse, tout : hormis la race des hommes."[8]

Segalen was impressed by the painter's ability to break ties with civilization, to live in solitude, and to create art for the sake of beauty. Tribute to his scientific training, Segalen has the ability to be objective, however, and to describe Gauguin as he was a personality driven by instinct, with a primordial vitality, willing to compromise. Beyond his admiration for post-impressionist art, Segalen was a defender of the individuality of the colonies. In his essay Essai sur l'exotisme (1904), Segalen opposes colonialism and assimilationism to exoticism because for the doctor it is diversity that ensures human survival and not uniformity. Segalen supported Gauguin's art because he discovered in the painter a supporter as fervent as he was of the uniqueness of each people. The world of European conventions that the doctor himself tried to avoid is exotic in the painter's case. Segalen was in search of authenticity, and this is given by the indigenous and individual character of art, both on a personal and national level.

Proof of the doctor's strong attachment to anti-colonial values is the fact that he dedicated two other works to Gauguin, *Le Maître-du-Jou*ir and Les Immémoriaux (1907). For Segalen, the implications of the encounter with Gauguin's art are much deeper, reshaping the doctor's inner landscape that proceeds to a further step - a break with the colonialist tradition of the Sal country in an attempt to support peripheral cultures, left in a shadow by central domination. For Segalen, Gauguin is a dissident who defends authenticity against colonial change. Le Maître-du-Jouir, although never finished by the doctor-writer, is a eulogy to Gauguin's complex spirituality and, from a bookish point of view, is built as an ensemble based on ancient Maori culture and the attraction to an artist's ability to defend their work and individuality. What Segalen shared with Gauguin is the deep sadness of seeing people disappearing before their eyes. Both understood that this civilization was doomed to extinction through Europeanization. And perhaps the doctor's regret is deeper than the painter's because he sees how the one who imported the soul of the natives onto canvas has also disappeared "Tous deux notent que la race, peu à peu dépouillée de ses traditions, de ses dieux, de ses idoles, de sa joie de vivre, tombe sous la loi étroite du prêtre, du pasteur et de l'administration."[9]

Les Immémoriaux was begun in 1904 and published in 1907 and is the story of a young Maori, Térii, a teenager who helplessly witnesses the death of his traditions. Térii, haèré-po, is in the process of learning to become Arioï, who in Maori tradition had the role of perpetuating the historical and religious stories of his people. The Maori, not having a written language, relied exclusively on the oral transmission of folklore. Segalen's story takes place at the end of the 18th century. Segalen wanted to highlight the fact that those cultures that did not have a tradition of transmitting culture in writing had suffered the most because the colonialists did not encounter resistance and the identities of these cultures were easier to eradicate. The French doctor also focuses on the conflict that arose between Tahitian traditions and the Protestant religion brought by the British colonists. In a desperate attempt to save his cultural identity, Térii embarks on an initiatory journey from which he returns to Tahiti after two decades. In this short interval, his fellow countrymen had already become captives of the new customs brought by the colonists. The novel has a sad ending because this sole representative of the old culture is also seduced by the Christian hierarchy and becomes a deacon. Thus, the last bastion of the struggle for identity gives way. Even if Térii survives physically, he fails in his mission. Segalen presents his readers with not only a story of Maori culture in decline and eventually annihilated. The stakes of his writing are much higher - in fact, any culture encountered in the path of European occupiers (English, French, Spanish or many others) was annihilated both in identity and physically where opposition arose.

If from a literary point of view the book is not special, its novelty comes from the way in which the French doctor managed to capture the essence of Maori culture. The impeccable documentation, the fact that Segalen based his literary pages on direct observation and the way in which the smallest details of this special culture are presented to the reader make Les Immémoriaux a true anthropological study. In fact, Segalen became an ethnographer and explorer as his travels brought him into contact with distant cultures such as the Chinese, Polynesian and Russian. Unlike other writers who presented the occupied peoples from the point of view of Westerners, Segalen managed to identify the essence of the countries he visited and surprise the reader with the accuracy of his descriptions. In order to maintain his authenticity, Segalen uses Tahitian names and an entire hierarchy to describe the social categories of the natives.

Segalen's novel is a true ethnographic study and, if we refer to the criteria listed by Peter Metcalf of Harvard University[10] when referring to ethnographic research, we discover that the French doctor did anthropological work because he lived with the Maori, learned their dialect, beliefs and traditions and lived as the Tahitian community did. Segalen manages to introduce the reader into a world that has existed since time immemorial, full of strangeness and the sacred and to confer veracity, the author creates the narrator at the intersection of these two worlds - the local and the Western, as an intermediary who translates the actions of the staff for the uninitiated reader.

The doctor was aware that Western society had lost its deep connection with spiritual values, with the divine, and that the way of life he had encountered in Polynesia needed a translation for Western readers. The feeling of total immersion is masterfully created by Segalen through the use of local terms and expressions, thus leaving the door open for the entire Tahitian culture to invade the book space. Even the braid used by Térii to remember the stories he must convey is a real one in Maori culture, as Segalen had met an elderly native woman on his journey who used a braid called a totekao to keep track of a family's genealogy. Segalen simply adapted this braid to the entire Tahitian culture, giving it a broader meaning to give veracity to his novel. By using this interweaving, the reader is presented with the origin of the Maori people, and these small details make Segalen's novel leave the area of pure ethnography and enter that of bookishness.

The Western system of thinking and relating to reality is confronted with a totally different vision in Segalen's novel. The Maori are indebted to the creator, the ancestors and nature in their becoming. They relate to a cosmology different from that proposed by Europeans. Immersion in these traditions that bring man into a different relationship with divinity constitutes the central theme of the novel by this doctor who managed to dress his ethnographic descriptions in a bookish way. The author appeals to an adolescent character to recreate the authenticity of an entire culture but also to an omniscient narrator who translates for the reader the entire procession of symbols.

In 1906, Segalen published the essay Le Double Rimbaud in Mercure de France. As in the case of Gauguin, Segalen followed in Rimbaud's footsteps, in Djibouti. The novelty that Segalen brings is the unique side that he discovered in his fellow surrealist. Far from Segalen is the thought that he would discover another personality of the poet in Africa - that of a merchant. The essay signed by the doctor is dedicated precisely to this dichotomy. This Bovarism, as it is cataloged by Segalen, is what amazes. Rimbaud had had the gift of writing from an early age and the life he led in Africa seems to have no connection with his literary period. The duality that Segalen intuited in the poet's personality refers to his ability to combine an innovative poetic spirit with the practical ability to trade and be financially successful.

Dans un monde sonore (1907) is a short story dedicated to the senses, synesthesia, creation and the creator who seems crazy, radical sensory experience. The narrator of the short story visits a friend, André, who lives in seclusion with his wife Mathilde. André lives in a world of sound while his wife in a world of tactile and visual sense. For the protagonist of the short story, hearing takes on a special dimension, being the very constitutive element of existence. André lives in a special world, "fortifié dans son château de l'âme écoutante."[11]

The ending is unexpected, however, as the friend André gives in to social conventions and gives up his uniqueness, conforming. What Segalen brings new through this short story is his ability to explore the surrounding world through sounds. Exegetes could argue that the short story stems from Segalen's friendship with Claude Debussy. It should be noted that Segalen dedicated one of his writings, Voix Mortes: Musiques Maories, to the composer who was also his friend. Segalen brings sound into his literature as a literary material, perception as a boundary between the inner and outer worlds, between nature and morality. The idea that the doctor tried to convey to his readers is that music can transform, has the ability to reconfigure Reality. Music has the ability to rewrite the surrounding nature, as in the myth of Orpheus, son of the Thracian king Oeagrus and the muse Calliope, the renowned musician manages to bring his wife, Eurydice, out of the Underworld. Dans un monde sonore represents the literary materiality of the radical synesthesias that Segalen experienced.

[11] Victor Segalen, Dans un monde sonore, in Mercure de France, t. 68, no. 244, 15 août 1907, p. 668

Stèles (1912) is a reprise of the philosophy of synesthesia. Therefore, the mixture of senses is used to describe his experience in China. Breaking conventions, categories and the way of experiencing existence specific to the ontic metaphysical thought system are extremely important for Segalen. Conventions only sink the individual into a dull reality, devoid of the depth that synesthesia can bring to the individual. Perceiving reality through other senses than those that society requires us to use is a game but also a way of existing for some of us "Cela, c'était l'hypothèse, l'essai, un jeu, un « défi », disait l'auteur « pour le plaisir de métaphysiquer… ». Et il advenait que j'étais mis en contact — non ! encore un faux emploi de ces mots tactiles… — en résonance, avec ce nouveau mode de concevoir le monde autour de nous ! J'avais entendu un vivant vivre dans ce monde ! Et la théorie, jetée comme une gageure par le psychologue du fond de son laboratoire ou de son encrier, voici qu'elle se réalisait à vif, en prenant même, — mais ce n'était là qu'un épiphénomène, — la forme d'un drame douloureux entre deux sensibilités discordées."[12]

Synesthesias occupied a central place in Segalen's literature. This is due, on the one hand, to the influences of symbolism on the doctor, but, on the other hand, to his interest in exploring the limitations imposed by perceptions and medical studies. Segalen perceived the surrounding world through senses that only musicians and painters possess. And all these experiences were merged into unique pages of literature at the beginning of the last century. Segalen seems to be the missing link between the senses and the citator, serving as a translator of these deep emotions aroused by sounds and images. The doctor's literature is a deeply philosophical vision of the whole of existence.

In 1916 Segalen published Peintures. This work is clearly influenced by his trip to China. Peintures represents a step forward in Segalen's literary formation. The book is based on descriptions of imaginary Chinese paintings ingeniously intertwined with lyricism and philosophy. Segalen tried to test his own limitations, to see if literary descriptions could describe painting. Segalen's fascination with Chinese culture translated into a personal struggle to keep this ancient culture intact. The French doctor was aware that the West would contaminate Eastern culture by trying to assimilate it. Each of the described paintings is based on a deep experience of the writer who manages to translate into words what a painting can evoke in the soul of the viewer. The historical, philosophical and literary digressions that Segalen puts on the written page make this work an encyclopedic one. This collection of prose poems are not only graceful literary descriptions of imaginary paintings but also an opportunity for the French doctor to philosophize on the theme of cultural differences, of the wonders that Chinese culture has to offer the entire human civilization. Segalen's literary mastery is to create the atmosphere of a museum without the reader being directly presented with any painting. Everything is built from the author's poetic imagination and addresses the reader's imagination.

The novelty that Peintures brings is that of a different kind of synesthesia. The author explores the way in which paintings can come to life in front of the reader not through colors but through words. Literature becomes, under Segalen's pen, not just fiction but a brush with which he paints on canvas. The French doctor set out to test the limits of language but also its power to color and draw strokes of a special sensitivity. Recreating the images is up to the reader's imagination. Segalen's great merit is to recreate mental art, to arouse the imagination and to give a new definition to perceptions and to experiment with various ways of expression. The tone of this lyrical prose oscillates between poetic and bookish. Segalen anticipates the surrealist movement through his writings precisely through the eclecticism of his writing - art, meditation and philosophical exploration of perception and even metaphysics "« Que rUnivers, et tous les êtres qu'il contient, sont issus de deux Principes, coéternels, infinis, distingués, mais inséparables, nobme et MATIÈRE. « Qu'il n'y a pas, entre ces deux Principes, antécédence ou postériorité d'origine, mais de Raison, — et une dignité. (La Norme ne tombant point sous les sens, la Matière les supportant.) « Que l'une et l'autre, sans âme ni contour, s'individualisent dans la chair dont chacun de nous est fait, et qui, pour un temps, limite une portion de Norme, laquelle, à son heure, s'en retourne à l'infini quand le fini dans la chair se dissout, se décompose."[13]

Victor Segalen places himself halfway between the classical symbolists who opposed naturalism and romanticism and the currents of the 20th century by cultivating synesthesia, ambiguity, allusions, concordances and excessive sensitivity. But the French doctor's approach also aims to reveal how colonialism destroys the identity of the nations it dominates. The magnifying glass he delivers to maintain the identity of the people politically dominated by his country is doubled by the fascination for the exotic and metaphysical, which places him at the forefront of the symbolist wave between the two world wars.

At the same time, Segalen combines the values of French symbolism from the beginning of the last century with oriental, Chinese and even Buddhist cultural references. For the French doctor, the word is more than an instrument for transmitting feelings, it becomes an anthropological value in itself and the meanings of words emerge from the womb of literary aesthetics and resonate with music and even painting. Segalen's need for authenticity, the anxiety of discovering it, the tragedy of human existence, and the search for freedom and truth place Segalen as a precursor of literary existentialism.

SOME PARTICULARITIES REGARDING CORPORATE TAXATION IN THE EUROPEAN UNION

Carmen Comăniciu
Prof., PhD, "Lucian Blaga" University of Sibiu

Abstract: The revenues recorded by a company represent a significant source for the formation of public financial resources. The concern that the corporate income tax represents the main direct tax at the level of any fiscal system requires the taking of measures aimed at determining legal entity taxpayers to concern themselves with obtaining a positive financial result and to understand the role of taxation in economic growth and development. If, initially, the way of determining a company's result (and implicitly the definitions of profit) determined the creation of the classic taxation system, when the profit tax was considered only a possibility of generating public money, with the opening of economies, with the impact of taxation on the way and level of development of a company, significant changes were made in the way of establishing and collecting the profit tax. Without claiming an exhaustive approach, through this article we will capture some particularities of the establishment and collection of corporate taxation, at the level of EU member states, taking into account recent changes.*

Keywords: corporate taxation; fiscal autonomy; fiscal harmonization; cross-border taxation; fiscal competition*

1. Introduction

Corporate taxation in the European Union is a complex subject, situated at the intersection of the fiscal sovereignty of the Member States and the objectives of European economic integration. In the absence of a common corporate tax, the EU operates on the basis of a fragmented tax system, in which national legislation coexists with European directives designed to provide a minimum framework for harmonization. This dual structure produces, on the one hand, a considerable diversity of tax regimes, and on the other hand, requires mechanisms to prevent market distortions and excessive tax competition.

For a modern and fair corporate taxation system in the EU, a corporate reform package was published on October 25, 2016, with three lines of action, namely: establishing a common consolidated tax base that would allow, on the one hand, to prevent and combat tax evasion and, on the other hand, to stimulate growth; adjusting dispute resolution mechanisms through international double taxation; extending the rules against hybrid mismatches with countries outside the EU (European Commission, 2016).

In this context, in order to capture the place and role of corporate taxation in the overall direct taxation and to identify some particularities for EU member states, we will draw attention to aspects such as: fiscal autonomy; European tax harmonization initiatives; rules governing cross-border taxation; taxation of the digital economy.

- Fiscal autonomy of EU member states

The fiscal autonomy of the Member States of the European Union is one of the essential pillars of the European institutional architecture, as the founding treaties did not assign the Union direct powers to set corporate tax rates. This fiscal independence is closely linked to the principle of subsidiarity, according to which decisions should be taken as closely as possible to the citizen, namely by national governments, which have a superior knowledge of the domestic economic context. Thus, national tax systems reflect different legal traditions, distinct levels of economic development and varying political priorities, which leads to considerable diversity in the approach to corporate taxation (European Commission, 2025).

Within this fiscal autonomy, Member States can adjust the level of tax rates to meet macroeconomic objectives, such as stimulating investment, reducing unemployment or increasing international competitiveness. The specialized literature provides multiple evidence that a high corporate tax rate determines a reduction in the level of foreign direct investment (Desai, 2004), which is why some states adopt fiscal policies aimed at attracting foreign capital, and through a low tax rate encourage the relocation of investments and the location of regional headquarters of multinational companies. In contrast, other Member States have maintained significantly higher tax rates over time, reflecting their orientation towards a fiscal model with a redistributive role, designed to finance extensive social systems and complex public infrastructures, based on the fact that for direct taxation, a harmonization of tax bases is much more important than a harmonization of tax rates (Sinn, 1990).

The fragmentation of the European tax system is amplified by the diversity of tax treatments applicable to deductions, depreciation, tax losses and tax credits. Although two states may have similar nominal corporate tax rates, the tax base may be radically different, leading to significant variations in the effective tax rate. Thus, the national tax system of each Member State is often influenced by the situations in other tax jurisdictions, especially to the extent that they offer tax advantages, and a form of tax competition is visible through national tax measures (European Court of Auditors, 2024)

Globally, corporate tax rates vary widely by region. In 2024, South America had the highest average statutory corporate tax rate (28.38%) and Asia the lowest (19.74%), with larger, more industrialized nations tending to have higher corporate tax rates than smaller nations (Tax Foundation, 2024a).

(Source: Tax Foundation, 2024a)

Based on data published by Tax Foundation, in 2025 it is found that the states in Europe practice different corporate tax rates, with values ranging between 9% and 35%, with an average of 21% (Tax Foundation, 2025a). As can be seen in the following figure, Hungary, Bulgaria, Cyprus and Ireland practice the lowest tax rates (9%-12.5), at the opposite pole being Italy, Germany, Portugal and Malta (27.8%-35%).

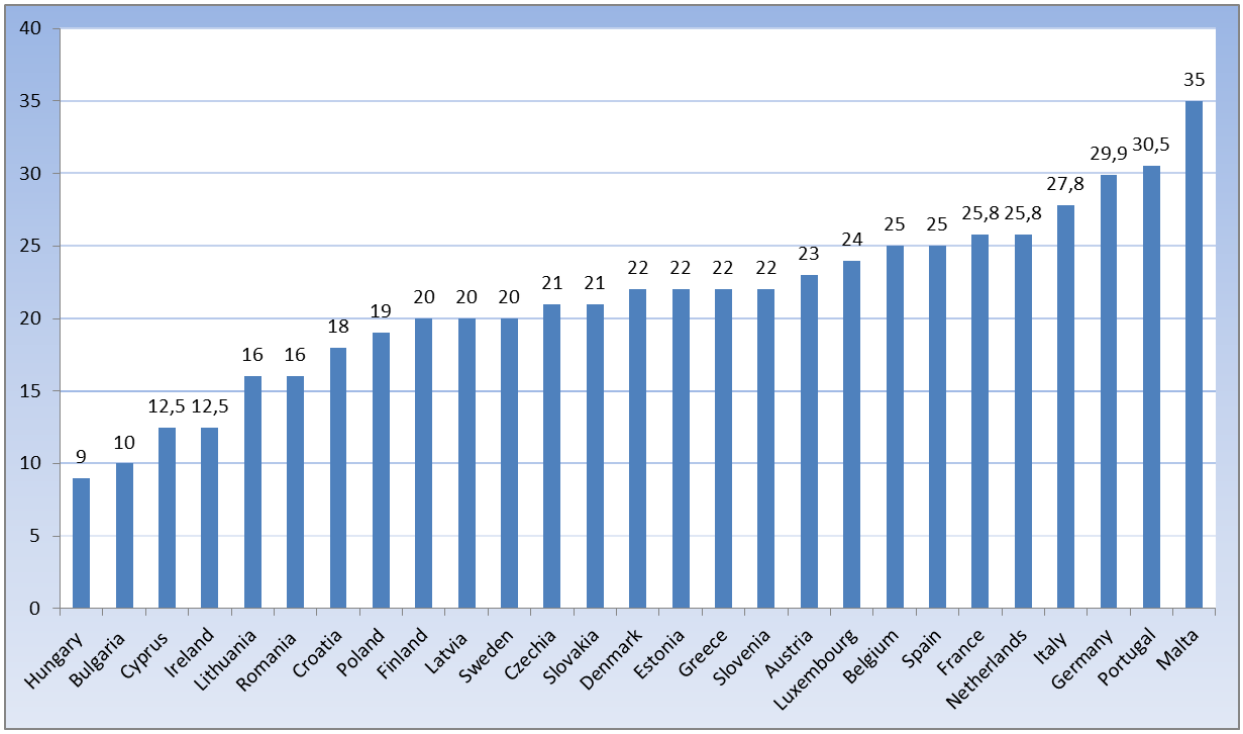

Fig. no. 2 Combined Statutory Corporate Income Tax Rates in EU Countries, 2025
(Source: Tax Foundation, 2025a)

If 40 years ago, worldwide, most states practiced a high corporate tax rate (40%-50%), its significant decrease has been observed, currently the most common rates being between 20% and 25%.

Corporate taxation is a key indicator taken into account for the International Tax Competitiveness Index Rankings, because in today's globalized world, capital is highly mobile, and corporations may choose to invest in a variety of countries to find the highest rate of return. According to data for 2024, it is found that although with a different tax rate at the corporate level, certain EU member states occupy a leading position among OECD member states. (Tax Foundation, 2024b)

Essentially, fiscal autonomy gives subnational governments more control over their own financial policy, promoting more tailored and accountable governance, with potential benefits including: better resource management, in line with the specific needs of the community; better accountability to taxpayers; and the emergence of more creative and efficient fiscal solutions.

- The European tax harmonization initiatives

Tax harmonization in the European Union is an essential strategic objective for the functioning of the Single Market, given that significant differences between corporate tax regimes can distort competition and create opportunities for artificial profit shifting.

Even though EU member states have the power to design their own tax systems regarding corporate taxation (who is subject to taxation, what elements are taken into account for taxation, what tax rate applies), they must comply with EU initiatives and directives, designed to prevent, on the one hand, international double taxation and tax evasion, and on the other hand, to promote administrative cooperation. In this context, it is worth noting (European Commission. (2025):

- Business in Europe: Framework for Income Taxation (BEFIT) - legislative framework, with common rules regarding the determination of the taxable result for members of a group operating in the internal market;
- Head Office Tax System for SMEs (HOT) - allows the interaction of SMEs operating cross-border with a single tax administration, respectively the one related to the head office;
- Transfer Pricing - the existence of a common approach regarding transfer prices;
- Debt-Equity Bias Reduction Allowance (DEBRA) - the existence of the same tax treatment for equity and debt, in order to improve financing;
- Unshell Proposal - establishing the guarantee that those companies that do not carry out activity do not benefit from tax advantages and do not impose financial burdens on taxpayers;
- Faster - improves the procedures for withholding tax at source, in order to ensure efficiency and safety, both for investors, as well as for tax administrations;
- Minimum Corporate Taxation – ensuring a global minimum level of taxation for multinational enterprise groups;
- Anti-Tax Avoidance – binding legal measures to combat tax evasion and aggressive tax planning;
- Dispute Resolution Mechanism (DRM) – clear rules for the rapid and efficient resolution of disputes concerning the application and interpretation of tax treaties;
- Parent-Subsidiary – provisions on the taxation of groups of companies across the EU;
- Merger – regulations on taxation in the event of cross-border reorganization, namely mergers, divisions, transfer of assets or share exchanges;
- Interest & Royalty – establishing the manner in which cross-border payments of interest and royalties are made.

In addition to binding legislative instruments, the EU also uses soft-law procedures, such as recommendations, technical guides and regular monitoring of Member States' tax policies. The annual corporate tax report analysed by the European Commission assesses tax developments, identifying risks of tax avoidance and legislative inconsistencies. Although these instruments are not binding, they exert significant political pressure on Member States and promote the gradual convergence of tax systems.

The role of the Court of Justice of the European Union also has a major impact on tax harmonization, as its case law sets the limits within which states can adopt restrictive tax measures. The CJEU rulings have eliminated numerous discriminatory practices and strengthened the principle of freedom of establishment. This case law indirectly contributes to harmonization, as it obliges states to amend their legislation in order to make it compatible with EU rules (Institute for Austrian and International Tax Law, 2025).

- Rules governing cross-border taxation

In modern tax systems, businesses play a key role in collecting taxes. The question is often asked: Why should companies be taxed? Analyzing the place and role of tax in general and corporate taxation in particular, the specialized literature specifies that (Fuest and Neumeier, 2023): corporate tax can be considered a mechanism to guarantee the taxation of individual income; corporate tax is considered a tax that companies pay for public services provided by governments; corporate taxes can be seen as a tool to tax economic rents or excessive profits; corporate taxes are often seen as a tool to tax the rich, especially when other tax instruments targeting the rich, such as wealth taxes, are not available.

In recent years, countries have debated significant changes to international tax rules affecting multinational companies. In October 2021, after negotiations within the OECD, over 130 member jurisdictions agreed on a plan for new tax rules, the Pillar II.

The EU adopted the Pillar II implementing directive, obliging Member States to introduce this minimum threshold into national legislation. This measure limits the possibility for States to compete with very low corporate tax rates and contributes to creating a fairer tax environment. The global minimum tax also reduces incentives for the artificial relocation of headquarters and profits to low-tax jurisdictions (Tax Foundation, 2025b).

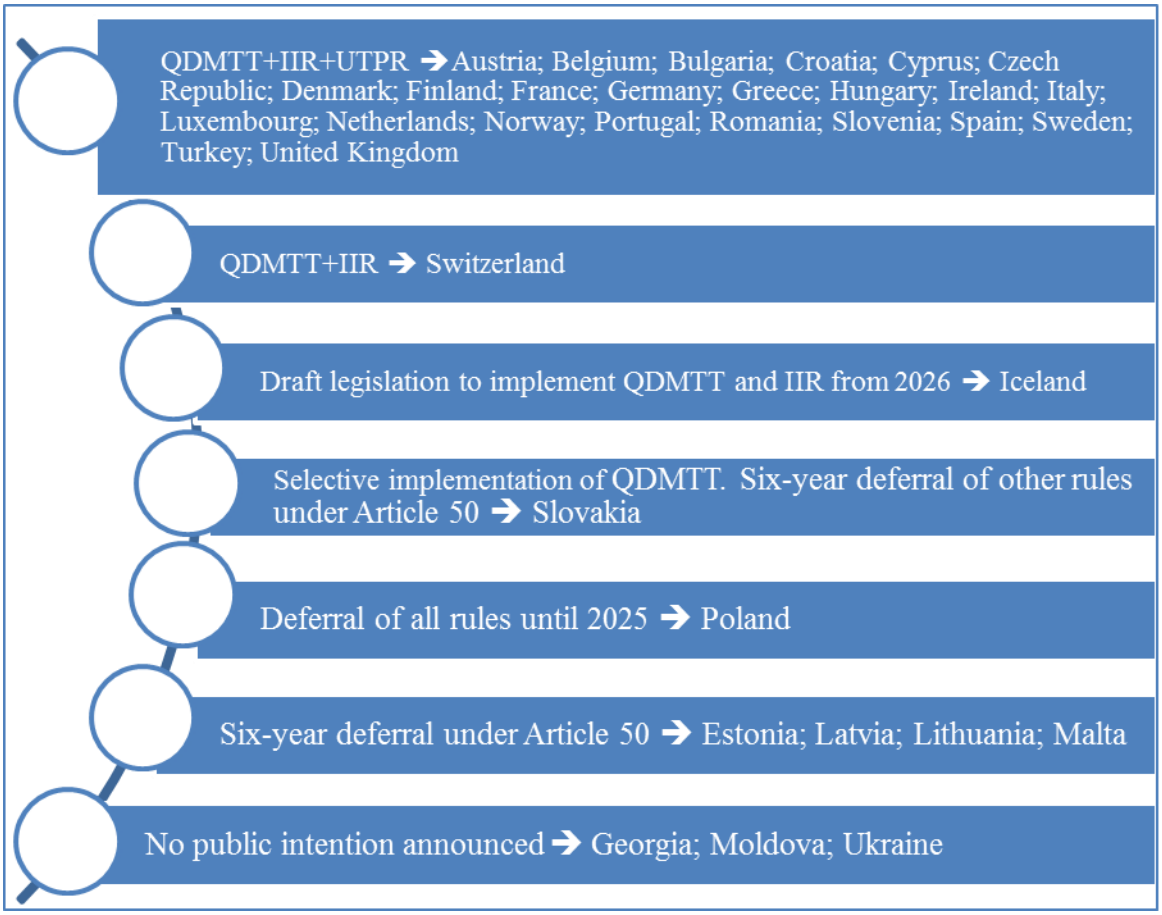
• additional qualified minimum domestic tax (QDMTT)
• to claim the first right to tax profits currently taxed below the effective minimum rate of 15%.
2
• income inclusion rule (IIR)
• determines when a company's foreign income should be included in the parent company's taxable income
3
• undertaxed profits rule (UTPR)
• allows a country to increase taxes on a company if another affiliated entity in a different jurisdiction was taxed below the effective rate of 15%.

Fig. no. 3 The main rules that determine the global minimum tax
(Source: Tax Foundation, 2025b)

The EU Pillar Two Directive obliges Member States with more than 12 multinational groups included in the scope of the Directive to implement the IIR from 31 December 2023 and the UTPR from 31 December 2024. Member States with up to 12 multinational groups included in the scope of the Directive may choose to postpone the implementation of both rules by six years under Article 50 of the Directive.

Therefore, by 2025, most European states had joined the Pillar Two Declaration, with a significant share being recorded among states that had implemented all three rules.



QDMTT+IIR+UTPR → Austria; Belgium; Bulgaria; Croatia; Cyprus; Czech Republic; Denmark; Finland; France; Germany; Greece; Hungary; Ireland; Italy; Luxembourg; Netherlands; Norway; Portugal; Romania; Slovenia; Spain; Sweden; Turkey; United Kingdom
QDMTT+IIR → Switzerland
Draft legislation to implement QDMTT and IIR from 2026 → Iceland
Selective implementation of QDMTT. Six-year deferral of other rules under Article 50 → Slovakia
Deferral of all rules until 2025 → Poland
Six-year deferral under Article 50 → Estonia; Latvia; Lithuania; Malta
No public intention announced → Georgia; Moldova; Ukraine

Fig. no. 4 Pillar Two Implementation in Europe, 2025
(Source: Tax Foundation, 2025b)

Twenty-two of the 27 EU Member States implemented the QDMTT, IIR and UTPR in 2025, while five did not. Five EU Member States can opt for a six-year postponement of the implementation of Pillar Two, and all have done so, with Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania and Malta postponing all rules until 2029, while Slovakia selectively implemented only a domestic additional tax in 2024. Four EU Member States - Cyprus, Poland, Portugal and Spain - implemented Pillar Two rules late, despite the obligations under the EU Directive. In these countries, the rules apply retroactively to 2024.

- Taxation of the digital economy

Taxation of the digital economy has become one of the most debated tax policy topics both in the European Union and globally. Traditional taxation models are based on the criterion of physical presence (permanent establishment), but digital companies can carry out extensive economic activities in a jurisdiction without having a physical structure. This situation generates major tax gaps and reduces the ability of states to collect revenues proportional to the economic activity carried out on their territory (OECD, 2015).

The European Union was among the first regulatory areas to identify the need to redefine the concept of permanent establishment to include notions such as "significant digital presence". This allows the taxation of profits generated by digital platforms even in the absence of a physical presence, based on indicators such as the number of users, the volume of data collected and revenues from advertising or digital transactions (European Commission, 2018).

In parallel with its own initiatives, the EU is actively participating in the OECD international framework, in particular in the Pillar I reform, which aims to reallocate taxing rights to countries where digital companies generate value. Pillar I introduces a new mechanism for distributing the profits of very large companies, going beyond the conventional limits of taxation. This reform represents a major structural change in the architecture of international taxation (OECD, 2020). Pillar II, on the other hand, establishes a global minimum tax rate of 15% for large multinational groups, limiting the tax advantages obtained by locating profits in very low-tax jurisdictions. This mechanism indirectly contributes to the fair taxation of digital companies, as they are among the entities with the most sophisticated tax optimization structures. The implementation of the Pillar II directive in the EU represents one of the most ambitious recent legislative projects (European Commission, 2022).

In the absence of an immediate international solution, several EU member states have unilaterally adopted digital services taxes (DSTs), including France, Italy, Spain and Austria. These taxes apply to revenues generated from advertising, digital intermediation and the sale of user data, and are designed as transitional measures before a global reform. However, these DSTs have generated trade tensions with the United States, which are accused of disproportionately affecting American companies (European Parliament, 2025).

In this context, elements of unilateral digital taxation at the level of EU member states can be exemplified (Tax Foundation, 2024c), namely:

- As of January 2020, Austria has implemented a Digital Value Tax (DVT) at a rate of 5% on online advertising revenues provided by companies that have worldwide revenues exceeding €750 million and Austrian revenues exceeding €25 million.
- On 31 January 2025, five Belgian political parties agreed on an agreement on the taxation of digital services. Thus, if no consensus is reached at European or international level by 2027, Belgium will independently introduce a digital services tax.
- The finance ministers of Denmark, Finland and Sweden issued a joint statement on digital taxation, indicating that the digital economy, like the traditional economy, should be taxed where value is created.
- France introduced the digital services tax in July 2019, retroactive to January 2019, at a rate of 3% on gross revenues generated from digital interface services, targeted online advertising, and the sale of data collected about users for advertising purposes.

- Conclusions

Corporate taxation in the European Union reflects a delicate balance between the fiscal sovereignty of Member States and the objective of economic integration. Although differences in tax rates and regimes persist, European directives and international initiatives are moving towards gradual harmonization, particularly in areas such as the digital economy, combating tax avoidance and administrative cooperation. In the future, the pressures of globalization and digitalization will continue to shape European tax policies, requiring the adoption of fairer and more efficient systems.

The analysis of fiscal autonomy demonstrates that Member States use their sovereign prerogatives to create tax mixes tailored to their own economic, social and political objectives. However, this autonomy cannot operate in isolation, as excessive differences can distort competition and create opportunities for fiscal arbitrage. Thus, the balance between fiscal freedom and European coordination is essential for the stability of the system.

Tax competition continues to be a structural element of the EU, reflecting a combination of legitimate differences between economies and aggressive investment attraction strategies. Preferential regimes have had mixed effects: on the one hand they have stimulated innovation and investment mobility, and on the other hand they have created risks to tax fairness and the stability of public revenues. However, harmonization through Pillar II reduces the extreme attractiveness of these practices.

Looking ahead, corporate taxation in the EU will be influenced by three major megatrends: accelerated digitalization, increased economic integration and the need for a fiscal transition towards sustainable models, in line with European climate policies. A modern tax system must be able to tax cross-border digital activities, prevent tax base erosion and stimulate investment in strategic sectors.

INNOVATORS OF MODERN ART: VINCENT VAN GOGH AND PAUL GAUGUIN

Adrian-Claudiu Stoica
Assoc. Prof., PhD, National University of Science and Technology "Politehnica", Bucharest

Abstract: The Impressionists used a wide variety of colors, enveloped in light and shadow. The artists who followed them sought other ways to express their art. Several directions were addressed, included in a broader framework, entitled post-impressionism. Vincent Van Gogh initiated expressionism, and Paul Gauguin was associated with symbolism. Both artists had tragic destinies: the value of their work was not recognized during their lifetime. Van Gogh committed suicide at the age of 37 and Gauguin died poor and alone on a Pacific Island.

Postimpresionismul: distanțarea de impresionism (1880 – 1906)

În prezent, cei mai cunoscuți postimpresioniști sunt Vincent van Gogh, Paul Gauguin, Georges Seurat și Paul Cézanne. Însă, ei nu s-au denumit niciodată în acest fel. Această titulatură le-a fost acordată, în anul 1910, de Roger Fry (1866 – 1934), artist, critic de artă și curator britanic. El căuta un nume comun care să cuprindă mai mulți artiști, pe care îi alesese în cadrul unei expoziții ce urma să fie organizată la Grafton Galleries din Londra, pentru a atrage atenția presei și a dobândi, totodată, acceptarea din partea comunității artistice.[1] Pe de altă parte, Roger Fry întâmpina o mare dificultate. Nu exista un pronunțat element de legătură între cei patru pictori. Era la curent cu faptul că Seurat și van Gogh au fost catalogați neoimpresioniști, Cézanne era un reprezentant al impresionismului iar Gauguin fusese asociat mișcării simboliste. Totodată abordările artistice ale celor patru evoluaseră diferit, ajungând să aibă din ce în ce mai puține elemente în comun. Fry a decis includerea în expoziție a lui Édouard Manet din cauze comerciale și care țineau de istoria artei. Curatorul britanic intenționa să prezinte publicului londonez o serie de pictori moderni care au preluat ideile lui Manet, dar și-au creat propriul limbaj artistic. Expoziția a primit titlul Manet și postimpresioniștii. Numindu-i pe van Gogh, Gauguin, Seurat și Cézanne postimpresioniști, Fry avea în vedere faptul că aceștia plecaseră de la impresionism, curentul artistic inspirat de Mannet".[2] Termenul de postimpresionism a fost acceptat, însă expoziția s-a dovedit a fi un eșec răsunător. Într-o scrisoare adresată tatălui său, Fry afirma că s-a confruntat cu numeroase critici venite din presă. Cronicile apărute în ziarele vremii (de exemplu The Morning Post), proliferau insulte care semănau cu acelea adresate anterior impresioniștilor. Ideea centrală a criticilor putea fi rezumată în interogația: „Asta se poate numi artă?". Criticii i-au pus la îndoială lui Fry gustul pentru artă.

Însă, existau și opinii diferite. I-au apreciat inițiativa artiști precum Duncan Grant (1885 – 1978), Vanessa Bell (1879 – 1961) și sora sa Virginia Woolf. La 1909 în Eseu despre estetică, a catalogat postimpresionismul drept „descoperirea limbajului vizual al imaginației".[3]

Expresionismul lui Van Gogh

Vincent van Gogh (1853-1890), s-a născut în Olanda, fiind fiul unui pastor care mai avea alți cinci copii. La 16 ani, cu ajutorul unchiului său, a fost angajat la o galerie de artă din Haga (Goupil & Cie). Ulterior, la aceeași companie, s-a angajat și Theo, fratele său mai mic. După ce a fost concediat, convingerile sale religioase intrând în contradicție cu interesele materialiste ale negustorilor din domeniu, van Gogh a decis să devină artist, ca urmare a sfatului primit de la fratele său. De altfel, a fost susținut din punct de vedere financiar de acesta pentru a învăța să picteze. A rămas, totuși, în primul rând, un autodidact.[4]

Dezamăgit de faptul că pasiunea pentru Kee Vos, verișoara sa văduvă, nu a fost împărtășită, van Gogh a avut o relație cu Sien Hoornik, o prostituată. Aceasta era însărcinată cu al doilea copil. La început, Sien Hoornik a fost model pentru van Gogh. Ulterior, Sien și van Gogh s-au mutat într-o locuință din Haga, împreună cu cei doi copii ai ei. Își doreau să se căsătorească, însă, s-au despărțit după doar un an, ca urmare a presiunilor exercitate asupra lui van Gogh de familie și prieteni, care dezaprobau această relație. Dezamăgirea fiind prea puternică pentru artist, acesta a părăsit Haga pentru Drenthe, o zonă izolată și mlăștinoasă aflată în nordul Olandei. Doborât de singurătate, a decis să revină la părinții săi, în Nuenen. Aici, atenția sa s-a îndreptat asupra reprezentării peisajelor rurale. Acum van Gogh a realizat cea mai ambițioasă creație de la începutul carierei, respectiv Mâncătorii de cartofi.[5]

Realizată în 1885, prima sa pictură de referință, Mâncătorii de cartofi, a trecut neobservată. Fără îndoială că lucrarea a reprezentat un proiect important pentru un artist aflat la începutul carierei. Tabloul cuprinde cinci persoane, care luau cina, într-o cameră întunecoasă. Lucrarea, realizată în culori sumbre: brun, gri și albastru", prezintă viața tristă și alimentația precară a unei familii sărace, dar care continuă să spere.[6] În această pictură, domină nuanțele întunecate și umbrele.[7]

Ulterior, a studiat câteva luni la Academia Regală de Arte Frumoase din Antwerp. Aceste luni de studii nu s-au soldat cu rezultatele așteptate.[8] Artistul dorea mai mult.

În martie 1886, i s-a oferit oportunitatea de a locui la Paris. La invitația fratelui său, care se afla în capitala Franței, la birourile galeriei din această țară, van Gogh a ajuns în metropola franceză. Acolo a cunoscut operele impresioniștilor.[9]

Parisul a avut un efect puternic asupra evoluției sale artistice. A avut posibilitatea să studieze cu Fernand Cormon. Totodată, a devenit prieten cu Henri de Touluse-Lautrec și Emile Bernard, care îi erau colegi. Nu a trecut mult timp și a făcut cunoștință cu alți reprezentanți ai curentului impresionist. În această perioadă, modalitatea sa de a picta s-a transformat într-un mod radical.[10]

Van Gogh a rămas surprins, descoperind varietatea culorilor. Totodată, a început să utilizeze tehnica impasto, abordată de impresioniști (vopseaua era adăugată pe pânză în straturi groase, creând un efect tridimensional). A remarcat că interesul său pentru stampele japoneze era comun cu al artiștilor francezi.[11]

A fost influențat de Monet și Pissaro, tonurile întunecate specifice picturilor sale realizate în Olanda fiind înlocuite de o feerie de culori. Creațiile reprezentând peisajul rural olandez au fost uitate. Artistul a început să surprindă peisajul urban, să realizeze portrete ale prietenilor săi și numeroase autoportrete.[12]

Totuși, impactul Parisului a fost prea puternic, capitala Franței a sfârșit prin a-l obosi și l-a condus către un moment de cumpănă. Prin urmare, fratele său i-a sugerat să părăsească Capitala, propunându-i orașul Arles din sudul Franței, unde s-a stabilit în februarie 1888. Van Gogh a locuit 14 luni la Arles, interval în care a realizat mai mult de 200 de tablouri, printre care, capodopere bine-cunoscute: Casa galbenă, Semănătorul, Cafeneaua de noapte, Vază cu floarea-soarelui, Noapte înstelată pe Ron, Camera din Arles, toate pictate în 1888. Și Natură moartă cu o farfurie de cepe, pictat în 1889. Sentimentul dominant din aceste tablouri, exprimat prin culori, compoziție și lumină, era acela de relaxare.[13]

A pictat într-un ritm intens, iar efortul depus l-a adus aproape de epuizare. Spre deosebire de pictorii impresioniști pe care îi întâlnise la Paris, van Gogh nu urmărea să surprindă aparențele efectelor de lumină, ci să redea, prin intermediul culorilor, sentimente și idei.[14]

Indiscutabil, Arles a fost o alegere bună pentru van Gogh. Intenționa să creeze un „Atelier al sudului", un loc de întâlnire pentru artiști. A răspuns invitației doar Paul Gauguin (1848 – 1903). Deveniseră prieteni la Paris și amândoi erau doritori să depășească restricțiile impuse de impresionism. Au lucrat împreună șase săptămâni, interval în care au realizat o veritabilă competiție și și-au împărtășit reciproc cunoștințele. În această perioadă cei doi s-au certat, iar van Gogh și-a mutilat urechea. Pe de altă parte însă, artiștii realizaseră lucruri remarcabile: van Gogh inițiase o nouă mișcare, marcată de mai multă expresivitate, iar Gaugain a ales o cale mai exotică.[15]

Impresioniștii urmăreau să redea, cu obiectivitate, ceea ce vedeau. Pe de altă parte, van Gogh și-a propus să exploreze adevăruri profunde. Așadar, abordarea sa a fost una subiectivă, redând sentimentele sale, nu doar ceea ce vedea.[16]

În 1889, artistul olandez s-a internat, timp de un an, într-un azil de nebuni din localitatea Saint-Rémy-de-Provence, pictând, în acest interval celebrul tablou Noaptea înstelată. A reușit să vândă puține lucrări, dar a beneficiat de sprijinul financiar al fratelui său.[17]

Van Gogh a murit la doar 37 de ani, după ce s-a împușcat în piept. Fratele său s-a aflat lângă el. La doar câteva luni a încetat din viață și Theo, fiind doborât de sifilis. Se finaliza un parteneriat care a condus la realizarea unor opere de artă remarcabile, deși prietenul său, Paul Gauguin nu era de acord.[18]

Simbolismul lui Paul Gauguin

Arta sa nu a fost apreciată în timpul vieții, însă mai târziu mulți artiști au găsit surse de inspirație în creațiile sale. Pentru a se concentra asupra acestei pasiuni, arta, nu a ezitat să demisioneze din funcția de agent de bursă. Și-a părăsit familia, îndreptându-se către Mările Sudului, pentru a se dedica picturii într-un spațiu unde civilizația occidentală nu pătrunsese. Paul Gauguin s-a născut la Paris, în anul 1848, fiind singurul fiu al unui jurnalist francez. Mama sa avea origini peruviene. Datorită opiniilor politice radicale ale tatălui său, familia a fost nevoită să se refugieze în Peru. Din nefericire pentru Gauguin, tatăl său a decedat în timpul călătoriei. La Lima, capitala statului Peru, și-a petrecut Gauguin o parte din copilărie, iar la șapte ani a revenit în Franța.[19]

creația artistică în Pacificul de Sud, alături de tinerele localnice, îmbolnăvindu-le de sifilis. Monet și Renoir erau de părere că tablourile lui erau „pur și simplu proaste". Nu a fost menajat nici de prietenul său, dramaturgul suedez August Strindberg, care i-a mărturisit: „Nu-ți pot înțelege arta, nu-mi place". Gauguin nu s-a lăsat însă afectat de astfel de remarci. Fostul agent de bursă, colecționar al tablourilor impresioniștilor, se străduia să intre în cercul lor artistic. În 1882 s-a prăbușit bursa, iar banii au încetat să devină o preocupare pentru Gauguin, întrucât era falit.[20]

Către sfârșitul deceniului 1880, a contestat raportarea impresioniștilor la naturalism, considerând acest fapt o eroare. Nu întâmplător, Monet și Renoir i-au catalogat picturile ca fiind „banale". Ei se întrebau dacă există în natură nuanțele de portocaliu, verde sau albastru utilizate de Gauguin. Categoric nu. Atât culorile vii, cât și subiectele abordate în tablourile sale, relevau distanțarea de impresionism. Van Gogh utilizase culori intense în picturile sale iar Gauguin a crescut intensitatea culorii, pentru a-l ajuta să se exprime. Pictura reprezentativă pentru perioada postimpresionistă timpurie este Viziunea de după predică sau Lupta lui Iacob cu îngerul (1888). Lucrarea se află doar pe jumătate în lumea pământeană. Elementul narativ cuprinde mai multe femei bretone, care experimentează o viziune sacră după ascultarea unei predici în biserică, respectiv lupta lui Iacob cu un înger. Femeile sunt reprezentate într-un mod realist, însă, restul picturii este diferit. A optat pentru o culoare neobișnuită pentru câmpul unde se luptau Iacob și îngerul, în vederea evidențierii trăirea religioasă a femeilor (un roșu-portocaliu frapant).[21]

Alegerea culorilor este strâns legată de simbolistică și impact vizual. A reprezentat alegoria teatrală, în detrimentul reprezentării riguroase a realității: o ramură împarte tabloul pe diagonală, separând fantezia de lumea reală. Realitatea și imaginația coexistă: în stânga picturii sunt prezentate femeile credincioase, care au o revelație, în dreapta, lupta lui Iacob cu îngerul.[22]

Decis să-și dezvolte talentul artistic, Gauguin s-a deplasat în Tahiti, unde și-a propus să devină, după cum singur afirma un „sălbatic, un lup din pădure, fără zgardă".[23] În Tahiti s-a văzut eliberat de presiunea familiei și a confraților din domeniul artei. Inspirația artistică regăsită l-a condus la realizarea unor tablouri inspirate de localnicii polinezieni, mai ales de tinerele indigene. Picturile se remarcă prin culoare și simplitate, fiind, în același timp, moderne și primitive.[24] Picturile realizate de Gauguin pot fi identificate cu ușurință. Se remarcă prin bogăția de nuanțe (ocru auriu, roșu, galben, portocaliu și roz), dar și prin complexitate. Cuprind drame psihologice, melancolia care îi marchează pe subiecții săi. El a respins impresionismul, readucând arta în spațiul imaginației, generații de artiști inspirându-se din opera sa.[25]

Totuși, artistul francez a rămas un necunoscut pe tărâmul artei până la sfârșitul vieții. A încetat din viață în 1903, în insula Hiva Oa din sudul Pacificului sărac și singur, marcat de frustrarea că opera sa nu era apreciată.[26]

Postimpresioniștii s-au îndepărtat de specificul artei realizată până la ei. De-a lungul istoriei, artiștii au realizat tablouri care cuprindeau elemente reale ale lumii în care trăiau. Impresioniștii au făcut un pas înainte, utilizând o gamă largă de culori, valorificând lumina și umbrele. Postimpresioniștii au mers și mai departe, întrebându-se ce altceva ar mai putea să exprime prin artă. Aceste căutări în domeniul artistic au deschis calea către mai multe direcții, toate primind titulatura de postimpresionism.

CONSERVATIVE IDEOLOGY AFTER THE FRENCH REVOLUTION

Adrian-Claudiu Stoica
Assoc. Prof., PhD, National University of Science and Technology "Polithenica", Bucharest

Abstract: The origins of conservatism must be sought, paradoxically, in the French Revolution. With the outbreak of the Revolution, concerns arose that the revolutionary process could encompass all of Europe. Therefore, some authors have developed criticisms of revolutionary doctrines. In the 19th century, conservative thinking described society as the natural result of a long historical process. And promoting individual rights would endanger community solidarity. Edmund Burke, Louis de Bonald and Joseph de Maistre invoked history and traditions, this vision inspired numerous currents that opposed the promotion of democratic principles.

Keyords: French Revolution; The Old Regime; conservatism; universalism; rationalism; tradition; nation

Critica universalismului și condamnarea raționalismului

În Franța, trecerea de la Vechiul Regim la noua societate s-a realizat pe cale violentă, în timp ce restul statelor occidentale au realizat o tranziție pașnică și mai puțin costisitoare. Revoluția Franceză a avut efecte nefaste pentru această țară, încetinind dezvoltarea societății: a condus la întârzierea dezvoltării capitaliste și la stagnare din punct de vedere demografic.[1] În niciun stat european nu a existat o diferență atât de profundă între Vechiului Regim și societatea creată de Revoluție. Absolutismul și democrația (deși încă nu era denumită astfel), se aflau în antiteză, evidențiind deținerea puterii de către o singură persoană și suveranitatea poporului.[2]

Revoluția Franceză nu s-a desfășurat în interiorul societății civile, care a fost anihilată, și nici în interiorul statului, întrucât au fost eludate toate formele acțiunii politice. Revoluționarii susțineau că restaurează statul, pentru ca acesta să cuprindă în mod echitabil societatea, dar s-au plasat atât în afara societății cât și a statului.[3]

Termenul conservatorism este unul echivoc; nu conduce către individualizarea unei familii politice care să manifeste aceleași convingeri. Se referă, mai ales, la manifestarea unui sentiment îndreptat către valorile tradiționale din perspectivă socială, morală sau religioasă. Totodată, noțiunea se referă la un ansamblu de doctrine și convingeri care exprimă opoziția față de programele de transformare pe plan social. Din această perspectivă, este evocat conservatorismul politic, favorabil menținerii organizării politice moștenite. Cuvântul se referă, și în prezent, în Statele Unite sau Marea Britanie, la dreapta parlamentară. Totuși, noțiunea cuprinde realități politice diferite. Ne putem referi la mai multe tipologii de conservatorism, după cum putem identifica orientări diversificate ale stângii politice.[4]

Istoria conservatorismului debutează în timpul Revoluției franceze. Procesul revoluționar din Franța a stârnit îngrijorare în întreaga Europă, iar o serie de autori au formulat un răspuns intelectual la doctrinele revoluționare. Contrarevoluția constituie o mișcare având caracter politic și intelectual, care se individualizează în timpul desfășurării Revoluției și continuă la începutul secolului al XIX-lea. Aceasta îi cuprinde pe cei care își propuneau să restaureze fundamentele Vechiului Regim. Din punct de vedere intelectual, A primit susținere din partea a două personalități de marcă: Joseph de Maistre și Louis de Bonald.[5]

Contrarevoluția a constituit un răspuns la acțiunile deputaților revoluționari, originea sa aflându-se în timpul Directoratului (1795 – 1799). În acest interval, au fost publicate scrieri filosofice în favoarea Vechiului Regim, termenul de Contrarevoluție pătrunzând în vocabularul politic.[6] Aceasta îi cuprindea pe regaliști, divizați între susținătorii monarhiei constituționale și promotorii absolutismului regal. Datorită acestei diviziuni, au irosit orice oportunitate de a reintroduce monarhia în momentul în care Napoleon Bonaparte a inițiat o lovitură de stat și a instituit Consulatul (1799). Ulterior, Restaurația (1814 – 1830) le-a oferit contrarevoluționarilor (regrupați în mișcarea Ultras), ocazia de a marca, pentru un scurt interval, evoluția Franței. Influența exercitată de Contrarevoluție s-a făcut simțită mai ales pe planul ideilor și, în mai mică măsură, în domeniul instituțional. Filozofia contrarevoluționară constituie, în primul rând, o punere la zid a exceselor care au avut loc în timpul Revoluției. Însă, nu reprezintă o simplă doctrină reacționară, din moment ce ideile afirmate de Louis de Bonald, Joseph de Maistre și Edmund Burke prezintă o viziune asupra lumii destul de coerentă, întemeiată pe invocarea istoriei și a tradițiilor. În secolul al XIX-lea, această viziune a inspirat numeroase curente care se opuneau promovării principiilor democratice. Opoziția față de ideile liberale s-a individualizat odată cu declanșarea violențelor din timpul Revoluției: interzicerea drepturilor feudale, ghilotinarea lui Ludovic al XVI-lea, dictatura instituită de Comitetul Salvării Publice. Criticile inițiale au vizat poziționarea individului și a drepturilor acestuia deasupra societății. Filosofia individualistă se opune Contrarevoluției, întrucât afectează corpul social și elimină solidaritățile constituite de-a lungul istoriei.[7]

Filozofia contrarevoluționară respinge și intenția revoluționarilor de a implementa libertatea promovând o viziune universalistă asupra naturii umane. Promotorii săi consideră că politica revoluționară este greșită, întrucât consideră omul o ființă care nu există în realitate. Pe de altă parte, Maistre și Burke subliniază ideea că omul este strâns legat de caracteristicile sociale și culturale ale spațiului unde locuiește.[8]

Joseph de Maistre a reprezentat, alături de Louis de Bonald, unul dintre filozofii de marcă ai contra-revoluției. S-a inspirat din scrierile lui Burke și considera că, prin intermediul Revoluției franceze, s-a pus în practică, într-un mod nefericit, o concepție metafizică, respectiv suveranitatea populară evocată de Rousseau. Maistre considera Revoluția „absolut rea", dar, datorită providenței divine, ea va conduce la reinstituirea regalității.[9] Atât Joseph de Maistre cât și Louis de Bonald considerau greșită concepția referitoare la organizarea societății pe baza unui contract social, întrucât instituțiile au origini divine, datorându-se voinței Creatorului.[10]

Raționalismul este condamnat, contrarevoluționarii subliniind caracterul abstract al filozofiei revoluționare. Bonald promovează o abordare extremă: în viziunea sa, rațiunea reprezintă doar „o poluare umană". Aceasta promovează adevăruri sprijinite de religie, care au menirea de a perverti societatea. Burke nu era o persoană religioasă, așadar dezvoltă o teorie care va sta la baza tezelor tradiționale. El afirmă faptul că superstițiile trebuie combătute, însă dezvoltarea societăților nu poate fi marcată de rațiunea umană.[11]

Principiile contrarevoluționare nu se referă doar la recuperarea fundamentelor Vechiului Regim. Principalul element al discursului se referă la tradiție, termenul aflându-se la baza doctrinei. Discursul laic promovat de Burke în 1790, s-a răspândit imediat pe întregul continent. Acesta se pronunța pentru respectarea trecutului, respingea teoriile contractului social, afirmând că tradiția reprezintă cel mai important element al unei societăți. În Franța, evocarea tradiției a fost strâns legată de teologia creștină, alianța dintre tron (regele) și altar (Biserica). Așadar, susținătorii Vechiului Regim au urmărit revenirea la valorile creștine. Aristocrații lipsiți de titlurile și privilegiile pe care le deținuseră anterior, (Bonald și Maistre) s-au pronunțat pentru restaurarea Vechiului Regim pe baze absolutiste și creștine. Pe de altă parte, Burke s-a dovedit un moderat: a susținut reinstituirea moștenirii, dar fără revenirea la puterea absolutistă. Referitor la guvernarea politică, ideile contrarevoluționarilor în ceea ce privește actul de conducere, cuprindeau o serie de contradicții. Exista un consens în ceea ce privește faptul că sistemul monarhic ereditar asigura stabilitate și menținea vechile tradiții. Prin urmare, autorii se pronunțau pentru revenirea la monarhie, însă, unanimitatea nu mergea mai departe. Pentru Bonald și Maistre puterea trebuia să aibă un caracter absolut. Totuși, ei nu susțin despotismul, dimpotrivă îl condamnă. Regele este trimisul lui Dumnezeu pe pământ, așadar, acesta trebuie să respecte drepturile naturale. În consecință, este necesară întoarcerea la monarhia absolută, prin reîntronarea societății creștine, precum și a celor trei ordine. În ceea ce-l privește pe Burke, acesta evidențiază dezordinea politică existentă în Franța și își propune să combată tezele revoluționare. În cazul concepțiile referitoare la istorie, diferențele sunt semnificative. Progresul s-a aflat la temelia proiectului revoluționar. Prin urmare, Burke, Bonald și Maistre sunt nevoiți să se pronunțe în ceea ce privește schimbările sociale, iar francezii nu promovează ideea de schimbare. Pe de altă parte, Burke susține implementarea „echilibrului social", în contextul raportării la tradiții și la istorie.[12]

Tradiționalismul pozitivist

Noțiunea tradiționalism poate fi asociată cu aceea de conservatorism. Tradiționalismul exprimă o opțiune politică susținută de mișcări diverse, care se pronunță pentru păstrarea tradițiilor, respectiv a instituțiilor având caracter istoric. Cei mai mulți dintre apărătorii tradiției nu reprezintă un corp doctrinar închegat. Aceștia susțin religia în detrimentul filozofiei critice, idealismul tradiționalismului politic în detrimentul rațiunii.[13]

În Franța, gândirea contrarevoluționară a avut câștig de cauză odată cu revenirea pe tronul Franței a Bourbonilor în 1814 – 1815. În perioada Restaurației (1814 – 1830), promovarea ordinii monarhice și creștine a revanit unui grup intitulat Ultras, din cadrul căruia se remarcă Bonald, ministru al monarhului Ludovic al XVIII-lea. Însă, proiectul întoarcerii la epoca Vechiului Regim a prinds cu adevărat contur odată cu instalarea pe tronul Franței a lui Carol al X-lea (1824). În următorii ani, administrația a fost epurată, cenzura reintrodusă parțial iar religia catolică a redevenit religia oficială. Pe planul gândirii filosofice, această mișcare a fost promovată de Chateaubriand. Academicianul francez a ocupat funcțiile de ambasador apoi ministru în timpul Restaurației. S-a opus individualismului liberal și a criticat excesele Revoluției. Nu a fost însă un doctrinar; s-a alăturat opoziției liberale în 1830, dezicându-se de un regim pe care l-a sprijinit o lungă perioadă.[14]

Speranța întoarcerii la absolutism a dispărut odată cu instituirea Monarhiei din Iulie (1830 – 1848). Noul rege, Ludovic-Filip de Orléans a depus jurământul pe o chartă regală prin care monarhia autoritară era înlocuită de monarhia constituțională. Pe de altă parte, aristocrația continuă să promoveze ideile contrarevoluționare. În secolul al XVIII-lea și în debutul secolului al XIX-lea liberalii au susținut progresul, pronunțându-se pentru dobândirea de libertăți. Au optat pentru utilizarea căii parlamentare, însă, numeroși liberali au promovat o viziune elitistă în ceea ce privește relațiile sociale. În Marea Britanie, relația dintre liberalism și conservatorism nu a fost conflictuală. În intervalul 1830 – 1840, numeroși deputați liberali au optat pentru o atitudine conservatoare, în vederea menținerii ordini publice și, în special, pentru a face față amplificării activismului republican. Liberalii din Marea Britanie victoriană reprezentau un amalgam de curente. Disputele politice vizau identificarea unor soluții practice în vederea rezolvării problemelor Imperiului. În secolul al XIX-lea, cele mai importante curente liberale nu vizau reformarea pe plan politic. Țara se bucura de stabilitate politică după revoluția din 1688 – 1689, monarhia fiind nevoită să colaboreze cu un parlament care deținea prima putere în stat. Elitele politice liberale nu erau interesate de proclamarea suveranității poporului, în schimbul obținerii unor concesii din partea Coroanei. Pe de altă parte, ca urmare a industrializării Marii Britanii, ideologii liberali se axau pe problematicii economice. S-au opus legislației protecționiste și au devenit susținătorii liberului-schimb. Așadar, datorită prosperității economice de care se bucura țara, liberalii au preferat să promoveze stabilitatea instituțională.[15]

Către sfârșitul secolului al XIX-lea, doctrinele tradiționaliste au cunoscut o evoluție importantă în Franța. Istoricului și filozofului Hippolyte Taine, un intelectual de marcă, deosebit de respectat în epocă, promova ideea conform căreia „credința în știință" ar trebui să înlocuiască „credința religioasă". Pe plan filozofic, susținea introducerea metodei științifice în cadrul unor discipline: istorie, filozofie sau morală. Precum alți numeroși filosofi din secolul al XIX-lea (Hegel, Comte, Tocqueville, Marx), Taine formulează „legi istorice", care, în opinia sa, marchează în profunzime dezvoltarea societăților. Identifică trei mari elemente: rasa (fiecare popor este diferit de celelalte prin calități și valori moștenite); mediul (acesta influențează obiceiurile și concepțiile oamenilor); momentul (etapa de dezvoltare a unei societăți este strâns legată de istoria acesteia). Filozoful francez era convins că în istorie acționează o serie de forțe care nu pot fi evitate și promova respectarea tradițiilor. După înfrângerea Franței la Sedan în confruntarea cu Prusia (1870) și Comuna din Paris (1871) s-a pronunțat în mod public împotriva Revoluției Franceze. A criticat democrația care, în opinia sa, afecta conducerea politică, oferind puterea masei ignorante. În opinia sa, politica trebuia să se desfășoare conform evoluției istorice a instituțiilor și caracteristicilor poporului. Nu se pronunța însă pentru revenirea la perioada Vechiului Regim, marcată de privilegii și sărăcie. Susținea implementarea unei conduceri politice care să aparțină oamenilor de știință. Era de părere că educația reprezenta o prioritate în vederea pregătirii elitelor. Societatea promovată de Taine era aristocratică, dar, totodată, și liberală; pentru istoricul francez, libertatea constituia elementul cel mai important al unei societăți.[16]

Ernest Renan și ideea de națiune

Ernest Renan a fost un specialist francez de marcă în domeniul studierii religiilor și a limbilor orientale. A criticat catolicismul roman, preferând să promoveze demersul științific. În deceniul 1860, a influențat o întreagă generație de intelectuali, care promovau libertate gândirii eliberată de religie. Susținător al distincției dintre Biserică și Stat, Renan a fost un precursor al anticlericalismului republican. La scurt timp după Comuna din Paris, Renan a decis, în mod neașteptat, să critice Revoluția Franceză și moștenirea acesteia. În lucrarea Reforma intelectuală și morală din 1871, acesta susține o serie de idei antidemocratice, condamnând principiul suveranității populare care oferă puterea „ignoranților" și „analfabeților". În fapt, Renan a fost promotorul unei societăți tradiționale și ordonate, dar fără influența Bisericii. Societatea imaginată de acesta este una ierarhică, în care trebuie să se afle la conducere cei mai buni. A acceptat faptul că societatea Vechiului Regim a fost una stabilă, dar nu se pronunța pentru revenirea la nobilimea ereditară. Promotor al științei, el își imagina o societate condusă de savanți, beneficiind de progresele înregistrate de știință. Către sfârșitul vieții Renan a susținut A III-a Republică, despre care a afirmat că promovează libertatea presei și afirmarea elitelor, ca urmare a politicii educaționale.

Ernest Renan a formulat „o sinteză intelectuală” în privința ideii moderne referitoare la națiune. În cadrul unei conferințe susținute la Sorbona în 1882, intitulată Ce este o națiune?, acesta promovează o viziune asupra națiunii care presupune adeziune. Una dintre afirmațiile sale a cunoscut un mare succes: națiunea constituie „un plebiscit de fiecare zi”. Așadar, națiunea există doar datorită consimțământului indivizilor, care își doresc să trăiască împreună. Prin demersul său, Renan a formulat baza teoretică asupra ideii moderne despre națiune în Franța. Definiția a fost formulată în contextul rivalității franco-germane de la sfârșitul secolului al XIX-lea, aceasta reprezentând un răspuns la viziunea germană asupra națiunii, formulată de Johann Gottfried Herder (Altă filosofie a istoriei, 1774; Idei asupra filozofiei istoriei omenirii, 1784 – 1791); Johan Gottlieb Fichte (Cuvântări despre națiunea germană, 1804); și Theodor Mommsen (Istoria romană, 1849 – 1856). În viziunea germană națiunea are la bază limba cultura și etnia, interpretarea justificând anexarea de către Germania a Alsaciei și a unei părți din Lorena în 1871. Așadar, locuitorii acestor regiuni erau germani, pentru că vorbeau limba germană. Respingând interpretarea germană, Renan subliniază faptul că națiunea presupune o alegere și nu se referă la limbă, etnie și cultură. În sprijinul afirmației sale, el oferă exemplul Elveției, (unde se vorbesc mai multe limbi, deși națiunea este una) sau al țărilor anglo-saxone (care vorbesc aceeași limbă, deși sunt națiuni diferite). Teoria lui Renan cuprinde elementele individualismului modern, națiunea reprezentând adeziunea individuală. Totuși, nu este lipsită de ambiguitate, intelectualul francez critică determinismul cultural german, însă nu definește națiunea utilizând criterii abstracte. El apreciază că națiunea reprezintă „un suflet, un principiu spiritual”, dar subliniază faptul că voința este insuficientă pentru ca aceasta să existe. Națiunea constituie alăturarea a două elemente, care reprezintă trecutul și prezentul: deținerea unei moșteniri comune și consimțământul din prezent.[17] Deși vorbeau un dialect al limbii germane, alsacienii aleseseră Franța în mod liber. Pentru francezi nu exista nicio îndoială în ceea ce privește apartenența lor la Franța. Însă, germanii erau de altă părere: din moment ce s-au născut germani, nu exista posibilitatea de a alege.[18]

Istoria conservatorismului, în mod paradoxal, este strâns legată de Revoluția Franceză. În perioada Vechiului Regim, doctrinele conservatoare nu au găsit un cadru propice pentru dezvoltare. Monarhul își legitima poziția de conducător al statului prin raportarea la voința divină și respectarea tradițiilor. De altfel, nu era des întâlnită contestarea autorității regale. Monarhii dețineau toate pârghiile pentru a-și păstra puterea: armata, autoritatea statului, o aristocrație fidelă și recurgerea la istoria oficială. Revoluția de la 1789 a declanșat în Europa îngrijorarea că procesul revoluționar ar putea cuprinde tot continentul. În acest context, o serie de autori au început să combată doctrinele revoluționare. Filosofia conservatoare s-a îmbogățit cu argumente și s-a dezvoltat ca urmare a declanșării Revoluției franceze.

ACADEMIC LITERACY IN TEACHER EDUCATION : INTEGRATED APPROACHES TO PROFESSIONAL COMMUNICATION I

Ingrid Cezarina-Elena Ciochină
Lecturer, Phd., "Lucian Blaga" University of Sibiu

Abstract: Academic literacy represents a fundamental pillar in initial teacher education, as professional communication skills directly influence the quality of teaching processes and educational interactions. This article explores the importance of integrating academic literacy development strategies — reflective writing, critical analysis of sources, interdisciplinary projects, and digital feedback — into the university curriculum. These strategies support the construction of professional discourse, the development of pedagogical vocabulary, and the formation of a well-articulated teaching identity. The study argues for the necessity of a coherent and collaborative approach that strengthens the essential communication competencies of future teachers.

Dezvoltarea literației academice reprezintă un element esențial în formarea inițială a profesorilor, întrucât competențele de comunicare profesională stau la baza practicilor pedagogice eficiente și a interacțiunilor educaționale autentice. Studiul de față analizează modul în care strategiile integrate de dezvoltare a literației academice pot consolida abilitățile de redactare, argumentare, reflecție și comunicare ale viitorilor profesori, pornind de la necesitatea alinierii formării universitare la cerințele actuale ale mediului educațional. Articolul explorează conexiunea dintre literația academică și literația pedagogică, evidențiind rolul acestor competențe în proiectarea didactică, în comunicarea instituțională și în activitățile de mentorat.

Sunt examinate o serie de strategii didactice integrate — învățarea prin proiect, scrierea reflexivă ghidată, analiza critică a surselor, utilizarea instrumentelor digitale pentru feedback și aplicarea unor rubrici standardizate de evaluare — care contribuie la dezvoltarea comunicării profesionale. Studiul propune un cadru metodologic prin care aceste strategii pot fi implementate în programele de formare inițială, evidențiind trei dimensiuni principale: dezvoltarea discursului academic, consolidarea vocabularului profesional și formarea competențelor de comunicare interdisciplinară.

Rezultatele discuției conceptuale sugerează că literația academică nu poate fi concepută ca o abilitate izolată, ci ca un proces continuu, care necesită expunere graduală, feedback constant și integrare curriculară. Concluziile subliniază importanța adoptării unui model formativ centrat pe reflecție, coerență și colaborare, capabil să sprijine viitorii profesori în construirea unei identități profesionale autentice și articulate. Articolul oferă direcții aplicative utile atât pentru cadre didactice universitare, cât și pentru proiectanții implicați în modernizarea programelor de formare inițială.

În ultimele două decenii, literația academică a devenit un concept-cheie în analiza formării universitare, în mod particular în formarea inițială a profesorilor. În contextul în care profesia didactică presupune producerea, interpretarea și comunicarea cunoașterii, abilitatea de a utiliza discursul academic într-un mod critic, coerent și profesionist devine fundamentală (Lea & Street, 1998; Hyland, 2009). Profesorul în formare trebuie să dezvolte nu doar competențe de scriere academică, ci și competențe de comunicare instituțională, pedagogică, interdisciplinară și digitală, toate înscrise în sfera literației extinse (Mândruț & Chiș, 2016).

În România, discuțiile privind modernizarea formării inițiale a profesorilor au evidențiat importanța dezvoltării capacităților discursive și reflexive (Bocoș & Jucan, 2019; Cucoș, 2014). În cadrul programelor universitare, accentul se deplasează tot mai mult de pe simplele competențe de reproducere a cunoștințelor către abilități de analiză, argumentare și comunicare pedagogică, indispensabile unui cadru didactic modern. Comunicarea profesională nu reprezintă doar transmiterea unor informații, ci un proces complex de construcție a sensului, prin care viitorul profesor învață să interpreteze situații educaționale, să formuleze raționamente didactice și să susțină decizii fundamentate.

Din această perspectivă, discursul pedagogic se structurează ca o formă de interacțiune socială, în care competențele lingvistice, cognitive și relaționale se împletesc. Capacitatea de a comunica în mod profesionist, fie în format scris (rapoarte, planificări, reflecții, analize de caz), fie oral (prezentări, dezbateri, micro-teaching) devine un indicator al maturității profesionale și al calității formării inițiale. Beauchamp și Thomas (2009) subliniază ideea că identitatea profesională a viitorului profesor se dezvoltă prin discurs, deoarece modul în care studentul își descrie experiențele, își justifică alegerile sau își analizează performanțele reflectă trecerea de la statutul de învățăcel la cel de practician reflexiv.

Comunicarea profesională permite viitorilor profesori să participe activ la comunități de învățare, să negocieze înțelesuri pedagogice și să contribuie la crearea unui climat de colaborare. În absența unei literații academice solide, studenții întâmpină dificultăți în formularea argumentelor, în structurarea reflecțiilor sau în utilizarea adecvată a terminologiei de specialitate, ceea ce poate limita integrarea lor în cultura organizațională a universității. Prin urmare, dezvoltarea acestor abilități devine o condiție esențială pentru profesionalizarea viitorilor profesori și pentru adaptarea lor la cerințele unei educații contemporane centrate pe comunicare, colaborare și reflexivitate.

Articolul de față explorează rolul literației academice în formarea inițială a profesorilor și propune un set de strategii integrate pentru dezvoltarea comunicării profesionale. Scopul este de a demonstra că literația academică nu poate fi abordată fragmentar, ci ca o competență transversală, consolidată prin practici reflexive, evaluative și colaborative.

I. Cadru teoretic

1.1.Literația academică – repere conceptuale

Literația academică depășește simpla abilitate de a scrie corect; ea presupune dezvoltarea unui set complex de competențe care combină gândirea critică, capacitatea de argumentare, organizarea logică a ideilor, utilizarea surselor credibile și adoptarea unui ton formal, adecvat contextului academic (Wingate, 2012). Această competență nu se limitează la corectitudinea gramaticală sau ortografică, ci implică și abilitatea de a construi raționamente coerente, de a sintetiza informații din diverse surse și de a participa activ la comunități discursive, contribuind la dialogul academic și la co-crearea cunoașterii.

Modelul Academic Literacies propus de Lea și Street (1998) identifică trei niveluri interdependente care explică complexitatea literației academice:

1. Competențele de scriere – abilități fundamentale de redactare și structurare a textului;
2. Convențiile disciplinare – norme și stiluri specifice fiecărei discipline, care ghidează modul de prezentare a argumentelor și de integrare a surselor;
3. Practici sociale ale discursului – aspecte legate de contextul social, cultural și profesional în care se produc și se utilizează textele academice.

Pentru viitorii profesori, această abordare este deosebit de relevantă, deoarece profesia didactică presupune trecerea constantă între diferite tipuri de discurs: academic (la nivel universitar), pedagogic (în interacțiunea cu elevii și planificarea lecțiilor), administrativ (rapoarte, planuri, documentație școlară) și didactic (expunerea și explicarea conținutului educațional). Capacitatea de a naviga fluent între aceste registre, păstrând coerența și claritatea mesajului, devine astfel un criteriu esențial al profesionalismului didactic și al succesului în practica pedagogică.

1.2.Literația pedagogică și comunicarea profesională

Discursul pedagogic reprezintă un registru specific de comunicare, caracterizat prin terminologie, convenții și structuri ale argumentației proprii, care diferă de limbajul cotidian sau de cel pur academic (Gee, 2015). Acest registru include, pe lângă vocabularul pedagogic specializat, modalități precise de organizare a ideilor, argumentare logică și justificare a deciziilor, precum și norme de prezentare care permit transmiterea clară a intențiilor educaționale. În formarea inițială a profesorilor, este esențial ca studenții să învețe să utilizeze acest discurs nu doar pentru a reproduce concepte și teorii, ci pentru a construi raționamente proprii, a analiza situații didactice și a fundamenta deciziile pedagogice luate în practică.

Procesul de învățare al discursului pedagogic implică dezvoltarea gândirii critice și reflexive, abilități care permit viitorilor profesori să interacționeze cu elevii și colegii lor într-un mod profesionist și conștient. Scrierea reflexivă, realizarea de rapoarte didactice, analizarea cazurilor concrete și participarea la discuții academice devin instrumente prin care identitatea didactică începe să se contureze (Ivanič, 1998). Prin aceste practici, studenții își dezvoltă capacitatea de a integra teoria și practica, de a observa efectele deciziilor lor asupra procesului de învățare și de a-și ajusta abordările educaționale în mod autonom.

Astfel, literația academică și pedagogică se transformă într-un proces formativ major, fiind nu doar un instrument de comunicare, ci și un mijloc de construire a profesionalismului și a identității didactice. Dezvoltarea acestui registru discursiv permite viitorilor profesori să participe activ la comunități educaționale, să-și susțină opiniile cu argumente solide și să dezvolte o practică reflexivă și adaptivă, condiții esențiale pentru succesul în cariera didactică.

1.3.Comunicarea profesională în formarea profesorilor

Cercetările internaționale arată că dezvoltarea competențelor de comunicare profesională este strâns corelată cu autoeficacitatea profesorilor și cu calitatea predării (Darling-Hammond, 2017; Korthagen, 2017). Profesorii care stăpânesc discursul profesional, reușesc să gestioneze mai eficient procesul didactic, să transmită clar obiectivele lecțiilor și să genereze un climat de învățare favorabil. Comunicarea profesională nu se limitează la transmiterea informațiilor, ea presupune abilitatea de a argumenta decizii pedagogice, de a negocia sensuri cu colegii și elevii și de a construi relații profesionale bazate pe colaborare și responsabilitate.

În România, tranziția spre un model de educație centrat pe competențe (Ionescu, 2010) a accentuat nevoia ca viitorii profesori să dezvolte un discurs pedagogic articulat, capabil să răspundă cerințelor curriculare, dar și să fie flexibil față de nevoile elevilor. Comunicarea profesională în acest context se manifestă în mai multe dimensiuni esențiale:

- Proiectarea didactică: elaborarea planurilor de lecție, a scenariilor didactice și a materialelor educaționale necesită claritate, coerență și structură argumentativă. Discursul profesional permite justificarea alegerilor metodologice și integrarea obiectivelor de competență în mod explicit.
- Evaluare: profesorul trebuie să comunice criteriile de evaluare, să ofere feedback constructiv și să interpreteze rezultatele într-un mod clar și comprehensiv pentru elevi și părinți. Capacitatea de a argumenta evaluările și de a explica deciziile contribuie la creșterea transparenței și încrederii în procesul educațional.
- Relația cu elevii: comunicarea pedagogică eficientă presupune adaptarea limbajului, tonului și structurilor argumentative la nivelul de înțelegere al elevilor, încurajând participarea activă, reflecția și gândirea critică.

- Colaborarea interinstituțională: profesia didactică implică dialog cu colegi, mentori, directori și alte cadre didactice. Abilitățile de comunicare profesională facilitează partajarea de resurse, rezolvarea conflictelor și dezvoltarea proiectelor comune.
- Raportări educaționale: redactarea de rapoarte, evaluări, proiecte și documentații oficiale necesită respectarea convențiilor academice și administrative, precum și abilitatea de a exprima clar concluzii, recomandări și planuri de acțiune.

Astfel, dezvoltarea comunicării profesionale nu este doar un obiectiv al formării inițiale, ci un proces continuu, care contribuie la consolidarea identității profesionale, la eficiența procesului didactic și la integrarea viitorilor profesori în comunitățile educaționale.

II. Strategii integrate pentru dezvoltarea literației academice

Formarea inițială a profesorilor impune dezvoltarea simultană a competențelor academice și pedagogice, ceea ce face necesară implementarea unor strategii integrate care să consolideze literația academică și comunicarea profesională. Aceste strategii urmăresc nu doar îmbunătățirea scrierii și a discursului, ci și stimularea gândirii critice, reflexive și de colaborare.

2.1.Scrierea academică reflexivă

Scrierea reflexivă reprezintă un instrument central în dezvoltarea literației profesionale, deoarece le permite studenților să transforme experiența practică în cunoaștere teoretică și să dezvolte raționamente independente (Bocoș, 2017). Exemple concrete includ:

- Jurnale de practică pedagogică: studenții documentează activitățile desfășurate, analizează situații problematice și identifică soluții alternative.
- Eseuri și analize critice: redactarea de eseuri pe teme didactice și pedagogice stimulează capacitatea de argumentare și de integrare a surselor teoretice.
- Autoevaluări: reflecția asupra propriilor performanțe permite identificarea punctelor forte și a ariilor ce necesită îmbunătățire, dezvoltând metacogniția.

Prin aceste activități, viitorii profesori învață să articuleze corect și coerent ideile, să argumenteze decizii pedagogice și să utilizeze un ton academic adecvat, consolidând identitatea profesională.

2.2.Învățarea prin proiect (Project-Based Learning)

Învățarea prin proiect oferă un cadru practic în care studenții aplică cunoștințele teoretice și dezvoltă abilități de colaborare și comunicare profesională (Barron & Darling-Hammond, 2008). Această strategie presupune:

- Elaborarea de planuri de lecție interdisciplinare și prezentarea lor în fața colegilor și mentorilor;
- Documentare și integrare de surse academice, stimulând gândirea critică;
- Crearea de proiecte de grup, care dezvoltă competențele de negociere, colaborare și comunicare orală și scrisă.

Învățarea prin proiect facilitează trecerea de la un discurs pur teoretic la unul aplicat, adaptat contextului școlar, contribuind la consolidarea literației profesionale și a încrederii în competențele proprii.

2.3.Analiza critică a surselor

Evaluarea și integrarea surselor academice reprezintă o competență esențială în literația academică. Studenții trebuie să învețe să:

- Identifice sursele credibile și relevante pentru planificarea și justificarea activităților didactice;
- Evalueze calitatea și pertinența informațiilor;

- Integreze citate și referințe corect, respectând normele academice (Chiș & Bocoș, 2018).

Acest proces nu doar consolidează discursul scris, ci dezvoltă și capacitatea de judecată critică, indispensabilă unei practici pedagogice fundamentate.

2.4.Utilizarea instrumentelor digitale pentru feedback

Instrumentele digitale permit feedback rapid, precis și personalizat, facilitând progresul continuu al studenților (Nicol & Macfarlane-Dick, 2006). Exemple de utilizare:

- Platforme colaborative (Google Classroom, Moodle) pentru partajarea proiectelor și comentarii pe text;
- Rubrici digitale pentru evaluarea pe bază de criterii de redactare a lucrărilor scrise;
- Softuri de analiză textuală, care identifică coerența, structura și argumentarea.

Aceste instrumente contribuie la dezvoltarea autocontrolului, metacogniției și capacității de a revizui și îmbunătăți discursul academic.

2.5.Dezvoltarea vocabularului profesional

Vocabularul specific disciplinei pedagogice este un element cheie al literației academice. Dezvoltarea acestuia se realizează prin:

- Glosare tematice și dicționare de termeni pedagogici, folosite atât la cursuri, cât și în proiecte practice;
- Micro-teaching și prezentări simulate, în care studenții aplică și consolidează terminologia;
- Dezbateri și discuții academice, care stimulează utilizarea coerentă și precisă a limbajului profesional (Pânișoară, 2015).

Un vocabular bine structurat și utilizat corect permite exprimarea clară a ideilor, argumentarea deciziilor pedagogice și participarea activă la comunități profesionale.

Articolul subliniază că literația academică nu poate fi tratată ca un set de abilități izolate sau fragmentare, ci trebuie înțeleasă ca un proces complex, continuu și integrat, care se dezvoltă progresiv pe parcursul formării inițiale a profesorilor. Aceasta presupune expunere graduală la practici reflexive și academice, prin activități variate precum scrierea reflexivă, analiza critică a surselor, proiecte de grup și prezentări, toate acestea contribuind la consolidarea abilităților de comunicare profesională. Procesul nu se limitează la simple exerciții de redactare; el implică integrarea constantă a feedback-ului, adaptarea discursului la diferite contexte și înțelegerea normelor și convențiilor specifice domeniului pedagogic și academic.

Modelul formativ propus în studiu se concentrează pe trei dimensiuni esențiale: coerența, reflecția și colaborarea. Coerența presupune dezvoltarea unui discurs academic și pedagogic bine structurat, care să permită viitorilor profesori să argumenteze decizii, să organizeze eficient planificările didactice și să transmită informații clar. Reflecția se referă la capacitatea studenților de a analiza propriile practici, de a evalua impactul deciziilor lor pedagogice și de a dezvolta o gândire critică orientată spre îmbunătățire continuă. Colaborarea include interacțiunea cu colegii, mentorii și comunitatea educațională, încurajând schimbul de idei, cooperarea și dezvoltarea competențelor sociale și profesionale necesare unui cadru didactic modern. Prin acest cadru formativ, viitorii profesori sunt sprijiniți să își construiască o identitate profesională autentică, bazată pe competență, responsabilitate și capacitatea de a integra teoria cu practica în mod coerent.

Formarea inițială, așa cum este conturată în articol, devine astfel un proces complex și multidimensional, care nu se limitează la transmiterea cunoștințelor teoretice. Aceasta vizează și dezvoltarea abilităților de comunicare profesională, esențiale pentru interacțiunea eficientă în diverse contexte educaționale — fie că este vorba de comunicarea cu elevii, colegii, părinții sau alte cadre didactice și instituții. Capacitatea de a argumenta clar, de a folosi limbajul profesional adecvat și de a participa activ la comunități de învățare contribuie la succesul viitorilor profesori și la crearea unui mediu educațional reflexiv și colaborativ.

Studiul mai evidențiază și importanța integrării literației academice în curriculumul formării inițiale. Aceasta nu doar sprijină dezvoltarea competențelor de scriere și argumentare, ci și formarea unei practici pedagogice fundamentate, colaborative și reflexive, capabile să răspundă cerințelor unei educații contemporane centrate pe comunicare, competențe și profesionalism. Implementarea direcțiilor aplicative propuse — cum ar fi utilizarea rubricilor de evaluare standardizate, instrumentele digitale de feedback, proiectele interdisciplinare și scrierea reflexivă ghidată — oferă cadrele didactice universitare și proiectanților de programe educaționale un ghid practic pentru modernizarea și eficientizarea formării inițiale.

În final, concluziile subliniază că literația academică și competențele de comunicare profesională sunt inseparabile de procesul de profesionalizare a viitorilor profesori. Formarea acestora trebuie să fie un proces continuu, orientat spre dezvoltarea de ansamblu a studentului, care să includă atât abilități cognitive și academice, cât și competențe sociale, reflexive și pedagogice. Adoptarea unui model integrat, centrat pe coerență, reflecție și colaborare, asigură nu doar pregătirea eficientă a viitorilor cadre didactice, ci și dezvoltarea unei practici educaționale durabile, adaptabile și fundamentate pe valori profesionale solide.

Ingrid Cezarina-Elena Ciochină
Lecturer, Phd., "Lucian Blaga" University of Sibiu

Abstract: Academic literacy represents a fundamental pillar in initial teacher education, as professional communication skills directly influence the quality of teaching processes and educational interactions. This article explores the importance of integrating academic literacy development strategies — reflective writing, critical analysis of sources, interdisciplinary projects, and digital feedback — into the university curriculum. These strategies support the construction of professional discourse, the development of pedagogical vocabulary, and the formation of a well-articulated teaching identity. The study argues for the necessity of a coherent and collaborative approach that strengthens the essential communication competencies of future teachers.

În contextul actual al formării inițiale a profesorilor, dezvoltarea literației academice reprezintă o componentă fundamentală pentru asigurarea calității procesului educațional. Competențele de comunicare profesională, manifestate prin scriere, discurs și interacțiuni pedagogice, stau la baza practicilor didactice eficiente și a construirii unor relații educaționale autentice. Articolul de față investighează modul în care strategiile integrate de dezvoltare a literației academice pot contribui la consolidarea abilităților de redactare, argumentare, reflecție și comunicare ale viitorilor profesori, subliniind importanța alinierii programelor universitare cu cerințele complexe ale mediului educațional contemporan.

Literația academică, așa cum este conceptualizată în literatura de specialitate, depășește simpla capacitate de a scrie corect din punct de vedere gramatical. Ea implică dezvoltarea unui set complex de competențe cognitive, lingvistice și sociale care permit viitorilor profesori să construiască raționamente coerente, să sintetizeze informații din surse diverse și să participe activ la comunități discursive. Modelul Academic Literacies propus de Lea și Street (1998) evidențiază trei dimensiuni interdependente ale acestei competențe: abilitățile fundamentale de scriere, respectarea convențiilor disciplinare și înțelegerea practicilor sociale asociate discursului academic. Aceste dimensiuni sunt indispensabile pentru profesorul în formare, care trebuie să navigheze între diferitele registre de discurs – academic, pedagogic, administrativ și didactic – menținând coerența și claritatea mesajului.

În România, modernizarea formării inițiale a profesorilor a accentuat necesitatea dezvoltării capacităților reflexive și discursive, deplasând accentul de la reproducerea cunoștințelor la competențe de analiză critică, argumentare și comunicare pedagogică. Comunicarea profesională, în acest cadru, nu se reduce la transmiterea informațiilor, ci presupune construirea sensului, interpretarea situațiilor educaționale, justificarea deciziilor și fundamentarea acțiunilor didactice. Prin urmare, literația academică și pedagogică se conturează ca un proces formativ continuu, esențial pentru consolidarea identității profesionale a viitorilor cadre didactice.

Articolul anterior analizează strategiile didactice integrate care sprijină dezvoltarea comunicării profesionale, printre care: scrierea reflexivă ghidată, învățarea prin proiect, analiza critică a surselor, utilizarea instrumentelor digitale pentru feedback și aplicarea rubricilor standardizate de evaluare. Aceste metode permit viitorilor profesori să dezvolte competențe de gândire critică și reflexivă, să articuleze coerent ideile și să participe activ la comunități de învățare, consolidând astfel identitatea profesională. Studiul propune un cadru metodologic structurat pe trei dimensiuni principale: dezvoltarea discursului academic, consolidarea vocabularului profesional și formarea competențelor de comunicare interdisciplinară.

Prin această abordare, articolul anterior subliniază ideea că literația academică nu poate fi concepută ca o abilitate izolată, ci ca un proces continuu, care necesită expunere graduală, feedback constant și integrare curriculară. Modelul formativ propus promovează reflecția, coerența și colaborarea, aspecte indispensabile pentru pregătirea profesorilor în vederea unei practici pedagogice autentice și eficiente.

Dacă articolul anterior oferă o analiză complexă a rolului literației academice în formarea inițială a profesorilor, evidențiind legătura sa strânsă cu literația pedagogică și comunicarea profesională, în articolul de față se vor urmări exemple de strategii integrate pentru dezvoltarea competențelor de comunicare profesională în formarea inițială a profesorilor. În ultimele două decenii, conceptul de literație academică a devenit central în studiile privind formarea universitară, în special în pregătirea cadrelor didactice. Profesorul în formare trebuie să dobândească nu doar abilități de scriere academică, ci și competențe de comunicare interdisciplinară, instituțională, pedagogică și digitală, toate înscrise în sfera literației extinse.

Procesul de dezvoltare a literației academice și pedagogice este considerat un factor cheie în consolidarea identității profesionale. Discursul pedagogic se construiește ca o interacțiune socială complexă, în care competențele lingvistice, cognitive și relaționale se împletesc. Prin activități precum redactarea rapoartelor, planificarea lecțiilor, scrierea reflexivă și participarea la dezbateri academice, studenții învață să articuleze clar ideile, să argumenteze deciziile pedagogice și să interacționeze profesional cu colegii, mentorii și elevii. Identitatea profesională se dezvoltă astfel prin discurs, proces care reflectă trecerea de la statutul de învățăcel la cel de practician reflexiv.

Comunicarea profesională, esențială pentru eficiența procesului didactic, se manifestă pe mai multe planuri: proiectarea didactică, evaluarea, relația cu elevii, colaborarea interinstituțională și redactarea documentației educaționale. În lipsa unei literații academice solide, viitorii profesori întâmpină dificultăți în formularea argumentelor, structura reflecțiilor și utilizarea terminologiei de specialitate, ceea ce poate împiedica integrarea lor în cultura organizațională a instituțiilor educaționale.

Pentru a răspunde acestor nevoi, articolul anterior propune strategii integrate pentru dezvoltarea literației academice, care combină abordări reflexive, colaborative și evaluative. Scrierea academică reflexivă permite transformarea experiențelor practice în cunoaștere teoretică, dezvoltând raționamente independente și metacogniție. Învățarea prin proiect facilitează aplicarea cunoștințelor teoretice în contexte practice și consolidarea competențelor de colaborare și comunicare. Analiza critică a surselor asigură identificarea și integrarea surselor credibile, stimulând gândirea critică și argumentarea pedagogică. Instrumentele digitale pentru feedback susțin progresul continuu al studenților prin evaluare rapidă și precisă, iar dezvoltarea vocabularului profesional contribuie la articularea coerentă a discursului pedagogic și la participarea activă în comunitățile educaționale.

Articolul anterior concluzionează că literația academică nu poate fi abordată fragmentar; este un proces continuu, care necesită expunere graduală, integrare curriculară și feedback constant. Modelul formativ propus promovează coerența, reflecția și colaborarea, sprijinind viitorii profesori în construirea unei identități profesionale autentice. Prin aceste abordări, formarea inițială devine un proces complex, care nu doar transmite cunoștințe, ci și consolidează competențele de comunicare profesională și capacitatea de a interacționa eficient în diverse contexte educaționale.

Având în vedere complexitatea literației academice și pedagogice și rolul acesteia în consolidarea identității profesionale a viitorilor cadre didactice, devine evident faptul că simpla cunoaștere teoretică nu este suficientă. Formarea inițială a profesorilor necesită abordări practice, reflexive și de colaborare, care să permită integrarea discursului academic și pedagogic în activitățile cotidiene ale viitorului profesor. În acest context, strategiile didactice integrate reprezintă instrumente esențiale pentru dezvoltarea competențelor de comunicare profesională, oferind cadrul necesar pentru aplicarea cunoștințelor teoretice, pentru stimularea gândirii critice și pentru consolidarea abilităților de interacțiune eficientă cu elevii, colegii și mentorii. Următoarea secțiune va analiza aceste strategii, evidențiind modul în care ele pot fi implementate în programele de formare inițială pentru a sprijini construirea unei identități profesionale solide și articulate.

III. Strategii integrate pentru dezvoltarea competențelor de comunicare profesională în formarea inițială a profesorilor Dezvoltarea competențelor de comunicare profesională reprezintă o componentă centrală a formării inițiale a profesorilor, deoarece acestea influențează claritatea exprimării, capacitatea de argumentare, interacțiunea cu elevii și colegii, precum și participarea la comunități profesionale (Darling-Hammond, 2017; Korthagen, 2017). În România, trecerea spre educația centrată pe competențe a accentuat nevoia de discurs pedagogic articulat și coerent (Ionescu, 2010). Strategiile integrate prezentate mai jos urmăresc să consolideze atât literația academică, cât și abilitățile de comunicare profesională, pregătind viitorii profesori pentru rolurile complexe pe care le vor ocupa.

3.1.Jocuri de rol și scenarii simulate

Jocurile de rol permit studenților să exerseze situații reale din școală, cum ar fi gestionarea conflictelor între elevi, consilierea individuală sau comunicarea cu părinții. Prin aceste simulări, studenții învață să folosească limbaj profesional adecvat, să structureze argumente coerente și să adapteze tonul la audiență, dezvoltând empatia și abilitățile sociale (Gee, 2015; Ivanič, 1998).

3.2.Peer review și evaluare reciprocă

Evaluarea lucrărilor colegilor stimulează gândirea critică și dezvoltarea abilității de a formula feedback constructiv. Studenții învață să identifice punctele forte și slabe ale discursului altora, să argumenteze recomandările și să aplice normele academice, contribuind simultan la perfecționarea propriei comunicări scrise și orale (Wingate, 2012).

3.3.Portofolii digitale interactive

Portofoliile digitale permit studenților să organizeze și să prezinte planuri de lecție, reflecții și proiecte într-un mod coerent și vizual. Această strategie dezvoltă capacitatea de a integra diferite tipuri de documente (texte, imagini, grafice) și consolidează claritatea discursului, oferind și un instrument eficient de evaluare formativă (Chiș & Bocoș, 2018).

3.4.Dezbateri tematice și forumuri online

Participarea la dezbateri sau forumuri online stimulează argumentarea bazată pe surse credibile, gândirea critică și colaborarea profesională. Studenții învață să își susțină punctele de vedere clar și structurat și să respecte regulile comunicării academice, dezvoltând competențe esențiale pentru dialogul profesional cu colegii sau părinții (Pânișoară, 2015).

3.5.Exerciții de parafrazare și rezumare

Reformularea textelor teoretice sau a studiilor de caz în propriile cuvinte ajută studenții să transmită idei complexe coerent, să sintetizeze informația și să respecte tonul academic.

Această strategie consolidează capacitatea de structurare logică a discursului și claritatea exprimării (Lea & Street, 1998).

3.6.Reflectarea asupra discursului propriu prin înregistrări audio/video

Înregistrarea prezentărilor, micro-teaching-ului sau a activităților simulate permite analiza clarității, coerenței și structurii argumentelor. Auto-reflecția pe baza acestor înregistrări ajută la identificarea punctelor forte și a ariilor ce necesită îmbunătățire, contribuind la dezvoltarea competențelor de comunicare orală (Ivanič, 1998).

3.7.Ateliere de redactare profesională

Exercițiile de redactare a rapoartelor, notelor administrative, planurilor de lecție sau comunicărilor către părinți dezvoltă limbajul formal, structura coerentă a textelor și capacitatea de argumentare pedagogică. Aceste ateliere permit integrarea regulilor academice și pedagogice într-un context practic, pregătind studenții pentru activități reale din școală (Bocoș, 2017).

3.8.Mentorat și discuții reflexive cu cadre didactice cu experiență

Dialogul cu mentori oferă modele de comunicare profesională și feedback personalizat. Studenții învață să adapteze discursul la diverse situații și audiențe, să interpreteze normele profesionale și să integreze teoria în practică, ceea ce contribuie la consolidarea identității didactice (Darling-Hammond, 2017).

3.9.Analiza studiilor de caz și a situațiilor complexe

Discutarea deciziilor pe baza studiilor de caz reale sau simulate dezvoltă gândirea critică, capacitatea de structurare a argumentelor și comunicarea clară a deciziilor profesionale. Această strategie facilitează integrarea teoriilor pedagogice în practică și consolidarea competențelor de comunicare profesională (Korthagen, 2017).

3.10. Crearea și prezentarea de materiale vizuale și infografice

Utilizarea suporturilor vizuale în prezentări și materiale scrise clarifică mesajul, evidențiază relațiile dintre concepte și consolidează impactul pedagogic. Studenții învață să combine eficient limbajul scris, oral și vizual, dezvoltând o comunicare profesională completă și atractivă pentru diverse audiențe (Wingate, 2012).

IV. Concluzii și direcții viitoare

Formarea inițială a profesorilor implică mult mai mult decât acumularea de cunoștințe teoretice; ea presupune dezvoltarea competențelor de comunicare profesională, esențiale pentru construirea unei identități didactice solide. Analiza literaturii de specialitate și strategiile propuse în acest articol evidențiază faptul că literația academică nu se reduce la abilitatea de a scrie corect sau de a citi eficient, ci include capacitatea de a argumenta coerent, de a structura ideile, de a utiliza surse academice și de a participa activ la comunități discursive. În contextul formării inițiale, aceste competențe se corelează direct cu dezvoltarea discursului pedagogic și a comunicării profesionale, constituind instrumente fundamentale în procesul de predare, evaluare și colaborare profesională.

Implementarea strategiilor integrate prezentate, precum jocurile de rol, evaluarea reciprocă, portofoliile digitale, dezbaterile tematice, exercițiile de parafrazare, mentoratul, atelierele de redactare profesională și utilizarea materialelor vizuale, contribuie semnificativ la consolidarea abilităților de exprimare și argumentare. Prin simularea situațiilor reale, analiza studiilor de caz și exercițiile reflexive, studenții dobândesc competențe esențiale pentru proiectarea activităților didactice, comunicarea cu elevii și părinții, dar și colaborarea eficientă cu colegii. Astfel, literația academică devine un proces formativ major, care nu doar susține performanța intelectuală, ci și dezvoltarea identității profesionale, a încrederii în sine și a capacității de adaptare la contexte diverse.

În concluzie, corelarea literației academice cu discursul pedagogic reprezintă un element central pentru pregătirea viitorilor profesori. Strategiile integrate oferă un cadru structurat care permite dezvoltarea simultană a competențelor scrise, orale și reflexive, contribuind la autoeficacitatea studenților și la consolidarea identității didactice. În perspectivă, este necesar ca cercetările viitoare să investigheze impactul fiecărei strategii asupra performanței profesionale și a dezvoltării comunicării profesionale în context românesc. Integrarea continuă a tehnologiilor educaționale, precum portofoliile digitale și forumurile online, poate sprijini acest proces, la fel cum mentoratul și participarea în comunități de practică pot facilita tranziția de la student la profesor debutant.

De asemenea, este importantă dezvoltarea competențelor metacognitive și reflexive, prin exerciții de auto-analiză a discursului și prin evaluări audio-video, ceea ce poate întări gândirea critică și capacitatea de adaptare a studenților. Formarea interdisciplinară, combinarea comunicării profesionale cu cunoștințele disciplinare și pedagogice, precum și extinderea dimensiunii interculturale, sunt aspecte care merită aprofundate în cercetările viitoare. Evaluarea formativă și feedback-ul continuu reprezintă, de asemenea, instrumente esențiale pentru ajustarea rapidă a competențelor, iar integrarea lor sistematică în formarea inițială ar putea conduce la îmbunătățirea semnificativă a calității procesului educațional.

Astfel, literația academică și comunicarea profesională sunt interdependente, iar dezvoltarea lor integrată constituie cheia pentru formarea unor profesori competenți, reflexivi și adaptabili. Strategiile prezentate asigură un cadru coerent pentru construirea identității didactice, creșterea autoeficacității și pregătirea studenților pentru provocările complexe ale profesiei didactice. În acest sens, viitorul cercetărilor și practicilor educaționale trebuie să continue să exploreze metode inovative și integrate, care să susțină simultan dezvoltarea competențelor de literație academică și a celor de comunicare profesională, pentru a răspunde nevoilor unei educații moderne și centrate pe competențe.

ARTISTIC REPRESENTATIONS OF LA FONTAINE'S FABLES

Aliteea-Bianca Turtureanu
Lecturer Phd, North University Center of Baia Mare, Technical University of Cluj-Napoca

Abstract: La Fontaine's Fables go beyond the realms of the universal literature having remained in its history, being found in arts too in the form of various visual representations. The artworks of the illustrators of La Fontaine's Fables: François Chauveau (17th century), Jean Baptiste Oudry (18th century), Gustave Doré (19th century), Eugène Grivaz (19th century), Philead Salvator Levilly (19th century), Raymond de Nezière (19th century), Salvador Dali (20th century) and Marc Chagall (20th century) go beyond the teaching and/or literary nature of the old Fables, offering the latter a new and original perspective, which greatly enhances their universal dimension.

L'auteur des Fables est l'un des écrivains les plus originaux du XVII-è siècle. Il voit le jour le 8 juin 1632 à Château-Thierry et quitte ce monde le 13 avril 1695 à Paris. La Fontaine a complété le clacissisme français, a emprunté ses sujets à l'Antiquité et au Moyen Âge; mais il les a transformés à ce point, que personne n'a jamais pu l'imiter. Héritier de Phèdre et d'Ésope (dont il s'inspire pour écrire la plus connue fable de la littérature universelle Le corbeau et le renard), il a su mettre dans chacune de ses fables une touche dramatique, et faire de l'ensemble un ample tableau: représenter les animaux avec l'exactitude scientifique d'un naturaliste, conformément à la tradition populaire; peindre tous les sentiments et toutes les passions de l'humanité, toutes les conditions sociales et tous les métiers. La Fontaine a décrit sobrement mais poétiquement les paysages de France qui servent de cadre à ses animaux. Sa morale est celle de l'expérience, un peu sceptique, mais fondée sur le sens; le lecteur n'apprend pas dans les Fables la charité, mais comprend mieux la solidarité. La Fontaine sait être tour à tour: conteur, poète épique, poète lyrique ou poète satirique. Le vocabulaire qu'il emploie est riche et varié tout comme ses thèmes, sa versification suit tous les mouvements de sa pensée.

Dès le Moyen Âge en France, la fable est un genre littéraire bien vivant: nous l'avons trouvée dans le fabliau, conte amusant et instructif, après elle s'est intégrée, sous forme de petites unités, à de plus vastes récits, chansons de geste ou romans. Aux XVI-è et XVII-è siècles, elle inspire bon nombre d'ouvrages pédagogiques. Publiée parfois sous forme de recueils, la fable inclut des symboles, des énigmes et des proverbes. La Fontaine a renouvelé la fable, en lui donnant une forme artistique raffinée, mélangeant poésie, critique sociale et sagesse populaire, un vrai outil de réflexion. Parallèlement à cet usage mondain, plus ludique qu'édifiant, se développe une tradition savante qui s'attache à traduire et à composer des fables à vocation pédagogique. La fable était en effet un outil pédagogique très recherché: les collégiens des jésuites ou des oratoriens ne manquaient pas d'étudier celles d'Ésope, de Babrius ou de Phèdre. Tradition savante et jeu mondain avaient donc contribué à alimenter un genre littéraire déjà enrichi d'influences antiques et médiévales, devenu célèbre et pratiqué par les contemporains de La Fontaine. Tout l'art du poète est d'avoir su renouveler un genre surexploité en intensifiant et diversifiant les rapports du récit et de la morale, mais aussi en dramatisant les scènes, en caractérisant les animaux dont il déroule le théâtre comme un miroir de la société. Les animaux de La Fontaine sont issus du bestiaire traditionnel de la culture française. Ils sont présents depuis l'Antiquité dans les mythes, les textes et les images, tout comme dans les rites et les croyances. Ils étaient déjà familiers bien avant le poète, qui conserve leurs caractéristiques «psychologiques».

En 1668, Jean de La Fontaine fait paraître le premier recueil des Fables dans lequel le lecteur pouvait lire Le Corbeau et le Renard. Cette fable est l'une des plus connues de La Fontaine. La Fontaine renouvelle le genre au XVII-ème siècle en s'inspirant du grec Ésope, né vers 620 avant J-C.

Parmi les fonctions de la fable nous citons le divertissement, l'enseignement, la réflexion et la critique. La fonction de divertissement consiste dans un récit court, interrompu par des dialogues au style direct ou indirect libre, la fable tire son charme d'une concision qui, en quelques mots, crée un monde d'images et de situations concrètes. Le rythme est donné par les vers de longueur différente, par les articulations logiques et chronologiques. Les mésaventures des animaux font rire ou sourire. La mise à distance est suffisante pour éloigner les similitudes. Le lecteur de la fable est le spectateur d'une scène qui le concerne, mais dans laquelle il ne se sent pas impliqué. La fonction de l'enseignement est que toutes les fables comportent une moralité qui ouvre ou ferme le récit. Les vérités énoncées dressent une sorte de bilan de la nature humaine et des fonctionnements sociaux.

Le classicisme n'aurait pas été complet sans lui, le grand fabuliste. La Fontaine réalise une synthèse de son époque, laisse un vrai témoignage, parce qu'il peint un tableau en couleurs, un tableau frais, vivant où il peigne toute son époque. L'œuvre de La Fontaine est adressée à toutes les catégories d'esprit, à tous les goûts et à tous les âges. Le dynamisme des fables consiste dans la diversité et dans l'originalité. Cette diversité est donnée par la formation de La Fontaine, le poète étant un bon connaisseur et admirateur de la culture de l'Antiquité, de la culture de la Renaissance italienne et française, il a eu une formation érudite. En 1668, Jean de La Fontaine fait paraître le premier recueil de ses Fables, duquel est extrait Le Corbeau et le Renard. Cette fable est l'une des plus connues de La Fontaine. La fable a comme base l'imagination et en ce sens elle occupe la même place que le conte et la légende. À travers la fable nous désignons également des récits mythologiques. Dans un sens plus restreint, la fable est un petit récit allégorique en vers ou en prose qui transmet un enseignement moral par l'intermédiaire d'une expression humoristique et au moyen des jeux de mots, visant à satiriser un trait de caractère ou une attitude. Même si la fable est comparée aux proverbes ou aux maximes, elle est différente à cause de la forme prise par la sagesse universelle. Les caractéristiques de la fable sont : le mélange des genres, ce qui contribue à la diversité des thèmes. La fable n'a pas de règles fixes pour éviter la monotonie. Dans la fable sont introduits comme personnages des animaux qui parlent, ce qui construit sa dimension allégorique. À l'aide de ses Fables, La Fontaine a exploité son esprit créateur, son imagination sans limites, son esprit inventif, toute sa fantaisie, mais sans enfreindre les exigences classiques. À travers toutes ces qualités du poète, La Fontaine peut créer cet immense et amusant spectacle animalier. Il y a aussi une alternance du discours narratif et du discours dramatique qui donne le rythme et l'expressivité. Le point de départ des Fables de La Fontaine est l'homme, l'animal est un intermédiaire, un symbole, un masque de la méchanceté humaine sous les signes de l'opposition bien/mal.

Nous pourrions noter ici un artiste célèbre par son style notable: Jean-Baptiste Oudry avec son œuvre sur les Fables qui est bien influente, car elle intègre la vie et la fantaisie des animaux pour illustrer les défauts humains. Ses illustrations sont si populaires qu'elles ont été reproduites sur différents objets décoratifs et sont devenues un vrai modèle visuel.

Les Fables de La Fontaine ont inspiré une riche tradition d'illustrations à travers les siècles, impliquant de nombreux artistes célèbres. Ces représentations visent à compléter l'esprit, l'humour et la morale des textes. Les artistes utilisent différentes techniques: de la peinture à la gravure, en passant par la gouache et la lithographie.

Concernant le style visuel, les œuvres peuvent être très réalistes ou plus stylisées, avec un focus sur la simplicité et la précision du trait, comme le fait l'artiste Aractingi.

Quant à l'analyse des thèmes, les artistes se concentrent sur la morale de la fable, l'humour et la malice de La Fontaine, ainsi que sur la dualité entre l'apparence et la réalité, le bien et le mal. Les artistes peuvent adopter une approche qui met l'accent sur le côté poétique, ou au contraire, sur les aspects tragiques de la condition humaine.

De nombreux artistes/illustrateurs célèbres ont contribué à l'iconographie des Fables: le premier illustrateur sollicité par La Fontaine lui-même pour l'édition originale de ses œuvres a été François Chauveau (XVII-è siècle). Jean-Baptiste Oudry (XVIII-è siècle) était un artiste connu pour ses 275 dessins détaillés et réalistes, qui servirent de base à la célèbre édition nommée: «des Fermiers généraux». Ses œuvres sont reconnues pour leur qualité de gravure.

Nous citerons également des artistes plus récents tels que le caricaturiste Benjamin Rabier (1864-1939) qui publie en 1905 une édition des Fables qu'il a entièrement illustrée. L'ouvrage présente une mise en page nouvelle : les dessins ne sont plus présentés planche par planche, mais ils viennent le plus souvent encadrer le texte en une succession de vignettes inaugurant les débuts de la bande-dessinée. Le trait est fin, coloré, avec des pages rendant hommage aux mouvements artistiques d'alors: art déco ou art moderne. Antony Roux, collectionneur marseillais, rêve, lui aussi d'un ouvrage exceptionnel: les Fables de La Fontaine illustrées par un peintre. Impressionné par son travail, il commande au peintre Gustave Moreau (1826-1898) le soin de les dessiner. En 1884, celui-ci livre 63 aquarelles denses, romantiques et symbolistes. Si les dessins préparatoires sont conservés au musée national Gustave Moreau, l'intégralité de cette collection est aujourd'hui gardée par les héritiers d'un ami d'Antony Roux. Quelques années plus tard, Ambroise Vollard, éditeur et marchand d'art parisien, sollicite le peintre et graveur Marc Chagall (1887-1985) pour publier une édition illustrée de cent fables de la Fontaine. Entre 1926 et 1927, l'artiste produit cent gouaches avec une « interprétation naïve» des fables mêlant différentes explorations techniques.

Marc Chagall (1887-1985) fut chargé par l'éditeur Ambroise Vollard pour réaliser des gouaches qui marquaient une rupture avec son imaginaire d'origine, s'orientant vers les avant-gardes cubistes et constructivistes. L'artiste a illustré les Fables et a mis en évidence les thèmes religieux présents dans l'œuvre de La Fontaine.

Ambroise Vollard (1866-1939) fut un marchand d'art qui a préféré des peintres comme: Cézanne, Gauguin, Van Gogh, Matisse, Picasso. En 1926, il a l'idée de faire illustrer cent Fables de La Fontaine à l'aide d'un peintre de son époque et demande à Marc Chagall de réaliser cent gouaches pour ces fables. En 1929, Vollard publie dans un journal un article intitulé: « De La Fontaine à Chagall »[1] où il décrit son projet, disant vouloir donner « de l'oeuvre de La Fontaine une interprétation moins littérale, moins fragmentaire, qui fût à la fois plus expressive et plus synthétique. »[2] En 1996, une exposition organisée au Musée d'Art moderne de Céret, puis au Musée National Marc Chagall à Nice, accueille une bonne partie des gouaches illustrant les fables, et rappelle le projet. La vision des fables est sombre et un peu tragique, cherchant à susciter parfois la terreur et la pitié plutôt que le sourire. Des artistes modernes et contemporains continuent de réinterpréter les fables, comme le dessinateur Benjamin Rabier, ou des auteurs de bandes dessinées comme Joan Sfar, qui, dans son univers, reste fidèle à celui de La Fontaine.

Gustave Moreau (1826-1898) est un artiste qui a réalisé une recherche bien approfondie sur les animaux présents dans l'œuvre de La Fontaine, en visitant bien des musées, pour capturer l'exactitude de leurs poses et de leurs mouvements dans ses illustrations. C'est le plus important représentant du symbolisme dans la peinture.

Les deux principales fonctions des Fables sont « placere et docere » et cela veut dire que les deux verbes « plaire et instruire » qui sont inséparables. L'intention de La Fontaine est celle d'instruire, car il affirme : « Je me sers des animaux pour instruire les hommes » [3] Le principe est celui de lire pour apprendre et puis lire pour comprendre. Le rôle de la fable est surtout didactique : le lecteur doit faire l'effort de chercher, de comprendre et d'interpréter. La lecture des Fables permet de mêler l'utile à l'agréable. Le lecteur peut aussi apprendre à travers les illustrations des Fables de La Fontaine et nous citerons celles de Jean-Baptiste Oudry peintre animalier de la cour de Louis XV, qui est resté célèbre pour ses illustrations des fables réalisées au début des années 1730. Ses ouvrages les plus connus sont les 275 dessins qui ont servi à l'édition nommée aussi des «Fermiers généraux des Fables de La Fontaine». Au XVIII-è siècle, Baptiste Oudry propose de nouvelles illustrations, un peu plus naturalistes. Oudry fut un peintre, un créateur de tapisserie et un immense illustrateur des Fables, les critiques le considèrent le plus grand peintre français concernant les scènes de chasse et de nature morte du XVIII-ème siècle. Il a également peint beaucoup de portraits, des paysages purs et des scènes historiques. François Chaveau (XVII-è siècle) est originaire de Bourgogne, il est né en 1613. Il a étudié dans l'atelier de Laurent de La Hyre et s'est spécialisé dans l'eau-forte. Louis XIV lui attribue le titre de «Graveur du Roi» ainsi qu'une pension en 1662. Il est nommé conseiller à l'Académie royale de peinture et de sculpture le 14 avril 1663. Chauveau a laissé une œuvre de plus de 6000 pièces (frontispices, vignettes, etc). Quoique très travailleur, il était d'un caractère jovial. Il improvisait chez Fagon des pièces de théâtre dans les bosquets et jouait volontiers le rôle de Pierrot en s'accompagnant de la guitare. Gustave Doré est connu pour la précision et le réalisme de ses illustrations de fables, souvent dans des décors exotiques. Gustave Moreau (1826-1898) a illustré un ensemble de fables pour un commanditaire privé, créant des œuvres riches et détaillées.

Concernant les interprétations modernes des Fables: Jean Granville a créé des illustrations satiriques, notamment dans des albums comme «Métamorphoses du Jour». Il a illustré les Fables de la Fontaine, de Swift (les Voyages de Gulliver). Certains ont vu dans cet ouvrage l'inspiration des œuvres surréalistes et contemporaines. Granville (pseudonyme de Jean-Ignace-Isidore Gérard) est un artiste, dessinateur, caricaturiste et lithographe, du début du XIX-è siècle. Son inspiration baroque lui fait traiter des thèmes inédits où la caricature la plus cruelle côtoie des illustrations visionnaires et poétiques. Ses planches satiriques sont des charges contre les contemporains. Ses dessins déplaisaient à Adolphe Thiers, qui fait promulguer, en 1835, une loi exigeant une autorisation préalable pour la publication des dessins et des caricatures. Benjamin Rabier a illustré les fables dans un style humoristique et truculent. Tout au long des Fables, Benjamin Rabier nous permet d'admirer la plupart des styles de l'époque: certaines pages sont construites dans la manière «des arts déco», à la Mucha, d'autres, plus rares, comme des arts modernes. Chaque Fable fait l'objet d'une mise en page particulière. Il se lance, à partir de 1916, dans le dessin animé et s'occupe de publicité. Pour la cinémathèque Pathé Baby, de 1922 à 1925, il crée de nombreux dessins animés ayant pour sujets certains de ses personnages d'illustrateur. Un style très particulier et personnel qui annonce la bande dessinée actuelle; René Haussman a proposé des illustrations poétiques et parfois truculentes, notamment dans les années 1960 et 1970. Thomas Tessier a créé des mises en scène humoristiques des textes dans un style contemporain. Joan Sfar a mêlé son univers de la bande-dessinée à celui de La Fontaine, offrant une approche moderne des fables. Chez Lukas Kandl (né en 1994) nous voyons très bien que sa peinture explore les fables avec une approche étrange, magique et un peu surréaliste. Les critiques apprécient son œuvre contemporaine conçue sous le signe d'un réalisme magique.

D’autres expressions artistiques sont les peintures murales: des œuvres comme le plafond de l'Opéra de Paris par Marc Chagall qui intègre des éléments liés aux fables. Les calligrammes incluent l'utilisation de la technique du calligramme, popularisée par Apollinaire, pour dessiner des animaux avec les vers de la fable. Nous citerons aussi des œuvres sculptées ou gravées: des exemples de gravures comme celles d'Ambrosius Francken ou des appliques représentant la fable qui met en scène le renard et le fromage, sont mentionnées dans les collections du Musée d'Art et d'Histoire de Genève.

Il est clair que l’univers onirique de Moreau, grand amateur de chimères, de mythes antiques et de mirages orientalistes, se prête à merveille à ces textes peuplés d’animaux qui parlent et se transforment, où surgissent une sultane à dos d’éléphant, des dragons, la magicienne Circé et la déesse Junon, tout cela dans un décor magnifique avec des végétaux ondulants ou des paysages exotiques. La passion du peintre pour le rêve infuse chaque aspect de ces aquarelles, y compris les plus naturalistes où la magie s’exprime à travers des couleurs fortes, étonnantes et vaporeuses. Dans «L’Éléphant et le Singe de Jupiter», «Le Dragon à plusieurs têtes» et «Le Dragon à plusieurs queues», la profondeur des formes et des nuances dépasse les frontières entre paysage terrestre, céleste et subaquatique. Pour donner corps à ces rêveries animalières, l’artiste s’est rendu à la Bibliothèque Nationale, au Musée d’Histoire Naturelle et à la Ménagerie du Jardin des Plantes où, durant un mois, il dessine sur le vif des cerfs, des lions, des serpents, des éléphants et des rhinocéros et se fait même livrer chez lui des grenouilles vivantes! Le peintre va aussi au Louvre pour étudier «Le Dessert» (une célèbre nature morte de Jan Davids de Heem) et croquer des objets précieux afin de nourrir la table luxueuse et fourmillante de détails qu’il choisit comme décor pour le festin des animaux dans «Le Rat de ville et le Rat des champs» s’avérant ici plutôt proche de la gravure de Gustave Doré réalisée un an plus tôt, en 1880.

Mais, le plus souvent, son regard symboliste nourrit des compositions plus modernes qui complètent les textes et renouvellent leur lecture. Ainsi, la silhouette d’un arbre incarne, comme un double diabolique, l’emprise cruelle dans «Le Loup et l’Agneau». Pour «Le Rat et l’Eléphant», qui traite de la supériorité d’un être sur un autre en fonction de sa taille, le peintre fait le choix intelligent de relativiser l’importance du pachyderme en le montrant dépassé par des fleurs énormes. Vers la moitié du XX-ème siècle, c’est Calvet Rogniat qui illustre les Fables de La Fontaine.
Il est bien connu de tous ceux qui ont fréquenté les salles de classe à cette période pour les belles images données par les instituteurs aux bons élèves lorsqu'ils avaient bien travaillé et acquis 10 bons points.

Un autre artiste important qui a illustré les Fables de La Fontaine est Salvador Dali (1904-1989). L’une des plus amples expositions dédiées à l’artiste catalan s’est tenue à Cluj-Napoca en 2025; elle présentait cent soixante dix œuvres signées par l’artiste. «L’Univers de Salvador Dali» a invité les visiteurs dans un voyage inoubliable parmi ses différents ouvrages: des sculptures en grandeur nature, du mobilier surréaliste et d’autres œuvres spécialement réalisées dans la composition desquelles il a utilisé le verre, le bronze, l’or et même les diamants. L’exposition qui s’est tenue dans la maison Hintz, bâtiment historique emblématique pour la ville de Cluj, a eu l’intention de tester la perception du visiteur sur la réalité en dépassant les limites du rationnel. Parmi les œuvres exposées, nous avons pu admirer les représentations des Fables: «Le Bestiaire de la Fontaine Dalinisé» contenait une série complète de douze gravures qui ont illustré des scènes présentes dans les Fables.

Au XIX-ème siècle, pendant les courants romantique et le réaliste Eugène Delacroix et Jean-Louis-Ernest Meissonier ont participé à des éditions illustrées, mettant en lumière la force expressive des animaux. Gustave Doré a créé des gravures célèbres, mêlant des figures grotesques et fantastiques pour mettre en lumière le chaos moral comme dans «La peste avec des créatures étranges». Gustave Moreau a produit des dessins symbolistes, explorant le côté allégorique et psychologique des scènes, comme par exemple dans « Le Paon se plaignant à Junon ». Au XX-ème siècle nous rencontrons Benjamin Rabier avec quelques dessins truculents et René Hausman qui ont travaillé pour moderniser l'image des Fables. Marc Chagall a enrichi beaucoup d'éditions avec sa vision onirique et colorée, utilisant des techniques variées comme la gravure ou le vitrail. Des bédéistes comme J. Sfar continuent l'adaptation de l'univers de La Fontaine. Concernant l'allégorie et la moralité, les artistes analysent le «corps» (le récit) et l' «âme» (la morale). Les animaux expriment des sentiments et des comportements humains, permettant des interprétations de la société.

Les représentations artistiques des Fables de La Fontaine sont un exercice de superbe liberté à travers les siècles. Elle montrent le caractère universel des Fables. À travers leurs œuvres, les artistes nous offrent une lecture plus originale et plus détaillée des Fables. Les lecteurs bénéficient d'une double vision, artistique et littéraire.

THE FIGURE OF THE OUTCAST IN THE NOVELS ITZIK BY PASCALE ROZE AND MAGNUS BY SYLVIE GERMAIN

Simona Suta
Lecturer PhD, University of Oradea

Abstract: This article explores the figure of the excluded individual in Itsik by Pascale Roze and Magnus by Sylvie Germain, two contemporary French novels that examine the long-lasting effects of the Holocaust on identity, memory, and the human condition. In Itsik, exclusion emerges through the silent suffering of a Jewish survivor whose body carries the traces of trauma and whose language has been shattered by the violence of history. His identity is reduced to fragments, and survival becomes a form of exile from himself. In Magnus, exclusion takes shape through a falsified identity: the protagonist, raised by a Nazi family, discovers that his entire past is a lie. His quest for truth reveals the destructive power of inherited guilt and the fragile possibility of reconstructing a self after erasure. Both novels show that the Holocaust produces wounded identities, where memory—whether destroyed or falsified—creates deep inner fractures that persist across generations.

Keywords : exclusion ; mémoire traumatique ; identité juive ; shoah, survivance ; héritage du bourreau

La figure de l'exclu, au sens le plus profond, surgit chez Pascale Roze et Sylvie Germain dès la scène inaugurale de leurs romans. Itzik comme Magnus présentent des êtres qui viennent au monde au cœur d'une déchirure historique et affective, dans un espace où l'appartenance est compromise avant même de pouvoir se constituer. Leur origine n'est pas seulement incertaine : elle est marquée par la rupture. L'exclusion devient ainsi non pas un accident de parcours, ci une condition fondatrice, une matrice qui traversera toutes les strates de leur identité.

Dans Itzik, l'enfant homonyme naît dans un environnement où la pauvreté, la dispersion diasporique et les traumatismes non résolus fabriquent des existences fragiles, toujours prêtes à basculer dans le silence ou dans l'oubli. L'exclusion d'Itzik prend forme dès son inscription dans un « monde en miettes », où la précarité matérielle et symbolique interdit ce que Pierre Bourdieu nommerait un « héritage transmissible » (Bourdieu, 1964, p. 12) Rien n'est transmis, rien n'est garanti : l'enfant s'inscrit dans le manque, dans l'absence, dans la périphérie de ce qui, normalement, fonde une entrée stable dans le monde.

Le cas de Magnus est encore plus emblématique. L'enfant est immédiatement pris dans une histoire qui le dépasse, saturée de violence et de falsification. Son identité même est brouillée : né sous un nom, réécrit sous un autre, puis abandonné à un silence opaque, Magnus incarne la figure extrême de l'exclu : celui qui n'a pas de « lieu d'origine » fiable. Sylvie Germain construit autour de lui une poétique de la fragmentation, où chaque trace de filiation se révèle fragile ou mensongère. L'exclusion n'est pas ici une conséquence sociale ; elle est une donnée ontologique.

Les deux romans convergent donc vers une idée essentielle : l'exclu n'est pas celui qui est rejeté après ; il est celui qui n'a jamais pu s'inscrire pleinement dans une origine. Cette absence de socle constitue le moteur principal de la quête identitaire qui structure les deux fictions.

Pascale Roze et Sylvie Germain écrivent tous deux la naissance comme un événement liminaire blessé. Dans Itzik, l'enfant se découvre étranger à son propre monde, spectateur d'une communauté où le secret, la résignation et le non-dit façonnent les relations humaines. L'exclusion se présente donc d'abord sous la forme d'un « sentiment d'inadéquation » structurelle, ce que la critique littéraire a souvent associé à la figure du « marginal intérieur » (Martin, 2003, p. 45). Itzik n'est pas encore rejeté par les autres : il se sent lui-même en dehors.

Chez Magnus, cette inadéquation prend une forme plus violente. L'enfant ressent très tôt qu'il est entouré d'ombres, de mensonges, de silences étouffés. Sa famille adoptive tente de lui imposer un récit identitaire, mais celui-ci se fissure immédiatement. La violence historique — la Seconde Guerre mondiale, les crimes de guerre, les identités effacées — brouille sa généalogie intime. Magnus n'est pas seulement sans origine : il est porteur d'une origine redoutée, peut-être coupable, dont il cherche à s'émanciper.

Cette difficulté à habiter le monde se déploie chez les deux personnages en une forme de solitude structurelle : solitude affective, solitude linguistique, solitude devant le passé. La naissance, au lieu d'ouvrir vers la communauté, enferme l'enfant dans une conscience diffractée. L'exclusion devient la matrice même de la subjectivité.

L'exclu n'est pas seulement un être séparé du groupe ; il est un être dont le corps et la mémoire portent les traces d'une coupure première. Dans les deux romans, le corps constitue une archive traumatique, une surface où se déposent les fractures invisibles.

Dans Itzik, le corps fragile, souvent malade, traduit la violence silencieuse d'un monde où l'enfant se heurte à une forme diffuse d'indifférence. À l'ombre des figures adultes, opaques et parfois distantes, Itzik se développe dans un climat émotionnel pauvre, où le langage affectif est rarement exprimé. Son corps devient alors un médiateur de l'exclusion : un corps qui ne trouve pas sa place, un corps qui flanche, un corps qui dit ce que les mots ne savent formuler. Magnus, de son côté, porte littéralement la marque de cette exclusion : son ours en peluche, détruit puis réparé, devient le symbole matériel de son identité lacunaire. Le corps de l'enfant n'est pas seulement vulnérable : il est hanté par des mémoires interdites. La culpabilité historique — réelle ou imaginée — s'inscrit dans les gestes, les sens, les perceptions, dans ces moments où le corps se souvient avant la conscience.

La mémoire fissurée, omniprésente chez les deux auteurs, est l'une des formes les plus profondes de l'exclusion. Ne pas pouvoir se souvenir, ou au contraire se souvenir trop, se révèle un handicap intime. Itzik est submergé par des images fragmentaires, par un passé familial lourd de non-dits. Magnus, lui, est amputé de toute mémoire fiable. La mémoire devient ainsi la frontière qui sépare l'individu du reste du monde : ceux qui savent d'où ils viennent et ceux qui errent dans les zones blanches de l'identité. Un élément essentiel rapproche Itzik et Magnus : la manière dont les auteurs utilisent la narration pour matérialiser l'exclusion. Le récit devient un espace troué, discontinu, où l'identité est constamment en suspens.

Pascale Roze construit Itzik à partir d'éclats narratifs. Les scènes s'enchaînent sans continuité logique apparente : fragments de mémoire, bribes de dialogues, ellipses brutales. Cette fragmentation n'est pas un simple procédé stylistique ; elle traduit la perception interne d'Itzik, son incapacité à relier les événements en un tout cohérent. L'exclu est celui qui ne peut pas narrer sa propre histoire. Sylvie Germain, de son côté, structure Magnus sous forme de fragments, de « feuillets » où l'histoire avance par bonds, par ruptures. Le lecteur, à l'image du personnage, cherche à reconstituer les zones d'ombre. Chaque vide narratif devient un rappel de la blessure inaugurale : ce qui manque, ce qui est perdu, ce qui ne sera jamais récupéré. Comme l'affirme la critique germanienne, « l'identité de Magnus est un palimpseste lacunaire » (Calvet, 2011, p.78). Ce caractère « hors récit » renforce la dimension métaphysique de l'exclusion. L'exclu n'est pas seulement séparé des autres : il est séparé du langage, séparé du récit, séparé de la possibilité même de se dire. En ce sens, Itzik et Magnus rejoignent une tradition littéraire où les êtres blessés deviennent les révélateurs d'un monde incapable de faire sens.

L'exclusion sociale constitue chez Pascale Roze et Sylvie Germain un cadre concret, presque tangible, dans lequel leurs personnages évoluent. Le destin d'Itzik est inséparable d'un milieu où la précarité matérielle et la fragilité économique colorent chaque geste du quotidien.

Le roman installe son protagoniste dans une zone de marginalité diffuse : familles instables, ressources réduites, absence de protection institutionnelle. L'enfant se situe d'emblée dans un espace où les règles du monde majoritaire semblent inaccessibles. La pauvreté — bien que jamais exhibée de manière spectaculaire — devient une présence latente, un horizon constant qui façonne les interactions humaines et structure la perception du réel.

Chez Pascale Roze, cette pauvreté s'entrelace avec la question diasporique. L'identité d'Itzik est ancrée dans une communauté éclatée, porteuse de traditions mais également de blessures historiques profondes. Les personnages évoluent dans une topographie humaine marquée par ce que certains sociologues désignent comme une « marginalité culturelle » (Wieviorka, 2001, p. 63) : une position où l'hybridité identitaire coexiste avec une forme de vulnérabilité sociale. L'exclu n'est pas seulement celui qui manque de moyens ; il est celui dont les repères collectifs sont instables. Les migrations successives, l'exil, les traces d'oppression passée — tout cela crée un climat où le sentiment d'appartenance est fragile, constamment remis en question. Dans Magnus, l'exclusion sociale prend une forme différente mais tout aussi puissante. Magnus n'est pas plongé dans la pauvreté matérielle ; au contraire, sa famille adoptive dispose de ressources. Pourtant, il demeure exclu de la communauté humaine par un déficit fondamental d'intégration symbolique. Sa marginalité est d'abord intime, mais elle se prolonge dans les relations sociales. Son incapacité à s'inscrire dans une histoire familiale cohérente le rend étranger au monde des autres enfants. L'école, loin d'être un lieu d'intégration, devient un espace de confrontation où la différence se dévoile : différence de comportement, différence de langage, différence de présence au monde. Il n'appartient jamais entièrement au groupe. Les deux romans montrent ainsi que l'exclusion sociale n'est pas uniquement une question de classe ou de ressources économiques ; c'est aussi une question d'accès à la communauté humaine, de capacité à y occuper une place reconnue. Itzik comme Magnus sont enfermés dans une position paradoxale : ils voient le monde, ils perçoivent la communauté, mais ils ne peuvent en faire pleinement partie. Leur solitude est donc une solitude parmi les autres — la forme la plus douloureuse de marginalité. Le langage joue un rôle central dans les deux romans. Il n'est pas seulement un outil de communication, mais le lieu où se mesure le degré d'intégration ou d'exclusion du sujet. Chez Pascale Roze comme chez Sylvie Germain, le rapport au langage révèle l'état d'âme des personnages, leur difficulté à s'inscrire dans le monde, leur incapacité parfois radicale à se dire.

Dans Itzik, l'enfant développe un rapport silencieux au monde. Il observe plus qu'il ne parle, il intériorise plus qu'il n'exprime. Son mutisme partiel est une conséquence de l'insécurité affective qui l'entoure : il n'y a pas d'espace stable où la parole pourrait s'épanouir. La parole semble toujours en danger de se perdre, de ne pas être entendue, ou de se heurter au mur des traumatismes familiaux. Le silence d'Itzik devient ainsi un refuge — mais un refuge lourd, qui renforce l'exclusion au lieu de l'apaiser. Chez Magnus, la situation est encore plus marquée. Le mutisme apparaît à certains moments comme une forme de défense contre l'effraction du passé. L'enfant perçoit confusément que certaines paroles sont interdites, que certains mots portent une charge historique ou morale trop lourde. Le silence devient alors une manière de se protéger d'une histoire dont il ignore les contours exacts, mais dont il ressent les menaces.

La parole entravée est un autre motif qui traverse les deux romans. Itzik, parfois, hésite, réorganise ses phrases, trébuche. Magnus, quant à lui, ressent sa parole comme une matière instable. Le bégaiement n'est pas systématique, mais il symbolise une parole blessée. Ce sont des paroles qui ne coulent pas naturellement, des paroles qui semblent contenir en elles-mêmes les ruptures du passé. On pense ici aux théories de Françoise Dolto sur la parole empêchée chez l'enfant traumatisé (Dolto, 1977) : la parole ne se développe pas ou se développe en dent de scie lorsque l'environnement affectif ou symbolique est défaillant. Itzik comme Magnus incarnent cette problématique : le langage révèle l'histoire invisible qui les traverse. Au-delà du silence et du bégaiement, il existe dans les deux romans une véritable impossibilité de dire. Certains mots ne peuvent être prononcés, certaines vérités ne peuvent être formulées. Chez Itzik, les secrets familiaux imposent une chape de silence : on ne dit pas, on contourne, on évite. Chez Magnus, l'indicible est encore plus radical : c'est l'histoire elle-même qui est indicible. Les racines du personnage sont enfouies dans des crimes, des ombres, des violences extrêmes. Comment dire l'innommable ? Comment dire l'origine lorsque celle-ci est marquée par la culpabilité historique? L'exclu est celui qui n'a pas les mots pour se dire, ou dont les mots sont trop lourds pour être portés.

La dimension historique amplifie l'exclusion. Les deux romans se situent dans un contexte où la violence collective — guerres, exils, déplacements forcés — imprime une marque durable sur les personnages. L'histoire devient une force qui déracine, qui coupe, qui sépare. Dans Itzik, la mémoire collective diffuse de la diaspora façonne les existences. Les personnages vivent dans les retombées d'une histoire marquée par les persécutions, les déplacements, les pertes. L'enfant ressent confusément cette fragilité historique : il appartient à une lignée blessée, à une communauté souvent rejetée, tolérée sans être pleinement acceptée. L'exclusion sociale est toujours liée à l'Histoire — à une histoire de marginalization. Dans Magnus, cette dimension est poussée à son paroxysme. Le roman s'inscrit dans les conséquences directes de la Seconde Guerre mondiale. Les identités ont été détruites, les enfants déplacés, les familles dissoutes, les mémoires falsifiées. Magnus incarne cette déchirure. Son origine est une énigme, non par manque d'informations seulement, mais parce que l'histoire elle-même a voulu effacer ou déformer sa généalogie. Le roman montre comment la grande Histoire peut détruire la petite histoire individuelle, comment la violence politique s'immisce dans la chair même du sujet. Les deux romans convergent vers une idée essentielle : l'exclusion n'est jamais purement individuelle. Elle est la conséquence d'une violence collective, sociale, historique, qui dépasse le sujet mais l'habite jusque dans ses gestes les plus intimes.

Si l'exclusion constitue le point de départ existentiel d'Itzik et de Magnus, les deux romans se caractérisent également par un mouvement inverse : une lente, fragile, parfois douloureuse reconstruction de soi. Cette reconstruction ne se fait pas par un accès soudain à la vérité, mais par une accumulation de fragments, de traces et de récits partiels. Chez Pascale Roze, Itzik avance dans un monde où les informations sont hétérogènes, parfois contradictoires. Les souvenirs familiaux, les gestes des adultes, les silences épais deviennent autant de matériaux à interpréter. La reconstruction identitaire repose ici sur un travail quasi archéologique : il s'agit de déterrer, de trier, d'organiser des traces souvent illisibles. Le roman invite le lecteur à partager ce geste de reconstitution, comme si la lecture elle-même devenait un processus de guérison. Ce que la psychanalyse nomme les « éléments α » — fragments émotionnels bruts que l'esprit doit transformer pour les rendre pensables (Bion, 1962) — s'incarne dans la forme même du récit.

Sylvie Germain adopte une démarche similaire mais plus frontale : Magnus doit littéralement reconstruire son identité à partir de documents, d'archives, de lettres, d'indices matériels. Sa quête ressemble à celle d'un historien confronté à des traces mutilées. Chaque fragment apporte une part de vérité mais révèle aussi une profondeur plus grande du mystère. Cette reconstruction progressive fait apparaître un geste éthique essentiel : celui de reprendre possession de soi en affrontant la vérité, même lorsque celle-ci est lourde de violence ou de culpabilité. Les deux œuvres montrent que la reconstruction de soi ne consiste jamais à revenir à une origine pure, mais à accepter une identité stratifiée, composite, parfois incohérente. La rédemption passe par la reconnaissance de cette complexité, non par l'illusion d'une unité retrouvée. Un élément frappant rapproche Itzik et Magnus : la manière dont l'identité des personnages se transforme continuellement. Loin d'être figée, leur subjectivité se déploie dans une série de métamorphoses. Les deux romancières refusent la fixité identitaire — l'exclu, parce qu'il n'a jamais eu de place stable, possède une capacité singulière à se réinventer. Chez Itzik, la transformation se présente sous forme de maturation intérieure. L'enfant, au fil du roman, acquiert une sensibilité plus fine au monde. Il apprend à lire les nuances, les ombres, les contradictions. L'identité se construit comme un « devenir », un processus ouvert, jamais achevé. Pascale Roze semble rejoindre ici les perspectives deleuziennes : l'être marginal est aussi l'être qui se déplace, qui échappe, qui ne se laisse pas enfermer dans une définition unique. (Deleuze et Guattari, 1975)

Magnus, quant à lui, incarne littéralement la métamorphose. Son nom change, son histoire change, sa perception de lui-même se transforme au fil du récit. Chaque rencontre, chaque révélateur du passé produit une nouvelle version de lui-même. L'identité devient un palimpseste, une superposition de couches successives où les traces anciennes ne disparaissent jamais totalement. Ces transformations ne sont pas des fuites ; ce sont des reconstructions conscientes. Magnus apprend à se détacher de l'identité imposée, à refuser la culpabilité héritée, à se créer un espace intérieur où il peut exister hors du poids écrasant de l'Histoire. La métamorphose devient une condition de survie : un geste nécessaire pour échapper à l'anéantissement intime.

Dans les deux romans, la rédemption est liée à l'acceptation d'une identité plurielle. Pas d'unité retrouvée : un tissage patient. Pas d'origine retrouvée : une constellation de possibles. L'exclu, paradoxalement, accède à une forme de liberté intérieure que les autres personnages n'ont pas : liberté de créer, liberté d'imaginer, liberté d'échapper aux assignations sociales.

Ainsi, l'exclusion, loin d'être une simple blessure, devient un point d'ouverture. Les marges deviennent un lieu où surgissent des formes nouvelles d'existence. La dernière dimension essentielle de cette partie concerne la portée poétique et métaphysique des deux figures principales. Itzik et Magnus ne sont pas seulement des exclus sociaux, historiques ou linguistiques ; ils deviennent des figures symboliques qui ouvrent le récit à des réflexions plus vastes sur la condition humaine.

L'exclusion rapproche les personnages de la figure du « voyant » au sens rimbaldien (Rimbaud, 1975). Leur position marginale leur donne accès à des zones de perception que les autres n'atteignent pas. Parce qu'ils ne sont pas pris dans la normalité sociale, ils voient ce que les autres ignorent : les failles, les zones d'ombre, les silences, les vérités cachées. Chez Itzik, cette sensibilité se manifeste par une attention aiguë aux détails, aux émotions des autres, aux mouvements invisibles du monde. L'enfant exclu possède une capacité unique à ressentir la souffrance, mais aussi la beauté. Chez Sylvie Germain, la dimension métaphysique est encore plus accentuée. Le roman Magnus est traversé par une quête spirituelle, par une interrogation sur le bien, le mal, le pardon, la culpabilité. L'exclu devient un être à la frontière du visible et de l'invisible, un être en quête de sens. La recherche d'identité de Magnus prend la forme d'un itinéraire spirituel : traverser les ténèbres pour trouver une lumière, même fragile. Le roman n'est pas religieux au sens strict, mais il ouvre des perspectives mystiques, notamment dans la manière dont la mémoire et la souffrance sont transfigurées. Itzik et Magnus dépassent largement leur cadre narratif. Ils deviennent des figures universelles de l'humain blessé, de l'humain en quête, de l'humain qui survit malgré le manque, malgré les ruptures, malgré l'Histoire. Leur exclusion ouvre un espace poétique où le sens se cherche, se perd, se retrouve. Cette dimension donne à leurs histoires un caractère intemporel, presque mythique. Les deux romans montrent ainsi que l'exclu n'est pas seulement un témoin de la violence du monde, mais aussi une source de lumière fragile, une invitation à repenser la condition humaine depuis ses marges.

L'étude croisée des romans Itzik de Pascale Roze et Magnus de Sylvie Germain révèle une profondeur thématique commune : la figure de l'exclu y apparaît comme le noyau autour duquel se construit l'identité, la mémoire et la quête de sens. Les deux œuvres, bien que

distinctes par leur contexte narratif et leur esthétique, explorent une même tension fondamentale : comment vivre lorsque l'origine manque, lorsque la place dans le monde est instable, lorsque l'Histoire a fracturé le tissu même du soi ?

Les personnages d'Itzik et de Magnus partagent ce destin d'êtres « en marge » — non pas par choix, mais par blessure inaugurale. Leur exclusion n'est ni temporaire ni accidentelle : elle constitue la condition initiale qui façonne leur rapport au monde. Chez Roze, cette exclusion s'inscrit dans une réalité sociale et diasporique marquée par la précarité affective et matérielle. Chez Germain, elle s'enracine dans une histoire tragique faite de mensonges, de crimes et d'identité usurpée. Dans les deux cas, le personnage évolue dans un espace de fracture, où la continuité du récit familial est brisée.

La deuxième dimension essentielle mise en lumière par cette analyse concerne le langage. L'exclu est celui qui n'arrive pas à dire — parce qu'il est enfermé dans le mutisme, dans la honte, dans le secret imposé, dans l'indicible historique. Itzik et Magnus montrent que la parole est à la fois une possibilité de guérison et un champ de lutte : c'est par la reconstruction linguistique que les personnages tentent de sortir de la marge. Le langage devient l'espace où se joue la reconquête du soi.

La troisième dimension, enfin, ouvre le champ métaphysique. Les deux romans transforment la figure de l'exclu en une figure symbolique, presque mythique. L'exclusion n'est plus seulement un état social, mais un état existentiel. Elle révèle une vérité plus vaste sur la condition humaine : nous sommes tous, à des degrés divers, façonnés par des manques, des ruptures, des zones d'ombre. L'exclu devient alors celui qui, depuis sa brèche, voit ce que les autres ne voient pas ; celui qui, par sa fragilité, accède à une lucidité particulière. Cette lucidité ouvre la voie à une forme de rédemption — non pas une libération totale, mais une capacité nouvelle à se tenir debout, à affirmer une identité plurielle, à reconstruire du sens là où tout semblait perdu.

Ainsi, Itzik et Magnus proposent une vision profondément humaniste de l'exclusion. Ils montrent que la marge n'est pas uniquement un lieu de souffrance, mais aussi un espace d'invention, de sensibilité, d'ouverture. L'identité blessée peut devenir identité créatrice. La mémoire fissurée peut devenir mémoire transformée. L'exclu, loin d'être une figure négative, devient une figure centrale pour penser l'humain : un être en quête, un être de passage, un être dont la fragilité révèle la part la plus authentique de l'existence.

En ce sens, Pascale Roze et Sylvie Germain offrent deux œuvres majeures sur la capacité de l'être humain à survivre au chaos, à traverser l'Histoire, à recomposer son visage malgré la fracture originelle. L'exclusion, loin d'anéantir, peut devenir le point de départ d'une réinvention profonde — intime, poétique, spirituelle.

AMNESIA AND INNER JOURNEY IN BRIEFING FOR A DESCENT INTO HELL

Alina-Dana Vișan
Lecturer, PhD, "Babeș-Bolyai" University of Cluj-Napoca, University Center Reşita

Abstract: This study focuses on one of Doris Lessing's inner space novels, Briefing for a Descent into Hell*, a novel which has for the first and the last time in her fiction, a male character, Charles Watkins, a professor of classics at Cambridge. The protagonist of this novel is self-divided because the stresses of middle age and personal problems have propelled him into a mental breakdown accompanied by a temporary loss of identity medically described as amnesia. Doris Lessing depicts multiple consciousness or realities: the external reality being juxtaposed with the inner or dream world. The gap between the inner and outer state of mind is craftily highlighted in this novel. In Briefing for a Descent into Hell alternating sections correspond to both ways of perceiving the psychic crisis of the central character: from within and without his own consciousness.*

Keywords: inner; self; journey; dream; psychic.

Introduction

Doris Lessing has written three inner space novels: The Summer Before the Dark, The Memoirs of a Survivor and Briefing for a Descent into Hell. The inner space novels reveal clearly Lessing's intention to explore, not external reality, but the world within. In the preface of Briefing for a Descent into Hell, the writer states that she was writing a work of "inner space fiction" because "there is never anywhere to go but in".

The inner-space novels share a sick society whose individuals need to discover meanings in their lives. In The Summer Before the Dark, catastrophe can be averted by reducing the pressure created by gender roles, and thereby creating true equality. The Memoirs of a Survivor and Briefing for a Descent into Hell feature characters who function in multiple levels of consciousness. This consciousness allows them to adapt to the ever-changing universe. These characters must discover their own truth in order to recover health and wholeness. (Friedow, 2002: 118)

In Briefing for a Descent into Hell, Lessing pays great attention to the co-existence of multiple consciousness or realities which she craftily designed to ridicule the absurdity of what society regards as real. She explores the nature of the self and consciousness; she also presents an insight into the gulf between the "inner" and the "outer" state of mind with great emphasis on myth and archetypal pattern of experience.

In this novel, the author suggests a possible "brave new world" in a madman's "inner space." By juxtaposing Charles Watkins's "real" world and his "dream" world, the author criticizes such cultural institutions as hospitals and universities, the society in which the insane lives, the depravity, the insanity and the violence of the time which makes it almost impossible for one to reason appropriately. The multiple realities in the novel are not just designed for narrative purposes, but to ridicule the absurdity of what the society terms "reality". (Akujobi, 2008: 19)

The crystal in the novel serves as a link of two worlds - the inner and the outer worlds. It is a symbol of man's inner thought. Charles' description of life in the solar provides an imaginary escape for the individual from the constraint of reality.

In Briefing for a Descent into Hell, Lessing invokes the image of the circle and square which she represents through the Mandala square, this place is in ruin and it is the place chosen for Watkins's spiritual journey which may be commenting on the author's belief that there is a connection between science and spirituality particularly in the domain of literature. C. G. Gung explains this symbol: “the use of a magic circle or mandala, as it is called in the East, for healing purposes is an archetypal idea. When a man is ill the Pueblo Indians of New Mexico make a sand-painting of a mandala with four gates. (Jung, 1995: 138)

Through consciousness, Lessing exposes the inner walkings of the human mind and in this case, one can say that consciousness is the nucleus of this journey in the novel. Lessing in this stead shares her major theme - the fragmentation of civilization and consciousness- with a great many modern writers such as William Faulkner, James Joyce, Virginia Woolf, and William Golding. Possessing what is still too often rare for women writers. (Akujobi, 2008:19)

Lessing suggests that man must embark on voyages of self-discovery which leave him changed. The difficulties of the voyage, and also the difficulties met by one who is successful, are suggested in the "briefing" to which the title of her book refers. (Marchino, 1972: 260)

For the first - and only - time, the protagonist of the novel is male. Structurally, the novel is remarkable by its inversion of chronology and multiple perspectives that reinforce the subjectivity of point of view. Briefing for a Descent into Hell depends on a basic pattern of theme and variations: the "theme" is Charles Watkins's deeper psychic urge to heal the schism of his present condition of self-division; the variations include his nostalgia for union and his recognition of separation, envisioned by Lessing through a series of metaphoric or symbolic journeys.

From the beginning of this work, Lessing alerts the reader to the dual schema, as well as to the underlying Sufi inflection of its meaning, by providing a context for the novel on the frontispiece: "Category: Inner-Space Fiction - For there is never anywhere to go but in." Two epigraphs - one from the fourteenth-century Sufi Mahmoud Shabistari’s poem The Secret Garden and the other from Rachel Carson's The Edge of the Sea - describe the macrocosm encapsulated within a raindrop or a sand grain suspended in water. By analogy, the unnamed seafarer of the first pages of Briefing for a Descent into Hell is Everyman, rediscovering through the exploration of the microcosm of his own consciousness the experience of the human race.

The protagonist of this novel is self-divided. As one subsequently learns the stresses of middle age and personal problems have propelled Charles Watkins, a professor of classics at Cambridge, into a mental breakdown accompanied by a temporary loss of identity medically described as amnesia.

In Briefing for a Descent into Hell alternating sections correspond to both ways of perceiving the psychic crisis of the central character: from within and without his own consciousness. The first long portion is narrated primarily from the more immediate and subjective focus of the perceiving consciousness, while the remaining portions are composed of letters, dialogues, and more public communications from members of Watkins's milieu and "reminiscences" provided by Watkins himself. In the first section, the doctors' evaluations are juxtaposed with the directly recorded subjective experiences of the protagonist.

When the protagonist is most awake and aware within his own mental experience, he is most deeply asleep from the point of view of the medical observers. His being is split into two modes: while his body participates in one, his mind participates in the other; they are complementary and mutually exclusive. "Inner" and "outer" spaces become metaphors in the novel of the disjunction between the mental and physical spaces that a person simultaneously occupies.

Watkins is Lessing's most identifiably "schizophrenic" character. In fact, a number of parallels can be drawn between the experiences of her protagonist and the existential phenomenology of schizophrenia proposed by R. D. Laing, not the least of which is a ten-day psychotic journey described by one of Laing's ex-patients, coincidentally named Jesse Watkins.

One of Laing's central (and controversial) hypotheses is that the psychotic breakdown manifested in acute schizophrenia is a natural process of mind-healing which, if allowed to run its full course, will be therapeutic rather than destructive. (Rubenstein, 1986: 154)

The Sufis describe man's evolutionary course from the simplest form of matter through vegetable, animal, human, and superhuman states of consciousness, to the achievement of the "total perception of the external phenomenal world." Further, phenomenologists of consciousness document similar motifs in the classical experiences described throughout the centuries in mystical and occult literature, and in the more recent psychedelic (or psycholytic) drug-induced experiences. (op. cit, p. 154)

The collective unconscious manifests itself in similar archetypal images and symbols. Regardless of the catalyst, the unconscious generates patterns which, under certain circumstances, become accessible to the other layers of the psyche. That identity is central to the major motifs of Briefing for a Descent into Hell, the first movement of which may be read as the narrative of a spiritual, archetypal, psychotic, or even drug-induced inner journey. The novel's symbolic meaning is represented by what is reached at the end of this journey and whether the change in consciousness has effects on the personality of the protagonist.

The first long portion of the novel has several levels of meaning. The protagonist initially finds himself "at sea". The protagonist's wanderings express other primary images, including heat, light, and circles. His "anti-clock Wise" direction and his need to experience a birth in reverse suggest the circularity of his journey backward both in time and in the development of his own consciousness as he tries to locate the centre of his being. He is the archetypal seafarer, alternately Jason, Jonah, Odysseus, Sinbad, adrift in a ship that is inhabited temporarily by a strange unearthly light (called the Crystal) that incorporates his shipmates but leaves him behind. One learns later in the novel that during Watkins's war experience he was twice the only survivor in a group of buddies; in this section he is twice left behind by the Crystal.

While the inner space journey traces the narrator's subsequent efforts to reach the Crystal again, it revises the history of life on earth. The protagonist is identified with the first living organisms emerging from the slime as they become land creatures; the psychological and spiritual parallel is the emergence of human consciousness and its growth toward enlightenment and wholeness.

Within his existential reality Lessing's protagonist accomplishes the evolutionary step from sea to land with the aid of a dolphin. Once on land, he establishes an intuitive communication with two gentle cat-like creatures who guide him over an apparent impasse in his upward climb. He arrives at what is at first an uninhabited archaic city. Later the houses are noticeably "turned inwards, to the centre," and the city itself seems to acknowledge the protagonist's presence as if also possessed of consciousness.

At first the archaic Eden-like atmosphere of the surroundings is emphasized, "as if this was a country where hostility or dislike had not yet been born." The protagonist experiences a sense of harmony and unity analogous both to the state of undifferentiated wholeness in the generic individual's personal development, and to the hypothetical primitive pre-ego consciousness in the history of civilization. However, that state is soon interrupted by the appearance of the ubiquitous "enemy" that Lessing has shown consistently as a configuration of the dark side of the mind. (op. cit, p. 157)

The protagonist feels himself under a lunar influence, a reference to the "lunacy" that his rambling monologues represent to the medical staff. On the outskirts of the city he witnesses a ritualistic bloodletting involving several male children and three females whose identities are familiar to him. He realizes that their rite destroys forever some fundamental innocence in nature by their introduction of carnality into the pure world. Just as his imagination had "invented" the city itself, "now I understood my fall away from what I had been when I landed, only three weeks before, into a land which had never known killing. I knew that I had arrived purged and salt-scoured and guiltless, but that between then and now I had drawn evil into my surroundings, into me." (Briefing for a Descent into Hell, p. 94). The shadow further manifests itself in two species of ugly, predatory animals – the negative counterparts of the kind beasts that had earlier guided him. From the first appearance of these rat-like dogs and monkeys, the protagonist watches their open warfare and admits his own complicity in their violence.

During the time he spends on land, the voyager sees as his task the preparation of a landing pad in the centre of the city, in anticipation of the return of the Crystal. Significantly, both the Crystal and the landing area are images of wholeness; in archetypal symbolism crystals and the abstract circle/square configuration often represent "the union of extreme opposites - of matter and spirit." After delays and failures in his effort to prepare himself for this crucial segment of his journey, he finally senses the presence of the Crystal. But, again, he is not ready for it: "Whatever it was that I could not quite see, but was there, belonged to a level of existence that my eyes were not evolved enough to see.... Beating out from that central point came waves of a finer substance, from a finer level of existence, which assaulted me, because I was not tuned in to them."(Briefing for a Descent into Hell, p. 106-107). The equation of extrasensory perception with the evolving organs of consciousness described by Sufi mystics underlies the formulations of Watkins's experience. The metaphoric language parallels the Sufi chemist Fariduddin Attar's description of inner transformation: "Every fibre has been purified, raised to a higher state, vibrates to a higher tune, gives out a more direct, more penetrating note." At the same time Watkins's inadequacy makes explicit the difficulty of achieving that elevated level of being. (op. cit, p. 158)

Thus far the protagonist's journey has been on water or land. Now he moves in air, with the help of a great white bird. Finally, the Crystal arrives at the centre of the circle-in-the square to receive him. His own body becomes "a shape in light" and the city changes correspondingly, "as if the city of stone and clay had dissolved, leaving a ghostly city, made in light." As the boundaries between self and world, inner and outer space, disappear, the light is simultaneously "inner or outer as one chose to view it." The protagonist's inner being becomes harmonious with the macrocosm; he understands that the mind of humanity is also a unified consciousness, of which he is an integral part. Even the war and blood-lust he has witnessed have been essential to his eventual transmutation, providing the "page in my passport for this stage of the journey ... a door, a key, and an opening."

Formally, the movement toward a higher plane of mystical awareness suggests the ascent motif of romance and myth, in which "escape, remembrance, or discovery of one's real identity, growing freedom, and the breaking of enchantment" shape the narrative; the growth of identity through "the casting off of whatever conceals or frustrates it" typifies the positive metamorphosis of the protagonist. Thus Lessing renders the fundamentally ineffable and self-transcending experience of spiritual illumination. The Sufi teachings have it that "when apparent opposites are reconciled, the individuality is not only complete, it also transcends the bounds of ordinary humanity as we understand them. The individual becomes, as near as we can state it, immensely powerful." (op. cit, p. 159)

The description of this process of exploration which takes place in the consciousness of the inner space voyager is periodically interrupted by the medical staff's observations on their patient's mental condition, and their disagreements about appropriate treatment. Doctor X recommends extensive use of drugs and eventually shock treatment, while Doctor Y is more restrained, arguing for a gradual approach with minimal intervention. Watkins perceives the doctors' different sensitivities: while he can scarcely "see" Doctor X, Doctor Y is more "visible," burning with a "small steady light." However, both doctors are primarily concerned to restore their patient to the same orthodox model of "normality." Monitoring his responses to the drugs, they interpret his mental condition through its physical manifestations, concentrating on such behavioural evidence as alertness, coherence, drowsiness, and other physiological signs. The reader, caught between the image of the protagonist as Everyman journeying through the collective unconscious, and Charles Watkins as amnesiac patient, observes the same experiences as described from internal and external perspectives. From the medical point of view, the spiritual experience is a religious delusion.

From deep in inner/outer space the protagonist of this novel has a similar overview of all the earth, with its petty wars, political schisms, social insanities, divisions. Yet the index of his psychic wholeness is his perception of the fundamental unity of all things. The real madness of humanity, he understands, is the failure to remember that unity at the base of all life, instead pursuing the courses of separation and division.

The same identification of microcosm with macrocosm, of inner with outer space, extends still further, as the enlightened protagonist finds himself at a cosmic reference presided over by an illuminated deity (the Sun). There he learns that the troubled planet Earth is in a state of First-Class Emergency. The cosmic spirits - including Merk Ury, Minna Erva, and other refractions of Watkins's intellectual familiarity with the Greek classics - are being "briefed" to carry the easily forgotten message of Harmony to its inhabitants once again before it self-destructs. If the macrocosm and the microcosm are understood as congruent, then the anticipated cataclysm on earth that Watkins observes corresponds to the psychic crisis in his own personality; he discovers the chaos in the outer world that is a projection of his inner state. Furthermore, for the cosmic beings who seek to revitalize the message of harmony and, analogously, for the vision of wholeness in the unconscious that seeks entry into consciousness, the obstacles are great. Even with the "brain-printed" message, the emissaries face a considerable risk of amnesia during their descent into Hell (earth); Watkins's descent into his own inner hell is manifested as amnesia to the medical observers. Symbolically, though each human being is born ("brain-printed") with the experience of harmony and wholeness, subsequent experience erodes that primary knowledge and substitutes division. As he grows older, he is more and more like a victim of amnesia, increasingly self-estranged and forgetful of the knowledge of original unity as the deepest reality of his being. Idries Shah notes in the latter case that in the Sufi dervish tradition, "remembering" is an important aspect of psychic development, beginning with "'remembering oneself,' after which the function shifts to one of harmony with the greater consciousness." (op. cit, p. 161)

In Briefing for a Descent into Hell, Lessing highlights the metaphysical characteristic of her fictional protagonists. As Watkins formulates it, "Each individual of this species is locked up inside his own skull," unable to "see things except as facets and one at a time." The Watkins of the second part of the novel and the mind-voyaging protagonist of the first part do not constitute a conscious integrated whole personality. His amnesia is a breakdown or disintegration of his roles as husband, father, professor. Forgetting for a time who he "is" for others, he journeys within his own unconscious self in an effort to rescue some deeper knowledge that his ego personality has forgotten. Thus, the hallucinations, fantasies, and visions of his inner space journey are unconscious. His larger task is to bring the truths discovered in the collective memory to personal awareness, to weld the split between the generic Everyman of the inner space journey and the individual self of waking life.

In the subsequent parts of the novel the emphasis shifts from cosmic to biological and social time and their corresponding metaphorical formulations. Following the rebirth and his cosmic briefing on Harmony, the protagonist "returns to the beginning" again, this time reliving the primary biological separation of his own physical birth experience:

"Sucked into sound, sucked into sea, a swinging sea, boom, shhhh, boooom, shhhh, boooom... thud thud, thud thud ... one two, and the three is me, the three is me, THE THREE IS ME. I in dark, I in pulsing dark, crouched, I holding on, clutching tight, boooom, shhhh, boooom, shhh, rocked, rocking, somewhere behind the gate, somewhere in front the door, and a dark red clotting light and pressure and pain and then OUT into a flat white light where shapes move and things flash and glitter." (Briefing for a Descent into Hell, p. 201)

His first "personal" memory following birth is his initiation into the drugging of his awareness and the equation of sleeping with being a "good" baby. Both literally and metaphorically, sleep is the norm and spiritual awakeness is the abnormal state.

That the inner journey is itself both a reflection of and an effort to heal the division is the central assumption of the novel. As R. D. Laing has remarked, the "cracked mind of the schizophrenic may let in light which does not enter the intact minds of many sane people whose minds are closed." (op. cit, p. 163) The narrator of Briefing for a Descent into Hell describes the mental hospitals that house the "millions who have cracked, making cracks where the light could shine through at last."

Like Laing, whose ideology Lessing shares more explicitly in this novel than in any of her other works, the author emphasizes that "mental illness" - manifested as unconventional behaviour or abnormal consciousness - is a cultural label that permits the potential for vision or even self-healing to be drugged by the very institutions that ostensibly promote recovery.

If the first major section of Briefing for a Descent into Hell shows the "light shining through" the cracked mind of the protagonist, the remainder of the novel provides a partial explanation for the crack.

The narrative organization expresses two kinds of knowledge: the "information" of the external world of social interaction, and its imaginative transformations at the unconscious levels of the protagonist's psyche.

Once Watkins's social identity is established, by means of a photograph found in his recovered wallet, the doctors attempt to reconstruct his former identity for him. Watkins, however, categorically rejects the role and name assigned to him by his former intimates, having found his true centre in the modality of psychic space he has recently discovered. Concurrently, the testimonies from his wife, mistress, colleagues, and acquaintances to the doctors contribute a picture of the social persona that Watkins has given up, and one that contrasts sharply with the illuminated Everyman of the first part of the novel. The commentaries of his familiars emphasize the ways in which Watkins - to their perceptions - was always somehow different, abnormal. Impervious to basic social conventions and feelings, he was "the original eccentric oddball" who did not even "pay lip service to ordinary feelings," according to his colleague Jeremy Thorne. His disillusioned former mistress, Constance Mayne, found him "above every human emotion." His wife, Felicity, who might be expected to know him best, seems to know him least, though she does volunteer the fact that he "always sleeps much less than most people." Conversely, Rosemary Baines, a bare acquaintance from one of his lecture audiences, had been so struck by his ideas and his presence that she had written an extraordinary letter, which forms a major section of the narrative, to share with him her ideas on education and other matters.

Though he had initially dismissed Rosemary Baines's remarkable effort at communication, one learns subsequently that Watkins had met her and her archaeologist friend, Frederick Larson, the night before the beginning of his amnesia. Many of the ideas detailed in her letter reappear in altered form as images and events in the inner space journey that he subsequently undergoes. Rosemary discusses the problem of education - the process of indoctrinating children into social norms and thus anaesthetizing their inborn capacity for perceiving wholeness. She describes the psychic wavelength that Watkins's lecture on the topic had struck within her: the feeling of "beings briefly, on a different, high, vibrating current, of the familiar are becoming transparent." Her reflections clearly parallel the experience Watkins himself lives out at the climax of his inner journey, which in turn suggests the elevated awareness of the Sufi mystic.

Moreover, Rosemary Baines retells her friend Frederick Larson's archaeological speculations on the forms of life of earlier civilizations. Observations on the roofing materials of archaic houses resonate with Watkins's discovery of the idyllic city with roofless houses; Rosemary's long discussion of Larson's mid-life crises, set up by the questioning of basic assumptions about one's profession and identity, resonates with Watkins's own breakdown. Like Larson, Watkins has suffered from a stammer that is the symptom of his inner turmoil; like Larson, Watkins is also a student of ancient civilizations, but his intellectual mastery of the heritage of Western thought has failed to develop in him any insight into the larger relationship between the collective past and his personal history. His mind journey of the first part of the novel thus acquires further meaning as a reflection of aspects of the self he has not assimilated into his conscious personality. Ironically, his psychic travels make existentially real his identification with classical mythic figures and motifs from his intellectual discipline.

Though that journey is interrupted by the doctors' efforts to restore him to his pre-amnesiac identity, it is resumed in another form in response to the more sensitive Doctor Y's suggestion that Watkins recall his wartime experiences. The reader discovers that this experience is a pure fantasy, neither "realistic" nor "true." His war buddy Miles Bovey, whose death is described in the account, later confirms not only that he is still alive but that Watkins had never seen action in Yugoslavia, the location of his "recollection." Instead, these events are closer to Bovey's own war experience.

Watkins describes a number of events: a briefing (this time a military one) followed by a descent (a parachute drop into Yugoslavia), and the experience of belonging to a larger collective whole (participation in the partisan Resistance).

In the final part of Briefing for a Descent into Hell, Watkins is balanced between the two extremes of his being: the vivid experience of wholeness in its several formulations, and the advice of his contemporaries to resume his former social identity. He is convinced that he must "remember" something that is crucial to his psychic survival, but what he must remember - the reality of unity - is antithetical to what the doctors urge him to remember - the split identity he has vacated. For a time he preserves his suspension between the two, sharing his intermediate state with a young patient named Violet Stoke: "They say I lost my memory because I feel guilty.... I think I feel guilty because I lost my memory."(Briefing for a Descent into Hell, p. 362). Violet's status as a girl who does not want to grow up emphasizes the ambiguity of Watkins's condition.

In this context, one theory of schizophrenia suggests that the condition is the individual's response to "paradox intolerance," particularly as embodied in the antithetical emotions of love and aggression. Because of the pressure of those conflicting experiences, he seeks a "personal paradise": "a hypothetical life situation where each person can creatively express himself openly, directly, and honestly, and come to fulfilment without double-binds, games, hidden agendas, and complexes.... The person who ends up with the appellation 'schizophrenic' is in some way more imbued with the need to find that paradise for himself, that is, he not only needs to, but has to. Such an archetype is more central to his being." (op. cit, p. 167)

Mircea Eliade describes the ambivalence inherent in the desire for paradise within the sacred context, noting that "on the one side, man is haunted by the desire to escape from his particular situation and regain a transpersonal mode of life; on the other, he is paralyzed by the fear of losing his 'identity' and 'forgetting' himself." Man must leave Eden in order to grow - but he may spend the rest of his life trying to return to it. The nostalgia for wholeness is his oldest memory, for unity is located, symbolically, at both the beginning and the end of consciousness. (op. cit, p. 167)

Watkins submits to shock treatment in the hope that it may help him to remember the truth that hesitates like a shadow on the edge of his awareness. His final insight before the shock treatment is his explanation to Violet of the phenomenon of timing at work in the level of human evolution and change:

"It's desperately urgent that I should remember, I do know that. It's all timing, you see... There are lots of things in our ordinary life that are ... shadows. Like coincidences, or dreaming, the kinds of things that are an angle to ordinary life... The important thing is this - to remember that some things reach out to us from that level of living, to here ... all these things, they have a meaning, they are reflections from that other part of ourselves, and that part of ourselves knows things we don't know.... What I have to remember has to do with time running out." (Briefing for a Descent into Hell, p. 378-379)

Despite Watkins's various illuminations, the ultimate prognosis is negative. The shock treatment works with rather than against the split in his personality, and the amnesia of his earlier life merely reverses itself and becomes amnesia of his inner journey. Watkins leaves the hospital, fully recovered but in fact as split as before. His wife and friends confirm the Watkins they had known before his breakdown. The tragedy of his medical "cure" is that he has recovered his former identity only to lose, once again, the meaning of his journey.

Conclusions

Conclusively, in this novel Lessing suggests that the fault lies not with his choices but with the establishment itself, for its endorsement of that very state of separateness and inner division as the norm. R. D. Laing has enjoined, "Can we not see that this voyage [into the self] is not what we need to be cured of but that it is itself a natural way of healing our own appalling state of alienation called normality?" (op. cit, p. 169)

Lessing more pessimistically implies that in society as it is presently constituted, abnormal consciousness is a mixed blessing, for the self cannot exist without reference to a world. If Watkins reflects the schizophrenia of contemporary life, the cure is no better than the disease. Ultimately failing to overcome his self-division, he hovers in the perilous straits between inner illumination and the external manifestations often identified as psychosis, with no certainty as to which is "real," since the definition of reality is established by consensus. By the latter standard, the effort to relinquish the personal ego in order to embrace transcendence is a pathological one. What distinguishes between the schizophrenic and the mystic or enlightened individual, as Lessing has already suggested, is partly the capacity of unique personality to harmonize its own dissonant elements and partly the judgment of the orthodox establishment that labels it. (op. cit, p. 169)

GRAHAM SWIFT'S POEMS IN THE MAKING OF AN ELEPHANT: WRITING FROM WITHIN. HOW THEY COULD BE VIEWED AS A CONTINUATION OF IDEAS

Irina-Ana Drobot
Lecturer, PhD, Technical University of Civil Engineering Bucharest

Abstract: The purpose of the paper is to analyse the poems written by Graham Swift and which can be found in the autobiographical volume The Making of an Elephant: Writing from Within, based on the perspective that they form one coherent whole, since at first they show a continuation of the same train of thoughts of the poetic persona. Further on, we can consider that the poem should be read in the same order in which they have been presented to readers in this volume, since they form an instance of free associations of the author and of the poetic persona. The poems can be read as a version of interior monologue which is familiar to readers from the novels written by Graham Swift. The main methodological framework is provided by reader-response criticism, as Swift's work ask for a reader who is actively involved and who actively participates in the understanding of meaning and who resonates emotionally with the texts. The novelty of this research paper is that it brings in the hypothesis that Swift's poems could be read as a whole, as much as free associations can ensure its coherence. The coherence can be ensured by the active participation of readers to some extent, as they look for connections and for the way in which various elements can seem to connect to others in the poems that follow next. This perspective is a proof of the way in which Swift's work can create a frame of mind through which readers can understand further works written by him, since he creates a familiar fictional universe. Reflections are part of it.

Keywords: Free associations; psychoanalysis; daydreaming; identity; loss.

Introduction: The Fictional Universe of Graham Swift

Graham Swift is a contemporary British author, born in 1949 (United Agents, 2025). His work includes novels, short stories, as well as an autobiographical volume, where we can find memories from his childhood and youth, essays, everyday life moments such as when Kazuo Ishiguro gives advice on how to choose a guitar, interviews with other authors, and poems.

What is specific to his novels is the structure which lies at their basis: the narrators are dealing, at the present time of the narration, with psychological dilemmas and various inner conflicts. They have been called traumatized narrator (Marginean, 2014). They are facing difficult moments in their lives, which prompts them to go back to past events and explore various moments in their lives, together with the relationships which may be part of their current problematic situation. Gradually, the story is revealed to the reader, through flashbacks, and moving from present to past and back. The characters explore their inner world, and on this occasion, readers can find out their story. The narrators often have no one else to confess to but the reader. The process of self-analysis is what ties up the entire structure of the novel. The interior world of the characters is also present in his short stories. We can see throughout his works how the characters are confronted with universal psychological issues, such as grief due to the loss of someone they love (due to death in Ever After and Mothering Sunday, and to infidelity in Here We Are, or to the loss of happiness together in Waterland, where Mary is suffering at present for not being able to have a child, as a consequence of an abortion during her teenage years in the Fens, which has as a consequence her husband Tom's own unhappiness), which leads to the redefining of their own sense of self, making up peace with the past and with what we cannot know for sure (Shuttlecock, where the narrator decided to leave up the public image as a war hero of his father, whose war memoir he is studying), the impact of an incident or detail which otherwise may seem commonplace to readers (Paula's story in Tomorrow about how her twins were born by artificial insemination, which to them may not seem that shocking, as readers have suggested in their online reviews), and others. We can also witness the unhappiness of William Chapman as he waits to see his wife Irene becoming affectionate towards him, as well as the difficulties of the relations between parents and children (e.g. Shuttlecock, Out of This World, Last Orders). While Swift's characters have been described as common men (O'Mahony, 2003), we realize that they are facing some exceptional circumstances at times, e.g. detective George Webb finds out about a gesture which leads to tragedy in a couple faced with infidelity: the wife decides that, even if her husband has returned to her, their relationship would never be the same, so she stabs him, and in turn George Webb wishes to wait for Sarah to come out of prison so that they could start a relationship. Another character in exceptional circumstances is Ronnie the magician, who is so passionate about his profession as a magician that he manages to bring magic into the everyday life of his romantic relationship with his assistant in his magic acts. At the same time, once she decided to marry someone else, he literally disappears, not just from his last magic act on stage, but from the lives of all people that had known him.

Swift uses in the majority of his works the setting of traditional Great Britain, Traditional Great Britain is the Great Britain before World War II, when the population was homogeneous, meaning white and ethnically British. After the Second World War, Great Britain went through migration was from the former colonies (from India, Asia, Africa), which led to a strong transformation in British Society, as it became multicultural. The post World-War II Great Britain is present in Swift's short stories volume England and Other Stories, originally published in 2014.

The poems written by Swift and published in the non-fiction volume Making an Elephant: Writing from Within are also concerned with reflection and with the inner world of the poetic persona. They are strongly related to the rest of Swift's work in the sense that he writes them down while he has finished a novel and has not yet started another one, which can lead to using them or some images or ideas in them in the next novel:

In the misty and often lengthy periods which I later come to realize are the preludes to my starting a new book, I've noticed that my reading can shift from novels, or anything large, to poetry, as if I'm aware that whatever I do next will arise not from any grand design but from some small, insistent vibration; a blink of light through the fog. (Swift, 2018)

This can explain why readers may feel some connections with some character's thoughts or happenings he or she goes through in one novel or another by Graham Swift. In addition, common elements such as the relationship between children and parents, or the sea, can make us readers start sequences of free associations (Freud, 2016) which can lead us to reflect on the connection between Swift's poems and novels or short stories. Free associations can be identified by readers especially in the short stories in the volume Twelve Post-War Tales (which was recently published, in 2025), where one element such as the passport in the short story titled Passport, or chocolate in the short story titled Chocolate can hold the story together and allow the narrator to move on from one idea and image to another, starting from and leading to the nucleus which is either chocolate or the passport. Knowledgeable readers can identify the references to and structure of the free associations (Freud, 2016) technique used in psychoanalysis, which can lead us to a range of thoughts and images we can put together and move on from one idea, incident or image to another, apparently unrelated, yet which are all part of the same web of thoughts. Free associations can be used both in the psychoanalytic setting, where the patient interacts with the analyst, and in the process of self-analysis, where the person using them writes down his or her thoughts in a diary and then identifies repeating patterns of thoughts, repeating ideas and images.

Swift's works ask for an active reader, which is why reader-response criticism (Mart, 2019) can be considered as the most suitable main methodological frame for analysis. According to Mart (2019), readers can react emotionally to any text, resonating with the characters' feelings and various incidents they go through, accompanied by the way in which they reflect on them. In addition, readers also use their background knowledge in order to better understand a text (Mart, 2019). Background knowledge can be composed of cultural knowledge – and here we have in view psychoanalysis, once we speak about free associations - , and personal life experience – and here we can have in view similar situations where a certain context has made us judge another person or react in a certain way, which we identify as similar with the way in which the characters react.

Free associations can also be identified in the poems written by Swift by a reader familiar with his works and by a reader who is also very active.

The Poems

If we look carefully at the way one poem ends and the way the other poem continues, we can see a continuation of ideas. We can, thus, start speculating that Swift may have intended each poem to continue along the sequence of ideas expressed in the previous one, similarly to the way in which the process of free associations occurs. Based on this point of view, we can consider that Swift has intended the poems to be read in the precise order in which they have been published in the volume Making an Elephant: Writing from Within, since they show how the train of thought belonging to the poetic persona continues with each poem that follows. As a result, we can claim that the Swift uses the poems as a means to express a process of free associations. The poetry form offers him a wider sense of freedom than prose. At the same time, the boundaries between poetry and prose are frequently crosses, as some poems can be very reflective, while others include stories which can be further on expanded with the reflections of readers about them. Some poems can be highly visual, while others can include more abstract thinking.

The first poem, titled This Small Place, sounds reflective and philosophical. The poetic persona reflects about how the world may be big, yet it is getting smaller. We have a small place for ourselves, which suggests a place where we feel comfortable and where we can have our privacy. The small place is tied down to memories and to small talk, as well as to thoughts. The small place can suggest our inner world and the way in which we can confess about them with close friends. The process of reflection is suggested by the idea that we begin in the small place and return to it, showing how our thoughts can wander backwards and forwards in time, just like in Swift's novels and short stories.

The poem Waves takes the poetic persona from the private, intimate space, into a space of trust where they connect with close friends. The small place could also be interpreted as the personal universe each and every one of us has. The poem Waves suggests the waves of life, with its ups and downs, which are presented next to the literal image of the waves and of a group of friends going to play in them.

The suggested idea of playing and then losing "of each other altogether" (Swift, 2018) leads us, together with the poetic persona, to the idea of returning to memories of childhood, in the poem titled Our Childhoods. Childhood was also present by the implied references to playing in the waves in the poem Waves. The poem Our Childhoods can suggest how losing touch of our friends from our social circle makes us go back to our memories, in this case, of our childhood years. Readers understand that the poetic persona was playing in the waves with other children, then they grew up and lost touch with each other. We may have also lost touch with our own selves, if we consider, as knowledgeable readers, the phrase our inner child. Readers understand that watching the sea and going to the seaside can trigger memories of our past, and of our childhoods. From watching the sea, the free associations of the poetic persona can move towards his memories of childhood, when he may have been in the same setting, playing with other children. The poetic persona can reflect on the different identities he has in his childhood vs now, in his adulthood, as readers can infer. The memories of childhood are personified and made animate, since "They pluck us on the shoulder sometimes" (Swift, 2018), and they are introduced as if addressing us directly: "Remember us?" (Swift, 2018). The fondness with which we think of these memories can be what brings them to life. The poem, through personification and turning them into animate beings, suggests that childhood memories are brought back to life. The fact that they are all orphans, referring to childhood memories, and which is a piece of information only we know can suggest that we now look back on events from the past, and that we know what will happen in the future. Orphans can refer to the idea of loneliness, which we can feel later in life. We can, later in life, feel lost, while childhood is a time of happiness and a time when we make friends easier than later in life. The poem moves on from the playful tone, where memories of childhood "pluck us on the shoulder" (Swift, 2018), to a meditative, reflective tone, ending up with the question "And then […] who will they become?" (Swift, 2018). Readers can think about the following fact: after childhood, during our adolescence, we start wandering about who we are and about our purpose in life. In retrospect, we can wander again as we recall memories from childhood what are we going to become in the future, or the other children in our friends' circles. We can also think that the poetic persona is wandering about what are these memories of childhood going to become, or how are we going to deal with them, how are we going to integrate them in our present-day identity. We can find ourselves during a time of uncertainty, of psychological dilemmas and crises, when we start wandering again who we are, later in life, after our teenage years. We can then go back to contemplate how we used to be in our childhood and what we were dreaming of becoming, or how we imagined our future lives to be like. A moment of psychological dilemma can lead us through a process of introspection and self-analysis, and knowledgeable readers are aware of the fact that sometimes, in psychotherapy, we can start talking about our childhood if we consider it relevant, or if our free associations take us there.

The title of the following poem, Rush Hour, suggests that time feels sometimes that it rushes through, that our lives move on too quickly, in this case from childhood to adulthood. What is more, we readers can also feel that this poem continues the reflections in the previous one, likely moving us from the question following the contemplation of the past, of the age of childhood, to the present day, during rush hour. We can reflect in various setting, and we can be so absorbed by our reflections that sometimes we focus on the thoughts and do not pay attention to our present surroundings. Then the present and the surroundings again catch our attention, as we take a break from our train of thoughts. The poetic persona is, at present, in a crowd, judging by the details given: "The fog of their massed breath" (Swift, 2018). The poetic persona continues with the process of reflection: "So this is their life, what they do every day,/ Funnelled into work like hour-glass sand?" (Swift, 2018). As we advance in life, we feel that we have entered a process of everyday life routine. This comes in contrast with the way we may have imagined our adult lives during childhood. We may have had great dreams and imagined how we would go through adventures and have the freedom to achieve many objectives. However, we can still dream and hope for our lives to take another course: "No, no, look again. It's not what it seems./ This smoky-blue dawn/ That hasn't yet torn them from dreams,/ These lights on their faces" (Swift, 2018). These lines suggest that it is only at surface level that we lead a life of routine, since our spirit and our imagination can see beyond all this.

Among the ups and downs of life we can include the reflections present in the poem To His Dead Father. The thoughts of the poetic persona wander back again, likely in connection with his childhood, towards his father and his memory. He imagines how time can stop, and how the father and son could meet, if time froze, and be the same age. This would make them feel "like equals, brothers, friends" (Swift, 2018). The poetic persona daydreams: "We'd walk, we'd talk, we'd know each other" (Swift, 2018). Readers understand that the poetic persona regrets that, due to the age differences, between father and son can appear some communication problems, especially during the teenage years, when conflicts between generations and sets of values are common. As the son approaches the age his father had during some time, he daydreams about meeting him and discussing with him, while getting along perfectly well. In time, the son may realize that he agrees at present with his father's opinions and values and that he resonates with him. The gap between them mentioned by the poetic persona is a gap between generations and between sets of values, yet time can solve them. At present, the poetic persona can sympathize with his father, as he remembers him.

The poem Inmates switches the mood of nostalgia for childhood and the teenage years by remembering the negative aspects, of longing for freedom. The free associations from the time he was going to school were the following: "School dormitories, barrack rooms,/ Hospital wards and, by a stretch,/ Prison wings too./ All of a muchness and all grim" (Swift, 2018). The poetic persona could describe a time when rules felt like a burden, when he needed to find freedom from them, and dreamt, likely, of growing up and of being free: "But imagine them empty,/ All the narrow beds unburdened./ Thrown in, we learn the hard way to muck in too,/ All fondly supposing there's some other free place/ Where we're all tender autocrats" (Swift, 2018). The poetic persona asks us readers to imagine al the beds empty, "The long spaces silent,/ Not a door being swung" (Swift, 2018). The emptiness then seems to turn into coldness and then into "All the meaningless lights-outs" (Swift, 2018). The rules did not seem to make much sense for teenage students, who were starting to question them. The authority of the grown-ups was fading away. These memories could be connected to those when the son started questioning the values of his father and now, at present, would like to discuss with him not from a rebellious position, but to get along with him. Likely, in the past, the son had felt imprisoned by the rules he found at school and at home.

The following poem, History, presents us readers with an intertextual reference to the line " The child is father to the man" (Swift, 2018) by Wordsworth, in the poem My Heart Leaps Up (Hecht, 2012). The line refers how we become adults based on how our childhood shapes us. Our childhood experiences turn us into the adult we are at the present moment. Here we can see a wide set of references to other beliefs, e.g. that education can shape us, our family circle, as well as our various psychological experiences, as we can rely on our early childhood relationships with our parents, other adults taking care of us, as well as with siblings and other children, the latter describing Freud's psychosexual theory of development (Elkatawneh, 2013). After our early childhood experiences, according to Ioan Ionut (2025), based on the opinions expressed as the moderator of and in the private forums belonging to AROPA (The Romanian Association for the Promotion of Psychoanalysis) and accessible to those members who have signed up for their online courses, nothing much happens, and we repeat the various traumas and fixations we have acquired. The way we see the world also has roots in the way we experienced it in our early childhood years. Swift (2018) reflects on how we can change from childhood to the time we are grown-ups, when we can be wise and sad, while we had had much fun during our childhood. The details presented further make us think of our imagination during childhood: "We are the only sad, wise grown-ups now./ To have lived in their day!/ On a sledge, say, in St Petersburg, in 1904./ Or on the old ranch, out west,/ Before Pearl Harbor, chasing the kicking maverick,/ Watching the still wet foal find its legs./ Those simple, carefree times!" (Swift, 2018).

The title, History, can refer to how the poetic persona has grown up in his life, and changed from childhood to adulthood, while, at the same time, some personality traits still remain with him. The history mentioned in the title is a personal history, of personal development and change.

The poem Borrowers continues with the idea of imagination, daydreams, and living by the principle of enjoying the moment, as suggested by "Live now, pay later" (Swift, 2018) as compared to the ways of life of another generation, based on "Pay now, live later" (Swift, 2018). Towards the end, the poetic persona grows nostalgic: "Oh but we lived, boy, how we lived" (Swift, 2018).

The poem The Virtuoso continues along the same lines of reflecting about the fulfilment of dreams and about happiness. The poetic persona seems to tell us the story of a musician who longs for the memories not of his highest peak of success, but of the days "When he'd make his way/ To the Academy" (Swift, 2018). Readers may recall a quotation which is attributed to Freud: "One day, in retrospect, the years of struggle will strike you as the most beautiful" (AZquotes.com, 2025). The moment the virtuoso was accepted into the Academy was lived with great emotional intensity: "And (why this morning, what/ Was magic about this morning?)/ Everything sang" (Swift, 2018). We can consider The Virtuoso to present us with a side-story of a side-character, of someone whom the poetic persona had known, and whose story ties in with the idea of the past, of meaning of life, and happiness, as well as with contemplation and introspection.

The following poem, We Both Know, refers to mutual glances and references between two people: "We both know, we both knew./ It hovers now around us when we meet/ Like some trick of light" (Swift, 2018). Next, the poetic persona reflects how memory and fantasizing or daydreaming can mix and become the same: "And those images of what might have been/ Can't be so different now/ From images of things that really were,/ Memory and longing amounting to the same" (Swift, 2018). The wish and the tension are maintained in the suggested relationship: "We burned but never were consumed,/ This soft ash keeping in the fire" (Swift, 2018). The two persons keep on wishing for one another and daydreaming.

The following poem, Breadcrumbs, can be interpreted as providing, through its title, a reference to only giving small amounts of happiness and not everything at once. At the same time, ir could be understood as another side-story about which the poetic persona finds out and which he uses to reflect on life. A husband notices his wife offering breadcrumbs to the birds. Likely this is a common, everyday scene, yet it becomes meaningful once she is no longer in his life. The husband looks at paintings of everyday life details recalling the scenes with his wife and the birds, and feels grief for the loss of his wife. The breadcrumbs can suggest small, everyday life detail, yet which are meaningful, even if we do not realize it at the moment.

The poem The Trespasser could also be regarded as a side-story, based on which the poetic persona reflects on the free associations of the word in the title. The trespassing starts from its religious meaning, where the following happens: "He never could quite grasp it,/ A boy in school assembly:/ 'Forgive us our trespasses …'/ What kind of word was that?/ He only understood the sense/ That had to do with property,/ Or with not being on it" (Swift, 2018). The boy reflects, together with the poetic persona, on the similarities between trespassing and being an intruder, or an isolated person: "Trespassers were people/ Who weren't supposed to be there./ And wasn't that, he knew by then,/ Exactly where he was at?/ An intruder in this place" (Swift, 2018). Being accepted by other can be a significant issue not just during our school years, but also later in life, when we try to connect with the others and to be accepted by them.

The poem Chekhov at Melikhovo can be considered another side-story with which the poetic persona comes in contact with and uses it to reflect on his own issues. Chekhov is presented a very passionate about his work as a doctor. Melikhovo is his estate, where he lived during 1892-1899 and practiced medicine, as well as where he wrote his major works. Chekhov is presented as having a high sense of purpose. The idea of purpose and meaning, as well as passion for one's work is frequently present in these poems by Swift.

The poem Watched joins in with ideas which preoccupy the poetic persona: "Once, there were our parents to watch over us/ And God, of course (we were told), looking down,/

And it was a comfort bigger than we knew then,/ Not to know the loneliness which we know now/ Of our own devices" (Swift, 2018).

The concern for the nostalgia for the time of childhood and of when we had our parents alive, as well as for the loneliness and the need for comfort, can be identified in this poem as well. The poems, after History and Borrowers, show illustrations of the abstract, philosophical reflections of the poetic persona, confirming them and repeating them.

We also witness fragmentary reflections, such as the ones in the poem Extinction, The poem Extinction presents the poetic persona in a moment of reflection about the way in which some vanished species matters or not.

The poem The Anatomist continues the series of life stories of other characters with whom the poetic persona comes into contact or hears about and reflects on. In The Anatomist, we witness the story of a young boy whose father dies while he is a child. This memory accompanies him at the present moment, when he remembers how he decided to take up medicine. His students whisper about how he is the son of his father. He tells his students about the study of anatomy: "What, ladies and gentlemen, is our study?/ It's the study, ladies and gentlemen,/ Of how we're all the same" (Swift, 2018). The reflections move to a universal truth about human nature. Medicine cannot offer true comfort for losing someone dear, and it cannot offer explanations, as readers infer.

The following poem, Civilization, continues the fragmentary train of thoughts, as well as their apparent incoherence, specific to free associations. The poem shows us how we fuss over small details and get lost in the trivial, in the civilized, developed world, e.g. "Over a new pair of shoes" (Swift, 2018).

The poem Unlooked-for brings to our attention "Ordinary moments that aren't so ordinary at all" (Swift, 2018) and which are described like spontaneous moments which bring us happiness. Readers infer that such moments can make our lives meaningful and happy. Previously, readers understand that the poetic persona had explored passion for a certain profession which could make our lives meaningful and which could bring us happiness. The following poem, called Affection, brings in another aspect of life which can bring us happiness and which can make our lives meaningful.

The poem Affection is very short, being composed only of the following lines: "And affection too./ Not love, it's true, no fires within,/ Just simple affection, flickering from skin to skin./ Not lust or seduction or desire or possession/ Just simple affection,/ Warming the air in between" (Swift, 2018). We notice how this poem proposed a balanced version of feelings, and the way in which caring about someone else and someone else caring about us can bring meaning into our lives.

The poem There Without Us represents a reflection on the ephemerality of human life and on the daydreaming we go through during our lifetime: "And thought: we're here now and might never have been/ And soon won't be, and places such as these,/ Pierced with birds and secret life,/ Must hardly ever get or need a human visitor" (Swift, 2018).

The poem Homings is a reflection on how we have found out about the mysteries of nature or how we believe we have, through science or through observation: "Homings/ Salmon still passage through the estuaries,/ Geese arrow the heavens,/ Turtles tunnel the oceans./ When shall we tell them we have ravaged their mysteries?/ Whom shall we choose as our spokesman" (Swift, 2018). The previous poem had also hinted at the secrets in nature.

The following poem, titled Priam, invites our reflections on the hero mentioned in the titled who may not be seen as a hero after all, but as a simple man who is faced with the problem of having a son stealing someone else's life and causing a war to begin. In the end of the story presented in this poem, Priam is curious about the Trojan horse, and considers bringing it in the castle. Knowledgeable readers may consider how we cannot stop the inevitable from happening, and how we do not learn anything from history. Instead, we repeat the same mistakes.

The poem The Bookmark invites our reflections on books we have not yet had time to read, while we had planned to. In one of the books we find a ticked and start reflecting on it, as if it represents a story itself. The end of the reflections reveals how we have been the ones placing the ticket there.

The poem Touch invites our reflections over questions such as: "Where do we really live?/ Where is the centre of command?/ In our eyes? Our brains?/ In this thing that beats in our chest?/ Or is it in our hands?" (Swift, 2018). The rest of the poem consists of further reflections and free associations over the role of our friends, in various domains, e.g. music or in the work done by draughtsmen, as well as for comfort, punishing, and begging.

The poem The Dead becomes a reflection over how we cannot forget them, suggesting grief work: "They cry to us, never finding the words/ To tell us what we already know,/ That our own lost voices will one day/ Be as theirs, the mouths of our souls/ Gaping like graves, gaping for reunion/ With those we have preceded" (Swift, 2018).

The poem On the Bridge seems to break off with the other trains of thoughts and make the poetic persona skip to another memory, with its accompanying impressions. The memory is centred on the image of "Three girls on a bridge/ (A subject for a painting—Gauguin or Munch)" (Swift, 2018). The poetic persona refers to someone in the third person, an Englishman, an academic, who was driving in Nîmes during summertime, and who, while taking a walk, sees these three girls. They greet him with Good evening in French. He compares them in his mind with Diana and the nymphs, and he further on reflects that they must have been schoolgirls. He tells us readers that they were "Between girlhood and what comes next" (Swift, 2018), and must have been wandering about they futures. The Englishman mentions he felt like an intruder in their discussion. This shows that he prefers to remain a detached observer and reflects on the course of life. Readers infer the girls may have been making confessions and talked about issues of concerns specific to their age.

The poem Allotments reminds of the first poem in the series, This Small Place. This is because the allotment represents a private, little world where we have a space of meaning and of comfort. The allotment refers to a plot of land for growing vegetables, which can, figuratively, mean how we are all give a space in the context of life which we can transform into an intimate and meaningful one.

The poem Perspective invites us to look at matters from someone else's shoes, or skin. This is an attempt to get closer to someone and to understand them better.

The poem Relapse presents us with the return of memories and with the issue of our vulnerability. The image of "scorched flowers under winterloads of ice" (Swift, 2018) suggests that some memories remain persistent, as if frozen in time.

The poem Another suggests that seeing ourselves through the perspective of the others and seeing others as they are not aware that they see us, in a contemplative way, are distinct. It is difficult to feel empathy since the others live in a World which may not include us. Our own perspective makes us place others partially in the shadow, suggesting there are limits to our perception. The others exist independently to us, the poem implies, and not in relation to us, as we may feel that they do, from our own perspective. The others live in their own World, and they are independent from us. The others are not blurry figures placed in our limited, peripheral vision.

The final poem, titled This Is the Life, suggests a carefree lifestyle, full of pleasure and relaxation. The way "some cheery oaf" says "This is the life!" (Swift, 2018) has the connotation of someone thinking in shallow terms about life. At the same time, the title looks like a conclusion to all the sets of poems. The poetic persona feels he has not lived life according to his own expectations. The line "Getting smaller" (Swift, 2018) brings us back to the first poem in this set of poems. When we read it we have the impression that the world feels smaller once we have gained life experience, or once we believe we have gained all the possible life experience to know the world enough to be able to claim that there is not much left of it for us to explore.

Results

The poems by Graham Swift present in the volume Making an Elephant: Writing from Within can be understood as forming a chain of free Association. For the first poems, we have seen how the ending of each poem forms a connection to the beginning of the next, creating a continuous train of thoughts, similar to the free associations technique used in psychoanalysis. According to this assumption and observation, Swift had intended the poems to be read in the order in which they were published. This reading order would allow readers to follow the way in which the reflections of the poetic persona would progress. Further on, we can see disparate thoughts and associations, with the connections becoming less coherent. However, at some points, we can see the return to the idea of small world present in the first poem, in Allotments and in the last poem, This Is the Life.

Reflections and stories merge in these poems by Swift. Some poems are more philosophical, others look more like storytelling, while others feel more abstract or more visual.

Discussion and Conclusions

Readers get to know another side of Graham Swift in these poems, a side which tends towards the universal aspects in human nature. Swift does not focus on the British identity and setting, or on the multicultural realities of today's world. Poetry allows him to express universally valid feelings. Swift grows detached from these issues regarding a certain culture and a certain place. The emotional realities, however, remain familiar and highly visible. The inner world gains prominence in all of his poems, and from this point of view, readers recognize a side of Swift they are familiar with.

The poems show how the small, private world in the first poem expands into a World suggesting connection with the others, from the second poem, titled Waves. The first poem focuses on the intimate space of thoughts and memories, while the second one expands into the topic of friendship. The fact that there is nostalgia for childhood, expressed in the poem Our Childhoods, suggests issues such as the inner child, the formation of identity, and psychological development. The poem Rush hour suggests a conflict between the everyday life routine of adulthood and the still existing dreams in the inner world. We keep childhood dreams while we are moving on into the responsibilities of adult age. Issues such as loss of parents and gaps between generations, imagination, dreams, the meaning of life, alienation and belonging, fragmentary reflections and universal questions, observing others and exploring ourselves can be found in Swift's poems.

These poems by Swift are united by the exploration of the inner world, and of ourselves. There is the wish to explore this external world, just as there is the wish to explore ourselves and our relationships to the others. The unity is ensured through the continuation of the train of thoughts, through the resonating with various elements, as well as through the returning to the contents of the poem in the beginning of the series of poems.

Irina-Ana Drobot
Lecturer, PhD, Technical University of Civil Engineering Bucharest

Abstract: The purpose of the paper is to analyse, comparatively, two short stories, Osamu Dazai's Cherry Leaves and the Whistler and Liu Zhengquan's We Will Meet Again Sometime, focusing on how both depict family members who comfort dying loved ones by fulfilling their unrealized fantasies of romantic love. In Dazai's story, an elder sister writes a fictional love letter for her dying younger sister, while in Zhengquan's, a granddaughter writes a calligraphic reply on a paper umbrella from the woman her grandfather once loved, to console him. allowing him to believe that had remembered him. Drawing on Kermode's theory of narrative endings, the paper argues that these compassionate deceptions provide emotional comfort and a sense of meaningful closure for both the dying characters and their families. The analysis highlights the role of empathy, personal symbolism, and the interplay between fantasy and reality in shaping the romantic love experiences. The methodology includes text analysis and a reader-response approach.

Keywords: Daydreaming; psychoanalysis; empathy; sympathy; comfort.

The present paper identifies similarities between the experiences and contexts of life in the short stories Cherry Leaves and the Whistler by Japanese author Osamu Dazai and We Will Meet Again Sometime by Chinese author Liu Zhengquan. In both stories, we find two characters who are dying, and for whom someone close from their family tries to make them believe that their wishes to be loved by the persons they had been in love with and with whom they had hoped to have a romantic relationship respond to them with the same feelings of love. In this way, their fantasies to be loved by the persons they had been daydreaming about are fulfilled, or so the persons from their families believe. In the short story Cherry Leaves and the Whistler by Osamu Dazai, the narrator tells us readers about her younger sister, who was very sick and doctors had warned the family that she would die soon. The younger sister had exchanged letters with a young man, with whom she was hoping for a romantic relationship. However, as the narrator finds out, when hearing the news that the younger sister was dying, the young man had written to her that they should better forget each other, and his letters had stopped. The narrator writes a letter pretending to be from the man her sister was in love with, and reads it to her. However, the younger sister tells her that she had written all those letters to herself, and that there was no young man who had written to her. Everything had all been her creation, since she had wished to be in love before dying, an experience she had never lived in her real life. The narrator is not so convinced that what her younger sister tells her is the truth, as she believed there had been a real exchange of romantic letters with a real young man. In the short story We Will Meet Again Sometime by Liu Zhengquan, we witness how a granddaughter wishes her dying grandfather to be happy and to have his fantasy of seeing an answer from a girl in his past whom he had been in love with and with whom he had hoped for a romantic relationship fulfilled. The grandfather still daydreams about finding, on a paper umbrella, a written reply to his own message from a girl in his past. In his youth, he had taken part in a calligraphy contest, where he had met a young girl who had suggested to him, indirectly, that she would be interested in a romantic relationship with him, by consenting to have their photograph taken together. They go on walks and they are both in love. However, the relationship does not progress since another participant in the contest suggests to the narrator's grandfather, indirectly, that the young girl is already in a relationship. This, however, is not true. The other participant in the contest had made that up since he was also hoping for a romantic relationship with the young girl. The narrator's grandfather retreats, and only finds out later about the truth. All his life he keeps longing for the young girl, and hopes to meet her again. The paper umbrellas are a memory of one such umbrella they had written their calligraphy messages in the past. The narrator arranges for an answer written in calligraphic script to be placed on an umbrella, as if coming from the girl he was still daydreaming about. The grandfather comes across the message written in reply and believes it is true.

We notice how in the short story by Dazai, the dying young girl became aware of the make-believe letter written by her elder sister, while in the short story by Zhengquan, the grandfather is comforted by the belief that the message from the young girl in his past is real, and that the young girl had also been thinking about him.

What is the role of such fantasies and, especially, of the wish of the close members of the family to fulfill them, at least at the level of make-believe, for their dying loved ones? We can think of comfort for both parties, and for a sense of closure for the dying persons. They can think about their lives by analogy with stories, which have a beginning, middle, and end, together with a sense of purpose. This is what The Sense of an Ending by Kermode (2000) confirms for us. Human beings use narrative structure with beginnings, middles and ends in order to make sense of life, and of additional issues such as history and death. According to Kermode (1966), fiction is used in such cases for its function of introducing a sense of harmony in the chaos of reality by resorting to coherent plots and to the focus on a clear ending in order to create a sense of meaning.

The questions related to the meaning of life are asked at various ages, and during different stages of transition in life. It is a question which can overlap with what is happiness. The answer to both questions can be to love and to be loved. Love becomes a universal and basic need for everyone, which is why the close members of the family of the dying characters wish for them to be at peace and to know that they are loved in return by the persons they had been longing for.

Both stories show how the persons from the family of the dying characters, the elder sister and the granddaughter try to show their own love for them by doing their best to make it seem that their fantasies about romantic love are fulfilled. Readers can identify a strong sense of empathy and sympathy of the elder sister and of the granddaughter.

Both empathy and sympathy refer to imagining ourselves in someone else's place, as if we were them. However, there is a difference (Chismar, 1988) in the degree of emotional involvement in the experience. We can be highly involved or keep ourselves to some extent at a distance from their emotional experiences. Empathy represents how we can share someone else's emotion. We are deeply involved in the others emotional experiences. Sympathy refers to how we can feel sad or how we can feel pity for someone and their unhappy experiences, yet we do not necessarily share their emotions. We can maintain an outside perspective.

Both elder sister and granddaughter are highly involved emotionally with respect to the wishes of their dying loved ones. They show their own love to them by becoming interested in those episodes in their lives and in trying to respond to them as they would expect from the other person who should love them romantically in return. Both elder sister and granddaughter need to understand and try to feel from the perspective of both members of the would-be romantic couple.

The granddaughter understands what calligraphy means to both grandfather and to the young girl from his past, since they had shared the same passion for it and since it had brought them together, even if for a very short while. The granddaughter is willing to find out about the unfulfilled love story of her grandfather, and is very attentive as he shows her a photograph with the young girl from his past. He had given the girl a Chinese paper umbrella on which he had written We will meet again sometime, which was a melancholic line from a poem. The message, therefore, was an allusion known to them both, which thus could make it likely for the girl to remember it and him if she found the umbrella in the store. This would make her, in turn, write a message in reply. The granddaughter manages to imitate the ideograms convincingly. She had also placed there the name of the girl. The grandfather is very happy. The short story ends with a daydream of the grandfather, where he sees the visual image of hibiscus flowers opening up. These flowers were present in a poem the grandfather in his youth and the young girl had discussed in their walk together by the lake. Readers notice elements which carry strong free associations and personal significance, making them able to bring back the scene of the romantic date. The paper umbrellas were part of the heritage of the Chinese province, just as the practice of calligraphy was. However, these elements gain personal connotations. The hibiscus flowers are present in the poem which was part of the invitation launched by the young girl to the young grandfather: „Un pocal de vin din Wu, frunzele de bambus ce vestesc primăvara,/ Două frumuseți din Wu dansând, îmbătate de vin, precum florile de hibiscus" ("A cup of wine from Wu, the bamboo leaves announcing spring,/ Two beauties from Wu dancing, drunk on wine, like hibiscus flowers," my translation). The poem is identified, in the footnote provided by the translator, to belong to Chinese poet Bai Juyi (772-846). The girl tells him the hibiscus has just bloomed as she invites him for a walk by the lake. Later on, a rain comes and the hibiscus blossoms remain without petals. The hibiscus is used as a symbol of passion, of beauty, of love, as it is in bloom, and afterwards, as its petals are scattered, of ephemerality. The happiness of the two young persons had been ephemeral. It is this image of beauty and implied ephemerality that returns to the dying grandfather during his last moments. Based on Zen Buddhist belief (Suzuki, 1991), everything in this life is ephemeral, and we need to come to terms with this. We only have the present moment. The memories of the grandfather capture the fleeting moment in the walk by the lake with the girl and the words and looks exchanged between them. Readers also understand that Chinese paper umbrellas are also beautiful and fragile, suggesting ephemerality as well. The granddaughter wishes to offer an ephemeral joy to her grandfather, as he can believe that his dream had been fulfilled. Readers can notice how the hibiscus flowers whose petals are falling, taken away by the wind during the rain can also foreshadow, together with their symbol of ephemerality, the fragility of the romantic relationship and of its future perspectives. The romantic relationship is only a dream, as the young grandfather had been given allusions by the other participant in the contest that the girl he liked was engaged. Readers can also reflect over both the fragility of the dream about the romantic relationship, and of human lives themselves, as the granddaughter finds out that her grandfather is terminally ill from his doctor. On finding this out, she believes that making him happy could make losing him easier for her. The story is about two losses, the loss of the grandfather's youth dream of a romantic relationship, and about the granddaughter's losing her grandfather.

The elder sister in the short story Cherry Leaves and the Whistler by Dazai (2025):

> […] learning the truth only made me pity my sister more; I imagined all sorts of outrageous things, and I myself felt a bittersweet sort of ache in my heart, a suffocating, unbearable feeling that no one but a girl coming of age can ever understand. It was a living hell, and I suffered it alone, as if it were I who'd had that dreadful experience. I was not quite myself in those days, you see.

In the quotation above, the thoughts of the elder sister make us readers see the high degree of emotional involvement in the romantic love story of her younger sister which she had discovered accidentally by going through her things, in a drawer. She begins to place herself completely in her younger sister's shoes, emotionally, and wishes to feel the way she feels, which can further on help her make up a love letter from the young man that she believes her sister would like to receive and would deserve to receive. As she writes from the part of the young man, the elder sister needs to do another exercise of empathy and sympathy, by playing out the role, emotionally, of the young man from the time when he was in love with her sister. She imagines a letter where the young man is sorry about writing a letter which ended abruptly their correspondence. The elder sister was outraged at how coward the young man had been when learning about the illness of her sister and presents him in the letter with a radical change of attitude. In the letter, she writes from the perspective of a young man who is very sorry for having asked her younger sister to forget everything about him, and who claims that he is very upset that he cannot do anything to heal her: "I am a poor and powerless man. There is nothing I can do to help you. All I have to give you are words" (Dazai, 2025). The elder sister wishes to comfort her younger sister and underlines these thoughts, reaching a poetic shade of meaning: "I haven't forgotten you for a single moment, not even in my dreams. But I can do nothing for you" (Dazai, 2025). The elder sister even thinks about a fantasy ritual between lovers, as she writes in the place of the young man in her letter: "Each and every day I shall write you a poem and send it to you. And this too: each and every day I shall stand outside your garden fence and whistle. I'll be there tomorrow evening at six o'clock, whistling the 'Warship March.' I'm a good whistler, you know" (Dazai, 2025). She tries to sound believable, just as much as she tries to sound comforting and loving in her letter. Readers could reflect about the letter written by the elder sister from the perspective of the young man that it was written based on her own fantasies about the ideal and idealized romantic love relationship. We can think that, having read the young man's previous letters she may have understood his spirit and style, and may have been able to continue along similar lines, as she may have started daydreaming herself about the ideal love relationship for her sister. She would have wished her sister to be happy and feel loved during such moments. As she had found out that the young man was a poet, she does her best to include poetry in his letter, under the form of his promises, as well as under the form of a poem included in this very letter. The poem sounds as follows: "I waited and waited/ to see them in bloom:/ the peach trees this year./ I heard they'd be white;/ these flowers are crimson" (Dazai, 2025).

Readers notice how the crimson colour of the peach blossoms can be regarded as similar to that of the red colour of the hibiscus in the story about the grandfather. Red and crimson can be both understood as allusions to passionate love. The blossoms suggest that love is in full bloom itself, figuratively, and as intense as the red and crimson colours. In both short stories, readers find poems addressed to the loved person in the romantic relationship. Both Chinese and Japanese cultures include, traditionally, poems written among lovers. In China, there are classical love poems which express longing between separated lovers, and which are called poems of lovesickness (xiāngsī shī) (Da, 2018). These poems were exchanged by the lovers in private, and they could be considered poetic love letters. Other such poems in Chinese culture are: qíngshī (Jiahui, 2020), which represent love poems in general, and guīyuàn shī, which represent those poems expressing longing for absent lovers and which are written by women (Yuan, 2025). In Japanese culture, we can find lovers exchanging waka and, in particular, tanka poems which were part of a formalized courtship ritual. This happened during the Heian period. Knowledgeable readers can think about such poems when they notice them in the two short stories. At the same time, love poems are present in general in all cultures and exchanged among lovers. The only difference we can see is how the Chinese culture has a classification of each and every aspect of the love experience regarding these poems, including who the one writing the poem is. Japanese culture has a specific genre of poem which is used on such occasions. Both lovers write tanka poems and exchange love messages. These were often written on fans.

The discovery of the love letters by the elder sister, together with the discovery that she had written the most recent letter by her younger sister paves the ground for confessions and for a stronger emotional connection between the two sisters. The younger sister claims that she had written those letters from the part of a gentlemen herself to herself, as she wanted to make her fantasy of being in a romantic relationship to feel that it had come true:

> "You needn't worry." My sister, remarkably calm and composed, gave me an almost sublimely beautiful smile. "You saw the letters tied in that green ribbon, didn't you? They … they weren't real. You see, I was so lonely that… Well, a year ago last fall I began writing those letters and sending them to myself. Please don't think me silly. Youth is such a precious thing. I've really come to understand that since I fell ill. I know that writing letters to yourself is pathetic. Perfectly wretched. But I really wish I'd had a chance to do something bold and reckless with a gentleman friend. I would have liked someone to hold me tightly in his arms. Not only have I never had a lover, I've never even talked with a man — outside of our immediate circle, I mean. You haven't either, have you? That was our mistake. We were too sensible. Oh, I hate the thought of dying. My poor hands, my poor fingertips, my poor hair. I don't want to die. I don't!" (Dazai, 2025)

The younger sister even thanks her elder sister for having written to her the most recent letter from the part of the young man. Readers understand that the younger sister realized that her elder sister cares for her very much if she did this and that she had wanted to comfort her. The younger sister mentions that she understands that her elder sister had also not had the opportunity to talk and write such romantic letters to a man and to receive them either. The two sisters are thus united by their confessions regarding their fantasies about romantic love. Knowledgeable readers can think about the letters and confessions between very close female friends in traditional Chinese culture, which are referred to and presented in the short story Snow Flower and the Secret Fan by Lisa See. In the novel by See (2009), we readers witness the lifelong friendship between Lily and Snow Flower from 19th century China.

Each couple of lovers develops their own romantic universe, which includes meaningful objects for both and rituals, e.g. paper umbrellas with messages written in calligraphic ideograms, references to flowers in poems, poetry writing, etc. Readers can identify these elements in both short stories, and they do so together with the outside observers from their family, the granddaughter and the elder sister. Next to all of these aspects, we can also add the fascination which Western culture readers can feel about the specific aspects of Japanese and Chinese cultures which, for them, form a particular and fascinating universe.

In romantic relationships, we could claim that we live in two worlds, one of reality and one of fantasy, in general, as we have wishes and expectations about the other person. We can also idealize the loved person. We can see the presence of two world, of fantasy and reality in both short stories. We can refer here to Freud's (1983) psychoanalytic theories, which claim that we all daydream, yet artists can give artistic shape and value to the raw forms of daydreams and fantasies.

The two short stories invite active readers' participation, especially with respect to emotional involvement, together with the characters. The reader-response approach (Mart, 2019) was adopted in the present paper, since, just as this approach claims, in these short stories readers react emotionally and they also rely on their background knowledge to understand the experiences described through which the characters go.

The common life experiences with which readers resonate are the following: the need for living a romantic love story and the need to fulfil the fantasies of dying charactes about romantic love stories. The latter need comes, just like the first one, from the theory put forth by Kermode (2000), since we all feel the need to provide order and a sense of meaning in an otherwise chaotic life. The fantasies about love relationships lead both dying characters and the ones close to them to feel that there is a sense of purpose and meaningful ending to their lives, once these fantasies are fulfilled. According to Kermode (2000), we human beings live in what we can call the middle of time – between past and future – and we have the constant need to connect our lives to a higher pattern of a meaningful beginning and ending. The fantasies related to romantic love relationships can provide this connection. In addition, the role of the fulfilled fantasies of romantic love bring emotional comfort for both dying persons – the grandfather and the younger sister – and for their close family members – the granddaughter and the elder sister, since they all know that there is an ordered life story and a sense of meaningful life and ending for them all.

FROM THE OJIBWA COSMIC BEADWORK OF CREATION TO ANCESTRAL MYTHS AND CULTURAL MEMORY IN A STORY OF SURVIVAL AND SPIRITUAL RECONNECTION

Oana-Andreea Ghiţă-Pîrnuţă
Senior Lecturer, PhD, "Transilvania" University of Braşov

Abstract: This paper explores the mythological dimensions of Louise Erdrich's "The Antelope Wife" focusing on how Native American myths – particularly the Ojibwa cosmology – permeates the novel's characters, symbols, and narrative structure. From the cosmic beadwork of creation to spirit-guiding animals, from shapeshifting antelope women to rituals of grief and sacred naming, Erdrich reanimates the ancestral myth as an active force in the contemporary Native American identity. Through close analysis of symbolic imagery, spiritual motifs, and ritual acts, this paper argues that Erdrich constructs a mythic continuum where personal trauma, cultural memory, and sacred cosmology converge. Thus, the novel becomes not only a story of survival, but a site of cultural resurgence and spiritual reconnection. Ultimately,"The Antelope Wife" becomes a narrative ceremony where myth breathes, mourns, and heals.

Keywords: Ojibwa; ancestral mythology; cosmology; beadwork; creation; cyclical time; cultural memory.

In The Antelope Wife, Louise Erdrich does not merely tell a story. The tale is retold many times and throughout this process Erdrich sets out on a cultural journey performing a spiritual ritual through language; thus, the novel turns into a narrative ceremony in which myth plays an important part. Rooted in the Ojibwa cosmology and Native American storytelling traditions, the novel is infused with mythological resonance. In this universe, which is very rich in spirits, animals speak, twins stitch the universe into being, and beadwork becomes an act of cosmological patterning with a very intricate structure.

"The cultural significance of Native American beadwork extends far beyond its aesthetic beauty. Beadwork is a powerful form of self-expression and storytelling, carrying deep spiritual, social, and personal meaning for the communities that practice it. Each bead, stitch, and pattern is imbued with symbolism that connects the artist to their heritage, family, and the natural world" (Derrick, 2024:6-7).

Rather than treating myth as distant or symbolic, Erdrich integrates it into the material world – combining the spiritual with the mundane, the ancestral past with the present moment. The novel unfolds as a cosmic beadwork or a mythic tapestry, where the spiritual forces are interwoven with multifarious aspects of everyday life.

"Unlike linear time, which constantly moves forward, many Native American Traditions are centered around cyclical time. Cyclical time moves in loops, like the seasons, which means that through the Creator, the universe is constantly giving people opportunities for renewal, restoration, comfort, and hope" (Arroyo, 2023:9).

Through fragmented narratives and recurring images, Erdrich challenges linear storytelling by using the stream of consciousness technique, thus, preferring a cyclical vision which has its origins in the Native American knowledge systems.

"Part of the history of Indigenous cultures is, of course, their tradition of storytelling. Myths, legends, and folktales all play important roles in explaining how the world came to be the way it is" (Clayton, 2020:3).

Myths are not framed as distant legends, but as lived experience, lived truths that shape identity, memory and transformation. Ancestral stories speak about grief, which is interwoven with personal trauma in this Native American universe of spirits.

In the Native American myths, legends and stories, "one can find reference to animals and birds as 'people'. The Bear is our grandfather. Beaver our cousin. Eagle our uncle. Deer our sister, and Buffalo our brother. But in a deeper sense of ideology, they are not only our 'relatives' but are also considered our teachers, protectors, guardians, supernatural aids, and sources of power and knowledge" (Lake-Thom, 1997:8).

Erdrich reanimates the Native American mythology as a very important force, which repatterns the contemporary Native American experience. Erdrich creates a cyclical narrative structure, a mythic continuum within the framework of her narrative: from the cosmic equilibrium of binary oppositions to the roles of animals, the sacredness of grief, the depth of symbols, the cosmic beadwork, and the circularity of myth or cultural memory.

According to Jake Page, the stories of the Native American peoples are called mythology by the European mind. Mythology is "a snobby sort of word for someone else's religion and history. But all mythology (…) is the primary, even only means by which all humans until very recently have endeavored to understand the paradoxes and mysteries of the universe: the existence of what appears to be order from an original chaos: the meaning and value of human life; the nature of good and evil; and – importantly – in the face of all this, how human beings are supposed to behave" (Page, 2004:4-5).

Ultimately, The Antelope Wife emerges as a narrative ceremony, a ritualistic act of narrative. Thus, the process of telling stories turns into a very structured pattern, which is very rich in multiple significances, having the power to heal through myth, to shape identity through tradition, reminding us that such stories are sacred talking leaves or living spirits.

According to L. M. Arroyo, "Oral Traditions are stories that are spiritually connected to the land, ancestors, and the particular Nation from which they come. Oral Traditions are stories that have been told for centuries, if not millennia, and many of these Oral Traditions are Sacred Stories – essentially each Nation's origin story" (Arroyo, 2023:18).

Cosmic duality is rendered in The Antelope Wife just like the creation through myth. The opening passage of the novel introduces a pair of twin sisters who sew reality into being with contrasting beads – light and dark, pale and indigo, in a never-ending act of cosmic rivalry: "EVER SINCE THE BEGINNING, these twins are sewing. One sews with light and one with dark. The first twin's beads are cut-glass whites and pales, and the other twin's beads are glittering deep red and blue-black indigo. One twin uses an awl made of an otter's sharpened penis bone, the other uses that of a bear" (Erdrich, 2002:1).

This dualistic creation myth is derived from the Ojibwa cosmology and it highlights various opposing spiritual forces, which define the harmony in this universe guided by spirits. It suggests that creation itself is not a singular moment but an ongoing act of tension, rhythm, and interdependence. The awls, crafted from animal bones – an otter and a bear – further link the spiritual act of creation to nature and the animal world. This dynamics resonates with the Anishinaabe tradition according to which one twin brings life and the other one brings death, both of them being, in fact, necessary in the mythic order.

Erdrich considers these twins to be continuous forces shaping fate. They are not positioned in the distant past and the intricate pattern or the beadwork created by them is more than visual art; it is a metaphor for fate and history, storytelling creating a sacred design which shapes identity.

"Beadwork serves as a visual language, telling personal and communal stories. The designs on an individual's clothing or accessories often reflect their identity, family history, or life experiences. These stories are often passed down through generations, preserving the collective knowledge, culture, and history of a people" (Derrick, 2024:7-8).

By embedding this myth into the very first lines of the novel, Erdrich signals that what follows is not a linear tale, but a ceremonial cyclical narrative built on dichotomies, such as: spirit vs matter, light vs shadow. The reader, like the world itself, is pulled into the constant interplay of such binary oppositions. This foundational myth transforms the act of storytelling into an echo of cosmogenesis – a sacred ceremony, a spiritual ritual interweaving past, present and future into the same sophisticated pattern.

In The Antelope Wife, animals are not passive symbols of the natural world – they are spiritual agents, shape-shifters, or guides who build bridges across realms. Erdrich's book is based on Ojibwa traditions where animals embody power, wisdom, and transformation. One of the most striking examples is the dog who flees with the baby in a tikinagun on its back, enacting a mythic rescue: "A dog bearing upon its back a frame-board tikinagun enclosing a child in moss, velvet, embroideries of beads, was frightened into the vast carcass of the world west of the Otter Tail River" (Erdrich, 2002:3).

In Ojibwa mythology, dogs are often spiritual guides, creating bridges across different worlds: the living and the dead. The dog carrying a baby is a striking reversal of roles – it is the animal, not a human, ensuring the child's survival. This recalls the Anishinaabe "Spirit Dogs", believed to accompany souls into the afterlife or to guide lost beings. The tikinagun (cradleboard) symbolizes tradition, protection, and ancestral continuity. Its beadwork suggests a sacred design, which is very rich in multifarious significances. This moment, where a tamed being takes on a mythical journey, blurs the lines between human, animal, and divine intervention. It makes us wonder whether this dog is just an animal or something more – a spirit acting on fate's behalf, delivering the child into an unknown but necessary future.

The figure of the Antelope Woman further embodies this hybrid reality. She is a shapeshifter, a marginal or peripheral being, whose roots can be found in the pan-Indigenous myths of animal brides – beings who move between wilderness and domesticity, spirit and body. The image of the man who "followed them, wrestled one down. Made love to her and was never the same. Few men can handle their love ways" (Erdrich, 2002:29) echoes traditional stories in which men try to possess these mystical women, often with tragic consequences.

In capturing the Antelope Woman, Klaus Shawano enacts a recurring mistake: attempting to own what is sacred and untamable. Her eventual departure reinforces her role as a spirit who cannot be caged. "The Native Americans shared in common a belief that the earth is a spiritual presence that must be honored, not mastered" (Mengelkoch & Nerburn, 1993:XI).

Shapeshifting, in Erdrich's novel, is magical and metaphysical. It symbolizes the layered nature of identity, especially feminine identity, within the framework of Native American cosmologies. The "Deer Husband", a supernatural being with hooves and a deer's head, serves as a counterpart to the Antelope Woman. Both figures disrupt human boundaries serving as reminders of older spiritual ways according to which humans and animals were never fully separated.

In Erdrich's mythic world, the wild is ancestral, and often wiser than the tamed. By portraying animals as carriers of mythic power, Erdrich invites us to see the living world as spiritually charged, hiding so many significances. Shapeshifters, spirit dogs, and animal-human hybrids are not fantasy; they are Native American truths made visible, reclaiming narrative space for sacred interdependence between species, stories, and souls.

"Traditional Native American Indians and medicine men/ women still understand the sacredness of Nature. They see the life-giving force of the Great Spirit flowing through all things in the Universe. Because of ancient beliefs, teachings, and spiritual practices, they feel and maintain a direct kinship with all of Creation" (Lake-Thom,1997:7-8).

In The Antelope Wife, time is not linear – it is cyclical, patterned, and stitched into the fabric of life through cultural memory, ritual, and art. Louise Erdrich uses beadwork not only as a cultural motif but as a metaphor for destiny itself: "The word for beads in the old language is manidominenz, little spirit seed. Though I live the dog's life and take on human sins, I am connected in the beadwork. I live in the beadwork too. The flowers are growing, the powerful vines. The pattern of her daughter's wild soul is emerging. With each bead she plants in the swirl, Rozin adds one tiny grain" (Erdrich, 2002:91). The quote suggests that beads hold life, memory, and ancestral connection, much like seeds carrying the growth potential. In Erdrich's novel spiritual reconnection is needed.

"Native American beadwork is a timeless art form, woven deeply into the cultural fabric of Indigenous tribes across North America. This intricate craft goes far beyond decoration; it serves as a means of storytelling, cultural preservation, and spiritual expression. Each bead, each stitch, and every chosen color hold meanings that connect the maker to nature, community, and ancestry" (Derrick, 2024:5).

In many Native American cultures, beadwork is more than decoration – it is a sacred act that weaves together identity, history, and the unseen world, the essence. When Rozin sews bead patterns reflecting her daughter's wild soul, she is not simply decorating cloth. She is weaving identity, recording spirit, and participating in an ancient act of spiritual connection.

"According to traditional Native American belief systems, everything is a source of 'power', and as a result it should be revered. The traditional Native American believes that each living thing in Nature has a spirit of its own, in addition to being connected to and part of the Great Spirit" (Lake-Thom,1997:8). The Great Spirit is called Wakan Tanka in the Native American universe of spirits.

This sacred act of beading is similar to the way in which stories and memories are passed down across generations; stories are told and retold, cultural memory having a paramount importance. The question posed in the final pages – "Who is beading us?" (Erdrich, 2002:240) – is food for thought, it invites us to reflect on the unseen forces shaping human lives. Just as thread disappears beneath the surface of fabric, so, too, do spiritual patterns run beneath the surface of our choices, loves, and sorrows. The beadwork becomes a map of the soul, and its invisible stitches mirror the workings of fate and memory.

Erdrich's novel highlights the mythic conception of time. Family histories recur in patterns, echoing Native American cosmologies where ancestral myth goes hand in hand with cultural memory. Naming ceremonies and the invocation of old place names like Gakahbekong succeed in anchoring the present in sacred memory; thus, past is interwoven with present.

Time, in this context, is not measured by clocks, but by stories and tales which are told and retold, by songs and lullabies that are sung, by ceremonies and rituals that are both sung and danced, by vision quests as well as by the land itself, which is considered to be the most valuable asset of the Native Americans.

By merging beadwork with cultural memory and ancestral myth, Erdrich reveals a world in which every thread connects to spirit, and every life participates in a design older than itself. In this vision, art is not decoration, it is prophecy. And identity is not a personal construction, but a cosmic inheritance continuously shaped by love, loss, grief and legend.
In her story, Louise Erdrich crafts more than a novel. She offers a ceremonial text woven from ancestral memory, Ojibwa cosmology, spiritual connection and reconnection. Through mythic figures, sacred rituals, and cyclical storytelling, Erdrich reclaims narrative space for Native American identity.

Erdrich's characters are not merely people; they are vessels for spirit, grief, animal wisdom, and cosmic design. By integrating Ojibwa mythology into every thread of the novel – from the creation story of the sewing twins to the transformative powers of beadwork – Erdrich preserves and honors the Native American oral traditions.

"Oral Tradition enriches and brings to life Native American stories in a way that the written word simply cannot. This extends to nearly every aspect of life – from the names they call each other, to the phrases and descriptors they use while speaking, to the nuanced, subtle ways that they communicate, which non-Natives with untrained ears cannot connect with or understand" (Arroyo, 2023:17).

Erdrich does not present myth as a metaphor. It does not represent a substitute living, on the contrary, myth is lived experience. In this lived reality animals guide souls, shapeshifters, such as the Antelope women, test the limits of love, and the dead bring their contribution to the world of the living. "Life is an endless cycle of change" (Mengelkoch & Nerburn, 1993:IX). There is no beginning and no end.

Erdrich's vision is one of continuity – between generations, species, body and spirit wild and tamed. "It is almost miraculous that certain voices, certain books, speak not only to one, but to many generations beyond them" (Mengelkoch & Nerburn, 1993:IX).

Louise Erdrich's novel teaches us that stories are sacred, and that by telling them, remembering them, and weaving them into our own lives, we participate in the ongoing act of creation.

Despite everything the Native Americans have endured, "they do the work of keeping their culture and beliefs alive for the benefit of the younger generations and to honor the people who came before them and suffered deeply – trying to stand up for their own humanity and right to exist" (Arroyo, 2023:158).

The Antelope Wife is deeply rooted in the Native American mythology, the main myth being the Deer/ Antelope Woman. It is also rooted in Ojibwa storytelling as mythic structure. Myth as cultural memory is the shared memory passed from one generation to the other connecting Erdrich's characters to their ancestors and the stories which are told and retold thus shaping the Native American identity.

Cultural memory survives through storytelling embodying the continuity of the Ojibwa tradition. Beadwork is a visual language and a metaphor for destiny. Ancestral mythology is a living force shaping identity and history. Mythology is not superficial, it is not a background. Mythology is structural, it organizes time and space, it builds identity and shapes the world; mythology is the architecture of the world itself.

INITIATORY JOURNEY AND UTOPIA WITH SWIFT AND VOLTAIRE

Mihai Ion
Lecturer, PhD, „Transilvania" University of Braşov

Abstract: Starting from Michel Butor's assertion that travelling and writing are two complementary activities—in the sense that the experience of travelling fuels up the imagination, which in turn is artistically captured by means of writing—the present study explores the literary theme of "journey" in two fundamental works of the Enlightenment: Gulliver's Travels by Jonathan Swift and Candide, or Optimism by Voltaire. Both works create utopian worlds through which the authors satirically address the society, politics, and mindset of the age. At the same time, the study demonstrates that the two books can be structurally classified as belonging to the category of "initiatory journey", although the protagonists do not ultimately reach a higher level of spirituality, but rather undergo a process of disillusionment.

Keywords: initiatory journey; utopia; Enlightenment; absurdity; philosophical satire

Într-un eseu[1] în care își exprimă viziunea asupra artei literare, Michel Butor susține că a călători și a scrie sunt două activități complementare inseparabile: călătoria alimentează imaginația și provoacă schimbarea, iar scrisul o fixează, o ordonează și o transformă în artă. Pentru teoreticianul Noului Roman francez, călătoria nu este doar o deplasare geografică, ci și una cognitivă și existențială – o transformare interioară care modifică perspectiva asupra lumii și, implicit, asupra limbajului.

Călătoria este, înainte de toate, o experiență continuă, o acumulare de trăiri care compun însăși existența călătorului. Fiecare își trăiește organic și nemijlocit propria călătorie, propriul traseu al ființei.

S-a vorbit despre călătorie în termenii unei metafore generalizante – o „pădure de simboluri" (Umberto Eco) prin intermediul căreia imaginarul uman exprimă tranziții și transformări de orice natură. S-a apelat mereu la călătorie, la mobilitatea umană, spre a explica fie semnificația morții, fie structura globală a vieții, fie pentru a codifica trecerile de la o condiție socială/existențială la alta, în rituri inițiatice.

Experiența călătoriei reduce subiectul călător la structura sa esențială, imuabilă; îl transformă, total sau parțial, în plan ontologic. De pildă, Ghilgameș, eroul babilonian, prin călătoria sa în căutarea nemuririi își descoperă natura perisabilă a ființei. Dar pentru această conștientizare, el trebuie să se sustragă din lumea concretă, să-și piardă identitatea socială, de rege al cetății Uruk, și astfel, eliberat de toate determinările anterioare, să ajungă la identitatea sa ireductibilă. La început, ne este prezentat un eu hipertrofiat, care prin experiența călătoriei revine la precaritatea condiției umane, aflate sub zodia morții.

Pe de altă parte, Ulise, eroul homeric, nu suferă o transformare semnificativă; călătoria lui este una circulară[2], care nu aduce schimbări majore – poate câteva achiziții în plan gnoseologic: dobândește știința, cunoașterea superioară, în episodul Sirenelor.

Nu întâmplător am evocat cele două exemple, pentru că ele marchează două paradigme fundamentale ale călătoriei: inițiatică (atunci când subiectul călător realizează un salt ontic) și noninițiatică (în cazul în care călătorul se menține în limitele ontologice inițiale).

În continuare voi analiza două parabole utopice aparținând patrimoniului cultural iluminist, aflate la granița dintre cele două paradigme esențiale ale călătoriei[3]: mă refer la Călătoriile lui Gulliver de Jonathan Swift și, respectiv, Candid sau Optimismul de Voltaire.

Câteva precizări de ordin teoretic sunt, mai întâi, necesare cu privire la conceptul de „utopie" ca gen literar. În acest sens, voi avea în vedere cartea lui Sorin Antohi, Utopica. Studii asupra imaginarului social.

Citându-l pe Alexandru Ciorănescu, Sorin Antohi consideră utopia un gen literar cu reguli rigide, în care imaginația se supune raționamentului, iar încărcătura ideologică influențează structurile literare. Sintetizând definițiile de până la el, Ciorănescu scrie: „utopia este descrierea literară individualizată a unei societăți imaginare, organizată pe baze care implică o critică subiacentă a societății reale"[4]. Acțiunea nu este specifică schemei constructive a utopiilor. De aceea, în absența unui conflict veritabil, nici personajele nu au consistență; eroii sunt în general simple instrumente cu ajutorul cărora autorul își demonstrează teza (ideologia literară). Și astăzi, observă Ciorănescu, producțiile utopice sunt „călătorii fictive de gradul al doilea". Acest tip de călătorii își au originea și sfârșitul în cadrul unei „călătorii fictive de gradul întâi" (realistă sau care speculează efectul de real al verosimilului geografic).

Nu călătoria sau peripețiile ei sunt importante pentru intențiile utopistului, ci descrierea funcționării unei societăți ideale. Sorin Antohi face distincția între utopie și genul său înrudit, voyage extraordinaire, „modalitatea literară care a transmis idealurile utopice noului public ajuns la cuvântul tipărit în secolul al XVIII-lea". Aceste voyages extraordinaires, care uneori includ episoade utopice à la Morus, „pot fi adăugate largii categorii a literaturii de conjectură rațională"[5]. Din această perspectivă, cele două cărți menționate mai sus și vizate de prezentul studiu aparțin mai degrabă genului voyage extraordinaire decât utopiei propriu-zise.

Într-o epocă a utopiilor optimiste, Swift creează prin pesimismul său sumbru o disjuncție în gândirea epocii. Călătoriile lui Gulliver este o operă parabolică, în care discursul narativ se „țese" pe o tramă bogată în semnificații simbolice. Cartea este alcătuită din patru părți; conținutul celor patru călătorii ciclice în spații existențiale distincte și fabuloase. În fiecare dintre ele, în mod progresiv și simbolic, eroul descoperă sensul existenței umane. Ca în proza lui Kafka sau teatrul lui E. Ionescu, în Călătoriile lui Gulliver trecerea din realitatea cotidiană în lumea imaginației se face printr-o lentă „irealizare a realității", prin infuzia unor elemente fabuloase în spațiul lumii reale, imanente.

Narațiunea începe în maniera obișnuită a romanelor cu aventuri marinărești. După un naufragiu, tânărul chirurg Lemuel Gulliver descoperă Lilliputul, țara piticilor de cincisprezece centimetri. Aici, unde eroul pare un uriaș înțelept și localnicii sunt ridicați în palmă pentru a discuta cu ei, pasiunile lor sunt la fel de mari și devastatoare. Semnificațiile satirice ale alegoriei sunt evidențiate prin procedeul analogiilor posibile. Referințele la Anglia sunt ușor reperabile în text (de pildă, vocabularul locuitorilor acestei insule este semnificativ: „Tribnia" și „Langden" sunt anagramele cuvintelor „Britain" și „England" etc.). Antagonismele dintre cele două partide, dictate de criteriul tocurilor mai înalte sau mai mici de la pantofi, sau de opțiunea pentru un capăt sau altul în care trebuie ciocnite ouăle, rapacitatea regelui, venalitatea miniștrilor intriganți sunt detalii care constituie cronica de moravuri a unei lumi fabuloase, „mulajul" lumii reale la o scară redusă.

Călătoria în Brobdingnag prezintă o altă perspectivă, răsturnată, plasând eroul într-o țară în care toate dimensiunile sunt augmentate în raport cu lumea reală. Prezentă în scrierile filozofice și științifice ale epocii, viziunea relativizantă a realității este asociată cu motivul literar al „lumii răsturnate". Lumea uriașilor imaginată de Swift este una prin excelență grotescă. Raportul dintre erou și uriași este conceput din această perspectivă (proporțiile firești sunt anulate; eroul își pierde statutul ontologic inițial, devenind un mic pinion în angrenajul existenței reconfigurate). Modificarea scării prin exacerbare în acest topos grotesc reflectă ideea relativității și instabilității existenței umane.

Cele două călătorii constituie două viziuni existențiale în care perspectiva antropocentrică este mereu prezentă. Dar imaginea omului ca măsură a universului este pusă sub semnul întrebării în cea de-a treia călătorie, în Laputa, țara savanților nebuni. De la detaliul grotesc și criteriul relativizant se face saltul spre universul absurd. Principala temă abordată este folosirea științei în scopuri neutilitare. Locuitorii Laputei sunt complet absorbiți de preocupările lor savante, de abstracțiuni și teorii, lipsindu-le simțul practic. Modul lor de gândire devine astfel inoperant pentru beneficiul societății. Prinși în plasa absurdului, savanții Academiei din Lagado încearcă să scoată raze de soare din castraveți, hrană din excremente și praf de pușcă din gheață. Lumea irațională descrisă în această călătorie îi conferă episodului valențele unei utopii negative. Imaginea „lumii răsturnate", în care nonsensul proliferează la nesfârșit, subliniază atât precaritatea condiției umane, cât și procesul de dezumanizare a omului.

Acest proces este împins până la limitele lui extreme în ultima călătorie existențială, în Houyhnhnms, țara cailor înzestrați cu rațiune. „În această epocă a utopiilor literare, – notează Romul Munteanu – când Voltaire schițează imaginea idilică din Eldorado, Montesquieu concepe «insula troglodiților», iar mai târziu, Goethe «provincia pedagogică», Swift construiește și el o lume utopică, aparent luminoasă. Dar în acest univers cu proporțiile răsturnate, păstrătorii marilor valori morale, care nu au în vocabularul lor cuvântul minciună, și au ridicat la rangul unui superlativ de existență dragostea, prietenia și bunăvoința, nu mai sunt oamenii, ci caii"[6].

Omul apare la Swift deposedat de atributele sale majore. Meschini, răi, pătimași, oamenii-yahoo sunt niște făpturi degradate, aparținând periferiei existenței:

Nimeni până la Swift nu a rostit o judecată atât de gravă asupra condiției umane. Confruntând ființa umană cu o perspectivă fără speranță, el aduce în istoria utopiilor literare o viziunie unică.

Ne putem întreba în ce măsură se poate vorbi despre o călătorie inițiatică a lui Gulliver. Romanul lui Jonathan Swift este în primul rând o satiră socială, politică și filozofică, nu un bildungsroman în sens clasic. Totuși, structura narațiunii și transformările prin care trece eroul permit o interpretare în cheia călătoriei inițiatice. De pildă, parcurgerea mai multor „lumi" cu rol de încercări: Gulliver trece prin patru tărâmuri – Lilliput, Brobdingnag, Laputa și țara Houyhnhnms – fiecare reprezentând o „probă", o etapă de învățare, o lume simbolică ce îi testează percepțiile. Apoi, protagonistul descoperă adevăruri ascunse despre lume și despre sine. Lui Gulliver i se dezvăluie treptat limitele propriei societăți: în Lilliput vede ridicolul puterii și al politicii mărunte; în Brobdingnag își vede propria cultură din perspectiva unui „uriaș moral"; în Laputa înțelege absurditatea intelectualismului rupt de realitate; la Houyhnhnms descoperă o societate „rațională" care îl face să se rușineze de umanitate. Un alt argument în favoarea călătoriei inițiatice este faptul că personajul central suferă o transformare interioară: Gulliver dezvoltă o autocritică radicală, își schimbă complet raportarea la propria specie, la final respingând compania semenilor după ce a cunoscut idealul rațiunii la Houyhnhnms.

Pe de altă parte, se pot identifica și elemente care limitează interpretarea inițiatică. De exemplu, inițierea nu îl conduce pe erou la o armonizare, ci la o ruptură. În loc să ajungă la o formă de înțelepciune aplicabilă lumii reale, Gulliver devine mizantrop și dezechilibrat. De asemenea, scopul lui Swift este satira socială, nu formarea spirituală a eroului. Transformarea lui Gulliver este intenționat dusă la extrem pentru a critica viciile omenești, nu pentru a arăta evoluția unui inițiat.

Așadar, cartea lui Swift poate fi interpretată ca o călătorie inițiatică, dar una paradoxală, construită în cheie satirică, în care protagonistul parcurge o serie de „încercări" care îi schimbă percepția asupra lumii, dar sfârșește nu în iluminare, ci în alienare.

Călătoriile lui Gulliver nu rămân fără ecou în cultură. Voltaire, între alții, va folosi motivul „călătoriei" ca pretext literar pentru a construi un univers imaginar absurd.

Teză sortită celei mai fragile cariere, credința lui Leibniz că întreaga categorie a posibilului se manifestă în jurul nostru numai prin ce are mai bun a eșuat în derizoriu. A fost o pradă facilă pentru Voltaire, necruțător cu ideile fixe și gata să intervină în disputele intelectuale ale vremii. Candid sau Optimismul este dovada exemplară. Scriitorul francez construiește în această carte un univers epic artificial, simplificarea rațională a faptelor permițându-i să pună în lumină absurditatea unei ordini interioare. Lumea din Candid este concepută ca un haos în care hazardul poate deturna oricând o existență calmă de la traiectoria ei obișnuită.

Referindu-se la specificul universului epic voltairian, Erich Auerbach afirmă că „așa-zisa realitate empirică pe care o construiește Voltaire nu corespunde deloc experienței, ea a fost confecționată în mod artificial, în scop polemic"[7], iar Sorin Antohi observă, în același spirit: „Atâta ontologie redundantă, atâtea peripeții nu sunt decât deghizările unui adevăr dinainte știut"[8]. Cu alte cuvinte, scriitorul își demonstrează teza cu mijloacele narațiunii. Fundalul istoric este un simplu element de recuzită, lipsit de semnificație. Ceea ce contează cu adevărat este ideea, iar personajele și întâmplările sunt de așa manieră alese încât să justifice și să propage această idee. Așa se explică de ce, la fel ca în teatrul absurdului, personajele nu au o consistență psihică, fiind simple entități imuabile, aruncate în existență. „Doctorul Pangloss – notează S. Antohi – demonstrează principiul rațiunii suficiente pe înțelesul tuturor, cu exemple și silogisme populare, reducând luxurianta realitate a unui roman picaresc (împins la absolutul său delirant) la o monotonă regăsire a identicului"[9]. Candid, ucenicul său, cunoaște și el viața, treptat, ca un spectacol absurd, iar Cunigunda, fiica baronului de Thunder-ten-tronckh, „este un fel de material experimental și fals superlativ de existență"[10].

Narațiunea menită să evolueze într-un univers aberant, catastrofic, nu are totuși un caracter tragic. Viziunea antitragică este realizată de Voltaire în maniera lui Swift, prin suprimarea afecțiunii. La aceasta se adaugă tehnica rememorării unor evenimente tragice consumate, care produce un efect de distanțare. Pe de altă parte, lipsa elementelor de contrast creează o anumită monotonie a discursului, pe fundalul căreia catastrofa se diluează treptat până la faptul divers, sfârșind apoi în deriziune.

Alungat din castelul baronului de Thunder-ten-tronckh „cu zdravene picioare în spate" pentru un început de relație amoroasă cu frumoasa Cunigunda, Candid pornește într-o fantastică și aberantă aventură, din plasa căreia nu se mai poate sustrage niciodată. Înșelat de niște escroci, vândut ca soldat în armata bulgară, bătut cu cruzime, Candid, intelectualul naiv și optimist, își reîntâlnește dascălul în Olanda. Înfățișarea jalnică a acestuia marchează primul moment de constestare a optimismului său iremediabil. „Plin tot de bube, cu ochii stinși, cu nasul ros, cu gura strâmbă, cu dinții stricați și vorbind din gât", Pangloss suportă consecințele lecțiilor erotice pe care le dăduse unei slujnice de la curte. Dar Pangloss rememorează circumstanțele contactării bolii venerice cu o anumită detașare, relatarea unei serii de întâmplări nefaste căpătând astfel o tușă comică. Reacția absurdă în lanț pe care o creează Voltaire vizează demonstrarea prezenței răului într-o lume pe care Leibniz o considera „cea mai bună din câte sunt posibile".

Pe tot parcursul narațiunii, personajele se mișcă într-un univers absurd și malefic. Fiind doar elemente de suport ale unei concepții filozofice, ele se supun unor peripeții de dincolo de logică și rațiune: regii dezlănțuie războaie; nobilii se opun fericirii tinerilor îndrăgostiți din prejudecăți de clasă; negustorii și cămătarii (ca neînduratul olandez Vanderdendur, care își mutilează sclavii) storc bani prin toate mijloacele; Inchiziția ucide oameni nevinovați, în numele valorilor creștine; iezuiții creează în Paraguay teocrații riguros organizate ș.a.m.d. Aproape fiecare pagină a cărții poartă în filigran nesfârșitele avataruri ale maleficului.

Există totuși un loc fericit pe pământ, o zonă existențială care are într-adevăr atributele celei mai bune lumi din câte sunt posibile. Este vorba de Eldorado, tărâmul utopic al aurului, în care Candid este transportat după o lungă confruntare cu hazardul. Contrar viziunii sumbre asupra existenței pe care Swift o crease în Călătoriile lui Gulliver, Voltaire construiește în fascinantul episod despre Eldorado una dintre cele mai frumoase utopii pozitive ale secolului al XVIII-lea.

Vorbind despre „paradigma utopiei moriene" (care subsumează cele două cărți ce fac obiectul prezentei analize), Sorin Antohi consideră „izolarea" (plasarea utopiei într-o exterioritate geografică) o constantă fundamentală a genului: „S*imbolul utopiei lui Morus este insula, care înlocuiește Arcadia ca formă exterioară a societății reușite"*[11]. Dar pe când, la Swift, simbolul „insulei" apare explicit, în utopia voltairiană acest simbol este mai degrabă implicit, latent (asimilabil polis-ului platonic, o „insulă urbană în peisajul natural" – cf. S. Antohi).

Fabulosul ținut Eldorado este o lume transreală, o geografie mineralizată, ieșită parcă de sub incidența timpului istoric (bătrânul învățat are 172 de ani):

„Intrară în cel dintâi sat pe care-l întâlniră în drum. La marginea satului câțiva copii îmbrăcați în haine de brocart aurit, toate rupte, se jucau cu bombițe. Cei doi călători din cealaltă parte a lumii se opriră și se uitară cu plăcere la dânșii: bombițele erau destul de mari, galbene, roșii, verzi, și aruncau sclipiri neobișnuite. Călătorii luară în mâini câteva din ele; toate erau numai aur, numai smaralde și rubine".

Utopia lui Voltaire întrunește câteva din idealurile proclamate de gânditorii epocii. Raporturile interumane, cât și acelea dintre individ și Stat nu sunt supuse niciunei norme de constrângere. Într-o țară în care nu există monede, tribunale și procese, nici călugării „care se ceartă, care guvernează, care uneltesc și pun să fie arși pe rug pe cei care nu-s de părerea lor", în care aurul și averea nu au nicio însemnătate, lumea trăiește în tihnă și fericire.

Singura religie în Eldorado este deismul, după cum aflăm din gura bătrânului învățat: „Pot fi oare mai multe religii? spuse el. Religia noastră este, cred, religia tuturora". Așadar, credința locuitorilor din ținuturile sclipitoare este una naturală și universală, constând din nucleul rațional comun tuturor religiilor. O trăsătură importantă a deismului este recunoașterea lui Dumnezeu numai ca pe o cauză primară și impersonală a universului, natura evoluând fără vreo intervenție divină, în acord cu propriile ei legi. Iată ce răspunde bătrânul învățat atunci când este întrebat despre relația oamenilor cu Dumnezeu în Eldorado: „Nu ne rugăm lui, spuse vrednicul înțelept; nu avem nimic de cerut de la dînsul; ne-a dat tot ce ne trebuie și noi îi mulțumim mereu". Așadar, lumea utopică în care descinde eroul voltairian este o imagine specular, o „punere în abis" a ideilor filozofice și religioase ale autorului.

[11] S. Antohi, op. cit., p. 61.

Dar Candid, fire naivă, vine în această lume cu idei preconcepute, care îl vor arunca încă o dată în vechiul univers absurd. Finalul operei reunește oamenii porniți pe trasee existențiale diferite. Într-un asemenea spațiu al hazardului, itinerariul ontic pare a fi construit circular. De aceea, călătoria lui Candid poate fi interpretată ca o veritabilă „odisee a absurdului".

În ce măsură putem vorbi de călătorie inițiatică în Candid sau Optimismul? Există o serie de elemente care susțin această ipoteză. De pildă, structura romanului este una tipică parcursului inițiatic. Protagonistul pleacă dintr-un spațiu protejat (castelul din Westfalia), trece prin numeroase încercări, cunoaște lumi noi, mentalități și sisteme politice diferite, apoi revine la final într-un spațiu stabil, transformându-se interior. Traseul său este cel al unui naiv care devine lucid, ceea ce corespunde unui act de inițiere (trecerea de la ignoranță la înțelegere). Fiecare episod prin care este transportat personajul (războaie, Inchiziția, călătoria în America de Sud, Eldorado, întâlnirile cu Martin, Pangloss, Paquette) funcționează ca trepte ale inițierii într-o viziune realistă asupra lumii. Candid parcurge un proces de transformare interioară, de la optimismul absurd insuflat de Pangloss („totul e spre bine..."), la pragmatismul din final, când își asumă ideea că fericirea reală vine din muncă, nu din teorii filozofice. Formula de încheiere („Trebuie să ne cultivăm grădina") este concluzia inițierii sale: adevărul nu se găsește în sisteme abstracte, ci în acțiunea concretă.

Totuși, nici la Voltaire, nici la Swift (cum am văzut anterior) călătoria nu este una inițiatică în sensul clasic al termenului, deoarece „novicele" nu evoluează spiritual, depășind planul profan. Inițierea este, așadar, rațională și ironică, nu sacră, scopul autorului fiind acela de a ne oferi – cu mijloacele satirei filozofice – o critică a ideilor, nu formarea unui erou.

THE FATHER FIGURE AND MALE AUTHORITY IN IOAN SLAVICI'S GURA SATULUI

Cristina Lizeta Furtună
Lecturer, PhD, Valahia" University of Târgovişte

Abstract: This article analyses Ioan Slavici's novella Gura satului from the perspective of the father figure and the role of the man in the traditional Romanian family. Starting from the central character, Mihu, the study examines how paternal authority is constructed at the intersection of domestic space, economic power, and communal opinion ("gura satului"). The article first outlines Slavici's realist poetics and his constant interest in the peasant family as a moral and social microcosm. It then focuses on the thematic and structural features of Gura satului, highlighting the tension between the normative patriarchal model (arranged marriage, paternal decision, social prestige) and individual affective choice (Marta–Miron). Through close readings of key fragments, the study shows that Mihu embodies a dynamic, negotiable patriarchy: he is at once master of the household and prisoner of public opinion, capable of harsh decisions but also of self-correction and sacrifice. The masculine roles are differentiated: Cosma represents traditional, inflexible paternalism; Toader, the socially "correct" but affectively neuter groom; Miron, the outsider whose masculinity combines physical vigour, artistic sensitivity, and moral verticality. The conclusion argues that Slavici nuances the traditional model of male authority, suggesting that true paternal legitimacy derives less from social control and more from the capacity to place the child's happiness above the fear of communal judgement.

Keywords: Paternal authority; traditional family; masculinity; Romanian realism; Ioan Slavici

From the outset, Gura satului presents itself as a text about the devastating power of communal speech in a traditional village. Yet behind this thematic surface lies a more specific and intricate problem: how male authority is constructed, tested, and finally transformed within the boundaries of the peasant household. The father, nenea[1] Mihu, becomes the privileged point through which Slavici explores the tension between the patriarchal code of honour and the emerging recognition of individual affective rights, embodied by Marta's love for Miron.

The novella thus stages a complex negotiation between three instances of "law": the law of the father, the law of the village, and the law of love. It is on this triangulation that the present analysis concentrates, with particular attention to the way Slavici shapes, in narrative and stylistic terms, a nuanced figure of paternity, at once authoritative and vulnerable.

Any discussion of Gura satului must be grounded in a broader understanding of Slavici's prose. A canonical realist, Slavici is less interested in spectacular events than in the slow, almost imperceptible processes through which moral decisions crystallise. His world is predominantly rural, regulated by unwritten norms concerning property, kinship, and reputation[2]. Within this world, the family functions as a microcosm and a testing ground for ethical choices: inheritance conflicts, arranged marriages, the management of wealth and honour are all mediated through paternal figures who bear the burden of decision. Stylistically, Slavici prefers a sober, economical narration, a third-person voice that adopts, without dissolving into it, the collective perspective of the village. Formulae such as „nu-i stăpân fără stăpân"[3] or „așa-i lumea!" do not merely provide local colour; they express the communal ideology which his characters internalise and against which they sometimes revolt.

[1] In traditional rural contexts, "nenea" conveys a blend of respect, affection, and social recognition. It marks the man as someone of standing—older, experienced, and deserving of polite regard, but without creating the formal distance that English titles like Mr might carry.

In Gura satului, the narrative voice is closely aligned with the viewpoint of the community. The opening characterisation of Mihu is emblematic: „Se și cuvine însă unui om din oameni, ca dânsul, să fie de bună chibzuială, să cumpănească vorbele și să umble mai mult călare decât pe jos."[4] The expression „om din oameni" signals a double legitimacy: Mihu's authority derives from his economic power and from the recognition of the village. His very posture in space – „să umble mai mult călare decât pe jos" becomes a sign of rank. Slavici constructs here a visual emblem of patriarchal authority, where masculinity is inseparable from public visibility and from a ritualised distance between the man of status and the common ground on which others walk.

At the same time, the same narrative voice insists, from the very beginning, on the fragility of this authority. Mihu's status as „om bun" is set against a general anthropology of human weakness: „Nu-i vorbă, răi sunt oamenii, încât mai răi nici n-ar putea să fie. Chiar și acela pe care toată lumea îl știe de bun își are ceasurile de răutate"[5]. Paternal goodness is not an essence, but a precarious equilibrium maintained under constant pressure from passion and pride. This pressure is largely mediated by the community, condensed in the formula „gura satului"[6]: „Să te ferească Dumnezeu să nu cazi pe gura satului."[7] The proverb functions as an axiomatic statement about the real centre of power: above the father there is the village, above the „stăpân" there is a „stăpân" more powerful, namely opinion. The internal hierarchy of the household („nu-i stăpân fără stăpân") mirrors and is overcoded by an external hierarchy, in which even the wealthiest man is, ultimately, accountable to „ce zice lumea".

This dependence on communal judgement structures Mihu's behaviour in his own home. The apparent domestic supremacy of Safta – „Safta face să treacă de stăpână în casă" – does not invalidate patriarchal order but rather reveals its mediation. When Safta „începe să facă gură", Mihu „caută să-i facă pe plac, numai să scape de urechile vecinilor". His concessions are not evidence of a matriarchal takeover, but of a specifically masculine concern: to protect the household from scandal. The father's authority is exercised primarily in the symbolic realm, as guardian of the family's honour and reputation; he yields in minor domestic matters in order to preserve his capital where it truly matters. Already here, Slavici draws a subtle distinction between two levels of masculine power: the visible, ceremonial authority, and the backstage, anxious labour of maintaining a good name.

The figure of the daughter is introduced precisely as an extension of this symbolic capital. The narrator notes that, as she grows, „i se lățea stăpânirea, căci — vorba lui nenea Mihu — fata mare-i cinstea casei."[8] The possessive relation is double: Marta belongs to the house, and through her beauty, comportment, and eventual marriage she adds „cinste" to it. Her walks to the „joc", described in an almost painterly manner – „E frumos cum își ține capul, cum își poartă trupul și cum se mlădie la tot pasul"[9] – are framed not only as aesthetic spectacle, but also as social display. The old women and wives at the gate watch her with a mixture of admiration and envy; their comments („Oare cine, soro?" – „Cine altul decât Toderică") immediately connect her image to the question of a suitable husband. The female gaze in the street anticipates and reinforces the paternal gaze at home: both are concerned with the alignment between Marta's attractiveness and an adequate masculine partner.

The relationship between Marta and Toader is, at this stage, a form of social choreography. Dialogue is restricted to formulaic exchanges : „— Ce mai faci, Marto? / — Mulțumesc de

[6] In the traditional Romanian village, gura satului functions almost like an unwritten law or a moral tribunal. It shapes behaviour, enforces norms, and can both elevate and destroy a person's honour. People fear it because it represents the power of collective judgement, often exaggerated, intrusive, and impossible to escape.

întrebare, bine! / — Nenea Mihu ce mai face? / — Mulțumesc, face bine că-i sănătos."[10] The repetition of politeness phrases and the careful mention of parents („Nenea Mihu", „Leica Safta") show that their interaction is less a space of personal intimacy than a public performance of good manners. Even the moment when Toader invites Marta to dance – „— Să jucăm una, Marto. / — Dacă vrei, Toderică." – is framed by his gesture of ostentatious generosity: „Toader atunci bagă mâna stângă în șerpar, scoate un pumn de bani, îi aruncă lăutarului și strigă: — Acum, una pe pofta mea!"[11] Masculinity here is defined by wealth, display, and the ability to command the musicians. The couple functions as an ideal projection of the village's expectations: „Prea se potrivesc tinerii la stare și la făptură, prea sunt deopotrivă în sat și-n șapte sate!"[12] The „gura satului" does not invent this pairing, but amplifies and solidifies it, transforming compatibility into destiny.

The entry of Miron destabilises this framework. His figure is constructed from the start as ambiguous: both perfectly integrated and radically other. Everyone knows him – „toată lumea știa că este Miron oierul" – yet „nimeni nu se întreba de unde vine și unde descalecă". His masculine attractiveness is described in terms that go beyond the village norm: „Înalt și mlădios, cu umerii lați și cu pieptul ieșit", his steps make „întregul trup" sway, attracting the collective gaze. The physical description culminates in his face: „Un cap bălan cu părul lung până pe umeri, cu o față albă și străbătută ca de-o răsuflare de rumeneală, cu doi ochi mari și albaștri ca fața cerului privită de pe culmea muntelui."[13] The simile „ca fața cerului privită de pe culmea muntelui" locates Miron at the intersection of nature and the transcendent, endowing him with an almost mythic aura. Importantly, this masculinity is tinged with sadness and reflection: „Totdeauna e în această față ceva ce nu se mai găsește în alte fețe, un fel de tristețe, un văl de gânduri."[14] In contrast to Toader's exuberant social presence, Miron embodies an interiorised, contemplative masculinity, still robust but deeply marked by feeling.

The episode at „Fântâna Corbului" crystallises the affective triangle between Marta, Miron, and, in absentia, Mihu. Here, the social group disperses, and for once Marta remains alone with Miron, deliberately resisting the norms of propriety: „— S-au dus toți! grăi Miron îngrijat, când se văzu singur cu Marta. / — Nu-mi pasă! îi răspunse Marta încălzită. Cântă mai departe."[15] The sequence of gestures – Marta sitting next to him, „își rezemă capul de umărul lui", the tremor of Miron who „se simți cuprins de un fel de beție" – proposes a different model of intimacy, based not on social choreography, but on the shared experience of the doină and on verbal confession: „— Marto! Dacă tu ai ști cât de bine mă simt când te văd, când îți aud glasul, când mă privești, dac-ai ști cât de bine mă simt când mă gândesc la tine, nu știu cum, dar parcă ar trebui să plângi."[16] Marta's answer („— Știu, Miroane! […] fiindcă și eu mă simt bine când sunt aproape de tine."[17]) seals the mutuality of feeling. This is the moment when the daughter escapes the circuit of paternal arrangements and communal expectations, entering a realm in which love articulates its own law.

The narrative, however, does not abandon the perspective of the father. When, after the failed logodnă, Safta comes to Mihu and reports Marta's turmoil – „mereu suspina, mereu se zvârcolea în culcuș și plângea prin vis de se înăbușea" – the paternal reaction is violently ambivalent. On the one hand, he acknowledges the pain: „Știi că nu ne mai rămâne nici câine, nici pisică dacă pleacă ea. Toată casa se duce cu dânsa." On the other, he refuses categorically any change of plans: „Cum s-ar putea să mai schimbăm un lucru care e pus la cale? Primesc oamenii lui Cosma, oameni de cinste, cu care nu te poți juca, le dau vorba mea, satul întreg știe… și apoi, țop, ca din senin, să-mi calc vorba pe care am grăit-o cu multă chibzuială și să mă fac de râsul lumii![18]" The key phrase is „să mă fac de râsul lumii": paternal identity is still tied, at this point, primarily to public coherence between word and deed. The individual suffering of the daughter is subordinated to the integrity of the father's public persona.

The revelation of Marta's love for Miron produces in Mihu a deeper crisis. When Safta, after many hesitations, admits: „e cioban de la munte", followed by „Și Marta îl iubește? – Da, încât se prăpădește", his reaction is encoded in physical and verbal spasms: „Mihu căzu pe un scaun de lângă masă, își rezemă capul în pumni și stete câteva clipe tremurând de zguduire. — Mi-ați mâncat viața! strigă el după aceea, ridicându-se. Ce să mă fac? Mai bine îi sucesc gâtul decât să mă fac de râsul și de batjocura lumii!"[19] Here Slavici exposes the underside of patriarchal control: beneath the façade of calm „chibzuială" lies a man paralysed by the fear of ridicule, for whom the idea of being „de râs" is almost equivalent to moral death. The violent threat („Mai bine îi sucesc gâtul") marks the point at which paternal love, communal pressure, and masculine pride collide.

The decisive turning point is the face-to-face confrontation between father and daughter. When Mihu, carried away by anger, calls Miron „ticălos", Marta replies with dignity and inner fire: „Taică! nu zice că e ticălos, căci îți batjocorești fata!" The rebuke is significant on multiple levels. First, it asserts a direct link between the evaluation of the beloved and the respect for the daughter: the father cannot degrade one without degrading the other. Secondly, it subtly overturns the hierarchy: for a brief moment, the moral authority appears to reside with Marta, not with Mihu. Her subsequent plea is all the more powerful because it combines obedience with autonomy: „Nu am să-l uit în viața mea, dar niciodată n-am să vă vorbesc despre dânsul. […] Nu cer să-l mai văd, dar doresc, taică, să-l vezi și tu, apoi mărită-mă după cine vei voi."[20] She accepts the formal structures of paternal decision („mărită-mă după cine vei voi"), but only after insisting on the father's obligation to know, not just to judge. In philological terms, one might say that the text moves from a model of remote authority (the father deciding on hearsay) to a model of experiential authority (the father as witness, who must confront reality directly).

Mihu's interior monologue at this stage is particularly revealing: „Viața îi era ruptă în două", he feels that „nu-i mai rămâne nici o mângâiere", and yet, after long hesitation, he articulates the phrase which marks the first explicit rupture with communal tyranny: „— Dar ce-mi pasă de gura satului!"[21] The narrative voice comments that „după ce rosti aceste vorbe fața lui se schimbă; nu mai era Mihu, omul bun și blând, ci omul bogat, căruia nu-i mai pasă de nimeni."[22] The remark is ironic and double-edged. On the surface, it suggests that, by disregarding the village, Mihu risks sliding into arrogance. At a deeper level, however, the reader perceives that this is the necessary first step towards a more authentic paternity: only by loosening the grip of „gura satului" can the father attend to the real needs of his child.

This process reaches its climax in the scene at the fair, where Miron and Marta return together and stand before Mihu. The narrative tension is high: Safta is „înspăimântată", recognising Miron („«Miron!» își zise ea ca trezită din vis"), while Mihu is „tulburat", unable to understand how this flăcău „de la câmpie" has appeared alongside his daughter. Marta, „cu fața albă, dar liniștită", introduces him with the simple, almost ceremonial formula: „— Tată! iacă Miron!" The directness of the naming, without qualifiers, forces the father to confront the concrete person, not an abstract category („cioban", „ticălos"). When Miron declares: „Știi că- ți iubesc fata: o cer de nevastă", the request is framed in terms of respect and openness: he does not seek elopement or secrecy, but a public, legitimate union.

At this precise juncture, the voice of the old order enters through Pintea, who reminds Mihu that „Marta e logodită și, chiar dacă-i vorba, o logodnă nu se strică așa ca din senin. Nu poți să te faci de rușinea târgului."[23] The language of „rușinii" returns, but now as an external pressure voiced by a collateral male authority. Mihu's answer is short and decisive: „— Ei! Mă fac! Mă fac de rușinea târgului! Mă fac de rușinea lumii! Mie [...] nu-mi mai poruncește nimeni pe fața pământului!" The triple repetition „Mă fac!" expresses both despair and liberation. He knowingly accepts the communal sanction in order to uphold his daughter's happiness. At the same time, he reclaims the core of masculine dignity: „Mie nu-mi mai poruncește nimeni", not because he refuses any norm, but because he chooses to follow a higher one, internalised and linked to love and justice rather than to mere reputation.

The gesture that follows „el se duse la Miron, îi apucă mâna și-i zise cu căldură: — Nepoate, iartă-mă!"[24] completes the transformation of the father figure. Mihu moves from a position of judge to a position of penitent; he asks forgiveness from the man he initially despised as socially inferior. Miron's reaction – „El ridică mâna bătrânului și o atinse cu fruntea"[25] – symbolically restores the hierarchy, but on a new basis: mutual respect. The father's authority is not abolished, but refounded on humility and the recognition of his own fallibility. In terms of the novella's broader architecture, this moment stands as the counterpoint to earlier scenes in which Mihu walked „pe mijlocul uliței, cu capul ridicat", enjoying the deference of villagers. Now, still in public space (the fair), he reveals vulnerability and chooses „rușinea" in order to save his child.

Viewed in this light, Gura satului becomes a complex meditation on male roles within the traditional family. Cosma, with his careful selection of „oameni de frunte" to carry the marriage proposal, represents a more rigid form of paternalism, unwilling or unable to engage with the inner lives of the youngsters. Toader embodies the socially sanctioned, but affectively shallow masculinity, in which the groom is primarily a „fecior voinic", „bun la veselie", „darnic unde-i vorba să se arate". Miron brings into the picture a type of man who is physically strong but also artist, storyteller, bearer of „cântece frumoase" and „doine pline de duioșie", capable of articulating suffering in language. Mihu stands at the crossroads of these models. He begins as a typical „om din oameni", whose main concern is the „cinstea casei", and ends as a father who, after long inner struggle, is willing to sacrifice that very „cinste" in its conventional sense for the sake of a more profound moral truth.

The final pages, which show the passage of time and the rearrangement of the village's matrimonial map, confirm the ambiguous but ultimately positive outcome of this transformation. Vasile and Toader marry other women, Mihu and Cosma become cumetri, and the village adjusts to the new constellation. The text notes that „S-a schimbat casa lui Mihu, s-a schimbat satul, lumea întreagă s-a schimbat; numai Marta rămăsese tot cum a fost, blândă, harnică și totdeauna în voie bună."[26] The phrase suggests a kind of stabilised maturity: Marta's earlier passion has been integrated into a quieter, enduring character. Significantly, although the community at some point does what it always does – „«N-am spus eu că așa are să fie!» zise Floarea lui Ciucur, când văzu că nunta satului tot se face."[27] – the force of „gura satului" appears, retrospectively, weakened. The village appropriates the outcome as if it had foreseen it, but the reader knows that it was the courage of one man – the father – that made it possible.

Slavici's Gura satului offers a sophisticated portrayal of paternal authority in a traditional setting. Far from presenting the father as an unproblematic patriarch, the novella follows Mihu through stages of fear, violence, doubt, and finally sacrifice. The role of the man in the family emerges as both a position of power and a heavy burden of responsibility, placed at the intersection of domestic affection and communal surveillance. By allowing Mihu to pronounce the scandalous „Mă fac de rușinea lumii!" and to act upon it, Slavici opens a space for an ethics of fatherhood which privileges the child's inner truth over the tyranny of public opinion. The male figure is thus redefined not by his capacity to impose decisions, but by his readiness to revise them when confronted with the living reality of his daughter's love. In this sense, Gura satului anticipates modern debates on parental authority and individual freedom, while remaining firmly rooted in the realist depiction of the Romanian village.

A concluding assessment of Gura satului must underline how profoundly representative the novella is for traditional Romanian culture. In many respects, the text functions as both literature and cultural document: it captures, with ethnographic precision and narrative subtlety, the values, social structures, rituals, and psychological mechanisms that governed rural life in the nineteenth century.

First, the very motif of "gura satului" is emblematic of traditional Romanian mentality. In a society where institutional forms of authority were limited, communal opinion operated as the true moral tribunal. The fear expressed in statements like „Să te ferească Dumnezeu să nu cazi pe gura satului" reflects a cultural system grounded in rușine (shame), cinste (honour), and the perpetual negotiation of one's public image. Identity is collective before it is individual, and moral behaviour is regulated not primarily by law, but by the vigilant, often punitive gaze of the community. Slavici captures this mechanism with remarkable fidelity, turning it into both the driving force of the plot and the ethical horizon within which characters act.

Secondly, the novella offers an exemplary portrait of the traditional Romanian family, especially the patriarchal household. The structure of Mihu's home—large, productive, hierarchically organised—mirrors the socio-economic model of the prosperous peasant estate. Elements such as the carved troane of Marta's dowry, the repeated emphasis on cattle, grain, land, and labourers, or the ceremonial visits made by "oameni de frunte" describe a world in which wealth is measured in tangible assets and transmitted through carefully arranged marriages. Matrimony is not merely a private affair, but a communal event that consolidates alliances, reinforces status, and stabilises the social order. The roles of father, mother, sons, daughter, and kin are all inscribed within this network of obligations and expectations.

Thirdly, the novella reflects traditional culture through its portrayal of gender roles. The father embodies authority, the mother mediates, the daughter carries the symbolic capital of the house, and young men display their worth through prowess, work, and public behaviour. Even the language—titles like "nenea Mihu", "leica[28] Safta"—and formulaic exchanges ("Ce mai faci, Marto?") preserve a sociolinguistic authenticity that is characteristic of rural Romanian forms of address and politeness.

Moreover, the communal rituals—Sunday dances, visits, the etiquette of pețit, the logic of zestrea, the long preparations for weddings, public gatherings at the fair—illustrate the rhythm of village life and the moral weight attached to every gesture performed in public. The scene in which Marta's dowry is laid out in front of the house so that „toată această bogăție sta dezvelită în vederea tuturora" reveals a culture in which visibility is integral to social identity: what is seen and acknowledged by the community becomes real and valuable.

Finally, the novella also embodies a distinctly Romanian synthesis of fatalism and moral agency. Characters often speak through proverbs, invoking destiny and inherited custom, yet the plot turns on moments of personal choice—especially Mihu's renunciation of the fear of „rușinea târgului”. This tension between tradition and moral self-determination is deeply rooted in Romanian cultural consciousness and gives Gura satului a representative psychological depth.

In sum, Slavici's Gura satului stands as one of the most faithful literary representations of traditional Romanian rural culture. It captures the ethos of the peasant world—its hierarchies, rituals, anxieties, and forms of solidarity—while offering a nuanced analysis of the mechanisms through which community and family shape individual destiny. Through its detailed rendering of customs, language, moral codes, and social dynamics, the novella serves not only as a work of fiction, but also as a window into the foundational structures of Romanian traditional identity.

BETWEEN WORD AND WORLD: ROMANIAN ARS POETICA IN TRANSLATION

Bianca Han
Lecture, PhD, UMFST „G.E. Palade" of Târgu Mureş

Abstract: This study examines the evolution and translation of ars poetica within Romanian literature as a form of artistic self-definition and cultural identity. Focusing on five canonical poets - Tudor Arghezi, Lucian Blaga, Ion Barbu, Nichita Stănescu, and Ana Blandiana - the study analyses how each author conceptualises the poetic act as transformation, revelation, or moral testimony. By comparing the Romanian originals with variants of their English translations, the paper explores semantic, prosodic, cultural, symbolic, and metapoetic shifts that occur through linguistic mediation. Employing a comparative-contrastive framework grounded in translation theory (Bassnett, Venuti, Jakobson), the analysis highlights the tension between untranslatability and creative equivalence. The findings suggest that, while translation inevitably alters sound and rhythm, it can preserve and even enhance universality by exposing the cultural essence of Romanian poetics to global discourse. The ars poetica thus emerges as both a national and a translingual statement: a dialogue between word and world, where poetry transcends its linguistic boundaries to assert a universal aesthetic of faith, irony, and revelation.

Keywords: Ars poetica; translation studies; comparative literature; poetic identity; cultural transference

The term ars poetica -the art of poetry- originates from Horace's Epistula ad Pisones (Ars Poetica, ca. 19 BCE), one of the earliest manifestos of literary theory. (Howatson, 2013: 75) Across centuries, the expression has come to designate any poetic text in which the poet reflects upon his own creative process, the nature of art, and the role of the poet. In Romanian literature, the ars poetica tradition not only defines artistic identity, but also mirrors the cultural trajectory of a nation that evolved from rural symbolism to modernist introspection and postmodern reflexivity.

This study explores the ars poetica as a self-defining genre within Romanian poetry, focusing on five representative authors: Tudor Arghezi, Lucian Blaga, Ion Barbu, Nichita Stănescu, and Ana Blandiana. It examines their poems both in the Romanian original and in their English variants of translation, analysing the transformations that occur through linguistic, stylistic, symbolic, and cultural transfer. Through a comparative and contrastive approach, the paper aims to demonstrate how Romanian poetic identity has been articulated, preserved, or transformed in translation, and how universality arises from the tension between untranslatability and creative equivalence.

An ars poetica is inherently metapoetic: it speaks about poetry through poetry. It is self-referential, performing both as text and as commentary on the act of writing. According to Roman Jakobson, poetic language emphasizes the "message for its own sake" foregrounding form, rhythm, and sound over referential content. (1959: 233) Susan Bassnett notes that when such language is translated, "the text becomes a negotiation between two poetics, two ways of perceiving the aesthetic function" (2014: 84).

In the context of translation, ars poetica presents particular challenges. The translator must convey both what the poem says and how it says it - its tone, structure, rhythm, and metaphoric texture. Lawrence Venuti's concept of the "translator's visibility" underscores that a translation is not a transparent window, but an interpretive act shaped by cultural mediation (2008: 12). In Romanian ars poetica, this mediation often involves transferring deeply national imagery - religious symbols, folk motifs, rural metaphors - into a language less bound to agrarian or Orthodox tradition.

This study employs a comparative-contrastive methodology, combining literary analysis with translation studies. The analysis focuses on four layers: semantic equivalence (accuracy of meaning); formal equivalence (rhythm, sound, and structure); cultural equivalence (the preservation of poetic worldview and emotional tone) and symbolism (metapoetic considerations).

The Romanian ars poetica evolves alongside the nation's cultural modernisation. In the early 20th century, modernism and expressionism introduced a self-conscious reflection on art, paralleling European trends. Tudor Arghezi redefined poetic language as an act of alchemy - turning "mud" into "honey"- while Lucian Blaga turned poetry into a philosophical meditation on mystery. Ion Barbu merged mathematics and myth, constructing a hermetic poetics of form and purity. The neo-modernist period (1960s–1980s) brought a new dimension: the poet as linguistic creator and existential witness. Nichita Stănescu made language itself the subject of poetry, exploring the limits of expression, while Ana Blandiana infused it with ethical transcendence and metaphysical faith.

Each of these poets wrote texts that can be read as poetic manifestos, explicitly or implicitly articulating their beliefs about art, language, and humanity.

Tudor Arghezi's Testament (1927)

Arghezi's Testament, opening his landmark volume Cuvinte potrivite (Well-Chosen Words), is perhaps the quintessential Romanian ars poetica. It declares poetry as a moral inheritance and an act of transfiguration: the poet transforms the suffering and hardship of his people into beauty. Our analysis considers the variant of translation rendered by Daniel Ioniță.

Testament, de Tudor Arghezi	Testament, by Tudor Arghezi
Nu-ți voi lăsa drept bunuri, după moarte,	I won't leave much to you beyond my death,
Decât un nume adunat pe o carte,	A name inside a book perhaps, a breath,
În seara răzvrătită care vine	In the rebellious evening, that ensues,
De la străbunii mei până la tine,	As my ancestors send to you their dues,
Prin rapi și gropi adânci	Through pits and furrows deep,
Suite de bătrânii mei pe brânci	Scaled by my old folk in an angry creep,
Și care, tânăr, să le urci te-așteaptă	That now await your youthful climb be done,
Cartea mea-i, fiule, o treaptă.	This book is but a simple step, my son.
Așeaz-o cu credința căpătâi.	Set it, in faith, as first and foremost guide,
Ea e hrișovul vostru cel dintâi.	And never put this holy writ aside,
Al robilor cu săricile, pline	For it belongs to slaves with loaded bales
De osemintele vărsate-n mine.	Of ancient bones, through me becoming tales.
Ca să schimbăm, acum, intâia oară	So that we're now translating, in a blink,
Sapa-n condei și brazda-n calimară	Spade into pen and furrow into ink,
Bătrânii au adunat, printre plavani,	My old folk gathered from amongst the snares,
Sudoarea muncii sutelor de ani.	Toil's perspiration for a hundred years.
Din graiul lor cu-ndemnuri pentru vite	And from their brogue, with prodding for the herd
Eu am ivit cuvinte potrivite	Some fitting words I issued, undeterred,
Și leagane urmașilor stăpâni.	Cribs for the masters' progeny to come.
Și, frământate mii de săptămâni	And, kneaded for a thousand weeks till numb
Le-am prefecut în versuri și-n icoane,	I altered them in verse and icon true,
Făcui din zdrențe muguri și coroane.	From rags, to flower buds and crowns for you.
Veninul strâns l-am preschimbat în miere,	The venom into honey to transform,
Lăsând întreaga dulcea lui putere	Preserving all its powers sweetly warm.

Am luat ocara, și torcând ușure	I took derision, spinning it demure,
Am pus-o când să-mbie, când să-njure.	And made it sometimes curse and sometimes lure.
Am luat cenușa morților din vatră	The hearth, the dead ones' ashes, fire grown,
Și am făcut-o Dumnezeu de piatră,	I took it and I made it God of stone;
Hotar înalt, cu două lumi pe poale,	A mighty border with two worlds in tow,
Păzând în piscul datoriei tale.	Guarding your duty's peak and all you know.
Durerea noastra surdă și amară	Our deaf and bitter pain, a deadly spin
O grămădii pe-o singură vioară,	I crammed it on a single violin,
Pe care ascultând-o a jucat	That as he listened, promptly learned to dance
Stăpânul, ca un țap înjunghiat.	The master, like a slaughtered goat in trance.
Din bube, mucegaiuri și noroi	From sores, and musty, muddy mold
Iscat-am frumuseți și prețuri noi.	I sprouted beauties, meanings new from old.
Biciul răbdat se-ntoarce în cuvinte	The suffered whip is turning into words
Si izbăveste-ncet pedesitor	And slowly saves, with chastening from my scroll,
Odrasla vie-a crimei tuturor.	The living offspring from the crime of all.
E-ndreptățirea ramurei obscure	The righteousness of an obscure old twig
Ieșită la lumină din padure	Springing to light from forests dark and big
Și dând în vârf, ca un ciorchin de negi	Blooming on top, a bunch of warts asunder,
Rodul durerii de vecii întregi.	The fruit of suffering, an ancient wonder.
Întinsă leneșă pe canapea,	Upon her couch, so lazily now lying,
Domnița suferă în cartea mea.	The princess in my book is suffering, crying.
Slovă de foc și slovă faurită	The writ of fire and the writ created,
Împarechiate-n carte se mărită,	Paired up, inside my book are married, mated.
Ca fierul cald îmbrățișat în clește.	Like grippers hugging iron, hot and strong
Robul a scris-o, Domnul o citește,	Writ by the slave, the master reads it wrong,
Făr-a cunoaște ca-n adîncul ei	Suspecting not that deep within its pages
Zace mania bunilor mei.	My forbears' wrath, silently rages.

Tudor Arghezi's Testament is one of the foundational Romanian ars poetica texts of the 20th century, functioning simultaneously as poem, programmatic statement, and self-reflexive meditation on the genealogy of poetic language. Arghezi constructs poetry as a transmutation of historical suffering, social injustice, and collective memory into a "carte", a book-legacy that the poet-son inherits and replicates. Daniel Ioniță's translation attempts to preserve this layered architecture by balancing semantic precision, formal resonance, and cultural intelligibility, while also transmitting the poem's intrinsic metapoetic mechanisms.

Arghezi's Testament articulates a powerful ars poetica in which poetry becomes both legacy and redemptive labour, transforming ancestral suffering into aesthetic value. The central metaphor of the book as sole inheritance Nu-ți voi lăsa drept bunuri…/Decât un nume adunat pe o carte is accurately preserved in Ioniță's rendering, I won't leave much…/A name inside a book perhaps, maintaining the poem's mixture of humility and solemnity. Likewise, the visceral imagery of collective labour and pain Sudoarea muncii sutelor de ani, Din bube, mucegaiuri și noroi/Iscat-am frumuseți is carried into English as Toil's perspiration for a hundred years and From sores, and musty, muddy mold/I sprouted beauties, keeping Arghezi's alchemical model of poetic creation largely intact.

Formally, Arghezi's compact rhythm and harsh sonic textures cannot be fully replicated in English, but the translation retains a parallel structure and rhetorical progression, including the climactic ethical shift in which the poet turns endured violence into linguistic redemption:

Biciul răbdat se-ntoarce în cuvinte/The suffered whip is turning into words. This helps maintain the poem's internal logic of transformation.

Culturally, the translation conveys the genealogical worldview of the poem, where poetry emerges from the ashes and memories of the oppressed: Am luat cenușa morților din vatră/Și am făcut-o Dumnezeu de piatră, rendered as The hearth, the dead ones' ashes, fire grown,/I took it and I made it God of stone. While certain terms shift connotation (ex. hrișov "holy writ"), Ioniță successfully evokes the spiritual, historical, and moral dimensions of Arghezi's vision.

Crucially, the poem's metapoetic core-poetry as an act of moral restitution and cultural continuity-is preserved through the final revelation that în adâncul ei/zace mânia bunilor mei as deep within its pages/my forbears' wrath silently rages. The translation thus remains a faithful, resonant expression of Arghezi's poetic credo.

Arghezi's diction relies on the contrast between the visceral and the spiritual, a tension that is attenuated in English. The Romanian verse's internal rhythm - its alternating stresses and strident sounds - enhances the alchemical aura. In English, the translation becomes more declarative and less incantatory. Yet, the central message - poetry as transformation - remains intact. Through his ars poetica, Arghezi establishes a new Romanian poetics: one that elevates vernacular speech, valorises manual labour, and blends aesthetics with ethics. As George Călinescu observed, Arghezi's language "creates beauty from the debris of the world," making him the modern alchemist of Romanian poetry. (1941: 156)

Lucian Blaga's Eu nu strivesc corola de minuni a lumii (1919)

Lucian Blaga's Eu nu strivesc corola de minuni a lumii (I do not crush the world's wreath of wonders) stands at the opposite pole from Arghezi's earthy materialism. Here, poetry is not an act of transformation but of preservation. The poet is a guardian of mystery, refusing to rationalise the world. Our analysis considers a variant of translation, performed as an exercise within a translation workshop, with the input of Applied Modern Languages bachelor students of the former Petru Maior University of Tg. Mureș, in 2018, which was exploited in a study Translating literature– always a new adventure (II) Case study: translating Lucian Blaga's 'Eu nu strivesc corola de minuni a lumii', in Studia Universitatis Petru Maior, vol. 25, Philologia, Univ. Petru Maior Publishing House, Tg. Mureş, 2018.

Eu nu strivesc corola de minuni a lumii, de Lucian Blaga	I do not crush the world's wreath of wonders, by Lucian Blaga
Eu nu strivesc corola de minuni a lumii	I do not crush the world's wreath of wonders
şi nu ucid	of the world
cu mintea tainele, ce le-ntâlnesc	nor do I kill în calea mea	with thought the mysteries I meet
în flori, în ochi, pe buze ori morminte.	passing the path of my life
Lumina altora	in flowers, eyes, lips and graves.
sugrumă vraja nepătrunsului ascuns	Other's light
în adâncimi de întuneric,	Smothers the spell of the impenetrable hidden dar eu,	In the deepness of dark eu cu lumina mea sporesc a lumii taină -	But I, şi-ntocmai cum cu razele ei albe luna	I, with my light, enhance the secret nu micşorează, ci tremurătoare	Of the world.
măreşte şi mai tare taina nopţii,	And just how the moon's ghostly beams aşa înbogăţesc şi eu întunecata zare	Do not diminish, but instead cu largi fiori de sfânt mister	Keep spreading the night's wonders with a tremble, şi tot ce-i neînţeles	That's how, I, too, enrich se schimbă-n neînţelesuri şi mai mari	The skyline's chaos

sub ochii mei-	With gravely thrills of sacred mystery
căci eu iubesc	And all that's doubtful
şi flori şi ochi şi buze şi morminte.	Turns into even deeper Doubts
	Before my eyes –
	For I do love
	The flowers, eyes, the lips and graves.

Lucian Blaga's Eu nu strivesc corola de minuni a lumii is widely considered one of the foundational Romanian modernist ars poetica texts - a poetic manifesto that articulates the poet's mission, method, and metaphysical stance. The poem defines Blaga's aesthetic creed: to protect, deepen, and glorify the world's mystery, not to rationalise or diminish it. The study emphasises that this poem explicitly expresses Blaga's "openly declared auctorial intent" and thus stands at the core of his poetic system.

The poem opens with the definitional line: Eu nu strivesc corola de minuni a lumii - I do not crush the world's wreath of wonders. The emphatic I announces a manifest form. As underlined in the above-mentioned study, the poem asserts what the poet does not do: he refuses to harm or diminish the invisible order that surrounds him. This negation is not passive but programmatic - it sets the foundation for Blaga's concept of "knowledge through deepening", an alternative to rational, analytical knowledge, a creed which is reinforced by the following lines: şi nu ucid cu mintea tainele - nor do I kill with thought the mysteries. Reason, as the traditional instrument of comprehension, is here portrayed as dangerous. The poet's mind must refrain from analytic violence; poetry must approach the world with reverence, not domination: thus, the poem proposes a new poetic ethics: the poet preserves mystery, he does not decode it; he amplifies wonder, he does not clarify it.

A crucial structural contrast shapes the poem, i.e. other people's light versus the poet's light: Lumina altora sugrumă vraja/dar eu, eu cu lumina mea sporesc a lumii taină.- Other's light smothers the spell, but I, with my light, enhance the world's secret. This passage could be identified as central to the poem's poetic self-definition. The poet's light is soft, lunar, suggestive, unlike the harsh, rational light of others that extinguishes, smothers, or kills, as Blaga's enlarges mystery, sanctifies darkness, contributes to the world's secret architecture, thus works through intuition, empathy, and silence. This distinction makes the poem unmistakably metapoetic: the poet defines his method of knowing and his creative principle.
Consequently, Blaga's famous simile encapsulates his philosophy: cum cu razele ei albe luna/ măreşte şi mai tare taina nopţii as just how the moon's ghostly beams/keep spreading the night's wonders; the moon, traditionally illuminating, here paradoxically intensifies darkness. This expresses Blaga's notion that poetry reveals the world not by explaining it, but by augmenting its unknown dimension. This image becomes crucial because it demonstrates the poet's deliberate refusal to penetrate mystery. Instead, he works as the moon works: gently, obliquely, illuminating around things, never into them, thus, this moment crystallises the poem as a poetic manifesto of mystery-preserving creativity.

The poem culminates in a profession of sacral love: căci eu iubesc/şi flori şi ochi şi buze şi morminte as for I do love/the flowers, the eyes, the lips, the graves. This love is not sentimental; it is the poet's mode of knowledge. It is through this loving gaze that the poet enriches mystery and avoids destructive rationalism.

Blaga's entire poetic system requires familiarity with his philosophical work; his epistemological categories (luciferic knowledge, mystery, revelation through suggestion) are directly embedded in this final affirmation. Thus, the poem ends with a credo: poetry is an act of sacred preservation and transfiguration.

Eu nu strivesc corola… is unequivocally an ars poetica, as it states the poet's mission of preserving, protecting, deepening and not destroying the world's mysteries. Moreover, the poem defines a poetic method, underlining how the poetic light is distinct from rational illumination; it does not reveal but suggests, envelops, and magnifies the mystery of the world, while articulating a philosophy of knowledge. Blaga's poetry is rooted in a theory of cognition, as the poet practices a form of luciferic knowledge, respecting the limits of human understanding. This ars poetica also formulates a value system, considering mystery as sacred, and the unknown not an enemy to conquer, but a condition of beauty and it identifies love as an aesthetic principle: the poet insists on approaching reality with love, not analysis, making this into his ethical and creative ethos, while describing the poet's relationship to the world as a custodian of wonder, not an interpreter; a guardian of the invisible.

The poem is both a theoretical statement and a performative act, as it enacts what it proclaims. Its fusion of metaphysical vision, lyrical clarity, and philosophical depth explains why it remains one of the most representative and profound ars poetica in Romanian literature. The poem becomes a declaration of the poet's epistemological stance: mystery should be deepened, not solved.

Ion Barbu's Riga Crypto și lapona Enigel (1930)

Although not an ars poetica in explicit form, Ion Barbu's Riga Crypto și lapona Enigel operates allegorically as one. The tale of the fungal king (Crypto) and the northern maiden (Enigel) is a symbolic fable about incompatible forms of existence: instinct versus intellect, matter versus spirit. Our analysis considers an excerpt from the variant of translation rendered by Daniel Ioniță.

Riga Crypto şi Lapona Enigel, de Ion Barbu	King Crypto and The Lapp Enigel, by Ion Barbu
Menestrel trist, mai aburit	Oh, minstrel sad, obscurer still
Ca vinul vechi ciocnit la nuntă,	Than good old wine they serve at weddings
De cuscrul mare dăruit	Which the groom's father dished at will
Cu pungi, panglici, beteli cu funtă,	With bags and ribbons, tinsel meldings,
Mult-îndărătnic menestrel,	Most stubborn minstrel might as well
Un cântec larg tot mai încearcă,	A grand old song to try and sing,
Zi-mi de lapona Enigel	Tell of the small Lapp Enigel,
Şi Crypto, regele-ciupercă!	And good old Crypto, mushroom-king!
– Nuntaş fruntaş!	– Chief here's my grief!
Ospăţul tău limba mi-a fript-o,	Your feast my tongue did burn and sting,
Dar, cântecul, tot zice-l-aş,	I'll sing the song, although not brief,
Cu Enigel şi riga Crypto.	Of Enigel and Crypto king.
– Zi-l, menestrel!	– Sing minstrel, sing!
Cu foc l-ai zis acum o vară;	You sang last summer like a heller;
Azi zi-mi-l strâns, încetinel,	Now sing constrained, on quiet string,
La spartul nunţii, în cămară. […]	At wedding's closing, in the cellar. […]

Ion Barbu's Riga Crypto și Lapona Enigel operates simultaneously as ballad, allegory, and symbolist narrative, and the opening fragment (analysed here) establishes the poem's performative frame: a minstrel is called upon during a wedding feast to recount the enigmatic story of Crypto and Enigel. Crypto, the fungal king rooted in darkness, represents material and instinctive life; Enigel, bathed in sunlight, symbolises transcendence. Their failed union becomes an allegory of poetic aspiration: the impossibility of reconciling purity of form (reason) with the warmth of inspiration (emotion). Daniel Ioniță's English translation variant preserves the scene's semantic coherence and playful archaic tone, though with some predictable losses in phonetic density and cultural specificity.

The Romanian opening Menestrel trist, mai aburit/Ca vinul vechi ciocnit la nuntă is rendered as Oh minstrel sad, obscurer still/Than good old wine they serve at weddings, showing how the translator maintains the comparison between the minstrel's haziness and the intoxication of old wine, though mai aburit (more fuzzy, clouded) becomes obscurer, slightly shifting from sensory to abstract description. However, key referential elements remain intact: lapona Enigel as the small Lapp Enigel preserving ethnicity and diminutive nuance; riga Crypto, regele-ciupearcă as Crypto, mushroom-king, as a clear, semantically faithful rendering of Barbu's whimsical metaphor; Nuntaș fruntaș! as Chief here's my grief! reframes the vocative into a rhyme-compatible form, losing the wedding-specific meaning (nuntaș fruntaș as honoured wedding guest), but retaining the direct address. The minstrel's reluctance Ospățul tău limba mi-a fript-o is aptly captured by Your feast my tongue did burn and sting, keeping the humorous physicality of the line. Barbu's ballad form uses strong end-rhymes, alternating rhythms, and playful internal music. Ioniță reproduces a comparable rhyming pattern (still/will, grief/brief), successfully suggesting the song-like quality required by the minstrel frame.

However, the original's tight tetrameter-like pulse and alliteration: e.g., pungi, panglici, beteli cu funtă lose some of their sonic richness in the more diffuse English: With bags and ribbons, tinsel meldings. The meaning is preserved, but Barbu's characteristic phonetic exuberance is softened. The translation, nonetheless, retains the structure of alternating voices -minstrel and wedding guest- through clear dialogue markers, thus preserving the dramatic rhythm of call and response.

Barbu's world blends elements of folk ballad, Nordic and Balkan folklore, and a cerebral symbolism characteristic of Romanian modernism. Ioniță manages to keep the recognisable cultural cues: the wedding setting (wine, feast, minstrel) is preserved; the term Lapp keeps the exotic northern ethnicity implicit in lapona; the framing of the poem as an oral performance remains intact, maintaining the cultural notion of the storyteller as mediator of myth; some culturally dense expressions (e.g., nuntaș fruntaș) lose their social nuance, but the essential atmosphere (festive, slightly chaotic, traditional) is still conveyed.

The poem's symbolic apparatus is only partially visible in this fragment, yet the translation preserves the essential metapoetic setup: a minstrel is being asked to retell a story that exists within the poem as a poem inside the poem. The repeated requests Zi-mi de lapona Enigel (Tell of the Lapp Enigel) and Zi-l, menestrel! (Sing minstrel, sing!) reflect the tension between artistic creation and audience demand.

Daniel Ioniță's translation demonstrates high semantic fidelity, strong structural and dialogic equivalence, and a commendable effort to echo Barbu's ballad-like musicality. Some culturally specific layers and sonic textures inevitably soften in English, but the translation successfully carries the mythic, playful, and ritualistic qualities that define the poem's framework. The fragment remains an effective English gateway into Barbu's richly symbolic universe.

Barbu's ars poetica emerges from the mythic subtext: poetry is a geometrical ideal, an equation of harmony. His intellectual rigor distances him from Arghezi's visceral aesthetics and Blaga's mysticism. The poem's translation highlights this distance - its crystalline abstraction translates more easily than its phonetic charm, revealing how Barbu's universality lies in structure, not sound.

Nichita Stănescu's Ars Poetica (1970s)

For Nichita Stănescu, language itself becomes the subject of poetry. His Ars poetica is an act of ontological inquiry: what happens when words cease to describe and begin to live? Our analysis considers the variant of translation rendered by Sean Cotter.

Ars Poetica, de Nichita Stănescu	Ars Poetica, by Nichita Stănescu
Îmi învăţam cuvintele să iubească	I taught my words to love, le arătam inima	I showed them my heart
şi nu mă lăsam până când silabele lor	and would not give up until their syllables nu începeau să bată.	did not start to beat.
Le arătam arborii	I showed them trees
şi pe cele care nu vroiau să foşnească	and what words wouldn't rustle le spânzuram fără milă, de ramuri.	I hanged, without pity, from the branches.
Până la urmă, cuvintele	In the end, words
au trebuit să semene cu mine	needed to resemble both me
şi cu lumea.	and the world.
Apoi	Then
m-am luat pe mine însumi,	I came to me, m-am sprijinit de cele două maluri	I braced myself between two banks ale fluviului,	of a river,
ca să le-arăt un pod,	to present a bridge,
între cornul taurului şi iarba,	a bridge between a bull's horn and grass, între stelele negre ale luminii şi pământ,	between black stars of light and earth, între tâmpla femeii şi tâmpla bărbatului,	between the temple of a woman's head and a man's, lăsând cuvintele să circule peste mine,	letting words travel over me
ca nişte automobile de curse, ca nişte trenuri electrice,	like racing cars, electric trains, numai s-ajungă mai iute la destinaţie,	only so they could cross faster, numai ca să le-nvăţ cum se transportă lumea,	only so they would learn to transport the world, de la ea însăşi,	from itself,
la ea însăşi.	to itself.

Stănescu's poem conceptualises poetry as an organic, self-reflexive training of language, in which words must be coaxed, disciplined, and awakened into life. The opening gesture Îmi învățam cuvintele să iubească/le arătam inima" is rendered faithfully as I taught my words to love/I showed them my heart, preserving both intimacy and intentionality. The poem's dramatic imagery of linguistic discipline pe cele care nu vroiau să foșnească/le spânzuram…de ramuri survives in English as what words wouldn't rustle/I hanged… from the branches, maintaining the tension between tenderness and severity in the poet's relationship to language.

Formally, Cotter mirrors the free-verse structure and meditative pacing of the original, carrying through the poem's gradual transition from shaping words to becoming their vehicle. The pivotal self-instrumentalisation m-am sprijinit de cele două maluri…ca să le-arăt un pod appears as I braced myself between two banks…to present a bridge, retaining the image of the poet's body as a structural support for meaning.

Culturally and imaginatively, the translation preserves Stănescu's characteristic mythic-modern blend, including the cosmic comparisons între cornul taurului şi iarba…între stelele negre ale luminii și pământ which appear clearly in English as between a bull's horn and grass… between black stars of light and earth. The kinetic, playful images of language in motion ca niște mașini de curse, ca niște trenuri electrice also survive intact.

Most importantly, the translation conveys the poem's metapoetic insight: that poetry "transports the world" as the Romanian asserts cum se transportă lumea/de la ea însăși, la ea însăși faithfully rendered as to transport the world/from itself, to itself. This philosophical closure encapsulates Stănescu's belief in poetry as a medium through which the world re-encounters and reinterprets itself. Cotter's version thus remains a lucid and culturally sensitive English embodiment of Stănescu's poetics. This brief declaration encapsulates Stănescu's concept of necuvinte ("non-words") - a poetics that transcends conventional language. The Romanian syntax, with its soft alliteration suggests tenderness and circularity. In English, Cotter's version maintains semantic accuracy but inevitably loses the melodic sequence.

Stănescu's ars poetica redefines the poet's role: he is not a craftsman, but a demiurge who animates words with emotion. His metaphors are self-referential - the word as a living organism, the poet as its creator. The English translation, though less musical, preserves the anthropomorphic vision, achieving what Jakobson would call "semantic equivalence without phonetic correspondence." (1959: 238)

Stănescu thus bridges Arghezi's material labour and Blaga's metaphysical intuition: he creates an interior ars poetica where words themselves become beings of feeling and thought.

Ana Blandiana's Eu cred (1984)

Ana Blandiana brings an ethical and metaphysical dimension to Romanian ars poetica. In Eu cred (I Think), she presents poetry as faith, not in religion but in humanity's capacity for transcendence. Our analysis considers the variant of translation rendered by Magdalena Biela.

Eu cred, de Ana Blandiana	I think, by Ana Blandiana
Eu cred că suntem un popor vegetal,	I think we are a vegetal nation,
De unde altfel liniștea	Where from then the peace in which
În care așteptăm desfrunzirea?	We are waiting for defoliation.
De unde curajul	Where from the courage
De-a ne da drumul pe toboganul somnului	To slip on the sleep's slide
	Up to the edge of death,
Până aproape de moarte,	Being sure
Cu siguranța	That we'll be able to
Că vom mai fi în stare să ne naștem	Be born again?
Din nou?	I think we are a vegetal nation –
Eu cred că suntem un popor vegetal-	Who ever saw
Cine-a văzut vreodată	A tree revolting?
Un copac revoltându-se?

Ana Blandiana's Eu cred is a concise, yet philosophically, charged reflection on the Romanian collective psyche, articulated through the central metaphor of a popor vegetal (vegetal nation). The translation by Magdalena Biela achieves strong semantic clarity, preserving the poem's introspective tone and key conceptual images. The opening assertion Eu cred că suntem un popor vegetal is faithfully rendered as I think we are a vegetal nation, maintaining both the tentative epistemic stance Eu cred and the metaphor's abstract density. Lines such as De unde altfel liniștea/În care așteptăm desfrunzirea? become Where from then the peace in which/We are waiting for defoliation, transferring the poem's paradoxical calmness in the face of existential decay, although defoliation introduces a slightly more technical, botanical term than the softer Romanian desfrunzirea.

Formally, Blandiana's simple, free-verse structure and conversational rhythm are closely reproduced. The translation mirrors the poem's short, breath-like lines and maintains the interrogative progression that structures the poet's reasoning. The metaphorical image De-a ne da drumul pe toboganul somnului/Până aproape de moarte appears as To slip on the sleep's slide/Up to the edge of death, preserving the childlike yet unsettling visual contrast between the innocence of a slide and the proximity of death. The English phrase is slightly more literal, with less of the fluid playfulness present in toboganul somnului, but it retains the dramatic movement from descent to near-extinction.

On the cultural level, the poem positions the Romanian people within a framework of passive endurance and cyclical rebirth. The final rhetorical question Cine-a văzut vreodată/Un copac revoltându-se?" is transferred accurately as Who ever saw/A tree revolting? This preserves the culturally resonant idea of stoic quietness, patience, and non-rebellion, all qualities Blandiana subtly critiques. The translation maintains the poem's underlying suggestion of political and historical resignation without over-explaining or distorting the cultural implications.

From the conceptual and metapoetical perspectives, the poem reflects on collective identity through a symbolic, almost ecological lens. Blandiana uses vegetal imagery to articulate notions of survival, regeneration, and passivity. The translation retains the poem's reflective, existential quality, especially in the lines concerning rebirth Că vom mai fi în stare să ne naştem/Din nou? rendered as That we'll be able to/Be born again? This preserves the circular temporality and mythic undertone that define Blandiana's lyrical vision. The English version thus successfully conveys the poem's philosophical meditation on identity, resilience, and the ambiguously gentle fatalism of a vegetal nation."

Overall, Biela's translation achieves a high level of semantic and conceptual fidelity, with minor tonal shifts due to the natural constraints of English botanical vocabulary. It remains an accessible, culturally sensitive rendering of Blandiana's subtle and politically charged poetic reflection.

Blandiana's ars poetica fuses ethics with aesthetics. Poetry is no longer only art - it is moral testimony. Written under the restrictive conditions of late communism, Blandiana's poetic credo elevates literature as resistance. In translation, Blandiana's clarity becomes almost crystalline. The loss of sonic rhythm is compensated by semantic precision. English readers perceive her ars poetica as part of a global discourse of conscience and transcendence.

Across these six poets, the ars poetica reveals a continuum of transformation - from material (Arghezi) to metaphysical (Blaga), intellectual (Barbu), linguistic (Stănescu), and ethical (Blandiana). Despite their diversity, each poet situates the act of writing as a dialogue between self and world, matter and spirit.

In translation, semantic fidelity is largely preserved. However, symbolic equivalence shifts according to cultural expectations: Arghezi's "mud" becomes "decay," transforming social labour into abstract metaphor; Blaga's "corolla" retains its universality, but loses its incantatory rhythm; Barbu's mythic density simplifies into narrative clarity; Stănescu's tenderness becomes intellectual; Blandiana's spirituality remains intact, but reframed through Western religious vocabulary.

Thus, translation negotiates not only between words, but between worldviews. Romanian ars poetica expresses a fundamentally ontological relationship with language - words as being, not just sign. English, however, emphasises communicative clarity, often at the expense of mystical resonance. Romanian prosody, rich in internal rhyme and vowel assonance, resists direct replication. However, translators compensate through semantic rhythm - preserving parallelism and structure. Where sound cannot cross linguistic borders, meaning sustains poetic motion.

The Romanian ars poetica tradition intertwines with national identity. Arghezi's moral labour, Blaga's mysticism, Barbu's intellect, Stănescu's emotional language, and Blandiana's faith all articulate distinct yet converging visions of art as redemption. In English translation, these voices gain universality precisely through difference. The cultural "foreignness" of the imagery - mud, corolla, fungus, prayer - invites interpretation. What is local becomes metaphoric. The translations thus act as mirrors, reflecting Romanian specificity into a broader humanistic light. Venuti's notion of "foreignisation" applies here: by preserving strangeness, the translators allow the Romanian aesthetic to remain distinct, resisting domestication into English norms. The tension between strangeness and accessibility becomes the space of universality.

The Romanian ars poetica constitutes a coherent philosophical lineage - a dialogue about the essence of creation, truth, and transcendence. From Arghezi's transformation of suffering into beauty, to Blaga's sanctification of mystery, Barbu's intellectual rigor, Stănescu's living language, and Blandiana's ethical purity, each poet articulates a stage in the evolution of artistic consciousness. Translation, while inevitably selective, acts as a form of critical interpretation. Through English versions, the Romanian ars poetica enters global circulation not as derivative, but as dialogic. Its power lies in its polyphony: multiple conceptions of the poetic act, united by a faith in language as revelation. Ultimately, the ars poetica in Romanian literature is a statement of cultural resilience. It reveals that poetry, in its purest sense, is both creation and confession, both national and universal. In the interplay between word and world, between original and translation, between voice and echo, the poet's ultimate art lies not in defining poetry - but in continuing to write it.

NEGOTIATING THE LEXICON OF CAPITAL: PEDAGOGICAL PATHWAYS IN TEACHING ENGLISH TO STUDENTS OF ECONOMICS

Ana-Blanca Ciocoi-Pop
Lecturer PhD, "Lucian Blaga" University of Sibiu

Abstract: Teaching English to students of Economics represents an intricate process situated at the crossroads of linguistics, disciplinary knowledge, and critical pedagogy. Unlike general English instruction, which aims primarily at functional communication, English for Economics demands mastery of complex lexical, grammatical, and conceptual structures that reflect the epistemological underpinnings of economic discourse. The field of English for Specific Purposes (ESP) offers a framework for exploring how language both reflects and constructs disciplinary thought. This paper investigates the main challenges, opportunities, and effective pedagogical techniques associated with teaching English to economics students. It highlights issues of linguistic abstraction, metaphorical framing, and cultural variation while emphasizing the potential of task-based, corpus-informed, and digital approaches to enhance both communicative and disciplinary competence. Furthermore, the article discusses how ethics and ideology are embedded within economic discourse, encouraging reflective engagement with the ways language legitimizes certain worldviews. Drawing upon the works of Hutchinson, Waters, Hyland, Swales, and Fairclough, this study advocates for a holistic approach that combines linguistic rigor with critical awareness. The paper concludes by suggesting that English for Economics should not merely teach terminology but foster intellectual agency, empowering learners to participate in global discourses with linguistic confidence and ethical consciousness.

Keywords: ESP; economics; linguistics; pedagogy; holistic approach

1. Introduction: ESP and Economic Discourse

English for Specific Purposes (ESP) has become a defining feature of language pedagogy in the globalized academic and professional landscape. Since its emergence in the post-war period of economic and technological expansion, ESP has evolved from a pragmatic response to immediate communicative needs into a sophisticated theoretical field emphasizing discourse, genre, and identity. Economics, as a discipline, is particularly dependent on English not only for communication but also for conceptualization. The spread of English as the lingua franca of global economics means that mastery of the language shapes who participates in the production and dissemination of knowledge (Hutchinson and Waters 19).

Economic language, however, is not neutral. It constitutes a distinct discourse characterized by nominalization, metaphor, and abstraction. As Fairclough observes, "the linguistic forms of economics are closely linked to its ideological functions" (Language and Power 89). Phrases such as 'the market decides' or 'inflation pressures' personify abstract systems and obscure human agency, framing economic phenomena as natural rather than constructed. Swales's work on academic genres underscores that language is central to the formation of disciplinary communities (Genre Analysis 110). In teaching English to students of Economics, educators must thus navigate a double challenge: introducing specialized vocabulary while cultivating a critical awareness of how linguistic structures shape thought. Economic discourse requires learners to decode complex noun phrases, comprehend lexical density, and interpret data-driven texts that demand precise yet context-sensitive reading. The task is not merely to teach grammar and vocabulary, but to help students internalize the rhetoric of economics—its logic, argumentation patterns, and narrative modes. This integration of language and thought transforms English for Economics into both a linguistic and epistemological endeavor.

2. Challenges in Teaching English to Students of Economics

Teaching English to students of Economics presents a multifaceted set of challenges that span linguistic, pedagogical, and motivational dimensions. Economics students typically engage with abstract theoretical models and quantitative data, which can make linguistic learning appear secondary to numerical reasoning. This perception can lead to limited motivation and engagement. Dudley-Evans and St. John (53) emphasize that ESP teachers must demonstrate the immediate relevance of language to students' academic and professional identities. Economic discourse itself complicates instruction through its dense nominal style - words like 'globalization', 'investment', and 'deregulation' condense entire theoretical frameworks into single lexical items. Fairclough's notion of reification in economic texts highlights how this linguistic style obscures agency and legitimizes certain power relations.

For example, the phrase 'economic downturn' abstracts away from individual decisions, presenting crisis as inevitable. Teachers must therefore guide learners to unpack such linguistic phenomena critically. Furthermore, authentic materials - reports, policy briefs, and research papers - often contain advanced syntax and specialized vocabulary beyond learners' immediate comprehension level. Adapting these without diluting their disciplinary value demands skill and creativity. Large class sizes and limited teaching hours also constrain personalized feedback, while the lack of specialized textbooks forces instructors to curate or design their own resources. Intercultural variation compounds these challenges: the rhetorical conventions of Anglo-American economics - linear argumentation, hedging, and explicit stance-taking - may differ significantly from local academic traditions, requiring instructors to bridge cognitive and communicative gaps.

3. Opportunities and Interdisciplinary Synergies

While the challenges are substantial, teaching English for Economics also offers powerful opportunities for interdisciplinary growth and innovation. Economic discourse inherently connects with social, political, and cultural dimensions, providing fertile ground for critical and creative learning. As Hyland notes, ESP instruction functions as a process of socialization into a community of practice (Disciplinary Discourses 33). For economics students, mastering the linguistic codes of their discipline enhances not only communicative competence but also epistemic access - the ability to think, argue, and produce knowledge like an economist.

The classroom thus becomes a site where students can explore how linguistic forms encode ideological assumptions. By analyzing metaphors such as 'market equilibrium' or 'the invisible hand', learners become aware of how economic reasoning depends on figurative and narrative structures. This awareness cultivates both critical literacy and cognitive flexibility. Interdisciplinary projects - combining economics with sociology, communication, or ethics - allow students to use English as a tool of inquiry rather than mere description. Simulations such as mock summits, policy debates, or economic journalism workshops blend communicative and disciplinary objectives. They allow students to test hypotheses, negotiate meaning, and articulate arguments in ways that mirror authentic professional contexts. Moreover, the integration of authentic materials - news reports, IMF statements, World Bank publications - links language learning with current global realities, enhancing engagement and contextual understanding. These opportunities demonstrate that English for Economics is not merely a subfield of language teaching but a dynamic site of intellectual and ethical formation.

4. Pedagogical Techniques: From ESP to Task-Based Learning

Effective pedagogy for English for Economics must blend theoretical rigor with practical application. Task-based learning (TBL) and corpus-informed instruction represent particularly effective frameworks. Ellis (97) emphasizes that learners acquire language best through purposeful communication rather than mechanical drills. In economics-focused classrooms, tasks can include writing market analyses, simulating investment meetings, or presenting on fiscal policy. These activities integrate linguistic, analytical, and rhetorical skills while reflecting authentic communicative demands.

Genre-based instruction, following Swales (134), further enables students to deconstruct and reconstruct disciplinary genres - reports, abstracts, data commentaries, and position papers. Through this process, students gain control over structure, tone, and rhetorical purpose. Corpus-based techniques enhance these methods by grounding instruction in authentic linguistic evidence. Teachers can use concordance lines from COCA or Sketch Engine to show common collocations like 'macroeconomic stability' or 'consumer confidence'. This data-driven approach allows learners to internalize both frequency patterns and discourse norms. Collaborative learning also plays a vital role. Group projects - such as drafting mock business reports or analyzing case studies—foster teamwork and intercultural communication.

Ultimately, the combination of ESP, TBL, and corpus-informed teaching encourages a learner-centered model that emphasizes inquiry, reflection, and autonomy. Students become not only proficient users of English but also reflective practitioners capable of analyzing how language shapes the discipline itself.

5. Digital Tools and Corpus-Based Approaches

Digital tools have revolutionized the teaching of English for Economics, offering immersive, interactive, and data-driven learning experiences. Corpora such as COCA, the British National Corpus, and the Corpus of Contemporary Business English allow teachers to access authentic examples of language use in professional contexts. Flowerdew (2005) describes corpus-assisted pedagogy as a form of 'discovery learning' that transforms students into investigators of linguistic phenomena.

In addition, AI-assisted translation and writing tools can provide scaffolding for non-native speakers, though instructors must ensure that students engage critically with machine-generated text. Digital collaboration platforms such as Google Docs, Padlet, or Trello enable real-time peer feedback and simulate workplace communication. Economic simulations - such as mock trading platforms or policy modeling tools - enhance linguistic immersion by contextualizing English use in decision-making scenarios.

The multimodality of digital pedagogy also caters to diverse learning preferences. Podcasts, interactive graphs, and economic news videos can help auditory and visual learners grasp abstract concepts. Furthermore, integrating digital tools fosters transferable skills such as digital literacy, data analysis, and intercultural communication - core competencies in the contemporary global economy. However, educators must navigate ethical concerns regarding data privacy, algorithmic bias, and academic integrity when using such tools. Balanced appropriately, digital and corpus-based pedagogies transform ESP classrooms into spaces of critical, creative, and collaborative inquiry.

6. Ethical and Cultural Dimensions of Economic Communication

The ethical and cultural implications of teaching English for Economics deserve explicit attention. As Halliday argues, language is not a transparent medium but a system of choices that encode ideology (Language as Social Semiotic 112). Economic language, therefore, is deeply political. Expressions such as 'labour flexibility' or 'cost efficiency' normalize neoliberal assumptions about human behavior and value. By analyzing such discourse, students learn to see language as a tool of persuasion and power.

Ethical pedagogy in this field involves teaching students to question taken-for-granted terms and to recognize how economic texts influence public consciousness. Moreover, intercultural competence is essential. The rhetorical conventions of Anglo-American economic writing - explicit argumentation, hedging, and self-citation - may contrast sharply with those of Eastern European, Asian, or Arab academic cultures. Teachers must thus facilitate dialogue between differing epistemological traditions. Activities such as comparative discourse analysis or debates on globalization can cultivate awareness of linguistic and cultural diversity in economic communication. In doing so, English for Economics becomes not merely a linguistic discipline but an ethical and intercultural one, preparing students to participate in the moral economy of global discourse.

7. Conclusions

Teaching English to students of Economics is an endeavor that transcends the boundaries of language instruction and enters the sphere of disciplinary meaning-making. It is not merely about teaching vocabulary or syntactic structures but about unveiling how economic realities are constructed, represented, and debated through language. As this study has argued, the challenge for instructors is to navigate between two demands: linguistic clarity and conceptual complexity. Economics, by its very nature, relies on abstraction, metaphor, and dense nominalization - all of which can obscure meaning for learners who approach English as a second or foreign language. The role of the teacher, therefore, becomes that of an interpreter and cultural mediator, guiding students through the epistemological habits of economists and helping them recognize how discourse shapes professional identity.

The opportunities emerging from this intersection are numerous. The teaching of English for Economics offers a fertile ground for interdisciplinary collaboration, allowing language instructors to engage with economists, business professionals, and policy researchers. Such cooperation enriches both domains: economists gain access to clearer communication tools, while language specialists develop deeper insights into how discourse patterns mirror systems of thought and value. This cross-pollination can reshape curricula, encouraging project-based assignments that simulate real economic communication - such as policy briefs, data commentaries, or international negotiations. Through such tasks, students learn not only how to "speak economics" but also how to think economically in English.

In methodological terms, the field must continue evolving from traditional ESP practices toward critical and reflexive pedagogies. Task-based learning, corpus-assisted analysis, and simulation-based teaching have demonstrated clear benefits, but their success depends on how they are framed. The ultimate goal should not be mere linguistic adaptation to professional genres, but the cultivation of critical literacy - the ability to question how those genres reproduce power, ideology, and cultural assumptions. For instance, a task involving financial report writing should not only develop lexical and grammatical precision but also encourage reflection on the rhetorical strategies that legitimize economic authority or conceal inequality. By incorporating such reflexive elements, English for Economics becomes a site of intellectual empowerment rather than passive imitation.

Digital tools further expand these pedagogical possibilities. Corpora of economic texts, automated writing feedback systems, and collaborative online simulations enable teachers to personalize instruction and engage students in authentic discourse communities. However, technology must remain a means, not an end. Teachers should maintain the humanistic dimension of ESP, where language serves as a bridge between understanding and empathy. Economics, despite its numerical foundation, is a profoundly social science - it deals with human behavior, risk, ambition, and morality. Integrating this awareness into language instruction enriches not only linguistic competence but also ethical and cultural sensitivity.

At a theoretical level, the teaching of English to economics students invites a rethinking of the very purpose of language education in specialized domains. It calls for a hybrid pedagogy, one that synthesizes linguistic, cognitive, and affective dimensions. The economics classroom becomes a microcosm of globalization, where linguistic performance reflects larger negotiations of identity, ideology, and belonging. In this sense, English for Economics is more than a branch of ESP - it is a laboratory of global communication, where knowledge, persuasion, and values intersect.

In conclusion, the future of English teaching for economics students lies in embracing complexity rather than simplifying it. Educators must design curricula that balance disciplinary accuracy with creative expression, and analytical precision with critical imagination. The ultimate aim is to enable learners to participate in economic discourse not as mere consumers of language, but as active contributors to its evolution. When students learn to articulate economic thought with clarity, nuance, and awareness of its human implications, they transcend the instrumental view of English as a tool and begin to experience it as a medium of intellectual transformation. In that moment, teaching English to students of Economics becomes not a challenge to overcome, but an opportunity to redefine what education itself can mean in a globalized, interconnected world.

REASSESSING NICOLAE STEINHARDT: BETWEEN ESSAYISM AND LITERARY CRITICISM

Anca Rusu
Assist. Prof., PhD Student, UMFST „G.E. Palade" of Târgu Mureş

Abstract: The present paper reconsiders Nicolae Steinhardt's position within Romanian literary criticism, focusing on the long-standing debate over his dual identity as essayist and critic, as well as the perceived tension between his pre- and post-conversion intellectual profiles. Surveryng assessments by literary critics, the paper demonstrates that Steinhardt's work resists strict critical recognition over time. His method – interdisciplinary, morally charged and marked by generosity of of judgment – combines cultural criticism, philosophical reflection, and an auto-essayistic mode rooted in extensive erudition. Attention is also given to the limits and implications of his field theory, whose mosaic, integrative approach allowed him to navigate the constraints of the 1980s. The paper shows that Steinhardt remains an original and influential figure whose critical practice unites liberal and Christian ethical values, securing his enduring relevance in contemporary literary discourse.

Keywords: Nicolae Steinhardt; dual identity; literary criticism; interdisciplinarity; critical practice

For most literary critics, Jurnalul Fericirii represents the volume that stands at the crossroads between Communism and Post-Communism. According to Steinhardt's posthumous testimony, published in 1991, this marked the beginning of post-communist memoir writing, which in turn marked the liminal phase of cultural transition, still unfinished. However, in terms of the writer's posterity, this publication also represented the catalyst for a major turning point. "The bibliography, objectively fractured by his status as a former political prisoner"[1], in addition to launching him into the daily news, also subjected him to huge pressure in relation to his own biography, as we are talking about an intellectual from the Jewish community, with certain very solid and deeply rooted liberal views and concepts, who was later politically condemned in the famous Noica-Pillat trial, converted to Christianity in prison, was baptized into Orthodoxy, and later entered the monastic life of Rohia Monastery in 1980.

This gave rise to a discreet but persistent controversy, which leads us to the following question: is there or is there not censorship, certain consequences that occurred "between the first and last Steinhardt"[2], consequences that produced and reflected the inner metamorphosis brought about by his conversion and entry into the monastic order at a late age? The first critic to raise this question was Nicolae Mecu, in his study published in the Revista de Istorie și Teorie literară, and he was also the one who gave a negative answer, neutralizing the question. Subsequently, the person who revitalized the research, making it the subject of a broad demonstration (Steinhardt's monograph written by George Ardeleanu) is the author of the afterword to the volume În genul tinerilor, Dan C. Mihăilescu. In the section devoted to the Argument, Ardeleanu states the following: "This monographic study advocates such a balance between the image of the 'first' Steinhardt and that of the 'last' Steinhardt"[3]. After the publication of Ardeleanu's book, the controversy can no longer be the reason for an approach, as it becomes very clear that the intertwining of all periods of the writer's life and moments of creation took place smoothly. Taking on the monk's robe and the trappings of that life led to a certain discretion in his literary creations, with the themes, areas of reading, and interests being, at most, open to reinterpretation, especially in the sphere of autobiographical texts written after his conversion to Christianity.

Another clarification that needs to be brought up is the following question: Is N. Steinhardt just an essayist, or is he also a literary critic? Can he be labeled a critic only in the sense of being open to cultural criticism, a criticism in which the ethics of writing and the moral values of art are in constant confrontation and reconfrontation? Literary criticism is still uncertain about this question, relying primarily on an incomplete but rapidly evolving bibliography. In an article by Nicolae Manolescu dedicated to Steinhardt, he states the following: ”Steinhardt's articles are, despite their brilliant erudition, almost always misinterpretations. Steinhardt is a cultured and intelligent essayist, yet he comes across as an amateur, perhaps because of the diversity of his interests [...]. He seems to know everything about everything. His memory functions like a file. The flip side of these qualities is a certain lack of focus and, above all, a generosity that prevents him from imposing his critical judgments”[4]. Therefore, what prevents Steinhardt from imposing his critical judgments is precisely that open-mindedness, defined by unfixedness and generosity: ”His open-mindedness prevents him from pursuing a strict career as a literary critic”[5].

The critic who places himself within Steinhardt's method, characterizing him as indulgent, is Eugen Simion, who states that his criticism appeals to the public through the subtlety of his moral portrait and, at the same time, through the imagination of his ideas: ”Steinhardt essays rely on a moral aestheticism expressed - and this is where his originality lies - in a language that indulges in Dâmbovița vocabulary [...]. As long as value judgments are not involved, critical discourse conceived and practiced in this way is more than acceptable [...]. Steinhardt criticism is saved from within, appealing through the imagination of ideas and the subtlety of the moral portrait”[6]. Not only Eugen Simion, but also Valeriu Cristea observed and noted the increased weight of the moral component in Steinhardt's essays: ”He is an extraordinary critic who refuses (more precisely: cannot) to be only a critic. He is also an extraordinary moralist, but also a philosopher, jurist, historian, advisor, mentor, almost a preacher, a man who wants to edify”[7].

Steinhardt has the honor of opening the chapter entitled ”Eseistica filosofică și literar-artistică” in the volume Istoria literaturii române de azi până mâine, edited by Marian Popa. He prefers Steinhardt especially for his position as a harsh, acidic, insinuating commentator, with comments directed particularly at the writers of the 1980s, but he also prefers him for his exclamatory style and constant engagement of the reader in the text, just as was the practice in the last century, perceiving him as ”modest in his own opinions, allowing those he comments on to be great, even if not superior, while he remains eclectic in his choices: Enășescu, Tolstoy, Gârleanu, Claude Simon, Valery, Bedros Horasangian, George Vulturescu”[8]. Among the few critics who appreciate and embrace, without doubt, Steinhardt's qualities as a literary critic is Alex Ștefănescu, who considered Steinhardt a professional literary critic, operating with enthusiastic and participatory criticism: ”N. Steinhardt was a professional literary critic. A competent literary critic, capable of evaluating accurately, without literary illusions, and of formulating his opinions decisively, unintimidated by the prestige of authors or their possible vindictiveness. […] The literary criticism practiced by N. Steinhardt is not conventionally laudatory. It is enthusiastic. It is not encomiastic. It is participatory”[9].

The essay remains, therefore, ”the estuary formula in which Steinhardt's spirit and culture are best indulged”[10], identifying him, most often, under this label. He advocates for complete formal freedom, falling into two favorite patterns: welcoming criticism and pretext criticism in order to present critical observations, with continuity even towards literary history and theory. His essays are defined by the illustration of a sub-species, namely the auto-essay, an indirect self-reference that does not refer to the idea of self-scopy, but to that baggage of knowledge, of readings, to his own field and literary field, a concept borrowed from McLuhan, applying his method of spectroscopic field analysis:

”And what is this field of literary work? It is the meaning given to it by series of readers, after publication, which is especially attributed to it by posterity over decades or centuries; it is the attraction and influence it exerts on both the general public and writing professionals [...]; it is the mass of stylistic and spiritual dust that it manages to make its satellite; it is the convergence between the innermost core of the work - the most hidden, most occult, most cherished - and the discoveries made by its beneficiaries, who recognize in it their aspirations, causes, current events, questions, obsessions, and whims; it is a (slow) decoding of indelible lines of force”[11].

This theory of literary fields is also a good cover in a difficult and highly conditioned era such as the 1980s, in order to avoid two major risks. First, it offers a certain justification in relation to the given quality of the entire editorial material, and second, the second risk is represented by the circumstantial obligation to note and record certain authors and book titles, such as Alexandru Căprariu, Vlaicu Bârna, Eugen Barbu, etc. As for the field, it gradually loses its temporal distance from the proposed subject, with Ardeleanu showing how Steinhardt shifts and betrays his theory, not waiting to accumulate all the elements of the field produced with the reception of the entire work, but discussing them simultaneously with the reading: ”Field analysis requires a temporal distance necessary for constructing a history of reception. This raises a series of questions: does N. Steinhardt really take such a history into account when he proclaims, for example, Caragiale’s paradisiacal, deeply Christian view of the world (except, perhaps, for M. Ralea’s perspective), or does he operate [...] with different (or, in any case, that do not overlap perfectly) of the notion of field? Does he not apply the field analysis even in the case of works for which the necessary temporal distance did not exist (at the time of writing the exegetical text)? Does his attention not often focus on the halo of the work, even in the case of contemporary writers?”[12]

Alex Ștefănescu, considered one of Steinhardt’s critics who displays a high degree of objectivity in his texts and criticism, compares Steinhardt, in an article published in România literară, to Ion Sârbu, perceiving him as ”tortured by the desire to communicate”[13]. His thirst for communication is natural, as he has shown a preference for the cultural path since childhood, which he has perpetuated throughout his life, his favorite reason being that he needed to find a way to express himself, to externalize his intellectual side. Writing - embodied in all his essays, volumes, interviews, publications, and correspondence - represented, a means of intellectual, spiritual, and cultural liberation, as well as an attempt at tangentiality or encounter with his neighbor, in order to give him and endow him with the overflow of his heart and mind: ”In the essay genre, he was among the best. A certain ease in navigating culture, European culture and especially classical culture, but also modern culture, as much as was possible for an intellectual like him at that time, quickly established him among the recognized values”[14]. Similar to Seneca, he did not want to keep knowledge only for himself, he wanted to share it with his neighbor, feeling happy every time he had the opportunity to do so. Despite the illnesses and various health problems he suffered from since his youth, his appetite and desire for communication did not diminish at all; on the contrary, it grew significantly over time. Steinhardt practices cultural criticism under the seal of communism, providing opportunities and premises, but at the same time, potential failures. As an interdisciplinary science, cultural criticism is the result of alliances between traditional, aesthetic, anthropological, sociological, imagological, and other types of criticism, covering as wide and integrative areas and fields as possible in relation to the text. Nicolae Steinhardt’s cultural essays are interdisciplinary, associating, combining, or uniting several fields in order to find solutions to the multiple complex problems raised by the socio-cultural sphere; each text taken from the field to which it belongs becomes a specific problem, with a view to discovering new connections or relationships that have the necessary capacity to function when transposed into another field of knowledge: ”Polyphonic, integrative, anti-exclusive, Steinhardt’s cultural essays function as a critical perspective of the think tank type, specific to interdisciplinary groups. [...] It functions on the principle of a mosaic approach. […] Steinhardt's criticism treats the text as an organ permanently destined for transplantation, and this is precisely where the difficult crossroads he reaches comes from. Steinhardt's chronicles and cultural essays fall within the scope of a quasi-poetic, artistic, and therefore quasi-utopian criticism. […] Believing that he can take over a principle of "two-dimensional" painting, Steinhardt sets himself an impossible task, by importing into the field of cultural criticism the pictorial strategies of a painter such as Cezanne, where, through a mosaic approach, the visual itself is silenced or blurred to make way for maximum interference between all the other senses, thus giving the viewer the sensation of holding the painted objects in their hands, rather than simply seeing them. The interdisciplinary approach characterizes most of Steinhardt's aesthetic interventions"[15].

Steinhardt, therefore, can rightly be considered an exceptional literary critic and essayist: "An original, passionate (in his literary writing, as in his sermons), happy man, free of any pride, who would probably have felt very much at home in the postmodern Babel style of our times. Nothing more disinhibiting, after all, than his reading for pleasure, in an eternal split between ideas. Nothing more intelligible to today's reader than the obsession with fearless digressions, formal licenses, or the mix of languages. Obviously, beneath this ornate shell, he (the reader) will find a more than solid structure: the iron discipline of an impressive culture and the result of the unrepeat'able conjunction between the values of conservative liberalism and those of Christian morality"[16]. In a work published years later, Monica Pillat captures, in a special way, that unusual adherence to Steinhardt's presence: "In those unforgettable evenings with my father, with Sergiu Al-George, Theodor Enescu, Alecu Paleologu, Sebi Munteanu [...] he spoke very little, but the excitement with which he participated in the discussions of others was so intense that, even though he didn't say a word, it seemed to me as if he hadn't been silent for a moment. He had the gift of surrounding his peers' revelations or discoveries with an aura of attention that made them feel unexpectedly projected into the center of the universe"[17]. In conclusion, Steinhardt was the writer who brought sobriety to sparkling intelligence, his posterity becoming infinitely and intermittently capacious.

THE CONSTRAINT OF MEMORY – THE CONFESSIONS OF WILLIAM TOTOK

Szilvia Gál
Assist. Prof., PhD, Sapientia University
PhD Student, UMFST „G.E. Palade" of Târgu Mureş

Abstract: This study examines The Constraint of Memory – Notes, Documents, Memories, William Totok's autobiographical and documentary work, situating it within both his literary trajectory and the historical context. The article analyses the generic complexity of this literary work, which is a text that blends autobiography, diary, documentary testimony, creating a multifaceted narrative of political repression. Through first-person narration Totok reconstructs the formation of the Banat Action Group, the mechanisms of surveillance, censorship, and literary persecution, as well as his own arrest, detention and post-release harassment by the Securitate. The study highlights the author's narrative strategies and explores how memory functions simultaneously as testimony, self-definition, and resistance.

Keywords: autobiography; testimony; censorship; literary persecution; resistance

William Totok was born in 1951 in Comloșul-Mare, Timiș County. He is a writer and journalist who has published poems, essays, articles, chronicles, etc. He is one of the co-founders of the Banat Action Group (Aktionsgruppe Banat), named by a journalist in the Neue Banater Zeitung and taken up by its members themselves. The Banat Action Group was a literary circle that was active between 1972 and 1975. Its initial members were Albert Bohn, Rolf Bossert, Werner Kremm, Johann Lippet, Gerhard Ortinau, Anton Strebling, William Totok, and Richard Wagner. The group's goal was to bring together young students from Banat to discuss their creations, whether poetry or prose, to identify themselves as a group, and to succeed in publishing several literary creations. Ernest Wichner's words convey both the spirit of the group and its purpose: "Wanting to get involved in the society we live in through our writing, convinced that literature has a duty to address the issues of the day (...) we wanted to be the avant-garde; we wanted our texts to provoke dance, to awaken and shake up everything that was dusty, old, and ideologically frozen. (...) We did not want to overthrow the regime, but to somehow draw the attention of those in power to the fact that another life was possible (...)" [1]However, this tendency was suppressed by the authorities, and the group was disbanded. Totok is a graduate of the Faculty of Philology at the University of Timișoara, where he studied German and Romanian.

Totok is the author of several works, including Die Vergesellschaftung der Gefühle, Freundliche Fremdheit, Das prompte Eingreifen des Fallmeisters beim Versuch eines Hundes sich eigenmächtig auf die Hinterbeine zu stell, Eiszeit, and Die Zwänge der Erinnerung. Aufzeichnungen aus Rumänien, Ein Lebenslauf. Jüdisches Schicksal in Rumänien 1896-1938. Mit einer Dokumentation zu Ana Pauker, Der revisionistische Diskurs, *Constrângerea memoriei. Totok's work entitled The Constraint of Memory – Notes, Documents, Memories raises a number of questions regarding its classification within a literary genre. First, we must consider the narrative instance. In this work, the author, the narrator, and the main character are identical, so the narrative is subjective because the story is told in the first-person singular and the events recounted are presented from only one perspective. However, we must also take into account the fact that the narrator in The Constraint of Memory – Notes, Documents, Memories attempts to present the events in an objective manner, through the language used and the presentation of the events, because the work includes laws, parts of the investigation, and interviews, which tend to present the events as faithfully as possible. If we also consider the narrator's degree of involvement in the narrative flow, the narrator is homodiegetic with a fixed perspective (the action is perceived by a single character). According to the narrator's status in relation to the narrative level, we have an intradiegetic narrator. And according to Genette's criteria, the narrator can be included in the typology: "internal focus" – when the narrator knows only as much as the character, and in Booth's categorization, the narrator of this type is credible.

The narrator recounts events in chronological order, providing well-founded information, but the events in detention are recounted succinctly, as we would say, briefly and to the point.

This literary creation can be conceived as an autobiography because the identity of the narrator of the events and the hero of the story is the same. We can observe the genesis of personality because the character is in the process of forming his personality. It is a genesis of personality in that the events that took place in detention, such as the repression of personality and torture, change both the person's perception of life and worldly things, as well as their personality. However, an autobiography involves recounting one's own life from the beginning to the present, while the memoir of detention presents the reader with only one stage of life. However, Totok's literary work includes a chapter entitled The Constraint of Memory (instead of an afterword), which briefly brings together the events and feelings accumulated from childhood to the present. It can also be read as a diary because we are reading confessional literature that refers to historical events. It describes the life of a man, which appears to the reader as a subjective history. The events are recounted retrospectively and are dated, but no exact dates are given, only periods. Last but not least, this work also has the characteristics of an interview because it includes several interviews that attempt to decipher the mysteries of that dark period. Therefore, this literary creation can be included in several literary genres because the writer uses several methods of expression.

Iulia Alexa in România literară states that this book is "the story of a reversed odyssey (not of returning, but of leaving home) and an odyssey, through which the author attempts to reconcile himself with this 'home' that brings back painful memories. [3] Gabriel Kohn somehow sums up the essence of the work, arguing that "the volume recounts in a private register the first act of rebellion (a letter sent to Radio Free Europe), ideological adventures (the subversive cultivation of 'true' Marxism as opposed to Ceausescu's totalitarian version), the experience of the repressive mechanisms of that time (denunciation meetings, house searches, interrogations, arrests), the cultural divorce from the Banat Swabian community, the antechamber of exile." The stages of confession

Totok begins by providing a framework for the memories he recounts. First, he describes the situation of artists, especially writers. He talks about the liberalization of the climate around the 1960s, seeing this period as a flowering of literature. During this flourishing period, the Neue Banater Zeitung newspaper played a significant role among the people of Timișoara, dedicating an entire page to publishing the creations of students. Many of the authors who made their debut in the Neue Banater Zeitung became members of the Banat Action Group. This positive period from a literary point of view was followed by a harsh period, which was the result of Decree 153 of April 1970: "Once it came into force, anyone with views different from the official ones could be convicted in summary proceedings for imaginary crimes — without being granted the right to defend themselves or appeal. Those who did not have regular work, or who had lost their jobs for one reason or another (even if they had been fired), could be brought before a court on charges of parasitic living." [5]The quote refers to the collective condition of man, a condition that was not only influenced but also directed and controlled by political power. The narrator makes an open reference to totalitarian tools, i.e., the harmful effects that will occur if written and unwritten laws are not respected by citizens. In the contemporary world, if an individual or a group commits acts against humanity, they have rights, the right to defense, that is, the chance to be heard about their version of a certain situation, their motivation, the cause for which they committed the acts, but after this confession, we can say that justice in the communist system was an abstract term of reference.

The narrator has to deal with the Securitate before being imprisoned for writing a letter to Radio Free Europe. The narrator does not reveal the details of the letter, but we can assume that it described beliefs that were against the party, or that a Securitate agent could interpret as having a negative connotation towards the current political leadership. Because of the letter, he is summoned to the Securitate around the time of his high school exams to identify the person who wrote the letter through graphological evidence, but he is summoned a second time, and this time he does not get off so easily. A captain named Dumitrescu interrogates the hero of the book for eight hours until he confesses to the deed. Why is such importance attached to a letter? The letter, which was anonymous, reveals through the language used that the writer is/may be an intellectual, and the intellectuals, who were not involved in politics, did not fully respect him, were not allowed to, that is, he was not allowed to convey the extreme ideas with which he would infect working-class society. In the writer's opinion, it was a game aimed at sabotaging his admission to the University of Timișoara. On October 22, 1970, he received his draft notice, and while he was in the army, Dumitrescu confiscated the poems from his parents' house. This investigation continued with his exposure and identification as an enemy of the people. But how could they legally carry out this investigation? At that time, it was common practice to conduct literary analyses. Literary analyses were carried out in collaboration between the Securitate and the university. Teachers were called upon to analyze literary texts and write critical analyses of them. Totok managed to obtain a position as a substitute teacher in Borlești, taught German in elementary school, and, despite the obstacles, managed to begin his studies at the Faculty of Philology at the University of Timișoara.

The publication in the literary magazine Neue Banater Zeitung marked the birth of the Action Group, a very important element in his life, through the publication of the article entitled In the beginning was the discussion in the student supplement on April 2, 1972. The group asserted itself through a point of view that took into account the fascist past of their parents' generation. Richard Wagner was the one who put together a kind of theoretical program, which the whole group agreed on:

We must methodically rethink our relationship with the surrounding reality. The specificity of the minority comes only afterwards. The analysis of reality must be at the forefront. A commitment to an imprecise reality (Vietnam, Angela Davis) is not a commitment. A serious concern for the surrounding reality requires a careful understanding of this reality, an understanding that does not ignore certain negative aspects and attitudes—and therefore exercises constructive criticism—but at the same time highlights the positive aspects in poetry. We should express ourselves both critically and laudatory. Wagner adds, in another place: We are the first generation of writers born under the sign of socialism. This produces a different kind of relationship to reality. Compared to our elders, we have the opportunity to observe today's reality in a more unbiased and complex way. But even in such statements, we must exercise restraint. Our parents' education has created false patterns of thinking that can hinder objective viewing. [6]

Therefore, the Action Group aimed to reflect and understand reality as it is, without socialist propaganda or censorship. Rethinking our relationship with reality suggests the existence of an unfaithful reflection of reality. This allusion can be made to writers who wrote literature committed to the system. The specificity, i.e., the literature, culture, history, etc., of minorities can only be understood after this faithful reporting of reality, because if the reality of the majority is falsified, then neither the minority, be it Hungarian, Swabian, etc., is conceived according to the true reality. Only after understanding the minority situation can we act in such a way that it is cultivated and respected, but of course, the specificity of socialism provided for the minimization or rather the purging of differences in order to form a united nation. The members of the group identified themselves as the Action Group thanks to Horst Weber, editor of Die Woche, who read the writings published in the Neue Banater Zeitung, and the Banat Action Group was named in the publication of the Romanian Writers' Union. The group made a name for itself in the field of literature despite the negative experiences of other literary groups, publishing articles, poems, poetry anthologies, and texts. However, their literary activity was heavily criticized. The Securitate infiltrated agents into the Banat Action Group to keep track of the group's every move. Totok himself was criticized in Drapelul roșu by Ioan Cumpănaș. 1974 was a crucial year for the group, as severe censorship of the writings of the authors in the Banat Action Group began. The Adam-Müller Guttenbrunn Literary Circle also joined forces to break up the group. Werner Kremm was the one who accused the group of carrying out activities' hostile to the state. By 1975, the purge of the group was already a known goal. After the jubilee meeting, Totok's brother, Gunter Totok, was arrested, which was important because, during the search of his brother's home, the Securitate managed to confiscate William Totok's hidden writings. Thus, the Securitate's method can be observed: if they fail to catch you in the act, they arrest a family member on an unjustified pretext, using this to gather evidence against the other. The narrator comments in detail on his brother's search and points out all the irregularities. He was also interrogated in his brother's case, but during the interrogation, the investigator always focused on the activities of the Banat Action Group, and the group's activities were considered anti-Stalinist, which would have influenced his brother as well. His brother's investigation ended with his arrest, even though he was allowed a lawyer, but the lawyer was considered an accomplice of the Securitate, and in court his fate was predetermined before anything was said. His brother's case already reveals two injustices: falsification of information and a subjective court. At the same time, the Securitate was working on the group's file based on procedure no. 153/1970: "which was applied to involuntary unemployed persons and persons engaged in political activities not approved by the authorities. According to the decree, punishment was meted out for 'initiating or forming groups of people who, through their behavior, express a parasitic or anarchic outlook on life, contrary to the basic rules of decency and alien to the principles of socialist coexistence, as well as supporting such groups in any way or joining them." [7]The memoirs written about the events leading up to their detention give us the chance to witness a life that was hindered by the system at almost every turn, or at the most important turns.

In detention

Gerhardt Csejka, Gerhard Ortinau, Richard Wagner, and William Totok were arrested in the fall of 1975 for "attempting to cross the border illegally." [8]Totok and his friends were taken to the Jimbolia detention center, where they were interrogated about their intention to leave the country, but the border guards made no secret of the fact that it was the Securitate that had ordered their arrest because their presence and activities posed a threat to the country, more specifically to the political system. Totok points out that they did not receive "special treatment" from the border guards, a fact that also surprised the soldier patrolling the corridor where the cells were located: "An armed soldier with a submachine gun was patrolling the corridor, and he couldn't stop wondering how we had escaped unscathed. (It is known that those caught attempting to cross the border illegally were severely mistreated by border guards. Only after this "special treatment," which was often disfiguring, were they handed over to the militia. Subsequently, they ended up in court, and the punishments were among the harshest." [9]The reason for their arrest was fabricated because Totok had his address listed as Comloșul-Mare in his identity card and had the right to have guests at his parents' house. We can assume that the soldier at the first checkpoint notified the next soldier at the next checkpoint that the suspects targeted by the Securitate had been identified, and at the second checkpoint, they took measures to arrest them. The narrator recalls his memories very precisely: "A second patrol stopped us about 15 kilometers before our destination. (...) About an hour later, a border guard captain named Marina arrived at the scene. On his orders, we were taken by military vehicle to the checkpoint in Comloșu-Mic. After a body search and luggage check, we were told the reason for our detention: attempted illegal border crossing!" [10]After the interrogation, which was like a staged scene, the writers were taken to Timișoara. In Timișoara, the investigation of the writers of the Banat Action Group really began. After their arrest was legalized by the prosecutor, they were taken to overcrowded cells, where six people slept in a cell five meters long and two meters wide. The order in the Securitate cells was explained by an older dean named Petrică. Petrică explained that it was strictly forbidden to address fellow prisoners as "comrade"; at the slightest sound or noise, they had to stand facing the cell wall; they were not allowed to identify themselves by their own names; it was strictly forbidden; they had to identify themselves by the number given to them by the Securitate. Totok bore the number 24. The prohibition on identifying oneself by name can be understood as a process of dehumanization because assigning a number as an identifier imposes the suppression of personality and fundamental human rights. Prisoners, who after a while lost track of time, were forbidden to lie down during the day or to communicate either verbally or through signs. They were forbidden to possess paper, string, shoelaces, razor blades, thread, etc., i.e., any tool that could help them escape, either by suicide or by leaving their cell. In order to check for and combat attempts to escape, or to verify compliance with the rules, the secret police organized surprise checks during which prisoners were searched from head to toe. These searches were in fact tools of psychological terror because the prisoner could never be at ease since the search could happen at any time, at any minute, and if the Securitate considered that a prisoner "deserved" punishment, they also applied physical punishment. The writer himself testifies to the dehumanizing, degrading conditions in which they were forced to live:

None of those who spent a longer period of time in Romanian prisons escaped without serious psychological and physical consequences. Prisoners, deprived of their rights and the possibility of communication, are totally exposed to the whims and degrading procedures of the guards, the interrogators (who in most cases try to extract confessions through brutal methods of torture), as well as their assistants (recruited from among criminals sentenced to long terms, who try to gain certain privileges through collaboration).[11]

These lines give us the prisoner's perspective on prison, but also on the condition of prisoners in general. Laws and rulings specifying prisoners' rights were established in vain, as they were violated without even maintaining the illusion of their existence. Their food consisted of three meals a day, but without protein, vitamins, or fat, which the narrator describes as a "slow process of extermination." Prisoners, especially political prisoners, who were considered enemies of the system and the state, were treated according to the whims of the secret police. So, of course, in many cases, the detainees tried to oppose the authorities or break the rules. According to Totok, forms of resistance and protest included hunger strikes and swallowing spoons. Prisoners who went on hunger strike were placed in solitary confinement. What did solitary confinement mean? Solitary confinement meant that the prisoner, who had very few clothes, was left alone in a very small cell and was not allowed to sleep during the day. Even if he wanted to, he couldn't, because the iron bed without a mattress was only lowered at night, and there were cases when the prisoner was tied to the bed. They received food only twice every two days and a glass of water to drink and wash with. Force-feeding was applied only on the orders of the doctor and the prosecutor, but there were situations when the individual was simply left to starve to death. Swallowing the spoon, in the best case scenario, resulted in the prisoner being admitted to hospital or a simple death certificate in which the doctor listed some cause of death. Attempts to escape were punished with beatings that lasted for hours. Totok recalls an incident that, in his opinion, was treated with enormous cruelty: prisoners were forced to lie naked and handcuffed on the concrete floor of the prison corridor, and the guards beat them with batons. Their screams were recorded and later used to "torment the victims whenever the opportunity arose." Thus, the prisoner was placed in a situation where survival was the only goal.

The trial, Totok's investigation, really began on the second day of his detention. During the interrogations, the investigator's goal was to make him confess that he had carried out activities against the system. The first interrogation focused on Totok's confiscated manuscripts. The interrogator demanded that he admit that the manuscripts were his and that he had distributed those texts. Subsequent interrogations included the following accusations: intent to leave the country—which Totok denied; search of texts—Totok did not admit that they were anti-state, but he did admit that the texts belonged to him: Three Moments, A Text in Six Clarifying Sentences. The texts were considered hostile by the authorities because, in the narrator's opinion, they had been mistranslated into Romanian. These texts were victims of censorship anyway. After this investigation, the writers were released, but Totok's release did not last long. The second arrest took place on November 18, 1975; the exact date of the first arrest is not specified. The interrogation, which the narrator tried to reproduce word for word, focused on the text entitled Romanian Song. The investigator focuses on a verse in which the writer says that students hang themselves and interprets it as an allusion to the cause of so-called socialist misery. Totok rejects this accusation and argues with concrete cases: "Nowhere does it say that students hang themselves because of misery. I had in mind several specific cases that shook me. One of my colleagues tried to take her own life for the second time a while ago, a high school student in Timișoara committed suicide last spring, as did a natural sciences student; and not long ago, a student at the Conservatory hanged herself in her wardrobe..."[12] – Totok reflects the true reality of the system, but investigators claim that these are isolated cases and that he is trying to accuse the system of their deaths by generalizing the cases. However, we do not need to generalize in order to interpret these causes as having been caused by the state, if we think about the system's strong censorship, which restricted the expression of both students and other people, which imposed the verification of the individual at every moment, which resulted in the suppression of freedom, it may be the cause of each person's suicide, because by choosing to end their lives, they found a way to escape. The narrator emphasizes the importance of reporting reality as it is and highlighting situations that need to be resolved: "When I describe something negative about our reality, it does not mean that I am mocking my country or inciting anyone against the order. (...) My criticism is not an attempt to overthrow society. As I said, criticism must be understood dialectically. After all, the goal is to correct a certain situation." [13]However, from the authorities' perspective, reporting on the flaws in the system is a revolting act with which they try to negatively influence citizens. A group of experts from the University of Timișoara was also proposed to analyze the texts, but the actual document of the analysis carried out by the experts is not known. We only know the perspective of the Securitate, but does their perspective also include the opinion of the experts? The system does not encourage multiple interpretations; the work must be clear, written for the homeland. Totok was held accountable under Article 166, paragraph 2 of the Criminal Code.[14] He was moved twice, and each time he had to endure the humiliating procedures of the Securitate – the narrator does not specify exactly what these procedures were – he does not recount in detail the period spent in detention, placing more emphasis on the fact that there were many irregularities, but the Securitate did not take his point of view into consideration. His release was brought about by a letter he wrote in November 1975, which reached the West, more precisely France. On June 21-22, the French newspaper La Monde published an article about him and the Banat Action Group entitled Romania: A poet of German origin is imprisoned for a crime of opinion[15], and on June 29, he was released. Amnesty International put pressure on the authorities to release him, and after his release, his brother was also released. However, their release is attributed to the state, which granted pardons to prisoners by decree, providing for either their release if the case was not so serious, or a reduction in their prison sentences. Why were these decrees imposed at that particular time? They were imposed to maintain the country's leadership's image in the eyes of other countries, such as France.

[13] Ibidem, p. 54.

After detention

While Totok was in detention, he was expelled from university on the grounds of unexcused absences, but it does not take much insight to guess the real reason, which was the investigation of the writer. Despite appeals to several bodies, such as the Ministry of Education, he was unable to regain his place at university. It was not until 1977 that he was able to find employment. The Securitate constantly imposed obstacles, and the terror of the prisoners continued even after their release by making it impossible for them to live a normal life: "The Securitate, while openly monitoring me (as well as the other members of the Group), pursued a subtle tactic. Company managers, who initially agreed to hire me, later gave in to pressure from the Securitate, so that any attempt to find work was doomed to failure."[16] The most spectacular act of the Securitate was in fact the system's well-known method: falsifying the past. Totok was summoned to recant his own letter published in the Frankfurter Rundschau and deny that he had been imprisoned. Totok did not carry out this order. But why is the Securitate, the state itself, trying to defend itself? Because of the Holocaust, because after what happened in Germany, actions against an ethnic or religious group, etc., were not well regarded, and Totok represented not only himself but also the Banat Action Group, which was made up of students of German origin. The problem was that Totok did not remain silent. Despite what had happened, he continued to write and send his work to literary magazines, most of which did not publish it, but the fact that he dared to write was already outrageous. Therefore, the secret police tried to get rid of the "Totok clan" and offered them the chance to apply for permanent departure from the country, but the authorities refused once again. Totok refers to the cases of Paul Goma, Herta Müller, and other writers persecuted by the Securitate, thus offering a synthesis of the literary perspective and condition.

The narrator of this memoir is very precise in providing evidence, as articles of law, decisions, poems, etc. are included so that the reader can understand the events and be as credible as possible. and to understand his situation, more precisely to hold each member involved in his trial accountable, he interviewed people such as former Securitate officer Roland Vasilevici, former prosecutor Iosif Burcă, and former literary expert in the case of Prof. Dr. Corneliu Nistor. After reading these interviews, one can conclude that all those involved in his trial have the excuse of fear of political power.

First, there is an interview with Prof. Dr. Corneliu Nistor, who was a member of the team that carried out the literary expertise on Totok's texts. The questions in the interview focus on the literary expertise, i.e., how it was carried out, what they wrote in that expertise, and whether he knew about the consequences of the expertise. Prof. Dr. Corneliu Nistor states that they did not write anything against Totok: "William Totok: I was arrested on the basis of this text, which was read to me. Corneliu Nistor: The arrest was illegal, because the text did not incriminate you. It turns the whole thing upside down. I'm starting to feel guilty again, when I know I didn't incriminate him. Damn it. Man, they were evil! Framing an innocent person for something, but that was probably the scenario at the time."[17]– Throughout the interview, Nistor maintains that they did not incriminate Totok in any way, that he does not understand why he was arrested when the expert report did not support the claim that the writer, then a philology student, was an enemy of the people, more precisely of the party, but if they did not incriminate Totok, that is, not him, but the words that may arouse suspicion that he helped the investigation against the writer must be reproduced: "It was like living in a nightmare. A crazy world. In a way, I thought they might take revenge on my family. I was a little afraid. Fear is human, and there are moments in life when it comes out. What can I do? I have to get used to living with everything that has happened."[18]– so if we consider the fear aroused by the authorities, the chance of incriminating someone increases because each individual tries to defend their own family, their own friend, or themselves, and the desire to get used to everything that has happened can be interpreted as a tendency to reconcile ourselves with our unfortunate choices. Therefore, through the interview with Prof. Dr. Corneliu Nistor, neither the reader nor the author himself is left with precise truths, but with ambiguous statements.

[16] Ibidem, p. 82.

As for the interview with Iosif Burcă, the former military prosecutor, the questions focus on finding out the connection between the Military Prosecutor's Office and the Securitate. Totok wants to find out about the judicial procedure, how it unfolded, and what steps were taken. Burcă answers the questions about the procedure, but when it comes to the guilt of the Securitate, which also includes the guilt of the prosecutors, he responds by avoiding a concrete answer that would reveal his true opinion about what happened: “William Totok: Do you think the Securitate abused the power it had at the time? Iosif Burcă: Looking back, it can be said that abuses did occur. It's possible, but we didn't know about them, because they kept away from us. When we went to them, usually for inspections, to ensure that they were complying with the law in general, they came up with some pertinent points. They had information, so there were issues we couldn't get involved in. Reflecting on the former prosecutor's statements, it can be deduced that he does not deny that the Securitate used its power without knowing any limits, and it can also be said that it influenced other institutions by simply stating the possibility of abuse of power. However, he does not claim that the prosecutor's office made decisions based on orders from the Securitate because, in his opinion, they did not have specific knowledge about these cases; only in retrospect does he assert that the Securitate committed abuses. But we must ask the question: did they not know or did they not want to know?”[19]

In an interview with former Securitate officer Roland Vasilevici, Totok reproaches him for the fact that even now there is no concrete truth. Vasilevici states that he alone cannot do justice, but why would he be the only one who wanted to confess what happened? And here we have fear, but fear of whom, and why? Vasilevici claims that even in the contemporary world there are powers that would harm him if he confessed everything he heard, saw, and did: Roland Vasilevici: "You don't realize how they guard themselves, what fear they cultivate, how scared people are even now. When it comes to appearing somewhere. Many people contacted me after the aforementioned broadcasts and told me: you took a huge risk, they can finish you off at any time, especially since you started telling some truths. So it's very difficult for me to find two or three people. I would need at least two witnesses."[20]– This interview was conducted in 1995, that is, quite some time after the fall of communism, but people still do not dare to make revelations because of fear. Vasilevici is almost the only one who acknowledged at the time the crimes committed against society, for example, that every literary circle of ethnic minorities was monitored and reports were sent to Bucharest, where the head of the Securitate decided whether the group should be liquidated, but the others do not have the courage to speak out. This tendency can be explained by two reasons: fear of the return of communist power or its continued existence, or fear of society's hatred, which does not understand why they took part in communist demonology.

Totok tries to find out the truth, but each interview reveals that it will be many years before the people in the system make any revelations, that he may never see his arrest clearly, receiving only impressions and opinions rather than clear, well-supported facts. Reading the interviews, the following conclusions can be drawn: The Securitate dictated every step in an investigation, and out of fear, no one opposed it. Out of fear or opportunism?! One could say either, but the interviewees' testimonies do not support opportunism, only fear of power and manipulation of people by the system.

Abstract: A document that is both theoretical and practical on the act of creation and all that it entails, Flaubert's* Correspondence speaks above all of a unique personal experience of a writer who discovers and discovers himself in the act of creation. His letters illustrate all the stages of the literary creation process, from the preparatory stage when the subject is chosen and the good idea is found, to the moment when the writer considers that there is nothing left to correct or modify in the final text.

Document à la fois théorique et pratique sur l'acte de la création et sur tout ce que cela implique, la Correspondance de Flaubert parle avant tout d'une expérience personnelle unique d'un écrivain qui découvre et se découvre dans l'acte de la création. C'est le parcours d'un écrivain qui entretient une relation biunivoque avec son œuvre « en train de se faire ». Il s'agit du type de comportement auctorial spécifiquement flaubertien – le comportement d'un auteur qui intervient sans cesse sur son texte, son travail ressemblant à celui d'un Sisyphe moderne.

Bien qu'elle soit un vrai document sur la France du XIX^{e} siècle, la Correspondance de Flaubert est, avant tout, un « manuel » : « La condition de document (…) est doublée, dans la manière la plus spécifique, de celle de « manuel », de pratique et théorie littéraire, où le plan scriptural arrive à coïncider avec celui existentiel » [1]. Une histoire qui illustre « le devenir d'un écrivain. (…) C'est le récit d'une création acharnée, prise dans les antagonismes de son temps, que nous suivons, par épisodes successifs »[2].

« Travailler », voilà un verbe qu'on ne peut pas éviter lorsqu'il s'agit de l'activité créatrice de Flaubert, et de sa manière de voir le génie, idée qu'on retrouve chez Irina Mavrodin aussi :

Pour Flaubert, « l'inspiration », « le génie » sont le tourment auquel il se soumet chaque jour, le travail épuisant – qui le rend malade et le tue – par lequel il fait son œuvre, la construisant comme un tout où seulement le changement du nom d'un seul personnage supposerait des modifications qui entraîneront la réécriture de tout l'édifice[3].

L'écrivain ne peut pas mener une vie semblable à celle des gens qui n'ont pas de préoccupation artistique. Il n'a pas le temps, ni l'énergie de le faire. Il doit tout simplement être conscient de sa mission et l'assumer avec toutes les conséquences qui en découlent :

Ne nous passionnons point pour le petit, pour l'éphémère, pour le laid, pour le mortel. S'il faut avoir l'air d'être ému par tout cela, prenons cet air, mais ne prenons que l'air. Quelque chose de plus subtil qu'une nuée et de plus consistant qu'une cuirasse, doit envelopper ces natures qu'un rien déchire, et qui vibrent sur toute leur longueur au moindre frottement qui se fait sur eux. - Nous avons à porter (rappelons-nous cela) toutes les passions des autres. Et comment voulez-vous que le vase reste plein, si vous le secouez par les deux anses ? [4].

La perfection est impossible à atteindre, mais pour écrire de façon forte, comme le dit Flaubert, il faut se concentrer sur cette étape préparatoire. Une bonne conception facilite un bon résultat : « Je ne crois pas que l'on puisse tout bien dire. Il y a des idées impossibles (celles qui sont usées, par exemple, ou foncièrement mauvaises), et comme le style n'est qu'une manière de penser, si votre conception est faible, jamais vous n'écrirez de façon forte »[5]. C'est le style qui distingue les œuvres de génie de celles médiocres (« Il n'y a pas en littérature de bonnes intentions : le style est tout »[6]), car seules les premières savent émouvoir, peindre : « Il faut avant tout, dans une narration, être dramatique, toujours peindre ou émouvoir, et jamais déclamer »[7].

Très souvent, l'écrivain est mécontent du résultat de son travail, car il avoue avoir dans la tête un idéal de style qui ne le laisse apprécier ce qu'il écrit que très rarement. C'est le style, le grand style qu'il a cherché toute sa vie, auquel il veut arriver non par un don spontané, mais par un effort de discipline :

Depuis le temps où j'écrivais en demandant à ma bonne les lettres qu'il fallait employer pour faire les mots des phrases que j'inventais, jusqu'à ce soir où l'encre sèche sur les ratures de mes pages, j'ai suivi une ligne droite, incessamment prolongée, et tirée au cordeau à travers tout. J'ai toujours vu le but se reculer devant moi, d'années en années, de progrès en progrès. Que de fois je suis tombé à plat ventre, au moment où il me semblait le toucher ! Je sens pourtant que je ne dois pas mourir sans avoir fait rugir quelque part un style comme je l'entends dans ma tête et qui pourra bien dominer la voix des perroquets et des cigales[8].

Flaubert est donc tout à fait conscient de ce qu'il doit faire pour arriver là où il veut : « Il me manque énormément, l'innéité d'abord, puis la persévérance du travail. On n'arrive au style qu'avec un labeur atroce, avec une opiniâtreté fanatique et dévouée »[9]. Ces mots pourraient surprendre, mais ils témoignent d'une manière de créer, d'écrire et d'être d'une modernité sans précédent, de l'interdépendance et de l'influence réciproque entre l'auteur et l'œuvre en train de se faire[10].

Le style conçu par Flaubert, sa manière de penser veut réunir le rythme de la poésie et la précision du langage scientifique :

J'en conçois pourtant un, moi, un style : un style qui serait beau, que quelqu'un fera à quelque jour, dans dix ans, ou dans dix siècles, et qui serait rythmé comme le vers, précis comme le langage des sciences, et avec des ondulations, des ronflements de violoncelle, des aigrettes de feux, un style qui vous entrerait dans l'idée comme un coup de stylet, et où votre pensée enfin voguerait sur des surfaces lisses, comme lorsqu'on file dans un canot avec un bon vent arrière[11].

Et encore :

Quelle chienne de chose que la prose ! Ça n'est jamais fini ; il y a toujours à refaire. Je crois pourtant qu'on peut lui donner la consistance du vers. Une bonne phrase de prose doit être comme un bon vers, inchangeable, aussi rythmée, aussi sonore. Voilà du moins mon ambition (il y a une chose dont je suis sûr, c'est que personne n'a jamais eu en tête un type de prose plus parfait que moi ; mais quant à l'exécution, que de faiblesses, que de faiblesses mon Dieu !). Il ne me paraît pas non plus impossible de donner à l'analyse psychologique la rapidité, la netteté, l'emportement d'une narration purement dramatique. Cela n'a jamais été tenté et serait beau[12].

Pour que cette démarche tout à fait novatrice se concrétise, les phrases (qui sont pour Flaubert « une unité de style, une unité de travail et une unité de vie »[13]), à l'aide desquelles les idées prennent forme, doivent être claires, nettes :

J'aime les phrases nettes et qui se tiennent droites, debout tout en courant, ce qui est presque une impossibilité. L'idéal de la prose est arrivé à un degré inouï de difficulté ; il faut se dégager de l'archaïsme, du mot commun, avoir les idées contemporaines sans leurs mauvais termes, et que ce soit clair comme du Voltaire, touffu comme du Montaigne, nerveux comme du La Bruyère et ruisselant de couleur, toujours[14].

Ce que Flaubert aime le plus, c'est « la phrase nerveuse, substantielle, claire, au muscle saillant, à la peau bistrée, (…) les phrases mâles »[15].

Pour éviter les répétitions de toute sorte ou les banalités à l'intérieur des phrases, la solution réside dans l'absence de toute marque de la personnalité de l'auteur :

Lorsqu'on écrit quelque chose de soi, la phrase peut être bonne par jets (et les esprits lyriques arrivent à l'effet facilement et en suivant leur pente naturelle), mais l'ensemble manque, les répétitions abondent, les redites, les lieux communs, les locutions banales. Quand on écrit au contraire une chose imaginée, comme tout doit alors découler de la conception et que la moindre virgule dépend du plan général, l'attention se bifurque. Il faut à la fois ne pas perdre l'horizon de vue et regarder à ses pieds. Le détail est atroce, surtout lorsqu'on aime le détail comme moi. Les perles composent le collier, mais c'est le fil qui fait le collier. Or, enfiler les perles sans en perdre une seule et toujours tenir son fil de l'autre main, voilà la malice[16].

Pour que cet ensemble dont parle Flaubert se construise jusqu'à la fin de la rédaction, il faut « que les phrases s'agitent dans un livre comme les feuilles dans une forêt, toutes dissemblables en leur ressemblance »[17]. En plus, chaque phrase joue un rôle important, car chaque phrase doit émouvoir :

Il faut avoir, avant tout, du sang dans les phrases, et non de la lymphe, et quand je dis du sang, c'est du cœur. Il faut que cela batte, que cela palpite, que cela émeuve. Il faut faire s'aimer les arbres et tressaillir les granits. On peut mettre un immense amour dans l'histoire d'un brin d'herbe[18].

Nous comprenons pourquoi Flaubert ne néglige aucune phrase. Le choix d'un mot est minutieusement analysé et la construction d'une phrase prend parfois des jours entiers. Cela parce qu'il est très difficile, sinon impossible, d'exprimer tant de choses en si peu de mots qui, en plus, ne doivent pas se répéter. Lorsqu'il doit changer un seul mot, l'ensemble entier est affecté, d'où les insomnies :

Je suis dans l'agacement des épreuves et des dernières corrections. Je bondis de colère sur mon fauteuil en découvrant dans mon œuvre quantité de négligences et de sottises. Les embarras que me donne un mot à changer me donnent des insomnies[19].

Barthes identifie dans l'effort de Flaubert d'éviter à tout prix les répétitions des mots, et dans la correction substitutive qui en découle, la première des deux croix de l'écrivain (la deuxième étant représentée par les transitions du discours)[20].

Selon Flaubert, les écrivains devraient maîtriser ce qu'il appelle « l'anatomie du style » :

La connaissance qui leur manque à tous, c'est l'anatomie du style, savoir comment une phrase se membre et par où elle s'attache. On étudie sur des mannequins, sur des traductions, d'après des professeurs, des imbéciles incapables de tenir l'instrument de la science qu'ils enseignent, une plume, je veux dire, et la vie manque ! l'amour ! l'amour, ce qui ne se donne pas, le secret du bon Dieu, l'âme, sans quoi rien ne se comprend[21].

La solution serait d'adapter « la plastique du style » aux rigueurs de la langue :

Quelle est la poétique qui soit debout maintenant ? La plastique même devient de plus en plus presque impossible, avec nos langues circonscrites et précises et nos idées vagues, mêlées, insaisissables. - Tout ce que nous pouvons faire, c'est donc, à force d'habileté, de serrer plus raide les cordes de la guitare tant de fois raclées, et d'être surtout des virtuoses, puisque la naïveté à notre époque est une chimère[22].

Et encore :

Mais il y a autre chose dans l'Art que la rectitude des lignes et le poli des surfaces. La plastique du style n'est pas si large que l'idée entière, je le sais bien. Mais à qui la faute ? A la langue. Nous avons trop de choses et pas assez de formes. De là vient la torture des consciencieux[23].

Le problème, c'est que « le mot surcharge la pensée, l'exagère, l'empêche même »[24]. Pourtant, lorsque l'idée est belle et précise, la phrase sera elle-aussi à la hauteur de l'idée qu'elle exprime : « Plus une idée est belle, plus la phrase est sonore ; soyez-en sûre. La précision de la pensée fait (et est elle-même) celle du mot »[25]. Cela respecté, la construction de la phrase devient plus simple et détermine l'auteur à dire :

Je voudrais faire des livres où il n'y eût qu'à écrire des phrases (si l'on peut dire cela), comme pour vivre il n'y a qu'à respirer de l'air. Ce qui m'embête, ce sont les malices de plan, les combinaisons d'effets, tous les calculs du dessous et qui sont de l'Art pourtant, car l'effet du style en dépend, et exclusivement[26].

Toutes ces idées pourraient surprendre, mais l'écrivain les considère essentielles et essaie de convaincre ses confrères de leur justesse :

Non ! sacré nom de Dieu, non ! il ne faut jamais écrire des phrases toutes faites. On m'écorchera vif plutôt que de me faire admettre une pareille théorie. Elle est très commode, j'en conviens, mais voilà tout. Il faut que les endroits faibles d'un livre soient mieux écrits que les autres[27].

Ou encore : « Écrivons, nom d'un pétard ! Ficelons nos phrases, serrons-les comme des andouilles et des carottes de tabac »[28].

En plus, l'idée doit elle-aussi préserver une continuité, sans jamais s'abattre des règles imposées initialement :

La continuité constitue le style, comme la Constance fait la Vertu. - Pour remonter les courants, pour être bon nageur, il faut que, de l'occiput jusqu'au talon, le corps soit couché sur la même ligne. - On se ramasse comme un crapaud et l'on se déploie sur toute sa surface, en mesure, de tous les membres, tête basse et serrant les dents. L'idée doit faire de même à travers les mots. - Et ne point clapoter, en tapant de droite et de gauche, ce qui n'avance à rien, et fatigue[29].

Et encore :

Travaille, médite, médite surtout, condense ta pensée, tu sais que les beaux fragments ne font rien. L'unité, l'unité, tout est là. L'ensemble, voilà ce qui manque à tous ceux d'aujourd'hui, aux grands comme aux petits. Mille beaux endroits, pas une œuvre. Serre ton style, fais-en un tissu souple comme la soie et fort comme une cotte de maille[30].

Pour obtenir cette continuité, la phrase doit être courte et écrite en style indirect : « Je ne dis pas de retrancher les idées, mais d'adoucir comme ton celles qui sont secondaires. Pour cela, il faut les reculer, c'est-à-dire les rendre plus courtes et les écrire au style indirect »[31].

La manière dans laquelle les idées se succèdent est tout aussi importante pour le résultat final :

Ce qui est atroce de difficulté c'est l'enchaînement des idées et qu'elles dérivent bien naturellement les unes des autres. (...) Ce qui fait, moi, que je suis si long, c'est que je ne peux penser le style que la plume à la main et je patauge dans un gâchis continuel que je déblaye à mesure qu'il augmente[32].

Roland Barthes identifie dans ces transitions ou articulations du discours ce qu'il appelle « la seconde croix de l'écriture flaubertienne »[33]. Le but est d'obtenir la fluidité, le rythme optimal du cours de la parole. Par conséquent, le style, à son tour, sera correct, et les dimensions de l'Art dépasseront les limites atteintes auparavant :

Tous les perruquiers sont d'accord à dire que plus les chevelures sont peignées, plus elles sont luisantes. Il en est de même du style, la correction fait son éclat. (...) Tout ne peut pas se dire ; l'Art est borné, si l'idée ne l'est pas. En fait de métaphysique surtout, la plume ne va pas loin, car la force plastique défaille toujours à rendre ce qui n'est pas très net dans l'esprit »[34].

Flaubert connaît donc les caractéristiques de la prose parfaite, du style parfait : « La prose doit se tenir droite d'un bout à l'autre, comme un mur portant son ornementation jusque dans ses fondements et que, dans la perspective, ça fasse une grande ligne unie. Oh ! si j'écrivais comme je sais qu'il faut écrire, que j'écrirais bien »[35]. Il sait très bien où se trouve la force d'une œuvre : « Ce qui fait la force d'une œuvre, c'est la vesée, comme on dit vulgairement, c'est-à-dire une longue énergie qui court d'un bout à l'autre et ne faiblit pas »[36]. Continuité, équilibre, proportion, voilà les coordonnées qui ne peuvent pas manquer :

Il ne faut jamais craindre d'être exagéré. (...) Mais pour que l'exagération ne paraisse pas, il faut qu'elle (la prose) soit partout continue, proportionnée, harmonique à elle-même. Si vos bonshommes ont cent pieds, il faut que vos montagnes en aient vingt mille. Et qu'est-ce donc que l'idéal, si ce n'est ce grossissement-là ? [37].

L'écrivain passera toute sa vie en essayant de mettre en pratique toute cette théorie de la perfection en littérature.

Quel serait le rôle de l'imagination dans ce tableau ? La réponse est à trouver dans une lettre que Flaubert adresse à Louise Colet en 1846 :

L'imagination est plutôt une faculté qu'il faut, je crois, condenser pour lui donner de la force, qu'étendre pour lui donner de la longueur. Paillettes d'or, légères comme de la paille et volatiles comme de la poussière, mes idées ont plutôt besoin d'être mises à la presse que passées au laminoir[38].

D'ailleurs, l'écrivain établit une différence entre imagination et ce qu'il appelle « intuition artistique » :

L'intuition artistique ressemble en effet aux hallucinations hypnagogiques - par son caractère de fugacité -, ça vous passe devant les yeux, - c'est alors qu'il faut se jeter dessus, avidement. Mais souvent aussi l'image artistique se fait lentement - pièce à pièce - comme les diverses parties d'un décor que l'on pose »[39].

Lorsque celle-ci apparaît, il faut donc en profiter et se mettre vite au travail. Mais cela n'arrive pas toujours et il ne reste à l'écrivain qu'à construire l'image artistique en suivant les étapes connues. L'idée que l'écrivain ne doit pas se fier à son inspiration revient toujours dans ses lettres. Elle ne fait qu'altérer la qualité de l'écriture, car elle épuise les forces créatrices de l'écrivain :

Méfions-nous de cette espèce d'échauffement, qu'on appelle l'inspiration, et où il entre plus souvent d'émotion nerveuse que de force musculaire. (...) Je connais ces bals masqués de l'imagination, d'où l'on revient avec la mort au cœur, épuisé, ennuyé, n'ayant vu que des faux et débité que des sottises[40].

Il est tout à fait surprenant de voir comment Flaubert rejette toute implication de l'inspiration dans le processus de création littéraire, considérant qu'elle représente une menace pour un résultat de valeur.

La Correspondance de Flaubert illustre toutes les étapes du processus de création littéraire, du moment où l'on choisit le sujet, jusqu'à celui où l'écrivain considère qu'il ne reste plus rien à corriger, à modifier dans le texte final. La Correspondance propose ainsi un comportement auctorial tout à fait unique, étant un véritable document poïétique qui montre le trajet de l'instauration de l'œuvre et le rapport qui s'établit entre l'écrivain et l'œuvre qu'il est en train d'écrire.

GENESIS. THE LIGHT OF BAPTISM

Emanuel-Daniel Sărmășan
Assist. Prof., PhD, UMFST „G.E. Palade" of Târgu Mureș

Abstract*: Valeriu Anania's poetry has continued throughout his career to be circumscribed by a mystical affiliation, even from the debut of his volume of verse entitled Geneze (Genesis), published in 1971. Each verse or word, carefully selected by the High Hierarch, aims to emphasize that theological, exemplary essence that encompasses the ineffable mystery or even generates the role-playing of existence and, why not, its masks. Certainly, the Genesis did not seem to be but remained charged with that fervor of the entire universe, which denotes the growth and palpation of an inner dimension.

Keywords: nominal value; inexpressible mystery; poetic dimension; aesthetic appeal; lyrical vision; Jesus of Nazareth

Bis zu diesem wichtigen Punkt der These hat sich herauskristallisiert, dass der Schriftsteller Valeriu Anania einem mütterlichen Schicksal unterworfen blieb und dass seine Versifizierung, die oft von einem übermäßigen Hintergrund gespeist wurde, auch in der Logistik der Annotation der Heiligen Schrift überhandnahm. Natürlich blieb dies nicht einer der Hauptmechanismen, nämlich hypothetisch zu beweisen, dass die Übersetzungen des Hohen nur auf das Prinzip der Verskunst reduziert sind, sondern im Gegenteil, dass es auch in dieser Hinsicht einen gewissen Einfluss gab.

Die Poesie von Valeriu Anania war während ihres gesamten Schicksals einer mystischen Zugehörigkeit unterworfen, schon seit dem Debüt des Gedichtbands mit dem Titel Geneze (Genesis), der 1971 erschien. Jeder Vers oder jedes Wort, das der Hohe Hierarch sorgfältig ausgewählt hat, soll jene theologische, lehrreiche Essenz ans Licht bringen, die das unaussprechliche Geheimnis umfasst oder sogar die Rollenspiele der Existenz und, warum nicht, ihre Masken hervorbringt. Sicherlich schienen die Genezen nicht nur von der Begeisterung des gesamten Universums erfüllt zu sein, sondern blieben tatsächlich davon geprägt, was das Wachstum und das Erspüren einer inneren Dimension bezeichnet.

Dennoch bleibt das Urteil über eine Wiedergeburt des materiellen, physischen Universums unangemessen, ja, die Gleichung verzweigt sich sogar spürbar, wenn die Diskussion über eine Welt, die einfach auf innerer Ebene wiederaufersteht, in den Vordergrund rückt. Die Erklärung für Formulierungen, die durch den prinzlichen Wert pedantischer Ausdrücke gekennzeichnet sind, ist ebenso konkret, gerade weil diese Einflüsse auf „übermäßigen Analysen"[1] beruhen, wie der Literaturkritiker und -historiker Vasile Fanache in seiner Publikation Cetatea Culturală (Die Kulturstadt) feststellt. Der Dichter bleibt weiterhin der Theologie treu, jedoch unter dem Einfluss einer einzigartigen und besonderen Plastizität, die ein lyrisches Bild des Erlösers Jesus Christus hervorhebt und aufgrund ihrer vollen Ausdruckskraft bewegt.

Einer der Gelehrten, die dem Stil des Hohen Bartholomäus nahe stehen, stellt ganz klar die Hypothese auf, dass „das gesamte Buch Genesis nichts anderes ist als eine Möglichkeit, sich mit seinem Schicksal im Universum auseinanderzusetzen".[2] Die conditio humana wird durch die Linse jener axis mundi betrachtet, in der ständig eine Atmosphäre der Meditation herrscht, die wiederum durch eine Fülle von Suchen und Finden unterstrichen wird. Der einzige Unterschied besteht in der Tonart, die vom Autor vorgegeben wird, wobei der elegisch-meditative Ton, der im Gedicht Confessio reichlich anzutreffen ist, dem spielerischen Ton des Gedichts Joaca lui din pumn și ghiold (Sein Spiel in Locher und Schubkraft) gegenübersteht, wobei der Titel hier ebenfalls ableitbar ist und sogar noch mehr als das: die jugendliche Präsenz bleibt aus dieser Sicht eines der wichtigsten Themen, durch die Wiederholungen, die anlässlich von Aufrufen oder sogar wiederholten Einladungen zum Spiel ausgesprochen werden. Das Bild des Meeres spielt in diesem Fall eine wesentliche Rolle, da es dem Menschen den Raum der Initiation bietet, in dem das Spielerische gerade wieder Gestalt annimmt, es ist das erste Fenster und die erste Öffnung zum Unendlichen der Göttlichkeit: „Meer, Meer, Reisender/ zwischen Sonne und Quellen,/ wer sitzt unter dem Morgen/ auf deinem heiteren Sand/ und riecht nach krauser Schöpfung/ und Wermutstängeln?/(...) Kommt, Kinder,/ kommt, Kinder,/ das Meer erwacht;/ sagt die Welle mit dem Kavalier,/ singt der Strahl mit der Brandung, / und der Zephir hält die Reihe mit dem Bogen wie der Faden./ (...) Meer, Meer, Reisende,/ dem Kind mit den weichen Knöcheln,/ Meer, Meer, Zauberin, gib ihm seine Beine zurück!"[3]

Die Unermesslichkeit des Meeres, wenn wir diese Argumentation nach der klassischen Symbolik zuordnen würden, stellt den unkontrollierbaren Raum dar, der von sich aus eine Art wiederherstellende Energie mit sich bringt, sogar Chaos, allerdings eine Art fruchtbare Unordnung, die gegensätzliche Valenzen und sogar die Entstehung einer neuen Welt prägt, denn die Präsenz des Meeres in diesem Gedicht belebt das Wesen wieder, stellt die Glieder der autoritären Instanz wieder her, indem es einfach die Kinder anruft, lebendige Geister, die dem gegenwärtigen künstlerischen Rahmen, den der Autor des Gedichts hervorhebt, Farbe und Bewegung verleihen. Der Dichter Valeriu Anania bedient sich der Technik des Meeresbildes in möglichst beschreibenden Nuancen, die diese schützende Präsenz und zugleich die vollständige Infusion von Sicherheit, Wohlbefinden und kontemplativen, visuellen, sensorischen, aber auch olfaktorischen Elementen des Meeres, wie zum Beispiel den heiteren Sand, den Kavalier, den Wermutstängel, der Bogen oder der Zephir. Im Laufe dieses Zyklus wiederholt Valeriu Anania das bildliche Bekenntnis bis zur feierlichen und höchsten Ebene des poetischen Diskurses und folgt dabei dem ununterbrochenen Faden des anamnestischen oder mythischen Zyklus – die bereits in dem Werk mit dem Titel „Simon von Kyrene" zu finden sind. Die beiden literarischen Referenzen, die über Valeriu Anania schweben, Tudor Arghezi und Nichifor Crainic sind während seines gesamten lyrischen Werks untrennbar miteinander verbunden.

Die Literaturkritik setzt ihre tiefgreifenden Untersuchungen fort, wobei sie sich weiterhin auf die großen Geister der rumänischen Literatur konzentriert, und der Literaturhistoriker Alexandru Piru stellt das literarische Werk von Valeriu Anania in die Nähe der Klassiker der rumänischen Poesie, auch wenn die Einflüsse des Hierarchen aus Vâlcea an die hawaiianische Reise erinnern, bewahren sie doch einen Hauch von Rumänischkeit in sich: „Die Gedichte von Valeriu Anania aus dem einzigen Band Geneze – Genesis (Das Rumänische Buch Verlag, 1971) enthalten Anklänge an die Lyrik von Arghezi, undefinierte Sehnsüchte, Träume vom Glück zwischen Leben und Tod, herbstliche Melancholie, Nostalgie nach fernen Ländern:

Nach der Auffassung und Vision von Nichifor Crainic verfolgte das Mönchtum Tudor Arghezi, eine reine Wahrheit, die sich in den Aussagen und Schriften des Mönchs Valeriu Anania widerspiegelte „mit seinen Worten und Ausdrücken, mit seinen Rhythmen, mit seinen liturgischen Düften und Bildern, die auf ihre profanen und barbarischen Entsprechungen treffen, um zusammen nicht eine groteske Mischung, sondern die Einheit eines strengen und persönlichen Stils zu bilden."[5] Manchmal sind Sarkasmus und Ironie auch beim Dichter aus Vâlcea miteinander verwoben, wobei seine Nähe zu Tudor Arghezi zu etwas völlig Magnetischem wird, das Nicoleta Pălimaru wie ein wahrhaft intellektuelles Schauspiel porträtiert. Die poetischen Wendungen in solchen entlegenen Ecken bleiben in dem Gedicht mit dem Titel „Treceri" (Übergänge) erkennbar.

Sicherlich bleibt dies kein Einzelfall, denn der Dichter rückt erneut die Notwendigkeit in den Vordergrund, den Dialog mit der Gottheit zu führen, sie zu erneuern und ihr nahe zu sein, und die autoritative Instanz scheint von einer exilierten Stimme verdoppelt zu werden, die versucht, sich unter anderen Parametern an Gott zu wenden: „Vom Ufer meines Meeres drängst du mich die ganze Stunde lang, in die Welle des Seins einzutreten und die Tiefe zu durchwühlen."

Die autoritative Instanz öffnet die Tore zur Vergangenheit durch den Ruf nach dem Imaginären, die poetischen Nuancen sind wie der „Garten des Paradieses", lebendig und farbenfroh genug, dass das innere Licht näher an das blaue Meer herangeführt wird als an die Wolken, die aus den Tiefen der gewölbten und verspielten Hügel am Horizont aufsteigen.

Der Mensch ist untrennbar mit der Süße der Göttlichkeit verbunden, und deshalb werden beide Instanzen ihre Reise über die Weiten des Wassers fortsetzen: „Um deinetwillen und um des Weges willen, den du dir durch mich vorstellst,/ um an das gegenüberliegende Ufer zu gelangen,/ tauche ich wie ein Taucher in das Geheimnis von Gut und Böse ein / und suche die Fauna in Algen und Schnee." Das vom Autor Valeriu Anania vorgeschlagene Universum ist eines, das die Geheimnisse des Fabelhaften, Exotischen, eines vergessenen, verwilderten Teils der Welt übersteigt, wo die Instanz des Autors das Licht aus den Tiefen zähmt, und aus der Sicht der Besonderheit durchlebt der Höhere Bartholomäus einzigartige Momente der Einsamkeit, die ihn ständig zermürben und ihm die traditionellen Werte in Erinnerung rufen, da er so weit von zu Hause entfernt ist.

Die Reise nach Hawaii verjüngt und aktualisiert zugleich den orthodoxen Geist des Dichters Valeriu Anania, eine gute Gelegenheit, diese Gefühle in dem Roman „Die Fremden aus Kipukua" zu konkretisieren. Das Gedicht erhält erst in den letzten beiden Strophen eine verstärkende Rolle, und Valeriu Anania beabsichtigt, unklare Andeutungen einzubringen, damit der Leser sofort das Identitätsprofil der Stimme, die zu hören ist, und vor allem die widerhallende Botschaft des Publikums spürt, zu welchem Zweck und in welcher Form diese an ihn gerichtet ist. Der Leser wird zum Fragenden und schließlich zum Gründer einer rhetorischen Schule, warum auch nicht? An wen richtet sich diese Stimme also und was möchte sie im Grunde hervorheben, die Göttlichkeit des Autors, die Göttlichkeit des Erlösers, die des Autors selbst oder die des Lesers? Eine Frage, die sich der treue Exeget des Hierarchen, Lucian Vasile Bâgiu, mit Würde stellt, indem er die folgenden Verse wiedergibt: „Und nun bereite deinen Schritt vor, grüße deine Zypressen, / erhebe deinen mit Blumen geschmückten Stab über die Wasser/ und sei wie der Prophet auf der Klippe des Roten Meeres, / um die Tiefe ohne Furcht zu sehen und hinabzusteigen. / Wenn du die Furt des Buches überquerst, das ich still geschrieben habe,/ bringe seinen Vers in das neue verheißene Land, / und wenn sich hinter dir das Meer in stummen Wellen öffnet, / suche mich in dir selbst, denn dort bin ich."

In diesem Fall lässt sich die Präsenz des Göttlichen leicht entschlüsseln, was den Autor dazu veranlasst, diese Art transatlantischer Reise ins „gelobte Land" liturgisch zu beschreiben, allerdings aus der Perspektive des postmodernen Amerikaners. Und dennoch hat hat Valeriu Anania eine seiner wichtigsten Aufgaben in seiner Jugend erfüllt, nämlich das Wort Gottes hervorzuheben, d. h. auch der Prosa durch die Poesie einen verwandelnden Charakter zu verleihen, wodurch sie noch mehr Tiefe gewann, als käme sie aus ganz anderen Hemisphären und Koordinaten der Erde. Geprägt auch von dieser Unruhe der Distanz, scheint der Dichter und Schriftsteller Valeriu Anania das Göttliche zu durchdringen und wird zu einem Schatten oder sogar zu einer Stimme Gottes, die ihn ständig verfolgt. Ein großer Teil der Natur des Dichters bleibt unbegrenzt umherstreifend und wird von diesem äußeren Geist an die Oberfläche getragen. Der Titel des Gedichts, Trecere (Übergang), behält seine Bedeutung, ohne den Schwerpunkt besonders auf den physischen Verlauf der Zeit zu legen, sondern

Der Leser sieht sich in der Situation, die Reise selbst zu akzeptieren, und nimmt, nicht zuletzt inspiriert durch den spirituellen Zustand des Autors, an dieser lyrischen Allegorie des Geistes zwischen zwei Dimensionen oder sogar zeitlichen und zeitlosen Räumen teil, dem Leben bzw. dem Leben nach dem Tod. Derselbe Leser kann das Unvermeidliche nicht übersehen, eine reine Erforschung des Wesens, das abstrakt bleibt, vielleicht sogar ohne diesen schrecklichen Schrecken. Letztendlich bleibt dies ein gutes Beispiel dafür, wie der Hohe Hierarch den Menschen wahrnimmt und verblüfft, insbesondere wenn dieser sich in einer Zwischensituation befindet. Der Schwerpunkt verlagert sich sofort auf die reine Manifestation der „Träume vom Glück zwischen Leben und Tod" – heftige Veränderungen des Wesens, an die auch Alexandru Piru glaubt. Zum Nachteil einer solchen Geschichte gelingt es Valeriu Anania, dem exotischen Roman trotz dieser Reisen eine resonante Vorführung zu verleihen.

Der Übergang zwischen den beiden Dimensionen ist an sich ungewiss und scheint wie eine Chronik auf einer Sanddüne erlebt zu werden: „Hier ist nie jemand gestorben./ Alle waren Reisende./ Sie kamen, verneigten sich vor dem Mond und wurden zu Wolken./ Es ist nicht bekannt, ob sie sich in der Festung aufgelöst haben oder zu den weiten Gewässern gegangen sind, um unter der Erde zurückzukehren,/ an den Wurzeln der Brunnen./ Warum solltet ihr noch kommen?/ Um eure Gebeine zu waschen und die Ängste der Lebenden zu stillen?/ Es gibt niemanden, der euch danken könnte. Die Tiefen erinnern sich nicht daran, dass ihr an ihnen vorbeigegangen seid. Als ihr geboren wurdet und nicht in die Erde eingegangen seid, war eure Seele ein Schritt ohne Weg.

In Ewigkeit und jetzt, die Starrheit der Erde."[6] Die poetische Stimmung und gleichzeitig die von der Autorität vorgeschlagene Welt geben eine bestimmte Art von Logik wieder, nämlich die der Wesen, die nicht unbedingt den Tod gekannt haben, diesen Zustand des Lebens, der ganz dem Übergang gewidmet ist, aber einem Wandel, der mit den irdischen Pilgern verglichen werden kann. Die oben genannte Versifizierung erinnert an den Atem von Ion Pillat, dem Dichter der Kirche von einst, dem es gelingt, die Ebene des rumänischen patriarchalischen Raumes neu zu konfigurieren, nach dem sich Valeriu Anania auf seiner amerikanischen Reise nicht selten sehnte. Nach dem Archetyp von Pillat kann man mit Vehemenz annehmen, dass die Seelenreise von Valeriu Anania aus bäuerlicher Perspektive übernommen wird, auch angesichts dieser Erwähnung des Poltergeistes im Vordergrund, Charaktere mit hoher psychologischer und mythologischer Aufladung in Bezug auf den Zustand der Unruhe des Geistes nach dem Übergang „ins Nichts" des Menschen.

Im Fall des von Ion Pillat erstellten Porträts nimmt die Gottheit dieselbe zyklische menschliche Rolle ein, sie steigt bereits in bäuerische, tellurische Umstände herab: „Sieh, das Paradies ist ein Haus aus Langenau/ Alles durch Obstgärten von Sternen steige ich zu ihm hinauf/ Ein weißes Haus mit kleinen Fenstern,/ In dem die Engel Schwalben sind/(...)/ Und die Mutter Gottes steht auf der Veranda,/ Freut sich am einfachsten Flug./ Sie steht auf der Veranda, arbeitet ein Netz/ Mit dem sie das Volk essen wird,/ und Gott und der Heilige Geist und ihr Sohn,/ sitzen im Haus zu dritt am Tisch./ Sie sprechen über die Mühen auf Erden,/ Wie vernünftige Hauswirte, die sie sind./ Sie sprechen über die Frucht des Weinbergs, über das gute Jahr/ Aus Weinbergen mit Pflaumenobstgärten."[7]

Die poetische Trance ist spürbar anders, viel lockerer im Vergleich zur ananianischen Version, das Paradies nimmt ein weltliches Profil an, das letztendlich die häuslichen Früchte in der Nähe der Naturelemente hervorhebt, wie Engel, die sich in Schwalben verwandeln, die Jungfrau Maria, die in den ländlichen Vorraum des Hauses unter dem Antlitz der Großmutter herabgestiegen ist, bzw. die Plejade der jüngeren Generation, Vater, Mutter und Sohn, wahre Träger von Geistern und Ikonen der Trinität. Einige Literaturkritiker alter Schule und nicht nur diese haben es nicht geschafft, eine formgebende Rolle in der religiösen Lyrik zu erkennen, sondern im Gegenteil nur einen dekorativen, oberflächlichen Zweck, aber eine Art Kontemplation, die jene Unruhe der von Hierarchen Bartholomäus beschworenen Geister zum Ausdruck bringt und mit beunruhigenden Nachwirkungen der autoritativen Instanz nach dem Vorbild der Arghezi-Lyrik eintrifft. Ein weiteres gutes Beispiel, um den lyrischen Faden zu erkennen, aber auch die vom Vater Anania angeführte Instanz, ist das Gedicht mit dem Titel Zori (Morgenröte), das unter der Feder desselben Ion Pillat in dem Band Umbra timpului (Schatten der Zeit) entstand: „Wer schlägt mir immer wieder ins Herz?/ Wer klopft an ihre verschlossene Tür/ So taub, so schwer/ Wenn die Nacht zur Hälfte stehen geblieben ist/ Wer schlägt mir immer wieder ins Herz?/ Oh, Herr, die Tore sind verschlossen/ Mit Kette und Schloss meiner Sünde./ Vergeblich klopfst du in der Nacht, klopf nicht mehr/ So taub, so schwer/ An die verschlossenen Tore der Seele./ Oh, Herr, mein Gott!/ In jungem Gold entzünden sich Himmel und Wasser,/ So klar nehmen sie immer zu;/ Ihr Licht dringt in meine Seele ein/ Mit Dir, mein Gott!"[8] Die Schwere der Seele besteht in der Vielzahl der Ungewissheiten, aber gleichzeitig auch in der Lawine redundanter Fragen. Die seelische Hypostasierung wird auf besondere, unterschiedliche Weise betrachtet und verstanden, weil die autorielle Instanz unter Umständen lebt, die der Relativierung unterliegen. Das Ego projiziert sich bereits auf sich selbst im Kontext des Jüngsten Gerichts, wo sich der Bezug konzentriert sich automatisch auf den Ausdrück „der lebende Tote", also auf das Intervall zwischen dem irdischen, physischen Tod und dem seelischen, metaphysischen Tod.

Daher wird die Entität von einem Amalgam psychologischer Abstürze als Folge dieser vielfältigen Probleme, Urteile und Überlegungen heimgesucht! Es kann nicht vollständig akzeptiert werden, dass sie am Leben ist, aber auch nicht, dass sie tot ist, sondern eher einem erdrückenden Fegefeuer unterworfen ist, das für den rumänischen Traditionalismus, aber auch für das Glaubenssystem im Allgemeinen unnatürlich und ungewöhnlich ist. Es ist festzustellen, dass, obwohl bisher eine Annäherung und ein leidenschaftlicher Geist gegenüber der arghesischen Lyrik beobachtet werden konnten, auch eine Distanzierung von der Kadenz der Psalmen existiert – eine Intimität mit universellem Profil, die die Macht erlangt, Mensch und Göttliches im selben Rahmen zu platzieren, ohne zu irgendeinem Zeitpunkt die Hypothese obskurer oder, warum nicht, sogar gegensätzlicher Zustände heraufzubeschwören.

Nichts kann klarer und deutlicher sein als die Tatsache, dass Valeriu Anania eine fantastische Verbindung zur Welt spürt, sich nicht von dem abwendet, was menschliches Schicksal genannt wird, sich ständig als ein Mensch erkennt, der der Gottheit nahe steht und gleichzeitig in ihr verankert ist, die ultimative Waffe, die ihn dazu bringt, auszurufen, dass sie seine ganze Zeit in Anspruch nimmt und dass absolut nichts seine Lebensbahn verändert. Das Gedicht mit dem Titel „Mein Herz" aus demselben Zyklus der Genesen stellt das Geständnis des Ichs dar, das unaufhörlich pulsiert, ohne einen Moment innezuhalten, aber gleichzeitig intensiv von der anderen Reise zu den unbekannten Katakomben geprägt ist, diesmal kehrt die rein orthodoxe Perspektive zurück, und das Fegefeuer fällt aus den mathematischen Berechnungen der eigentlichen Erlösung heraus. Was mag die Ursache sein? Die Existenz von Zollstellen, von unterirdischen Labyrinthen, die die Seele nicht überwinden kann, wie das Fohlen oder der Athlet, der sich über die kleinen Zäune erheben muss?

Sicherlich, die lebendige Erklärung ist mehr als wahrhaftig, beständig genug durch ihren Eigenwert, der es schafft, das Rationale hinter sich zu lassen und zumindest für einen Moment auf das existenzielle Gefühl des Todes zu verweisen, wobei sich die Anfälle als unaufhörlich erweisen, mit diesem Ultimatum, dass jenes Deo Abscondito sich nicht manifestiert, zumindest hier durch ein oder zwei Herzschläge, sondern im Gegenteil durch den Klang und den bebenden Gesang der himmlischen Farbe, die wie Donner verglichen wird, wahre Blitze, die strömend aus dem Himmel fließen: „Mein Herz ist gemacht zu schlagen, zu schlagen,/ zu schlagen (...),/ Ohne Zögern, ohne Unterbrechung,/ in allen Rhythmen, in allen Maßen,/ mit den Wassern, mit den Wäldern,/ mit dem Stern der langsamen Welten,/ mit der feinen Tiefe des im Meer vergossenen Regenbogens./ Mein Herz schlägt ohne Unterlass./ Und wie sollte es nicht schlagen, wenn es noch unüberquerte Zollschranken gibt,/ unterirdische Geschichten,/ nicht explodiertes Licht im feinen Staub,/ wenn es noch Wunden und Gangrän an allen Träumen, an allen Geschöpfen gibt,/ wie sollte mein Herz nicht in den Rhythmen, in den Maßen schlagen, mit denen es vertraut ist? Nur in seinem eigenen Rhythmus schlägt es nie."[9] Die lyrische Instanz kommt hier mit einem vielleicht nicht überzeugenden Argument in Bezug auf die Stärke der Seele auf individueller Ebene, sondern möchte vor allem die Schwäche der Seele hervorheben, nämlich dass sie zweifellos einer Nacheiferung oder ewigen Wurzelbildung durch die durch Wellen verursachten Gangräne bestimmt ist. Damit das Herz in seinem Rhythmus schlägt, braucht die Seele ein durstiges Training, oder die autorielle Instanz scheint sich in einer Unmöglichkeit zu befinden – ohne diese Aufregung und dieses unterirdische Zittern gerade aus dem Inneren der Katakomben, wo es keine „Normalität" mehr gibt. Es gibt keine schönere Vertragsklausel mit der Zeit in diesem Sinne als die, die der Text selbst vorgibt – der Stift des Dichters Valeriu Anania skizziert das Cockpit eines „pterygialen Pilgers" in einer der heikelsten Positionen, nämlich in der Nähe des Reiches des Allmächtigen, wobei sein Wunsch nach Ausdruck unerschöpflich ist. Der Verband, beziehungsweise der weiße Mantel, der die verwundete Seele bedeckt, kann die Vielzahl der Wunden nicht aufsaugen und zurücklassen, die sie wie Messerspitzen aus allen Winkeln der Luft durchbohren, bekannt und unbekannt, vor allem so gefühlt und unsichtbar. Das Epizentrum des Herzens weigert sich, sich zu beruhigen, die Herzschläge werden immer stärker. Tatsächlich spüren die Pforten des Herzens die Ewigkeit immer näher, denn „nur in seinem Rhythmus schlägt es nie."

Trotzdem der Dichter Valeriu Anania auch die schmerzlichere Facette der Lyrik durch Leiden vorschlägt, gelingt es ihm, der Einsamkeit ihren willkürlichen Sinn zu geben, also mit anderen Worten ein ewiges theologisches Werk, das sich durch die menschliche Schöpfung nicht in einen Ausweg verwandelt, der auf Neurosen oder auf durch Psychosen bedingten Grenzen basiert, sondern im Gegenteil, das Ich erlangt diesen Zustand des Gleichgewichts und der offenen Akzeptanz menschlicher Unzulänglichkeiten zurück, aufgrund der Tugend, eines Tages mit dem höchsten Schöpfer am selben Tisch zu sitzen, der die schöpferische Gnade gerade in ihm gesät hat, und das Gedicht mit dem Titel Elegie evoziert umfassend die wichtigsten Verzögerungen des menschlichen Wesens, und die Lakonik der Verse setzt die Seele auf die geradlinige und eindeutige Flugbahn, ihre eigene Vergangenheit wiederzugewinnen – genau dort, wo die Seele sich verloren und in tausenden von kleinen Stücken zerbrochen hat.

Obwohl diese Zustände den Schwerpunkt auf eine gewisse Dichotomie und die Macht der Unentschlossenheit zwischen den beiden Waagschalen des Lichts und der Dunkelheit legen, verzichtet der Dichter nicht auf das, was menschlich ist, und glaubt fest an jene Berührung des Lebensgeschmacks bis zum Ende, so wie es ist. Die Gnade hebt ab und landet durch die Sünde, denn nur sie liegt dem Fundament des heiligen Werkes zugrunde: „Niemand kann mich lieben, ohne zu sündigen./ Niemand kann mich hassen, ohne sich zu verdammen./ Mein Schatten entsteht, wenn er im hungrigen Morgen abnimmt./ Mein Schritt richtet sich vor Ort unter dem himmlischen Fluss aus./ Komm lieber als Anfang, lass das Sehvermögen des Geheimnisses mir sagen!/ Führ mich zum unbefleckten Aufstieg, dem Traum, in dem er mich lockt!/ Alle werden aus Abscheu und so viel Ewigkeit sterben,/ alle werden wiedergeboren und im Sturm dauern."[10]

Der gesamte Gedicht soll in der Tat solidarisch mit der Metapher des Menschen sein, durch alles, was er als Siegel und leuchtende Gnade der Ewigkeit trägt. Perfektion wird in diesem Fall durch das Prisma des unbefleckten Aufstiegs verstanden, ein Thema, das in extenso als reiner Ausdruck des poetischen Universums wieder aufgegriffen und verklärungt wird. Wie man sieht, lässt die Interpretation viel Spielraum, und durch eine Rettung, vielleicht implizit taborischer Ordnung, ist der Dichter Teil einer bewegenden, offenbarnden Erfahrung. In seinem Wesen ist er dennoch bereit, die Last einer fieberhaften Suche und, warum nicht, einer anderen, aber identischen Realität im Spiegel der Ewigkeit zu übernehmen.

Auf eine erste Analyse nach den Worten des Engländers, brief analysis, könnte man leicht den Grund feststellen, dass dieser Band der Genesen ganz einer Wiederentdeckung der Seele gewidmet ist, natürlich aus menschlicher und christozentrischer Perspektive, die die schöpferische

Gabe des Individuums von Geburt an und implizit die Qualitäten und Tugenden in den Vordergrund stellt, die es im Mutterleib erhalten hat. Natürlich ist dies gut versteckt und wie ein Kokon aufgehängt, aber gleichzeitig nur teilweise wahr in der vollständigen und einheitlichen Erfassung seines Umfangs in Bezug auf die poetische Gestalt von Valeriu Anania insgesamt.

Der literarische Raum bereitete dem Dichter aus Vâlcea ein abrasives Verhalten vor, das durch den Faden der bereits beobachteten und heraufbeschworenen Komplexität hinreichend verschlungen war. Es scheint, dass die Literatur dem Dichter neben einem sakralen Raum auch das Gemurmel bot, sich auf die Kraft der Reinkarnation zu berufen, natürlich als Stereotyp der zig und tausend Formen, so dass die Wahrnehmung in Bezug auf die Definition und Hervorhebung eines tragischen Schicksals völlig verzerrt wird. An diesem Punkt kennt die Literatur einen anderen störenden Grenzraum. Warum gerade so? Gerade wegen der anspruchsvollen Kriterien, die sie abheften muss, denn der Autor, der sich gezwungen sieht, muss automatisch die Bereiche trennen, sich von der „Formel" oder dem „Muster" lossagen, wie auch der Universitätsprofessor für Literaturtheorie, Gheorghe Crăciun, in der Monografie über das literarische Gebiet in Frage stellt und in einer zweiten Auflage im Cartier-Verlag aus der Hauptstadt im Jahr 2003 veröffentlicht wurde und wie folgt betitelt ist: Einführung in die Literaturtheorie.

Nicht selten bot die literarische Stilistik dem Dichter aus Vâlcea einen größeren Spielraum für die Manipulation des Stifts, denn „das Schreiben ermöglicht Abgeschiedenheit, Einsamkeit, Meditation, es ist eine Tätigkeit, die den Augen der Welt verborgen ist, es ist keine Form der direkten, unmittelbaren Kommunikation mehr, die unter der Kontrolle des Zuhörers steht (...) Die manieristische Poesie oder die hermetische Poesie – spektakuläre lyrische Modi per Definition – sind unerbittlich mit der Idee des Schreibens verbunden."[11]

Sebastian Drăgulănescu
3rd Degree Scientific Researcher, Alexandru Philippide Institute of Romanian Philology

Abstract: Containing events spanning nine years (1935-1944), Mihail Sebastian's Diary offers a unique perspective on the cultural, political and social life of the years preceding World War II. The writing reveals disappointment with his generation, with the radicalization of society and the marginalization of the Jews, but also a tendency towards self-isolation, marked by introspection and loneliness. At first, the diary appears as a kind of narrative of initiatory expression, through the special bond from mentor to disciple, from prophet to zealot, from priest to novice, doubled by a kind of state of vassalage, but also by fascination with the controversial personality of Nae Ionescu, spiritus rector, to a point, of the interwar generation. M. Sebastian also expresses his personal anxieties, desires and disappointments in his diary, especially in relation to love, friendship and the inexorable meaning of life, the relationship with the actress Leni (Caler) appearing as a recurring affective thread, knotted and re-knotted several times (only a complete concordance). In this sense, the diary represents a vast textual canvas in which personal history and grand history intersect, an essential document for understanding the cultural and political climate of Romania at that time. Another important interwar figure who goes through various stages within the diary, from restrained admiration to coldness and distancing, from the author's perspective, is Mircea Eliade. Considered one of the important diaries in Romanian literature, comparable, to a point, to Jeni Acterian's diary or that of Monica Lovinescu, this one, although it strives for objectivity, it also slides towards subjectivity until its ending and inevitably distances itself from authenticity, reflecting the positioning of the personalities of the time in relation to the ideologies of the time, but also its particular position from the perspective of the uprooted, disappointed and permanently self-illusioned Jew.*

„Inventariind accepţiile termenului şi reliefând dominantele fiecăreia, se conturează specificul noţiunii de autenticitate: confesiune neliteraturizată, urmărind redarea palpitului existenţial în sine; adevăr indubitabil; normă a conştiinţei morale; similaritate între creaţie şi experienţă; eliberare a creaţiei de componentele eteronome; surprindere a vieţii concrete în desfăşurarea ei; trăire subiectivă, însuşire de a fi tu însuţi, de a-ţi exprima propria integritate psihică şi, în consecinţă, valorificare directă a subiectivităţii existente în jurnalele intime şi în documentele de orice natură; absenţă a „literaturizării" şi renunţare la convenţiile literaturii; calitate de a nu scrie conform gustului unuia sau altuia; stare de deplinătate a fiinţei umane, la care se poate ajunge în urma ieşirii din cotidian prin conştientizarea prezenţei morţii în toate momentele existenţei; întoarcere la originar, la „izvorul" prim al realităţii etc" (VRABIE, 2008: 181). Jurnal aflat dominant sub pactul sincerității, scrierea lui Mihail Sebastian este o mărturie valoroasă a scriitorului evreu român despre perioada interbelică și despre pietrele de hotar ale celui de-al Doilea Război Mondial. Scris între 1935 și 1944, și publicat postum în 1996, jurnalul oferă o privire au coin d'œil, și totuși cuprinzătoare, asupra vieții culturale, politice și sociale din România, dar și asupra trăirilor interioare ale autorului. Este o scriere de o mare intensitate, un document literar și istoric care surprinde viața intelectuală, politică și personală a diaristului începând cu anii premergători conflagrației mondiale, dar și în timpul acesteia. Tematica fundamentală este structurată în jurul câtorva coordonate, în primul rând antisemitismul și marginalizarea. Autorul înfățișează cu luciditate și amărăciune intensificarea antisemitismului în România, inclusiv în cercurile intelectuale în care activase. Este accentuată dezamăgirea sa față de prietenii și colegii de generație care adoptă ideologii fasciste. În această direcție, se accentuează solitudinea și introspecția, două modalități de auto-protejare a sinelui: jurnalul este marcat de o adâncă însingurare, dar și de o reflecție constantă asupra propriei condiții, a literaturii și a sensului existenței.

În ceea ce privește viața culturală a epocii, M. Sebastian notează adesea întâlniri, discuții și conflicte cu figuri importante ale epocii, precum Emil Cioran, Mircea Eliade, Nae Ionescu.

Observațiile sale sunt, de cele mai mult ori, destul de critice, dar păstrează totuși o notă de respect și considerație intelectuală. În sfârșit, rezistența prin cultură constituie motorul creator al scrierii diaristice: în ciuda izolării și a atmosferei sociale încărcate, autorul continuă să scrie, să citească și să reflecteze, înțelegând prin cultură o formă de supraviețuire și, în parte, de păstrare a demnității umane. Ieșind cumva din 'mantaua' lui Nae Ionescu, M. Sebastian se dezice, cel puțin în perioada 1935-1940, într-un mod lucid și dureros de exagerările și deraierile ideologice ale celui dintâi, prin discuțiile pe care le poartă în cercurile vremii, printr-o luare de atitudine, nu chiar fățișă, dar nici neglijabilă, și nu în cele din urmă, prin rândurile acestui jurnal oarecum atipic. Într-o ordine relativă de idei, Marta Petreu lansează aserțiunea cum că M. Sebastian era un extremist de dreapta moderat în prima parte a vieții sale. „Cum în 1934 se produce o gravă fractură în societatea românească, dar și în conștiința scriitorului, lucrurile degenerează, ba chiar o iau razna, cum se zice cu o locuțiune tipic românească. În acest context, scandalul prefeței romanului De două mii de ani „a fost al persoanelor implicate în el (Nae Ionescu – M. Sebastian), al combinației insolite dintre un ideolog antisemit, care prefațează în mod antisemit un roman cu tematică evreiască scris de un scriitor român de origine evreiască, scriitor care a mai avut și 'norocul nemeritat' de a fi redactorul lui Nae Ionescu" (PETREU, 2010: 150). Prefața l-a constrâns „să ia cunoştinţă de caracterul său etero-etnic, împotriva aplecărilor sale lăuntrice" consideră mai târziu Mircea Vulcănescu (Ibidem: 164). „Avem, aşadar, o biografie proiectată pe fundalul istoriei europene şi româneşti, aflate în liberă cădere de dreapta. Poveste în care tinereţea unuia, farmecul şi cinismul celuilalt au jucat fără îndoială un rol. Dar în care nici avantajele ucenicului nu sunt de trecut cu vederea. Dacă nu luăm în calcul şi avantajele, şi dragostea amândurora, riscăm să nu înţelegem mare lucru din drama aceasta de cuplu, în care nu există o victimă cu adevărat inocentă. Sebastian a fost victima lui Nae Ionescu, dar nu victima lui inocentă. Iar în anii prigoanei antisemite a fost, ca evreu, cum ştim, victima antisemitismului oficial, de stat" (PETREU, 2010: 202).

Dacă M. Sebastian nu a fost, propriu-zis, un oportunist, atunci a fost cel puțin atins de fatalitatea primei sale iubiri intelectuale. Se pare că acest Don Quijote interbelic a purtat adevărate lupte culturale și literare, ideologice, prin intermediul profesiei sale de gazetar, cu „Viața Românească", cu Ionel Teodoreanu, Demostene Botez, G. Topârceanu, Otilia Cazimir, Al. O. Teodoreanu, cu G. Ibrăileanu, G. Călinescu, M. Ralea. Cât privește o altă relație aparte, între el și M. Eliade, „dezlipirea propriu-zisă de Eliade a fost dureroasă şi lungă: începută în toamna lui 1937, desprinderea a tot durat, până când, într-un sfârşit, în primăvara lui 1942, Sebastian a putut pune punct, în interiorul său, acestei relaţii, diagnosticând 'infamia morală' a lui Eliade. Autoritatea lui Mircea Eliade asupra sa a fost reală şi insidioasă. De pildă, delimitat public de fondul obscur şi 'mistic' al acestuia, Sebastian respecta prescripţiile lui, în mod ritual, în intimitate" (PETREU, 2010: 244). Se remarcă încă de la început în jurnal un fel de relatare de expresie inițiatică, prin legătura specială de la mentor la discipol, de la profet la zelot, de la sacerdot la novice, dublată de un fel de stare de vasalitate, dar și de fascinație față de personalitatea controversată a lui Nae Ionescu, spiritus rector, până la un punct, al generației interbelice. Mihail Sebastian intră în cercul lui Nae Ionescu ca student, și în calitate de colaborator la revista Cuvântul, unde publică articole și învață să își cizeleze scrisul pe parcurs. Este atras de magnetismul intelectual al profesorului, de stilul său provocator și de capacitatea de a coagula o generație de spirite tinere, în căutarea unor valori superioare. În această etapă, M. Sebastian se definește ca parte a unei elite intelectuale interbelice, în căutarea unui sens cultural și metafizic, până la un punct, dar și a menirii personale printre ceilalți intelectuali ai generației. „Nae Ionescu era un om care te obliga să gândești, chiar și atunci când nu erai de acord cu el." (SEBASTIAN, 1996: 26). Mai există și o tensiune permanentă între admirația inițială față de mentor și dezamăgirea ulterioară provocată de radicalizarea acestuia.

De la recunoașterea carismei indiscutabile a personalității magistrului: „Nae Ionescu are o forță de seducție intelectuală care nu poate fi negată. Te obligă să gândești, chiar și atunci când te revolți" și până la manifestarea de tip ideologic care îl acaparează (desigur, mișcarea legionară), „Nae nu mai e același. Nu mai e profesorul care ne învăța să gândim liber. E un om prins în mrejele unei ideologii care exclude, care urăște" (SEBASTIAN, 1996: 46) se produce, în timp, o scindare aproape covârșitoare, care bulversează profesiunea de credință a tânărului intelectual. „Este fără îndoială cel mai interesant şi mai complex om pe care l-am cunoscut. Asta în ciuda tuturor celor ce s-au întâmplat şi se vor mai întâmpla – în stare să mă edifice asupra valorii lui morale, dar nu şi să mă dezamăgească în ce priveşte calităţile lui de inteligenţă" (SEBASTIAN, 1996: 30 – Luni, 17 iunie 1935). Despre M. Sebastian în tinerețe, mai consideră Marta Petreu, că la început a fost un reprezentant tipic al falangei respective: „Traiectoria lui Sebastian în generaţia '27 a devenit atipică numai după 1934. Până atunci, el a fost, cu toate particularităţile sale – cu spiritul său filofrancez, cu distanţa sa faţă de mistică, cu dorul lui complementar după luciditate, – unul dintre tinerii cei mai vizibili şi cei mai războinici ai generaţiei ieşite din incubatorul Cuvântului" (PETREU, 2010: 26).

Cât despre el însuși, la 30 august, același an, scriitorul notează cu optimismul și entuziasmul tinereții, cu accente trăiriste: „Sunt mândru de mine, când mă uit în oglindă, aşa de tânăr, aşa de vizibil sănătos (poate prea vizibil). După-masă mă duc la fotograf. Să-mi rămână cel puţin atâta, dacă mai mult nu se va putea" (SEBASTIAN, 1996: 32). Tot atunci se gândește la inaptitudinea (sa) în ordinea practică şi la fericita abilitate a celorlalţi (p. 33). Fiind un spirit sensibil, muzical, evreu în toată puterea cuvântului, resimte mereu această perpetuă inaderență la real. El însuși spune: „Tot ce mi se întâmplă trece undeva dincolo de mine, fără aderenţă – ca şi cum nu m-ar privi" (SEBASTIAN, 1996: 36). Elaborează uneori cronici la spectacole muzicale pentru „L' Indépendence Roumaine" și ascultă mereu muzică clasică (câte șase ore în continuu). Aş vrea să ascult mereu muzică – e singurul meu stupefiant (p. 103). Frecventează concertele (Beethoven, Schumann, Bach) de la Filarmonică și de la Ateneu, devine aproape dependent de radio, urmărește multe posturi muzicale, Berlin, Munchen, Zurich, Breslau, Viena, Varșovia, Paris, Lyon, Praga, Budapesta. „Prin muzică înțelege și simte că se poate asocia vieții cosmice, până la limitele divinației, dar fără pierderea de sine" (TRANDAFIR, 2007: 253). De cele mai multe ori, autorul este oarecum timid, oscilant și inconsecvent și în viața amoroasă: „Ce i-aş mai putea reproşa Leniei după convorbirea noastră de azi ? A fost bună, afectuoasă, drăguţă, fără nici un fel de falsă abilitate, cu puţină cochetărie, cu oarecari elanuri şi mai ales fără niciun fel de ipocrizie. S-o chem la mine şi va veni" (8 noiembrie 1935 – SEBASTIAN, 1996: 39). Un bărbat nu va şti niciodată ce sedimente de amoruri trecute sunt în gesturile, în obiceiurile, în vocabularul, în ticurile unei femei, afirmă la pagina 40. Nina, Marie, Nora, Thea, Madeleine, Lily, Marysse, Zoe (Ricci), Alice (Theodorian), Marietta (Rareș), Cella (Serghi), Dorina (Blank), Beate (Fredanov) sunt tot atâtea reprezentante ale sexului frumos care se intersectează pasager cu acest bărbat însingurat și nefericit, care este, de fapt, un timid, dar mimează degajarea (masculină). „Dedublarea funcționează draconic. Îndrăgostitul simte enorm și vede monstruos probe numeroase de frivolități, amplificate de zvonuri, unele de-a dreptul incredibile" (TRANDAFIR, 2007: 256).

De altfel, M. Sebastian își exprimă neliniștile, dorințele și dezamăgirile personale, în special în legătură cu iubirea, prietenia și sensul inexorabil al vieții, relația cu actrița Leni (Caler) apărând ca un fir afectiv recurent, înnodat și reînnodat de câteva ori (o deplină concordie, notează). „Jocul meu în dragoste e una din cele mai stupide torturi. E umilitor, e primejdios, e zadarnic, este fără sens – şi totuşi nu-mi pot impune o dată pentru totdeauna o definitivă renunţare. Totul e dinainte sortit celui mai grotesc deznodământ – şi totuşi de fiecare dată mă îmbarc în aceeaşi ridicolă farsă, cu nu ştiu ce amestec de impostură şi bună-credinţă, ca şi cum ar fi o încercare pe care o fac pentru prima oară. Ce e mai de neiertat în cazul meu este că antrenez în situaţii atât de false fiinţe care n-au nici o vină, alta decât aceea de a nu mă cunoaşte: Cella, Leni, Zoe..." (Vineri, 30 octombrie 1942 – SEBASTIAN, 1996 : 320). Altădată, la 17 decembrie, spre sfârșitul anului 1935, transcrie câteva rânduri esențiale dintr-o scrisoare pe care i-o trimite altă femeie, Marysse. Tot la finele anului ajunge la Sceaux, la Paris. La începutul anului 1936, pare însă foarte deprimat și cochetează cu gândul sinuciderii, meditând la arta de a-mi complica la maxim viața asta nefericită (p. 19). Îl obsedează și sinuciderea lui Pascal Alexandru, citățm, antisemit, dar având ceva feminin, palid și fin în întreaga lui ființă. În acest context, crede că E inutil şi ar trebui să mă obişnuiesc a socoti definitiv încheiate socotelile vieţii mele (SEBASTIAN, 1996: 47).

În răstimpuri, se întâlnește direct sau poartă corespondență cu o multitudine de intelectuali din perioada interbelică: Mircea Eliade, Emil Cioran, Camil Petrescu, Tudor Vianu, Camil Baltazar, Constantin Noica, Radu Cioculescu, Felix Aderca, Elvira Godeanu, Radu Olteanu, E. Lovinescu, Max Blecher (care trăiește în intimitate cu moartea), iar jurnalul descrie atmosfera intelectuală a epocii, viața culturală interbelică, marcată de efervescență, dar și de o accentuată radicalizare a spiritului boem și combatant, deopotrivă. În acest sens, jurnalul reprezintă și un soi de metaficțiune istoriografică în care se întretaie istoria personală și istoria mare, un document esențial pentru înțelegerea climatului cultural și politic al României interbelice și al celui de-al Doilea Război Mondial. Revenind la mentorul Nae Ionescu, scriitorul evocă la un moment dat o adevărată dragoste înălțătoare pentru acesta, în sensul în care discipolul Critias, de exemplu, o avea pentru Socrate. Încolo, nimic. Mă abrutizez pe fiecare zi şi mi se pare că nu mai aştept niciun fel de salvare (Ibidem: 18). Pe la 14 martie 1936, cursurile lui Nae încep să îl plictisească, iar la 20 martie consideră chiar că „Lecţia lui Nae de azi este penibilă. Resturi din cursul anului trecut, resturi de articole, resturi de şuetă, şi în plus câteva grosolane glume, care încercau să provoace simpatiile unei săli mai mult distrată" (SEBASTIAN, 1996 : 48). În paralel, îi vine ideea și lucrează la o piesă de teatru, Jocul de-a vacanța, și la un proiect despre romanul românesc pe care, din nefericire, nu l-a mai finalizat, precum și la niște studii despre „scrisori şi jurnale" din literatura franceză „Mă gândesc la o carte pe care aş putea-o tipări peste un an-doi, care s-ar numi „Culise" şi în care aş strânge toate lucrurile mele scrise în legătură cu creaţia literară, cu tehnica de lucru, cu viaţa de scriitor, cu experienţele publicării unei cărţi" (București, 11 iunie 1936 – SEBASTIAN, 1996: 62).

Relația dintre Mihail Sebastian și Nae Ionescu devine în jurnal una dintre cele mai complexe și tensionate din cultura română interbelică, un amestec de admirație, influență intelectuală, trădare și distanțare etică, o relație care a marcat profund formarea și evoluția lui M. Sebastian ca scriitor și gânditor. Este indiscutabil că, la început, Nae Ionescu era un profesor carismatic, provocator, care atrăgea tineri intelectuali prin stilul său polemic și prin accentul pus pe gândirea metafizică. Distanțarea de acela care îi fusese maestru și formator se realizează treptat, dar nu fără consecințe, la modul conștient și totuși oarecum sentimental. La un moment dat, apare o aluzie aproape poetică la cel ce fusese odată maestrul său de cugetare: „Ce voinţă de viaţă, indiferentă, puternică, fără cuvinte, fără gesturi, de o grandoare tăcută, în copacul ăsta, care părea uriaş între oamenii care se agitau în jurul lui" (Sinaia, duminică, 12 aprilie 1936 – SEBASTIAN, 1996: 51). Din când în când, autorul este sensibil la peisajele de natură care îl atrag, îl farmecă și îl liniștesc și îl sustrag de la agitația cotidiană: „Niciodată Breaza n-a fost aşa de frumoasă. E o profuziune de culori. N-am văzut în viaţa mea atâţia pomi înfloriţi. Cred că sunt meri. Unii au ceva de carte poştală, aşa sunt de albi." (Vineri, 17 aprilie 1936 – SEBASTIAN, 1996: 54).

Când este dezgustat de atâta inutilă existență, devine aproape nihilist și notează cu amărăciune: „O oră, cât am stat acolo (la SSR), m-am agitat, am făcut grup, am făcut propagandă şi abia când am ieşit în stradă mi-am dat seama ce joc caraghios jucasem. Ce am eu comun cu toată povestea asta, cu toată politica asta, cu toate comploturile astea... Suntem într-o groaznică mahala, o mahala cu literaţi. Sinistru, sinistru, încă o dată sinistru. Trec de altfel printr-o perioadă de intoxicare literară. Mi-e silă. De ce n-am rămas un meseriaş oarecare – avocat, birocrat –, un om de treabă şi de ce nu mi-a fost dat să am casa mea, viaţa mea, iubirea mea, fără complicaţii, fără nimic 'interesant', fără regrete" (Duminică, 3 mai 1936 – SEBASTIAN, 1996: 56-57). Când lucrurile devin destul de periculoase și pară să rămână prins în menghina istoriei, scrie cu adâncă teamă, dar fără să o recunoască: „Alaltăieri, la Braşov, la procesul studenţilor gardişti, Nae a declarat (i-am citit depoziţia în ziare) că nu orice asasinat e interzis de religie şi că deci în mod firesc studenţimea se solidarizează cu asasinii lui Duca. Cred că nu mă voi mai duce la cursul lui. Nu ca să dau 'sancţiuni' împotriva lui. Dar, foarte sincer vorbind, Nae Ionescu începe să nu mai fie interesant. E prea simplă schema lui" (Joi, 14 mai 1936 – SEBASTIAN, 1996: 58).

Este perioada în care se suspendă în fapt cursurile lui Nae Ionescu de la Universitatea din București. Există și un fel de admirație descendentă, de la maestru la discipol, atunci când Nae îi spune, ieșind din sala de curs: „– Pentru tine am făcut lecţia asta. De doi ani te uiţi la mine chiorâş. Ei, acuma ce zici?" (SEBASTIAN, 1996: 59). La 1 iulie 1936 se duce la întâlnirea de zece ani a foștilor absolvenți de liceu la Brăila. Pe la 22 iulie, același an, este angajat redactor la Revista Fundațiilor Regale. Din când în când merge la în stațiune la Ghilcoș, adică la Lacul Roșu, să se destindă și să se depărteze de lumea dezlănțuită… Altădată, se află la Balcic, cu un cerc de prieteni:

actori, pictori și literați. „Balcicul are ceva care mă îmbată, mă destramă, mă descompune. Îmi vine să mă lungesc pe pământ, cu braţele desfăcute şi să spun: gata, mai departe nu mai merg. Aş rămâne aşa o viaţă întreagă” (Ibidem: 132).

Atunci când nu trăiește suficient de intens, scrie despre experiența trăirii. Față de existență, în genere, are un sentiment de disensiune iremediabilă. Inclusiv cu Mircea Eliade, despre care crede următoarele: „Dacă eu ridic din umeri, cu neîncredere, el mă priveşte dezolat, dând uşor din cap, ca în faţa unui om cu desăvârşire pierdut pentru adevăr. Aş vrea să eliminăm din discuţia noastră orice aluzie politică. Dar e posibil ? Strada urcă pînă la noi vrând-nevrând, şi în cea mai anodină reflecţie simt spărtura mereu mai mare dintre noi.” (Vineri, 25 septembrie 1936 – SEBASTIAN, 1996: 85). Marcată de o tensiune crescândă între prietenie și dezamăgire ideologică, Sebastian notează cu o luciditate dureroasă transformarea lui Eliade dintr-un prieten apropiat într-un susținător al Mișcării Legionare, ceea ce îl obligă să-și reevalueze complet raporturile de prietenie și încredere reciprocă. „Eliade nu mai e acelaşi. Nu mai pot să-l privesc fără să simt o rană. Nu înţeleg cum poate să creadă în acea nebunie” (p. 59). Urmează mai târziu o lungă discuţie politică cu Mircea, la el acasă, considerată imposibil de rezumat: „A fost liric, nebulos, plin de exclamaţii, interjecţii, apostrofe... Din toate astea nu aleg decât declaraţia lui – în sfârşit leală – că iubeşte Garda, speră în ea şi aşteaptă victoria ei” (2 martie 1937 – SEBASTIAN, 1996: 115). „Ceea ce Nae Ionescu teoretizează pe plan extern, M. Sebastian pune în evidenţă zelos pe plan intern, exemplificând teoria decuplării sau a autarhiei cu un sat din cuprinsul ţării şi arătând, firește, beneficiile unei asemenea practici. Ucenicul aprobă punctul de vedere pe care şi l-au însuşit ţăranii (din Balinț) şi critică încă o dată poziţia celor trei mari partide democrate cu care se războia de multă vreme” (PETREU, 2010: 66).

La 18 octombrie, final de 1936, își serbează fără fast și cu sentimente amestecate ziua de naștere: „29 de ani. Îi primesc nici bucuros, nici trist – cu conştiinţa că mai am unele lucruri de făcut, pentru care sunt obligat să trăiesc. Încolo, nimic. Dar am făcut serioase eforturi pentru a primi ziua asta cu oarecare solemnitate, ca pe o zi fastă. Am atâta nevoie să-mi creez mici superstiţii prevestitoare de bine” (SEBASTIAN, 1996: 90). În altă ordine de idei, luciditatea extremă a lui Nae Ionescu nu are cum să nu impresioneze pe cititor, ca un cântec de lebădă: Eu sunt un om terminat, căzut, ratat (p. 91). Scriitorul însuși se consideră, în contextul mai larg, citățm, un tip lichidat (idem). Iar ceilalți îl acuză frecvent de un fel de uscăciune a inimii, de golire a sentimentelor… N-am cultivat simpatii, n-am evitat adversităţi, mai explică autorul. (Ibidem: 93). Eu sunt un om care joacă la loterie, unde sunt şi mai puţine şanse – ceea ce nul împiedică totuşi să joace (SEBASTIAN, 1996: 95).

Trecerea către anul 1937 nu este deloc promițătoare: atmosfera ultra-națională se acutizează: „Scriu pentru prima oară cifra noului an. Am trecut peste noaptea de ajun fără emoţie, fără deznădejde şi, mi se pare, fără speranţe. Am băut mult, fără entuziasm însă. Reveillon-ul de la Mircea a fost destul de cenuşiu. Altădată treceam cu mai multă solemnitate de la un an la altul, încă un semn de bătrîneţe ? Joi seara – în ultima zi a anului – l-am vizitat pe Nae, pe care nu-l mai văzusem de mult. Potriveală care n-a avut nimic simbolic. Mă întreb dacă Nae nu-şi pierde complet controlul de sine. Acces de megalomanie, orgoliu exasperat de înfrângeri sau pur şi simplu o fază de misticism acut ? Îl găseam altădată, în asemenea ocazii, pitoresc; începe însă să fie îngrijorător” (SEBASTIAN, 1996: 105).

Într-adevăr, conform propriei aprecieri, M. Sebastian pare să fie, în jurnal, aproape golit de sentimente sau, cel puțin, nu și le recunoaște întotdeauna, ceea ce pune pactul autenticității jurnalului sub semnul întrebării. „Aşadar, aseară i-am cetit în sfârşit piesa. Mi se pare, cu mai puţină emoţie decât aş fi făcut-o în vară sau în toamnă. Poate cu nici un fel de emoţie. N-am subliniat nici una din replicile care aveau vreun sens ascuns pentru ea. N-am privit-o, nu i-am zâmbit cu subînţeles, n-am lăsat-o să se înduioşeze, n-am primit să fie nici un moment complice cu mine într-o lectură care altfel cuprinde atâtea complicităţi sentimentale” (SEBASTIAN, 1996: 116). De multe ori pare mercantil și interesat: Privesc lucrurile sub raportul banilor (p. 117). Pe de altă parte, la treizeci de ani este singurul avocat fără de arginți, și singurul dominat de sentimentul că-şi pierde vremea. Prin toamna lui 1937 pierde, la propriu, 111 de pagini de manuscris la Paris și, de aceea, are sentimentul acut al ratării și al zădărniciei existenței umane: „Voiajul ratat, romanul pierdut, piesa scoasă din repetiţii, probabil definitiv. Mă aflam în faţa unei toamne bogate, în faţa unei ierni laborioase, aşteptam cu curiozitate atâtea întâmplări sigure –şi acum nu mai aştept nimic. Îmi rămâne biroul Roman, articolele pentru Independenţa, sila de a fi treaz, un gust groaznic de a bea, de a dormi, de a uita. Mi se pare că sunt la limită. Nimeni în lume nu poate face nimic pentru mine. Am aşa de puţine raţiuni adânci de a trăi, încât o întâmplare ca asta (care pentru altcineva, în alte condiţii, ar fi o durere, dar nu un dezastru), devine pentru mine un prilej de moarte. Şi împlinesc astăzi 30 de ani" (SEBASTIAN, 1996: 124-125). Aş bea mereu, ca să uit – şi am atâtea de uitat devine o frază din ce în ce mai frecventă. Singurul fel de a uita e să te îmbeţi. (pagina 95). Aş bea mereu, n-aş face altceva decît să beau (SEBASTIAN, 1996: 151). Am băut. Eram decis să mă îmbăt. Niciodată o seară de beţie n-a fost mai oportună (pagina 104).

Atmosfera din oraș este incalificabilă, în capitală se instalează guvernul Goga(-Cuza), divizat între simpatizanți ai Germaniei și adepți ai occidentalizării: „Nu ştiu care e atmosfera în oraş. Consternare, nedumerire, buimăceală, frică ? Ziarele sunt cenuşii, inexpresive, fără nici un accent de protestare. Mi se pare că abia de aici încolo vom învăţa ceea ce se cheamă cenzură" (SEBASTIAN, 1996: 137). Prin iarna lui 1937 își revine temporar din această depresie cu ajutorul lecțiilor de schi de la Sinaia, Brașov, Predeal și Bran; alteori, caută cu obstinație soarele de la Balcic. În 1938, în primele zile ale anului, are loc retragerea permiselor de circulaţie cu trenul tuturor gazetarilor evrei. Ziarele publicau numele celor vizaţi (inclusiv numele lui Sebastian). Din scrierea Sparkenbroke de Charles Morgan, îl obsedează o observaţie despre un personaj evreu: „Mais dans ses yeux noirs luisait une ardente imagination, refroidie par cette tristesse ironique qu'ont des civilisés parmi les barbares, et qui est particuliere à sa race" (SEBASTIAN, 1996: 145). Observația socială se îmbină cu apetența către meditație filosofică în Jurnalul lui Sebastian. Pentru Nae Ionescu simte deopotrivă simpatie, iritare, îndoială, dezgust, după cum le enumeră. Copilăria asta a lui e unul din ultimele lucruri pentru care îmi este încă drag (pagina 160).

Foartea adesea, scriitorul M. Sebastian duce o viaţă impardonabilă, de om leneş, care se extenuează pierzându-şi timpul (București, duminică, 8 mai 1938 – SEBASTIAN, 1996: 161). Este și perioada în care Nae Ionescu este arestat și întemnițat la Jilava, iar acest lucru provoacă stupoare în societatea românească. Iar la 5 iunie 1938 moare Max Blecher, care fusese grav bolnav de tuberculoză osoasă la coloana vertebrală, și este apoi înmormântat la Roman. Sunt evenimente care lasă urme adânci în sufletul deja zdruncinat al lui M. Sebastian. La 18 septembrie 1938 însă, are parte de un succes la premiera piesei Jocul de-a vacanţa, dar notează destul de neutru: „Sunt desigur mulţumit, dar nu cred că mi-am pierdut capul. Sunt încă destul de sceptic şi mai ales sunt foarte obosit" (SEBASTIAN, 1996: 182). Din ceas în ceas poate izbucni războiul scrie la 24 septembrie, același an (pagina 184). Întrevede o lentă tranziţie spre un regim legionar, convenabil amenajat, în termenii autorului. Apoi, spre sfârșitul anului, se mută în noua sa garsonieră. Evenimentele se precipită și iau o turnură fără precedent: la 30 noiembrie (1938) Corneliu Zelea Codreanu este împuşcat şi îngropat azi-noapte, împreună cu asasinii lui Duca şi cu asasinii lui Stelescu (p. 190). Tonul jurnalului este, în cea mai mare parte obiectiv, poate prea obiectiv, pentru o natură atât de sensibilă, interiorizată și fragilă cum pare să fie scriitorul. „Ar fi în logica lucrurilor ca toată această spaimă amuţită să spargă într-o explozie antisemită. E o supapă de siguranţă, pe care n-ar fi exclus s-o deschidă chiar guvernul. Şi de astă dată s-ar putea să plătim tot noi" (Vineri, 2 decembrie – SEBASTIAN, 1996: 191). La 17 decembrie, Dinu [Constantin] Noica, aflat la Paris, îi scrie lui P. Comarnescu despre uciderea lui Codreanu, și anunță că s-a decis să devină legionar şi că reziliază, în consecință, toate contractele pe care le are cu Fundaţiile Regale, arătându-se dispus să restituie cu celeritate avansurile primite.

De fiecare dată când cronicarul interbelic (!) încearcă să își redreseze viața, angrenajele și spițele istoriei mari se încurcă ori chiar se împotmolesc. Luni, 9 [ianuarie 1939]: „Nu înţeleg de ce mi-am pierdut vacanţa de Crăciun rămânând în Bucureşti. Aş fi putut să-mi termin romanul, aş fi putut să schiez... Iată-mă la sfârşitul vacanţei, obosit, fără elan, fără chef de lucru, leneş, dezorientat, plin de remuşcări. Şi din nou n-am bani, ceea ce îmi aminteşte că am 31 de ani, că viaţa trece pe lângă mine, că o pierd, că aproape am pierdut-o. Şi e afară o neverosimilă zi de primăvară, caldă, însorită, care mă face de două ori mai trist" (SEBASTIAN, 1996: 193). Între două răgazuri, scriitorul încearcă să învețe engleza ca să citească literatură britanică în original. La 20 martie 1939, se amintește în jurnal, Cehoslovacia este ocupată în întregime de către germani. „Privită de acolo (de la Balcic), toată viaţa mea mi se pare greşită, stupidă, încordată, fără sens" (pag. 202). Când este chemat la pregătirea militară, la 18 mai 1938, așterne pe hârtie următoarele rânduri: „Am făcut adineauri o repetiţie generală. Vai ! ce deplorabilă figură fac. Sunt mizerabil, bătut parcă, desfiinţat, desfigurat. Nu mai sunt eu; nu sunt nimic, nimic, nimic. Ceva care poate fi ucis la îmbulzeală, fără ca într-adevăr să aibă vreo importanţă; ceva care poate fi târât prin noroaie, aruncat în grajduri, uitat pe câmp; ceva fără nume, fără identitate, fără privire, fără voinţă, fără glas, fără viaţă — un soldat român" (SEBASTIAN, 1996: 205). Trebuie să fie în mine ceva iremediabil civil, care îi irită din instinct pe militari (Ibidem: 209). Când primește, ca excepție, prin mijlocirea unei persoane importante, șaizeci de zile de permisie, efectiv nu mai vrea să se întoară la regiment. Spre deosebire de alte jurnale de epocă, jurnalul lui M. Sebastian este extrem de sec, de lucid, de obiectiv. Aproape că pare lipsit de ceea ce face ca un jurnal să fie jurnal. Nu sunt trist. Sunt pustiu. Nu aştept pe nimeni, nu aştept nimic (Ibidem: 214). La un moment dat, devine traducător din limba engleză, după doar șase luni de asimilare a limbii, ceea ce este aproape un record în materie, și asta îi permite să mai câștige niște bani și să supraviețuiască în continuare. Într-un Bucureşti pustiu, depopulat, oblonit, aprins, incendiat de flăcări albe, nevăzute – eu traduc, traduc, traduc... (Duminică, 23 iulie 1939 – SEBASTIAN, 1996: 216).

Notația de Miercuri, 9 [august 1939] este deosebit de importantă în ordinea dominației realului în cadrul jurnalului: „Am ascultat aseară comunicatul Statului-Major la radio şi dintr-o dată am simţit că nimic nu mai are importanţă. Vor fi mari concentrări şi, judecând după încordarea de la Danzig, s-ar putea să fie şi război. Am avut o seară grea şi o noapte agitată. Un fel de silă, un fel de oboseală de a fi om. Totuşi, acuma dimineaţa, sunt din nou la masa de scris. Cu orice preţ, romanul ăsta trebuie terminat" (SEBASTIAN, 1996: 217-218). Deși este de cele mai multe ori deprimat, scriitorul își recunoaște și o anumită perseverență a scrisului, chiar dacă o neagă în mod frecvent: Nu merge, nu merge, nu merge (p. 220). La un moment dat i se adresează lui însuși la persoana a treia, ca unui străin: „Trece vremea, băiatule. Ar trebui să înţelegi asta. Ar trebui să înţelegi că zilele acestea mari, libere, libere din zori pînă noaptea, nu le vei găsi la Bucureşti" (SEBASTIAN, 1996: 224). Între timp, se stabilește cunoscutul tratat de neagresiune germano-sovietic, adică pactul Molotov-Ribbentrop. Luni seara războiul părea inevitabil. Aseară pacea părea posibilă (30 august 1939 – Ibidem: 226). Existența lui M. Sebastian cunoaște o lungă serie de oscilări, înaintări, pendulări, amânări, indecizii și decizii îndoielnice, în acest context inexplicabil care este Viața în sine. Pentru că Este o limită dincolo de care lucrurile sunt mai tari decît oamenii, mai tari decît iniţiativa şi voinţa oamenilor (pagina 231). „Totul e confuz, nesigur, încă neangajat, încă nedecis. Şi ceea ce mi se pare cu totul neverosimil e acest Bucureşti luminat, vioi, plin de lume, cu restaurantele pline, cu străzile animate, un Bucureşti cel mult curios de ce se întâmplă, dar nu intrat în panică şi nici conştient de prezenţa unei tragedii care a izbucnit" (SEBASTIAN, 1996: 150). Dimineţile sunt suportabile, dar nopţile sunt grele, pline de neliniște, otrăvite de presimţiri (p. 157). „Ca evreu român, M. Sebastian a fost nu numai victima antisemitismului public (inclusiv din presă), ci şi victima antisemitismului oficial. Introducerea legislaţiei antisemite în România (1938), urmată de pierderea locului de muncă la Fundaţiile Regale, ameninţarea directă la care a fost supus ca evreu, Războiul Mondial, deportările evreilor (inclusiv deportarea fratelui său) au fost o parte din ofensele, suferințele şi persecuțiile pe care le-a îndurat. Pe măsură ce antisemitismul oficial a câștigat teren, iar cercul lui de prieteni l-a expulzat, Sebastian s-a simţit tot mai însingurat" (PETREU, 2010: 256). Atunci când este asasinat Armand Călinescu, „E o minunată zi de toamnă, plină de soare... și nimic nu pare deranjat din mecanismul acestui mare oraș; totuși, undeva, în însuși centrul acestui mecanism, s-a dat o lovitură teribilă, lovitură care nu se simte încă" (Joi, 21 septembrie 1939 – SEBASTIAN, 1996: 233). Totul mi s-a părut atroce, umilitor, deșănțat. La un moment dat, lecturează selectiv Istoria evreilor de Dubnow.

Vineri, 15 martie [1940] este o zi capitală din existența diaristului: „A murit Nae Ionescu", iar sâmbătă, 16 [martie 1940]: „Plâns nervos, imposibil de stăpânit, ieri-dimineaţă, intrând în casa lui Nae Ionescu, două ore după ce a murit. Se duce cu el o întreagă perioadă din viaţa mea, acum – acum de abia – definitiv închisă. Ce soartă stranie a avut omul ăsta extraordinar, care moare neîmplinit, nerealizat, învins și – dacă nu mi-ar fi greu s-o spun – ratat (s. n.)" (SEBASTIAN, 1996: 267). Peste exact o lună, la 16 aprilie, își imaginează fie o sumbră lume hitleristă, fie o Europă liberă, fără terori, fără superstiţii (p. 270). Caruselul războiului ia proporții îngrijorătoare, nemții se află deja la Calais, iar scriitorul se simte prins ca într-o cursă de șoareci. Din când în când, își transcrie, pe scurt, visele și reveriile nocturne. Mereu visuri lungi, complicate, fantastice, aproape în fiecare noapte, par le uit înainte de a le putea însemna (Ibidem: p 273). La 14 iunie 1940, germanii ocupă Parisul. Este interesant de observat că, în jurnal, ororile războiului sunt consemnate cu detașare aproape maximă, tinzând către gradul 0 al subiectivității: este ca și cum M. Sebastian s-ar dezgoli de propriul lui înveliș de carne. Prin primăvara lui 1941 e silit să își părăsească garsoniera, din cauza exproprierii imobilelor aparținând evreilor, iar casa pe care o lasă în urmă este și primul lucru pe care îl pierde. „Strania senzaţie de a intra într-un mare restaurant cu lumină, cu lume multă, cu muzică. E parcă o lume ireală, un decor de teatru, ceva în afară de întreaga noastră viaţă" (SEBASTIAN, 1996: 316) iar „De la 1 aprilie mai departe sunt în aer. Dintr-o dată, ca o bruscă sufocare, resimt toată spaima sărăciei, a mizeriei" (Ibidem: 318). Stilul sec, ca de arhivă, apropiat de reportaj sau de documentar, al jurnalului lui M. Sebastian, cu foarte puține inserții emoționale, dă seamă de absurdul războiului și al epocii respective. Mă simt obosit, extenuat, covârşit de tot ce se întâmplă (p. 322). Obosit, apăsat, abătut – dar nu ajuns la limita speranțelor (p. 325). Între timp, în Europa, Londra se află iremediabil sub asediul bombardamentelor. Și peste toate, un sentiment de cenuşe, de zbatere, de viață inutilă (Ibidem: 333). De la 19 mai, același an, primește cartele pentru zahăr, pâine, ulei și carne și toată lumea așteaptă o „pace de compromis".

Încremenirea în identitatea evreiască îi creează frecvent anxietate, dar În fond, suntem, noi, evreii, de un optimism copilăros, absurd, uneori inconştient (SEBASTIAN, 1996: 338). Duminicile, mai ales, trec din ce în ce mai greu pentru tânărul Sebastian, care întrevede în resemnare cel mai bun remediu împotriva morții care cuprinde întreaga umanitate. A rămâne în casă și a citi din sonetele lui Shakespeare, în loc să iasă afară obligat să poarte steaua în șase colțuri, o piesă de identitate, un fel de medalie, i se pare un fel de dezertare necesară și izbăvitoare. „Războiul e o scuză pentru prea multe renunţări. Eu m-am resemnat a-l primi ca pe o lungă hibernare, dar în jurul meu sunt încă oameni vii, care trăiesc, care lucrează, care se agită. De ce nu pot reintra şi eu în viaţă ?" (Luni, 15 septembrie 1941 – SEBASTIAN, 1996: 386). Din când în când, în mod paradoxal, remarcă frumusețea orașului, și a naturii, în vremea unui război absurd și dezumanizant. „Azi-noapte trei alarme aeriene, pe o lumină albăstrie de lună, clară, străvezie, uşoară ca niciodată. Una din cele mai frumoase nopţi din câte ţin minte. Totul e transfigurat, totul e mai uşor, mai pur. Oraşul nemişcat, tăcut devine ceva cu totul distinct de oraşul obişnuit" (p. 389). Atunci când nu se gândește la sinucidere, cu o săptămână înainte, se gândește la cerşeală. Peste vreo jumătate de lună, reveria dispariției voluntare se accentuează din ce în ce mai mult: „Şoseaua pustie, cu multe frunze moarte. O culoare galbenă, pală, care înfrumuseţa totul. Aş fi putut crede că sunt în altă ţară, în alt oraş, la Lisabona, la Geneva" (Luni, 7 octombrie –SEBASTIAN, 1996: 398). Între timp, evreii din Bucovina sunt adunați de prin diverse târguri de provincie (Vatra Dornei, Câmpulung, Gura Humorului) şi expulzați din țară. „Spre o ţintă necunoscută. Spre Transnistria, se zice… Îngheaţă surâsul lor de optimism atavic, se stinge vechea lor ironie consolatoare" [despre evrei] (p. 401/403). În acest context, scriitorul începe să se gândească obsesiv la imperiozitatea, și în același timp imposibilitatea plecării din țară. De Sfântul Dumitru (1941), așteptările referitoare la încheierea conflagrației mondiale se prăbușesc vertiginos: „Sunt împietrit de spaimă şi nelinişte. Mi-e milă de bătrâni şi de copii. Mi-e milă de Mama. Nu ştiu ce să-i spun, nu ştiu cum s-o mângâi. Mă silesc să zâmbesc şi nu pot" (SEBASTIAN, 1996: 408). Niciodată viaţa nu mi s-a părut atât de nereală, iar războiul E un pendul psihologic, de o regularitate mecanică (p. 417).

Anii 1941 și 1942 se precipită, și în macro-istorie, și în cadrul jurnalului. [Miercuri], 31 decemvrie 1941: ruşii au debarcă în Crimeea răsăriteană, reocupând Kerciul. În același an, se scufundă „Struma", vasul care plecase din portul Constanța cu aproximativ 769 de refugiați evrei din România, care încercau să ajungă în Palestina (aflată atunci sub mandat britanic), vasul cu ajutorul căruia se gândise și M. Sebastian, în treacăt, să își croiască o altă soartă (vezi p. 443). La 6 martie Darea de seamă extinsă despre Al Doilea Război Mondial care este Jurnalul lui Mihai Sebastian, cu inserții amare, și totuși reținute, despre soarta evreilor, reprezintă un documentar folositor și o scriere destul de emoționantă pentru cititorul din actualitate. „Iulie a trecut îngrozitor de încet – ceas de ceas, minut de minut. Trag timpul după mine, mă târăsc după el. Trăiesc cu ochii pe ceas şi calendar. Încă o zi, încă una, încă una, încă una. E extenuant" (Sâmbătă, 1 august [1942] – SEBASTIAN, 1996: 463). Aceste notații au loc în timpul ofensivei de la cotul Donului şi dinspre Stalingrad: autorul dezvoltă un soi de impasibilitate la tot ceea ce se petrece în jurul său. Războiul ne urmăreşte ca propria noastră umbră (p. 465). Din jurnal străbate, pe alocuri, dictonul latin „Homo sum, humani nihil a me alienum puto" – „Sunt om, nimic din ce este omenesc nu-mi este străin") în tonuri triste sau, câteodată, mai vitaliste („Nu are nici un sens şi nu e de folos nimănui să reintru în exasperarea noastră comună" – pag. 468). Spre sfârșitul toamnei, resemnarea atinge, în mod paradoxal, paroxismul. Pentru mine războiul suspendă totul. Aştept pacea cum aş aştepta un tren. Între timp, mă zbat între toropeală şi exasperare. (Luni, 2 noiembrie 1942 – SEBASTIAN, 1996: 477).

„Fără disperare, mă gândesc că asta se cheamă un ratat. EU. La 35 de ani, nici o meserie, nici o resursă, nici o prietenie reală, nici o scăpare. Tot ce am făcut a eşuat lamentabil. Hainele mi se jerpelesc. Ghetele arată din ce în ce mai prost. Sunt jigărit, sunt obosit, sunt terminat, sunt inutil. De aici până la a întinde mâna şi a cere – cât mai e ?" (Duminică, 20 decembrie 1942). De la 1 ianuarie, anul următor, 1943, încetează să mai urmărească mersul războiului cu același soi de religiozitate și să mai consemneze periodic situația: Nimic nou pe fronturi (p. 485) „Ritmul evenimentelor se precipită oare ? Ne aflăm cumva pe planul înclinat al sfârşitului? Mai e, dimpotrivă, loc pentru opriri, pentru redresări, pentru întoarceri ? Talgerul balanţei a căzut definitiv, sau vom mai avea oscilaţii, într-un joc nesfârşit de balanţă ? Nu ştiu – dar întrebările devin posibile" (Marți, 9 februarie 1943 – SEBASTIAN, 1996: 501). Detașat de toate scenariile posibile, Mihail Sebastian începe să scrie, în iarna acestui an, la celebra piesă Steaua fără nume. În vară, absurdul războiului atinge apogeul: „Între care nu trebuie s-o uităm pe aceea [posibilitate] de a nu se întâmpla nimic. Un fel de armistiţiu nepremeditat, reieşind din pânda intensă a celor două tabere, care ar aştepta din secundă în secundă un atac mereu amânat – este şi asta posibil" (Luni, 14 iunie 1943 – SEBASTIAN, 1996: 517). Însă la 8 septembrie 1943, se întâmplă ceva de domeniul miracolului, așa cum notează diaristul: Italia capitulează în sfârșit. Pentru anul 1944, jurnalul începe brusc, la 8 aprilie, cu bombardamentele cumplite ale germanilor asupra Bucureștiului. Într-o oră (şi nu cred că bombardamentul propriu-zis a durat o oră), un oraş cu un milion de locuitori a fost paralizat în cele mai simple funcţiuni de viaţă (p. 539).

La 5 iunie [1944], luni, în sfârșit, Roma este ocupată de Aliaţi, iar la 29 august 1944 jurnalul consemnează că se întâmplă ceva teribil: rușii intră triumfători și, totodată, lamentabili, în București. Ultima parte a jurnalului devine foarte cețoasă, anti-românească și oarecum filo-rusă. „Soldaţii ăştia ruşi, care trec pe străzile Bucureştiului, cu zâmbetul lor de copil şi cu bădărănia lor cordială, sunt nişte îngeri. De unde au puterea să nu pună foc peste tot, să nu ucidă, să nu prade, să nu prefacă în scrum oraşul ăsta în care locuiesc mamele, nevestele, surorile, amantele celor care au asasinat, incendiat şi nimicit propria lor ţară ? Numai exterminarea totală a Germaniei ar putea răscumpăra – pe o balanţă ideală a Justiţiei – tot, sau măcar o parte din ce s-a întâmplat." (Vineri, 8 septembrie 1944 – SEBASTIAN, 1996: 561-2).

Jurnalul se încheie în ton minor, meditativ și în mare măsură melancolic: „Sâmbătă, 16 septemvrie [1944] – „Nu sunt dispus să am decepţii. Nu-mi recunosc un asemenea drept. Nemţii şi hitlerismul au crăpat. E deajuns. Am ştiut totdeauna, până în adâncul inimii, că aş fi murit bucuros, ca să grăbesc măcar cu o fracţiune de milimetru prăbuşirea Germaniei. Germania e prăbuşită – şi eu trăiesc. Mai mult ce pot cere? Atâţia oameni au murit, fără să vadă cu ochii lor căderea bestiei ! Noi, care suntem încă vii, am avut acest imens noroc. Mai departe? Nu ştiu. Mai departe, începe viaţa. Un fel de viaţă care trebuie trăită. Singurul lucru după care am tânjit a fost libertatea. Nu o nouă definiţie a libertăţii – ci libertatea. După atâţia ani de teroare nu mai avem nevoie să ni se explice ce înseamnă să fii liber. Asta ştim – şi asta nu se înlocuieşte cu nici o formulă" (SEBASTIAN, 1996: 564). Duminică, 31 decemvrie [1944] este ultima intrare cronologică a jurnalului. La un moment dat se notează autoreferențial, și într-o tonalitate foarte deprimantă –„Jurnalul ăsta nu-mi serveşte la mare lucru. Îl recitesc uneori şi mă dezolează lipsa lui de sunet adânc. Lucruri consemnate fără emoţie, cenuşiu, inexpresiv. Nu se vede nicăieri că-l scrie un om care merge, zi de zi, ceas de ceas, cu gîndul morţii lângă el, în el. Mi-e frică de mine însumi. Fug de mine. Mă evit. Prefer să întorc capul, să schimb vorba. Niciodată n-am fost mai bătrân, mai tern, mai fără elan, mai fără tinereţe. Coarde sparte, gesturi inutile, cuvinte șterse" (SEBASTIAN, 1996: 313).

Respectând cele mai multe dintre caracteristicile jurnalului, precum temporalitatea, confesiunea, fragmentarismul și interioritatea/ interiorizarea, tonalitatea fundamentală a opului lui Mihail Sebastian păstrează autenticismul care variază de la analitic la confesiv, cu inserții critice subiective asupra epocii. Spre deosebire de alte jurnale, are un stil destul de sobru, suficient de prudent, auto-supravegheat în permanență, cu o conștiință a receptării dusă la extrem. „Jurnalul lui Sebastian surprinde situaţia paradoxală în care se afla scriitorul. Pe de o parte, el trăia în România care adoptase o legislaţie antisemită, se învârtea într-un cerc de cunoştinţe şi prieteni (unii antisemiţi) care ţinea de trecut (PETREU, 2010: 269). „Din incident în incident, din ramificare în ramificare, plec de la Alice şi ajung la Blank, la Leni, la mine, la Lilly, la Zoe, la Maryse, la Marie Ghiolu, la Lupa, la Nae, la Mircea, la Camil – şi prin Camil din nou la Alice, unde circuitul se închide, putând însă să reînceapă din nou în alt sens, cu alt itinerar, antrenând alţi oameni, alte aventuri – toate fiind angrenate în acelaşi sistem de relaţii sociale", remarcă el în 14 martie 1939. Pe de altă parte, are relaţii noi, există oameni care îl ajută, dar care nu au pentru el o declarată importanţă afectivă. O lume fără soluție, din care nu mai avea ieșire. „Cazul real al lui Sebastian – un scriitor român, evreu de origine, rătăcit în labirintul extremei drepte româneşti – arată nesfârşitele posibilităţi de înşelare la care ne ademeneşte istoria. El, primul din generaţia '27, s-a lăsat înşelat de ideologia revoluţionară a epocii şi de farmecul lui Nae Ionescu, precum şi de spectacolul extremei drepte europene, în varianta dictaturii italiane; începând cu 1933 [la 9 decembrie 1933, Consiliul de Miniştri a interzis Garda de Fier] şi apoi în contratimp cu Sebastian, l-au urmat colegii lui de generaţie, Racoveanu, Cioran, Eliade, Noica şi ceilalţi. Evoluţia lui pune bine în lumină forța gravitaţională de atracţie a extremismului din Europa şi din România interbelică, dându-ne totodată o sugestie despre puterea persuasivă a modelului Nae Ionescu" (PETREU, 2010, 278). Considerat unul dintre jurnalele importante din literatura română, comparabil, până la un punct, cu acela al lui Jeni Acterian sau acela al Monicăi Lovinescu, jurnalul expus, deși tinde către obiectivitate, și pare redundant, alunecă înspre subiectivitate către finalul său și se distanțează inevitabil de autenticitate, reflectând totuși situarea personalităților vremii față de ideologiile de atunci, dar și poziția lui particulară din perspectiva evreului dezrădăcinat, decepționat și mereu auto-iluzionat.

THE TRAUMA OF THE KOREAN WAR IN ECHOES OF THE WHITE GIRAFFE

Marian Suciu
Postdoctoral Researcher, PhD, "1 December 1918" University of Alba Iulia

Abstract: After World War II, the Korean Peninsula was divided into two countries. The state established south of the 38th parallel was under the influence of the United States, while the northern state was under the influence of the Soviet Union. Unfortunately, in the Republic of Korea, communist sympathizers were persecuted, while in North Korea, those who had collaborated with the Japanese were hunted down. As North Koreans dreamt of reunification, the communist state attacked the Republic of Korea, causing refugees to flee to the safer southeastern part of the peninsula. During the war, many soldiers were killed or wounded, but it was not only the soldiers who suffered, as the civilians also lost family members and endured hunger and exhaustion. Echoes of the White Giraffe describes the suffering of a young girl who took refuge in Busan with her mother and younger brother, while her older brothers and father remained in Seoul. The novel vividly portrays how harsh life was for the refugees.

Keywords: Republic of Korea; Popular Democratic Republic of Korea; Korean War; Trauma.

Although the Korean War was just one of many traumatic moments in the recent history of the Korean Peninsula, it is important to note that this conflict profoundly affected South Korean society, as the capital of the Republic of Korea was captured twice by communist forces, and a large proportion of the population moved to the southeastern part of the peninsula to escape North Korean brutality and communist propaganda. Recently, more and more autobiographical and fictional novels were published on this topic, describing in great detail how traumatic the Korean War was for both those that fought and those that ran from the conflict. This increase of Korean War literature came about because the victims, their family members or other related Koreans or Americans tried to heal from this traumatic moment through writing.

Historical context

As the Japanese were forced to capitulate after the two nuclear bombs exploded in Hiroshima and Nagasaki in August 1945, the Koreans believed that they would be free, but the great world powers did not allow it. In the beginning, at the Cairo Conference in 1943, it was established that the Koreans would be helped and put under a trusteeship by the United States of America and granted full independence at a later date. Although "Stalin appeared to have gone along with the plan for a trusteeship" at the Tehran Conference, after the United States dropped the first bomb on Japan, the Russians declared war on the Asian Empire and attacked their "northern frontier in Sakhalin, Manchuria, and along the extreme northeast corner of Korea that borders Siberia" . In this context, as the United States of America were still far from the Korean peninsula, they were forced to accept the compromise of sharing the influence in the region. Therefore, what was north of the 38 parallel remained under the Soviet Union's influence and the territory south of the 38 parallel was put under American protection.

At the "conference in Moscow, the foreign ministers of the U.S., Great Britain and Soviet Union adopted a 5-year trusteeship plan for Korea" . However, this plan was never put into action as "South Korea opposed the plan whereas North Korea approved of it brining conflict between the Korean people" . After this failure, elections were carried out under U.N. supervision in South Korea and the first South Korean representatives were elected, who then selected Rhee Syngman as the first president of the Republic of Korea in 1948. In the meantime, "[o]n September 9, 1948, Kim Ilsung declared the establishment of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea" .

On 25 June 1950, the Korean communist army crossed the border and invaded the Republic of Korea. As the South Korean army was missing guns, plans, cannons and tanks, it stands to reason that the North Korean offensive was successful. After only 3 months, the forces of the South had to retreat in the southeastern area of the Korean peninsula, in the neighborhood of Busan. The United States, fearing the expansion of communist forces in the Asian-Pacific area, prepared an intervention starting with August 1950. Through the battle of Inchon, in September 1950, the United States, United Nations and South Korea managed to reconquer the area near the South Korean capital. Afterwards, the American and Korean army managed to retake the South Korean state's territory and invaded North Korean territory. As Kim Il Sung's forces were losing ground, the Chinese approved the intervention by Chinese volunteer soldiers, which moved the fight alongside the 38 parallel and even recaptured Seoul for a couple of months. After that, there was no significant development, and the Korean Armistice Agreement is signed on 27 July 1953 .

During the war, more than 33.000 American soldiers lost their lives, while the army of the Republic of Korea recorded over 400,000 troops as killed or missing. North Korea's forces suffered even greater losses, with more than half a million soldiers dead or unaccounted for. Moreover, almost 2 million civilians from North Korean were killed or injured, and about 1 million South Koreans died . Even the survivors endured terrible hardships during the North Korean invasion of the Republic of Korea: masses of people carrying only the barest of essentials had to relocate in the southeast of the Korean peninsula, where they had to live as refugees in encampments or improvised houses .

The Korean War Trauma in Sook Nyul Choi's Novel

Sook Nyul Choi is a well-known writer of children's picture books and young adult novels through which she introduces either Korean culture or history to American readers . The novel Echoes of the White Giraffe continues the story of Sookan, a young Korean girl who survived the Japanese occupation of Korea and fled North Korea after the Korean peninsula was divided, which was told in Year of Impossible Goodbyes. In this new novel, Sookan continues her traumatic survival in the Korean peninsula, as the Korean communist state attacks the Republic of Korea, and the majority of the populace is forced to retreat to the southern part of the peninsula, where refugee camps were established.

The majority of South Koreans that lived through the Korean war had also experienced the Japanese occupation, with its harsh treatment by the invaders. Afterwards, they were exposed to the hunts for former Japanese collaborators and then the hunts for socialist sympathizers. Consequently, South Koreans were experiencing chronic trauma, no longer an acute one, as they had witnessed multiple instances of war or violence and "[t]hese types of repeated, life-threatening experiences are typically understood to result in symptoms of chronic trauma" , which impacts the ability to build "trusting relationships with other people, and […] [the] ability to feel safe" , but also "often produces strong feelings of fear, shame and guilt" .

After the traumatic experience of the Japanese occupation, when Sookan had to survive the Japanese school life, learn Japanese, while being banned from using Korean, and had to endure her Japanese teacher's harassment, and her escape from communist indoctrination in North Korea, she thought she would live a normal life. But in Echoes of the White Giraffe, the traumatic experiences continue, as she witnesses the Korean War. Although she goes through multiple disturbing experiences, Sookan learns to heal from chronic trauma through the normal routines of school, by joining the church choir, and through her first friendship with a boy.

People like Sookan had escaped the horrors of war, only to end up in refugee camps near Busan or other cities in the south of the Korean peninsula, where they were judged for fleeing their cities by their fellow Koreans. They were lucky because they "had escaped the bombing in Seoul just three days before" , and they did not have to witness how people were killed by bombs or how South Koreans were taken prisoner by the North Koreans, but they still had to suffer as they "had spent an entire day walking in the bitter cold all the way to Inchon harbor" . In the end, the family of Sookan arrived "[f]amished, frostbitten, and dirty" in Busan, were they had to take refuge in old houses on the hills of the city of Busan.

As if it were not enough to suffer on the flight from Seoul, the locals in Busan saw them as a nuisance. They called Sookan "a "refugee." That's what I am now, I thought to myself. How terrible the word refugee sounded! She said it as if it were the name of some terrible disease" . Despite being called a refugee, Sookan tried to adapt to her new life and attended classes at the improvised school and choir practice. Due to her talent in singing, she became the main singer of the choir, alongside Junho.

Although Sookan had a large family in Seoul, she always thought to herself that it is possible she "might see them soon, or [...] might never see them". During the evacuation, many people were left behind, some being trapped in the debris after the bombing of the city, while others might have been captured by the communists, or killed for having collaborated with the government of the Republic of Korea. Unfortunately, her best friend found out "that Bokhi's parents had died in the bombing" , which made her best friend mourn her family's death. Therefore, "for two days and nights, […] [Sookan] sat with Bokhi in utter silence. Her eyes were red and swollen, and her lips were sealed tight" .

Despite the fact that Sookan suffered constant traumatic experiences, she manged to overcome these difficult challenges. She received encouragement from a teacher that had build an improvised school for refugee children, from her good friends and from her new friend, which happened to be a boy, and with whom she spent time at choir practice.

In conclusion, we can say that, although young children lived through difficult moments during the Korean War, those that managed to escape to Busan and other southern regions during the war were fortunate to some degree. They were also unfortunate, as they were then perceived as refugees that had invaded the natives' home land. However, due to visionarie that built improvised schools or integrated the refugee children into local communities, the children managed to overcome their traumatic experiences. The novel the Echoes of the White Giraffe shows this type of experience, in which the dedicated professors and other extraordinary people transform a traumatic experience in an enjoyable experience. Therefore, the young refugee's experience becomes similar to a vacation experience in a camp, where she makes friends and meets a nice boy, who falls in love with her.

THE MYTH OF DEATH IN THE FAIRY TALE "YOUTH WITHOUT AGE AND LIFE WITHOUT DEATH" COLLECTED BY PETRE ISPIRESCU

Gabriela Olaru
PhD Student, University of Craiova

Abstract: The paper explores how the fairy tale "Youth Without Age and Life Without Death" reflects mythological and anthropological ideas about mortality. It argues that the hero's pursuit of immortality breaks the natural order and ultimately reveals that death is essential to human nature. Using mythocritical and hermeneutic approaches, the study shows that concepts like temporality, initiation, and dor restore meaning and balance. Modern readers interpret the tale as an allegory about human limits and the dangers of timeless existence, viewing the hero's final return to mortality as a necessary reintegration into the human condition.

Keywords: myth of death; temporalities; immortality; mythocriticism; narrative anthropology

1. Introducere

Problematica morții ocupă un loc central în majoritatea culturilor și se manifestă prin mituri, ritualuri și simboluri care conferă sens finitudinii și oferă comunităților cadre de interpretare a existenței (Eliade, 1995, p. 321). În tradiția românească, moartea nu este percepută exclusiv ca un eveniment biologic, ci ca o trecere într-un alt plan ontologic, reflectând o viziune în care granița dintre viață și moarte este permeabilă, iar ciclurile existențiale se înscriu într-o ordine cosmică (Boyer, 2022, p. 57). Această concepție se regăsește atât în folclorul funerar, cât și în basme și legende care descriu „lumea de dincolo" sau „tărâmul celălalt" (Ispirescu, 1984, p. 45).

Basmul „Tinerețe fără bătrânețe și viață fără de moarte", cules de Petre Ispirescu, se distinge prin modul în care narativitatea devine un discurs mitologic despre imposibilitatea abolirii morții. Spre deosebire de basmele tradiționale, în care eroul trece prin încercări pentru a atinge plenitudinea, protagonistul basmului aspiră la depășirea condiției umane, revendicând ceea ce în imaginarul cultural universal aparține divinităților sau ființelor supranaturale (Călinescu, 1982, p. 312). Dorința sa de a dobândi tinerețea veșnică îl conduce inevitabil la o confruntare cu moartea, restabilind ordinea cosmică perturbată de aspirația la nemurire (Eliade, 1957, p. 101).

2. Contextul cultural, mitologic și literar al basmului

2.1.Poziția basmului în cultura românească

Basmul „Tinerețe fără bătrânețe și viață fără de moarte" ocupă un loc aparte în literatura populară românească, nu doar prin vechimea și răspândirea motivelor sale, ci și prin concentrarea asupra unei probleme existențiale fundamentale: sensul și limitele vieții umane (Ispirescu, 1984, p. 46). Spre deosebire de majoritatea basmelor culese de Ispirescu, care urmăresc în principal conflictul moral, acest text se apropie de miturile cosmogonice și eshatologice, explorând relația omului cu timpul și destinul (Călinescu, 1982, p. 320).

Potrivit lui Ispirescu, basmul derivă din tradiția orală, confirmând existența unei mentalități arhaice despre tărâmul tinereții fără bătrânețe și viață fără de moarte, regăsită în credințele populare despre „tărâmul celălalt" sau „insula morților" (Ispirescu, 1984, p. 47). În folclorul românesc, acest spațiu apare ca un univers edenic inaccesibil muritorilor, unde timpul este suspendat, iar legile lumii obișnuite nu mai funcționează (Eliade, 1995, p. 322).

Astfel, basmul preia și transformă artistic aceste credințe, oferind o meditație asupra imposibilității omului de a evada din ciclul vieții și al morții, plasând textul în zona literaturii populare sapiențiale (Boyer, 2022, p. 58).

2.2.Perspective mitologice asupra morții

Miturile din diferite culturi au încercat să explice originea morții și posibilitatea depășirii ei. În mitologiile antice, nemurirea este rezervată zeilor, iar muritorii pot accesa temporar o stare de „aproape-nemurire" doar prin elemente magice sau ritualice: elixirul vieții în mitologia chineză, ambrozia și nectarul în mitologia greacă, sau apa vie și apa moartă în folclorul slav și românesc (Chevalier & Gheerbrant, 1993, p. 102).

În toate aceste mitologii, există o limită ontologică: muritorii nu pot accesa eternitatea fără consecințe. Încălcarea acestei granițe conduce la pedepsire sau reechilibrare cosmică. Exemple relevante includ mitul lui Ghilgameș, mitul lui Tithonus, legenda lui Orfeu sau povestea arborelui vieții din Geneza (Lévi-Strauss, 1978, p. 88).

În această lumină, eroul basmului lui Ispirescu poate fi interpretat ca un avatar al căutătorilor universali de nemurire. Eșecul său nu este întâmplător, ci structural, reflectând aceeași imposibilitate întâlnită în marile sisteme mitologice ale lumii (Boyer, 2022, p. 60).

2.3.Dimensiunea antropologică

Antropologia modernă evidențiază moartea ca temă centrală a imaginarului colectiv. Conform lui Mircea Eliade, Pascal Boyer și Anne-Christine Trémon, moartea este percepută nu doar ca sfârșit, ci ca trecere și reorganizare a statutului ontologic al individului (Eliade, 1995, p. 324; Boyer, 2022, p. 61; Tremon, 2024, p. 76).

În basmul analizat, moartea apare ca un „punct de returnare" în ordinea naturală. Narațiunea devine astfel un mit al negației morții și un avertisment asupra consecințelor evadării din timp (Vulcănescu, 1985, p. 100). Acceptarea morții, ca parte integrantă a existenței, reconfirmă ideea că timpul și finitudinea sunt structuri esențiale ale condiției umane (Boyer, 2022, p. 62).

Astfel, basmul lui Ispirescu se poate interpreta ca o expresie a înțelepciunii tradiționale: echilibrul lumii este posibil doar prin acceptarea morții, iar refuzul acesteia conduce la fragilitate și pierdere de sens (Eliade, 1995, p. 326).

3. Analiza narativă a basmului și funcțiile mitului morții

Basmul „Tinerețe fără bătrânețe și viață fără de moarte" poate fi înțeles ca un discurs narativ ce explorează tensiunea dintre aspirația spre eternitate și limitele ontologice ale condiției umane. Narațiunea este organizată în jurul unei axe conceptuale: încercarea de abolire a morții, iar fiecare episod contribuie la conturarea unei mitologii narative a condiției umane în raport cu finitudinea (Ispirescu, 1984, p. 48).

3.1.Nașterea eroului: un prolog al imposibilului

Debutul basmului marchează o introducere simbolică deosebită în literatura populară românească. Refuzul copilului de a se naște până la promisiunea „tinereții fără bătrânețe și viață fără de moarte" anticipează tema centrală a narațiunii: moartea este amânată, dar nu învinsă (Ispirescu, 1984, p. 49). Nașterea condiționată îl plasează pe erou în categoria ființelor liminale, între uman și suprauman, pregătindu-l pentru conflictul final. Moartea este prezentă prin absența ei: evitarea ei devine conflictul fundamental al întregii narațiuni (Eliade, 1995, p. 327).

3.2.Drumul inițiatic ca trecere prin limitele existenței

Călătoria eroului respectă un tipar inițiatic, însă scopul nu este maturizarea, ci depășirea condiției umane (Durand, 1960, p. 110). Obstacolele întâlnite reflectă limitele existenței:

Gheonoaia simbolizează moartea inevitabilă și efemeritatea vieții, confruntarea cu ea testând capacitatea eroului de a se desprinde de destinul natural (Vulcănescu, 1985, p. 102).

Scorpia întruchipează forța distructivă a naturii și testarea limitei curajului și a rezistenței morale.

Împărățiile supranaturale exprimă permanența cosmosului, contrastând cu efemeritatea ființei umane.

Fiecare episod îl îndepărtează pe erou de comunitatea simbolică a maturizării, transformând călătoria într-un parcurs paradoxal: nu apropiere de umanitate, ci suspendare într-o existență artificială, fără timp și fără destin (Ispirescu, 1984, p. 52).

3.3. Împărăția Tinereții – un spațiu al nemuririi sterile

Împărăția Tinereții reprezintă un spațiu al eternului prezent, fără istorie și fără suferință, un „non-loc" al nemuririi artificiale (Eliade, 1957, p. 42). Aici, eroul trăiește într-o plenitudine statică, contrară naturii umane, pentru care timpul și devenirea sunt esențiale. Identitatea sa se dizolvă, iar existența devine sterilă (Boyer, 2022, p. 63).

3.4.Dorul – reactivarea timpului și chemarea spre moarte

3.5.Întâlnirea finală cu moartea

Moartea finală nu are caracter punitiv; ea restabilește ordinea naturală, anulând excesul ontologic al existenței atemporale (Vulcănescu, 1985, p. 105). Eroul reintră în totalitatea ordinii universale, iar mesajul basmului este clar: nemurirea nu aparține oamenilor, iar moartea este element indispensabil al armoniei cosmice (Călinescu, 1982, p. 322).

4. Analiza mitocritică și hermeneutică

Analiza mitocritică și hermeneutică a basmului „Tinerețe fără bătrânețe și viață fără de moarte" permite înțelegerea textului nu doar ca narațiune folclorică, ci ca mit modernizat, purtător al unei cosmologii simbolice complexe. Raportarea la cadre teoretice fundamentale – Mircea Eliade, Gilbert Durand și Romulus Vulcănescu – evidențiază modul în care basmul organizează mitul morții și al nemuririi, transformându-l într-o reflecție asupra condiției umane (Eliade, 1995, p. 328; Durand, 1994, p. 55; Vulcănescu, 1985, p. 100).

4.1.Mircea Eliade: dualitatea sacru-profan

În gândirea lui Mircea Eliade, opoziția sacru-profan reprezintă una dintre structurile fundamentale ale experienței umane. Evadarea din timpul profan, discontinuu și degradat, și accesul la timpul sacru, regenerant și arhetipal constituie aspirația centrală a ființei religioase (Eliade, 1957, p. 45).

Eroul basmului lui Ispirescu întruchipează o variantă extremă a homo religiosus: refuză condiția timpului profan (timpul morții) și caută accesul la sacralitatea absolută – eternitatea. Totuși, Eliade subliniază că omul poate accede doar la forme simbolice ale eternității, nu la eternitatea însăși. Iluzia abolirii condiției umane corespunde încălcării unui tabu ontologic.

4.2.Gilbert Durand: regimurile imaginarului

Conform antropologiei imaginarului a lui Gilbert Durand, basmul poate fi analizat prin succesiunea celor trei mari regimuri simbolice: nocturn, diurn și sintetic (Durand, 1960, p. 112).
Regimul nocturn: dominat de frică, ambivalență și dorința de protecție, ilustrează refuzul de a se naște într-o lume marcată de moarte. Promisiunea „tinereții fără bătrânețe" funcționează ca protecție simbolică împotriva întunericului metafizic.

Regimul diurn: reprezintă eroismul, acțiunea și depășirea limitelor. Călătoria eroului și confruntarea cu entități simbolice (Gheonoaia, Scorpia) reflectă voința și verticalitatea imaginarului diurn.

Regimul sintetic: reîntâlnirea cu moartea și reconcilierea opozițiilor (eternitatea – temporalitatea, sacrul – profanul, viața – moartea). Scena finală simbolizează reintegrarea în ritmul cosmic și eliminarea exceselor (Durand, 1994, p. 57).

Astfel, basmul traversează un arc complet de la negarea morții la acceptarea acesteia, reflectând structuri universale ale imaginarului colectiv.

4.3.Romulus Vulcănescu: mitologia românească a nemuririi

Romulus Vulcănescu identifică în mitologia românească forme ale nemuririi: zeii, spiritele naturii și eroii supraumanizați. Nemurirea este însă rezervată ființelor din afara lumii muritorilor (Vulcănescu, 1985, p. 101).

Eroul basmului comite o „ruptură de nivel ontologic", aspirând la statutul ființelor nemuritoare și încălcând granița dintre uman și supraumanul. Ascensiunea sa în Împărăția Tinereții reprezintă o intruziune în ordinea cosmică, iar revenirea bruscă în lumea muritoare restabilește echilibrul. Îmbătrânirea instantanee și moartea finală sunt consecința depășirii limitelor ontologice.

4.4.Funcția morală și antropologică

Interpretarea mitocritică arată că basmul transmite un mesaj profund antropologic, nu strict moralizator. Structura narativă funcționează ca model pentru înțelegerea limitelor umane.
Nemurirea nu este destinul omului.

Condiția umană este inseparabil legată de timp (Eliade, 1995, p. 329).
Moartea nu pedepsește, ci conferă sens existenței, reintegrând individul în ritmurile universului.
Eternitatea lipsită de succesiune și devenire devine sterilă (Jankélévitch, 1961, p. 48).

Mitul morții funcționează ca mecanism de echilibrare, reamintind limitele dintre lumi și rolul omului în univers (Boyer, 2022, p. 70).

Astfel, basmul promovează o înțelepciune tradițională: omul trebuie să locuiască timpul, nu să-l anuleze, iar condiția sa umană este definită prin finitudine, nu prin nemurire (Călinescu, 1982, p. 324).

5. Dimensiunea filosofică a morții în basmul „Tinerețe fără bătrânețe și viață fără de moarte"

Problematizarea morții în basmul lui Petre Ispirescu depășește nivelul simbolic folcloric și devine un discurs metaforic asupra finitudinii și limitelor ontologice ale condiției umane (Eliade, 1995, p. 332; Boyer, 2022, p. 68). Basmul integrează teme centrale ale filosofiei existențialiste și hermeneutice: imposibilitatea nemuririi, nostalgia originară, revenirea în temporalitate și moartea ca reintegrare în ritmul cosmic (Heidegger, 1977, p. 36).

5.1.Moartea ca limită constitutivă a existenței

Martin Heidegger afirmă că moartea constituie „structura de bază a ființei în lume", iar ființa umană este „ființă către moarte" (Heidegger, 1977, p. 36). În această viziune, moartea conferă sens și orientare existențială vieții.

Basmul confirmă acest principiu: în Împărăția Tinereții fără bătrânețe, unde moartea este suspendată, eroul își pierde treptat orientarea existențială, memoria se diluează, trecutul și viitorul devin irelevante, iar identitatea se fragmentează (Ispirescu, 1984, p. 45). Suspendarea morții conduce implicit la suspendarea sensului, ilustrând ideea heideggeriană conform căreia viața fără finitudine devine imposibilă.

5.2.Nemurirea ca negație a devenirii și a identității

Vladimir Jankélévitch subliniază că nemurirea absolută constituie o „imobilitate letargică", lipsită de tensiunea vitală specifică condiției umane (Jankélévitch, 1961, p. 48).

Basmul lui Ispirescu traduce această idee: Împărăția Tinereții este paradisiacă, dar lipsită de sens și devenire. Eroul trăiește fără suferință, dar și fără autenticitate; identitatea sa este suspendată, iar devenirea umană – anulată (Ispirescu, 1984, p. 48). Nemurirea devine astfel „moarte ontologică": corpul există, dar ființa profundă este inertă.

5.3.Dorul – reactualizarea temporalității și chemarea spre finitudine

În basmul românesc, dorul funcționează ca principiu ontologic, nu doar ca emoție (Eliade, 1995, p. 330). Dorul reintroduce timpul în existența eroului, restaurând legătura cu trecutul, memoria și identitatea.

Prin acest mecanism, moartea reintră în logica narativă, readucând eroul în limitele propriei condiții umane (Ispirescu, 1984, p. 52).

5.4.Timpul moral și timpul cosmic: două regimuri existențiale

În Împărăția Tinereții, timpul este suspendat; în lumea muritorilor, timpul este ireversibil (Eliade, 1995, p. 331). Revenirea eroului produce un „șoc ontologic": îmbătrânirea instantanee și moartea reflectă compatibilitatea existenței umane doar cu timpul muritor (Cioran, 1997, p. 74).

5.5.Moartea ca rezoluție ontologică și restabilire a armoniei

Moartea finală nu reprezintă pedeapsă, ci reintegrarea ordinii cosmice: eroul este readus în ciclul natural al vieții și identității (Vulcănescu, 1985, p. 103). Ea are rol purificator și integrator, aliniind basmul la viziunea lui Lucian Blaga asupra morții ca „mister care încununează existența" (Blaga, 1995, p. 120).

5.6.Sinteză filosofică

Din perspectiva unei hermeneutici filosofice, basmul comunică următoarele idei:

1) Omul nu poate trăi fără moarte; finitudinea conferă sens vieții (Heidegger, 1977, p. 36).
2) Nemurirea absolută este inumană și conduce la stagnare existențială (Jankélévitch, 1961, p. 48).
3) Fuga de moarte este iluzorie; încercarea de a o evita readuce moartea cu mai multă forță (Ispirescu, 1984, p. 55).
4) Timpul este structura fundamentală a existenței; suspendarea lui anulează identitatea (Eliade, 1995, p. 332).
5) Moartea nu este sfârșit tragic, ci proces de restabilire și eliberare (Blaga, 1995, p. 120).
6) Basmul se dovedește astfel un text cu valoare filosofică remarcabilă: omul este ființă muritoare, iar murirea constituie condiția posibilității vieții autentice (Boyer, 2022, p. 70).

6. Narativitatea mitologică în receptarea contemporană a basmului „Tinerețe fără bătrânețe și viață fără de moarte"

Basmul lui Petre Ispirescu continuă să fie relevant în contextul contemporan, datorită capacității sale de a transcende temporalitatea și de a oferi lecturi mitologice și filosofice universale (Călinescu, 1982, p. 312; Eliade, 1995, p. 335). Narativitatea mitologică a textului este percepută de cititorii moderni ca un mecanism prin care se explorează tensiunile dintre finitudine, dorința de nemurire și structurarea timpului.

6.1.Fascinația față de imposibil

Refuzul eroului de a se naște până la promisiunea „tinereții fără bătrânețe și vieții fără de moarte" este perceput în recepția contemporană ca o scenă emblematică a paradoxului existențial: intrarea directă într-un univers mitic, în care moartea este amânată, dar nu eliminată (Ispirescu, 1984, p. 17; Boyer, 2022, p. 69). Pentru mulți cititori, acest episod reprezintă gestul de libertate absolută al individului și evocă simultan imposibilul și inevitabilul.

6.2.Nemurirea ca anxietate, nu ca ideal

În recepția modernă, Împărăția Tinereții este asociată cu alienarea, monotonia și golul existențial. Tinerii adulți percep eternitatea fără timp nu ca un dar, ci ca o condiție de sterilitate simbolică (Eliade, 1995, p. 330). Lectura hermeneutică relevă că nemurirea nu este idealul uman, ci expresia unei tensiuni între dorința de plenitudine și limitările ontologice ale existenței (Vulcănescu, 1985, p. 104).

6.3.Dorul – forța ontologică a reactivării temporalității

Dorul apare în basm ca mecanism ontologic, reintroducând timpul și revenind eroului identitatea și legătura cu lumea muritoare (Ispirescu, 1984, p. 52; Eliade, 1995, p. 331). Receptarea contemporană evidențiază faptul că dorul nu funcționează doar ca nostalgie, ci ca catalizator al reintrării în temporalitate și al acceptării finitudinii.

6.4.Funcția cathartică a basmului

Cititorii moderni percep îmbătrânirea instantanee a eroului și moartea finală ca un șoc simbolic, generând efect cathartic. Experiența lecturii facilitează reflecția asupra limitelor umane, asupra inevitabilității morții și asupra ordinii cosmice (Călinescu, 1982, p. 315; Blaga, 1995, p. 122).

6.5.Funcția educativă și identitară

În mediul școlar contemporan, basmul stimulează discuții despre rostul vieții, sensul vârstelor și relația dintre schimbare și stagnare (Boyer, 2022, p. 72). De asemenea, el reafirmă elemente specifice culturii române: dorul, legătura cu pământul, acceptarea morții, tensiunea dintre destin și libertate (Ispirescu, 1984, p. 55; Vulcănescu, 1985, p. 107).

6.6.Interpretări simbolice în contextul contemporan

Analiza discursurilor contemporane indică trei tipare principale:

1) Basmul ca alegorie a maturizării – Împărăția Tinereții reprezintă „vârsta iluziei”, iar întoarcerea eroului – „vârsta lucidității” (Eliade, 1995, p. 333).
2) Basmul ca reflecție asupra limitelor tehnologiei și nemuririi artificiale – cititorii contemporani asociază nemurirea cu anti-aging, transumanism și alienare existențială (Boyer, 2022, p. 74).
3) Basmul ca mit al alienării – eternitatea devine sinonimă cu un spațiu fără biografie, un non-loc al existenței (Durand, 1994, p. 118).

6.7.Concluzii privind narativitatea mitologică contemporană

Studiul receptării contemporane arată că basmul funcționează la mai multe niveluri:

Antropologic: omul nu poate concepe existența fără timp; moartea dă sens vieții (Heidegger, 1977, p. 36).

Memorie tradițională: dorul, ritmurile cosmice și limitele existențiale sunt preluate din imaginarul folcloric (Ispirescu, 1984, p. 57).

Identitar: basmul reafirmă valori culturale specifice și stimulează reflecția asupra condiției umane (Călinescu, 1982, p. 320; Vulcănescu, 1985, p. 110).

Relevanță contemporană: temele basmului – imposibilul, alienarea, tensiunea între nemurire și timp – rămân actuale și permit adaptarea lecturii la sensibilitatea modernă (Boyer, 2022, p. 75).

Astfel, basmul lui Ispirescu continuă să fie un spațiu privilegiat de întâlnire între tradiție și modernitate, între imaginarul arhaic și cel contemporan, între fascinația pentru eternitate și acceptarea finitudinii (Eliade, 1995, p. 336; Ispirescu, 1984, p. 58).

7. Concluzii

Analiza narativă și mitologică a basmului „Tinerețe fără bătrânețe și viață fără de moarte” arată că textul lui Petre Ispirescu nu se limitează la funcția sa folclorică, ci construiește un univers simbolic și filosofic complex. Principalele concluzii care reies din studiul de față sunt următoarele:

1) Moartea ca temă centrală: Basmul explorează inevitabilitatea morții și imposibilitatea omului de a depăși condiția muritoare. Chiar și în Împărăția Tinereții, unde timpul și suferința par suspendate, eroul este obligat să revină în temporalitate și să accepte finitudinea (Ispirescu, 1984, p. 52; Eliade, 1995, p. 331).

2) Narativitatea mitologică și funcția liminală a eroului: Eroul ocupă un spațiu intermediar între uman și supraumman, fiind prins între dorința de nemurire și limitele ontologice ale condiției umane. Această structură narativă permite cititorului contemporan să reflecteze asupra imposibilului și asupra structurii existențiale a ființei (Vulcănescu, 1985, p. 104).
3) Rolul dorului și reactivarea temporalității: Dorul funcționează ca mecanism ontologic prin care eroul este readus în lumea muritoare. În recepția modernă, acest motiv simbolic este asociat cu reconectarea la autenticitate și acceptarea limitelor existențiale (Boyer, 2022, p. 69; Eliade, 1995, p. 335).
4) Eternitatea ca paradox: Împărăția Tinereții nu reprezintă un ideal al nemuririi, ci un spațiu de alienare și sterilitate existențială. Nemurirea absolută devine sinonimă cu lipsa devenirii, memoriei și sensului vieții, reflectând idei filosofice moderne despre condiția umană (Jankélévitch, 1961, p. 48).
5) Funcțiile contemporane ale basmului:

Cathartică: Finalul simbolic generează o reflecție asupra limitelor umane și a inevitabilității morții.

Educativă: În context școlar, basmul stimulează discuții despre sensul vieții, timpul uman și raportarea la mortalitate.

Identitară: Textul reafirmă valori culturale românești, cum ar fi dorul, legătura cu pământul și tensiunea dintre destin și libertate (Călinescu, 1982, p. 320; Vulcănescu, 1985, p. 110).

6) Continuitatea temelor culturale: Basmul dovedește că marile mituri nu îmbătrânesc, ci se adaptează sensibilității contemporane. Chiar și în epoca modernă, cititorii identifică în narațiune teme universale: imposibilul, anxietatea față de nemurire și echilibrul între temporalitate și eternitate (Durand, 1994, p. 118; Boyer, 2022, p. 75).
7) Semnificația finală: Imposibilitatea abolirii morții nu constituie o limită tragică, ci fundamentul unei vieți cu sens. Basmul arată că moartea este restaurare, reconciliere cu ritmul natural al lumii și condiția posibilității unei vieți autentice (Eliade, 1995, p. 336; Ispirescu, 1984, p. 58).

În concluzie, „Tinerețe fără bătrânețe și viață fără de moarte” rămâne un text emblematic al literaturii române, care combină elemente de folclor, mitologie și filosofie. Narativitatea sa mitologică continuă să influențeze receptarea contemporană, oferind cititorilor instrumente pentru reflecția asupra condiției umane, asupra timpului și asupra finitudinii, demonstrând astfel valoarea sa durabilă și universală.

WHEN THE WORLD WAS A STORY

Gabriela Olaru
PhD Student, University of Craiova

Abstract: The work "When the World Was a Story" explores the role of myth in traditional culture and its relevance in contemporary society. Starting from the analysis of archaic thought, the work highlights the multiple functions of myth: explanatory, social, and ritual, as well as its archetypal symbolism (fire, wall, sacrifice, tree, hero). The case study of the legend of Meșterul Manole illustrates how sacrifice, creation, and collective responsibility become moral and symbolic benchmarks for the community. The essay compares the structure of traditional myth with its modern manifestations in literature, film, and media, demonstrating the continuity of archetypal symbols and functions. Ultimately, it emphasizes that myth remains a universal language, a framework of meaning for humanity, capable of transcending time and adapting to contemporary culture.

Keywords: myth; archetype; ritual; symbolism; narrative

1. Introducere

Lumea omului arhaic era fundamental o lume a poveștii. Înainte de apariția istoriei scrise și a gândirii raționale moderne, mitul reprezenta principalul instrument prin care comunitățile explicau originea universului, ordinea socială și condiția umană. Prin mituri, oamenii nu doar transmiteau informații, ci înscriau experiența colectivă într-un cadru sacru și simbolic, ușor de memorat și de transmis.

Mitul nu este o simplă ficțiune sau basm; el constituie o formă de cunoaștere, un limbaj al sensului. Mircea Eliade (1957) afirmă că miturile sunt „povești adevărate" pentru cei care le trăiesc, deoarece acestea funcționează ca repere morale, sociale și cosmice. Claude Lévi-Strauss (1955) susține că structura mitului reflectă gândirea profundă a omului, prin opoziții și relații simbolice care organizează experiența lumii.

Lucian Blaga (1928) și Joseph Campbell (1949) evidențiază rolul mitului ca expresie a universului arhetipal, care transcende timpul și spațiul. Astfel, mitul poate fi privit ca „o cercetare a condiției umane" prin simboluri și narațiuni colective (Blaga, 1928; Campbell, 1949). Prin urmare, mitul devine mai mult decât o poveste: el este limbajul prin care omul comunică cu sine și cu ceilalți, construind un univers simbolic în care experiența vieții devine inteligibilă și memorabilă.

Lucrarea de față, intitulată „Când lumea era poveste", explorează aceste dimensiuni ale mitului, combinând perspective antropologice, literare și simbolice. Ea urmărește modul în care mitul a structurat gândirea și viața comunităților, precum și reflecțiile sale în cultura românească prin legenda Meșterului Manole, un mit complex ce ilustrează jertfa, creația și căutarea perfecțiunii, valori fundamentale ale lumii mitice.

2. Lumea arhaică și nașterea mitului

În zorii existenței umane, omul nu privea universul ca pe un spațiu neutru sau abstract; pentru el, lumea era vie și plină de forțe invizibile și semnificații tainice. Fenomenele naturale – răsăritul și apusul soarelui, schimbarea anotimpurilor, furtunile – erau percepute ca manifestări ale unei ordini invizibile. După cum subliniază Mircea Eliade, „mitul este o formă de gândire prin care omul se raportează la realitatea cosmică, transfigurând-o într-o poveste" (Eliade, 1957, p. 21). Prin urmare, povestea devenea un instrument indispensabil pentru înțelegerea lumii, pentru ordonarea haosului și pentru stabilirea relațiilor sociale.

Claude Lévi-Strauss observă că „structura mitului reflectă gândirea profundă a omului, organizată prin opoziții fundamentale: viață și moarte, lumină și întuneric, ordine și haos" (Lévi-Strauss, 1955, p. 30). Această organizare simbolică permite comunităților să interpreteze realitatea și să o transforme într-un limbaj comprehensibil, transmis de-a lungul generațiilor. În acest sens, mitul funcționează nu doar ca poveste, ci ca „hartă simbolică a universului”, în care explicația, moralitatea și socializarea se întâlnesc.

2.1.Cosmogoniile și explicarea lumii

Primele mituri au avut adesea un caracter cosmogonic, încercând să dea sens originii universului și ordinii naturale. Eliade afirmă că aceste mituri „repetă începuturile” și permit o experiență a timpului ciclic, în care trecutul sacru poate fi retrăit în prezent prin ritual și povestire (Eliade, 1957, p. 35).

În cultura românească, legenda Meșterului Manole exemplifică această dimensiune arhetipală. Zidirea mănăstirii de pe stânca Argeșului devine un act mitic, simbol al creației și sacrificiului, reflectând legătura omului cu cosmosul. Soția meșterului este sacrificată pentru stabilitatea zidului, arătând tensiunea dintre creație și distrugere, viață și moarte. Jertfa sa simbolizează ideea că echilibrul și ordinea pot fi obținute doar prin asumarea sacrificiului și a voinței creatoare, un principiu analizat pe larg de Joseph Campbell (Campbell, 1949, p. 48).

Această poveste, la fel ca multe mituri arhaice, îmbină elemente de moralitate, educație și experiență colectivă. Ea nu este simplă ficțiune, ci ci un instrument fundamental prin care grupul uman își modelează percepția asupra realității, conferindu-i o dimensiune sacră (Blaga, 1928, p. 17).

2.2.Mitul ca experiență colectivă

Mitul funcționează nu doar ca explicație, ci ca experiență trăită. Joseph Campbell subliniază că eroii și sacrificiile din mituri oferă comunității „un cadru moral și social prin care se poate înțelege natura umană” (Campbell, 1949, p. 52). În repovestirea poveștilor, comunitatea internalizează valori fundamentale precum solidaritatea, respectul pentru sacrificiu și înțelegerea ciclicității vieții.

În epoca modernă, aceste structuri mitice nu dispar; ele se transformă și se adaptează, găsindu-și noi forme în literatură, cinema sau arte vizuale. Lucian Blaga afirmă că „dorul de absolut” al omului rămâne constant, iar mitul, fie tradițional, fie reinterpretat, continuă să fie „instrumentul imaginar al cunoașterii colective” (Blaga, 1928, p. 24).

3. Structura și funcțiile mitului

Mitul nu este doar o poveste transmisă de la o generație la alta; el constituie un cadru de gândire prin care comunitatea interpretează realitatea și organizează experiența umană. Mircea Eliade susține că „mitul permite omului să repete originile lumii și să se reconecteze cu sacralitatea primordială” (Eliade, 1957, p. 40), iar Lévi-Strauss arată că opozițiile fundamentale și repetiția arhetipurilor sunt „mecanisme prin care mintea umană ordonează complexitatea existenței” (Lévi-Strauss, 1955, p. 34).

3.1.Mitul ca „poveste adevărată”

Campbell notează că „miturile transmit modele de comportament, valori morale și repere sociale, fiind mai mult decât simple fabulații” (Campbell, 1949, p. 56). În legenda Meșterului Manole, sacrificiul și efortul de a ridica mănăstirea transmit ideea că creația nu poate fi separată de responsabilitate și sacrificiu. Prin repetarea structurilor narative, mitul creează un timp sacru în care experiențele individuale se înscriu în ritmuri universale, devenind „memorie colectivă” (Eliade, 1957, p. 42).

3.2.Funcțiile Mitului: Explicativă, Socială și Ritualică

Mitul îndeplinește mai multe roluri vitale, acționând ca un cadru tripartit pentru organizarea experienței umane:

Funcția Cognitivă (Explicativă): Prin narațiuni despre începuturi (cosmogonii), mitul oferă un cadru de referință pentru a numi și a înțelege fenomenele cosmice și naturale care altfel ar părea haotice. El transformă necunoscutul în poveste.

Funcția Socială și Morală: Mitul servește ca un ciment social, stabilind și transmițând setul de norme, reguli de comportament și valori necesare pentru coeziunea și supraviețuirea comunității (ex. importanța sacrificiului individual pentru binele colectiv).

Funcția Sacră (Ritualică): El furnizează scenariul și legitimitatea practicilor rituale, permițând retrăirea simbolică a evenimentelor fondatoare. Astfel, ritualul transformă mitul dintr-o simplă narațiune într-o experiență concretă și participativă.

Mircea Eliade (1957) subliniază că, prin ritual, omul "reproduce cosmogoniile", permițând o reconectare constantă cu timpul sacru al originilor (Eliade, 1957, p. 44).

3.3.Simbolismul Mitic: Arborele, Focul, Apele, Eroul

Simbolurile mitice constituie nucleul narativ, fiind elemente arhetipale care permit poveștii să își păstreze coerența și profunzimea, indiferent de contextul cultural (Vernant, 1965, p. 23):

Arborele: Este adesea perceput ca un axis mundi, un pivot cosmic ce asigură o conexiune verticală între cele trei planuri ale existenței: cerul, pământul și lumea subpământeană. El întruchipează continuitatea vieții și reînnoirea ciclică a naturii.

Focul: Deține o natură dublă. Simbolizează forța creatoare și transformatoare (precum efortul de a construi), fiind totodată un agent de purificare și de sacrificiu (similar patimii necesare pentru a ridica zidul mănăstirii în mitul lui Manole).

Apele: Reprezintă sursa de viață, regenerare și potențial. Ele sunt asociate cu fluiditatea și cu timpul, fiind adesea mediul primordial necesar pentru orice naștere sau reînceput simbolic, inclusiv în plan spiritual.

Eroul: Este proiecția idealului uman și comunitar, acel personaj care se ridică deasupra limitelor obișnuite. Rolul său major este acela de a confrunta haosul și de a-și asuma o responsabilitate majoră (inclusiv sacrificiul) în fața destinului sau a sacrului.

3.4.Mitul tradițional și manifestările sale moderne

Mitul tradițional, precum legenda Meșterului Manole, este structurat clar: opoziții fundamentale, simboluri arhetipale și funcții multiple. În epoca contemporană, aceste structuri sunt preluate de cinema, literatură sau jocuri video, adaptând limbajul narativ la sensibilitatea modernă, dar păstrând semnificația simbolică (Barthes, 1957, p. 17).

4. Timpul sacru și ritualul

Omul arhaic nu trăia doar în timp istoric, liniar, ci simultan și într-un timp sacru, ciclic și regenerativ, în care evenimentele fundamentale ale lumii puteau fi retrăite și reînnoite prin poveste și ritual. Eliade vorbește despre „eterna reîntoarcere”: „prin repetarea simbolică a originilor, omul se reconectează cu sacralitatea primordială și își reînnoiește legătura cu cosmosul” (Eliade, 1957, p. 51). În această perspectivă, mitul nu este doar narațiune, ci și experiență vie, participativă, care dă sens existenței și consolidează coeziunea comunității.

Timpul sacru, spre deosebire de timpul istoric, nu este liniar; el este ciclic, repetitiv și regenerativ, permițând comunității să retrăiască originile universului și ale valorilor fundamentale. Fenomenele naturale, ritmurile agriculturii, sărbătorile și ritualurile religioase sunt exemple ale acestei temporalități sacrale, care ordonează viața umană și îi conferă sens. În acest cadru, „omul arhaic simte că trecutul sacru poate fi reactivat și transpus în prezent, iar experiența devine astfel participativă” (Eliade, 1957, p. 53).

4.1.Relația dintre mit și rit

Ritualul reprezintă materializarea mitului: povestea, odată transpusă în gest și ceremonie, devine un eveniment simbolic, prin care comunitatea participă activ la reînnoirea lumii. Legenda Meșterului Manole oferă un exemplu elocvent: zidirea Mănăstirii Curtea de Argeș nu este doar un act fizic de construcție, ci un ritual al creației, în care jertfa, efortul și responsabilitatea devin simboluri ale ordinii universale.

Jertfa soției meșterului reflectă tensiunea fundamentală dintre viață și moarte, sacrificiu și creație, individual și colectiv. Prin acest gest simbolic, comunitatea învață că stabilitatea și armonia universului implică responsabilitate, solidaritate și asumarea sacrificiului. „Ritualul fixează mitul în experiența concretă a comunității, transformând simbolurile narative în practici ale vieți" (Campbell, 1949, p. 88).

Această relație dintre mit și ritual se regăsește și în alte culturi. De exemplu, sacrificiile și ceremonialele din mitologia greacă, cum ar fi oferirea de jertfe lui Zeus sau ritualurile de purificare, servesc aceleași funcții: reconectarea comunității cu sacralitatea și repetarea originilor. În societățile tradiționale, mitul și ritualul sunt astfel inseparabile, fiecare întărind și legitimând funcția celuilalt.

4.2.Reînnoirea lumii prin repovestire

Mitul se reînnoiește prin repovestire, iar fiecare reluare a poveștii oferă comunității o șansă de reconectare cu valorile fundamentale. În legenda Meșterului Manole, repetarea narațiunii reamintește oamenilor că sacrificiul creativ, responsabilitatea socială și legătura cu sacrul sunt esențiale pentru echilibrul și ordinea lumii. „Fiecare reluare a mitului nu este simplă rememorare, ci un act de regenerare culturală și spirituală" (Eliade, 1957, p. 55).

Repovestirea permite, de asemenea, adaptarea mitului la contexte diferite, menținând relevanța simbolurilor și funcțiilor sale. În literatura modernă, elementele mitice sunt reinterpretate pentru a reflecta realitățile sociale și morale contemporane. Astfel, simbolul sacrificiului din legenda Manole poate fi transpus ca metaforă pentru efortul creator, responsabilitatea socială sau lupta pentru idealuri, demonstrând continuitatea mesajului mitic în timp și spațiu.

Prin repovestire, comunitatea nu doar că păstrează memoria colectivă, ci și „reconfigurează permanent universul său simbolic" (Campbell, 1949, p. 92), readucând trecutul sacru în prezent și oferind sens experienței cotidiene.

4.3.Mitul ca experiență colectivă și cadru moral

Pe lângă funcția sa simbolică, legenda Meșterului Manole servește drept cadru moral și social. Povestea transformă mitul într-un vehicul al memoriei colective și al normelor sociale, oferind exemple concrete de responsabilitate, altruism și coeziune comunitară. „Prin repetarea poveștii în ritmuri culturale și prin transmisia orală, comunitatea interiorizează valorile fundamentale, transformând mitul într-un ghid etic și spiritual" (Blaga, 1928, p. 60).

Mitul devine astfel experiență colectivă, care permite oamenilor să înțeleagă relațiile dintre individ și comunitate, între viață și moarte, și să interpreteze evenimentele lumii printr-o lentilă simbolică și morală. Repetiția ritualică și repovestirea creează o memorie activă, în care simbolurile mitice nu sunt doar concepte abstracte, ci elemente vii care organizează viața și gândirea colectivă.

Această funcție a mitului este prezentă și în alte culturi, cum ar fi ritualurile de trecere sau miturile fondatoare ale popoarelor africane și asiatice, unde repovestirea și reactivarea simbolică a mitului consolidează coeziunea socială și transmite valori esențiale generațiilor următoare. În acest fel, mitul nu este doar ficțiune, ci un instrument de organizare a experienței colective și de reconstrucție a sensului lumii.

5. Moștenirea mitului: de la sacru la cultură

Mitul, odată creat și trăit în cadrul comunității, nu dispare odată cu trecerea timpului; el se transformă, se adaptează și supraviețuiește prin integrarea în cultură, literatură, artă și mass-media. Lucian Blaga vorbește despre „dorul de absolut", „nevoia eternă a omului de sens și de conectare cu sacrul" (Blaga, 1928, p. 29). Această dorință de sens explică persistența și adaptabilitatea mitului, care, chiar și atunci când formele tradiționale se pierd, continuă să modeleze gândirea și imaginarul colectiv.

Mitul nu este doar relicvă a trecutului; el constituie un „cadru simbolic viu" care organizează experiența umană, permițând omului să interpreteze realitatea și să-și reconstruiască valorile în contexte noi (Eliade, 1957, p. 112). Adaptarea mitului la epoca modernă nu diminuează valoarea sa, ci îi oferă noi modalități de expresie și relevanță socială.

5.1.Supraviețuirea mitului în artă și literatură

Poveștile și legendele tradiționale au inspirat constant literatura, teatrul și artele vizuale. Legenda Meșterului Manole, cu zidirea mănăstirii și sacrificiul implicat, a devenit sursă de inspirație pentru poeți, dramaturgi și pictori, care au transpus povestea prin cuvinte și simboluri vizuale.

În literatură, temele sacrificiului și creației se regăsesc în poeziile lui Mihai Eminescu sau în nuvelele lui Ion Creangă, care, prin reinterpretarea elementelor mitice, păstrează sensul arhetipal al poveștii. În teatru, drama sacrificiului și a tensiunii dintre individ și comunitate poate fi regăsită în piese inspirate din folclor, care transformă mitul într-un cadru reflexiv și estetic (Campbell, 1949, p. 124).

Pictura și artele vizuale au interpretat simbolurile mitice: zidul mănăstirii, focul creației și sacrificiul sunt reprezentate în lucrări care transmit vizual tensiunea și universalitatea temelor mitice. Astfel, mitul devine vehicul artistic, menținând relevanța valorilor fundamentale și a simbolurilor arhetipale, indiferent de forma expresiei.

5.2.Miturile moderne și mass-media

Mitul continuă să se manifeste în contextul mass-media și culturii populare. Roland Barthes afirmă că „miturile se manifestă în mass-media, reclame, filme și literatură, construind eroi și narative care influențează percepțiile colective” (Barthes, 1957, p. 20). Structura arhetipală a mitului — opozițiile fundamentale, eroii, sacrificiile — rămâne relevantă și în context modern, demonstrând capacitatea mitului de a traversa formele de comunicare.

Filmele contemporane, de la cinema la animații, continuă să preia structura mitică: protagonistul trece prin încercări și sacrificii, confruntând binele și răul, iar finalul reflectă echilibrul dintre ordine și haos. Literatura modernă, precum romanele fantasy sau reinterpretările legendelor, păstrează aceleași tipare: eroii, confruntările morale și simbolismul sacrificiului mențin coerența narativă și relevanța valorilor tradiționale.

Astfel, mitul tradițional nu este uitat, ci „repus în circuitul cultural modern”, adaptându-se la limbajul vizual și textual al epocii, continuând să modeleze percepția colectivă și să ofere modele morale și sociale (Eliade, 1957, p. 118).

5.3.Lumea contemporană ca spațiu de reconfigurare mitologică

În lumea contemporană, mitul devine un spațiu hibrid, unde tradiția și inovația culturală sau tehnologică se întâlnesc. Poveștile tradiționale sunt reinterpretate, adaptate și integrate în contexte globale, iar simbolurile arhetipale — focul, zidul, sacrificiul — continuă să fie recunoscute și valorizate.

Această adaptare demonstrează că mitul nu este un vestigiu al trecutului, ci o resursă vie, capabilă să organizeze experiența umană și să mențină legătura dintre trecut și prezent. În literatură, cinematografie sau jocuri digitale, valorile fundamentale ale mitului — sacrificiul, responsabilitatea socială, confruntarea cu limitele existenței — sunt transmise într-o manieră accesibilă publicului contemporan.

Moștenirea mitului constă, așadar, în capacitatea sa de a traversa epocile, păstrându-și funcțiile esențiale: explicarea lumii, transmiterea valorilor și crearea unui cadru simbolic coerent. Legenda Meșterului Manole rămâne exemplu elocvent al modului în care mitul, deși reinterpretat, continuă să ofere sens și să inspire generații noi, reconfirmând „rolul său de limbaj universal al experienței umane” (Campbell, 1949, p. 137).

6. Concluzie

Analiza prezentată în paginile precedente evidențiază faptul că mitul reprezintă o formă originară de cunoaștere și expresie a experienței umane, care transcende timpul și spațiul, conferind sens lumii și existenței. De la gândirea arhaică, în care totul era poveste, până la manifestările culturale contemporane, mitul rămâne un vehicul al memoriei colective, prin care comunitățile organizează realitatea, transmit valori morale și simbolice și recreează legătura omului cu sacrul.

Studiul legendei Meșterului Manole evidențiază clar funcțiile multiple ale mitului: el explică fenomene complexe, oferă modele de comportament și valori sociale, iar prin simbolismul jertfei și al creației arată tensiunea dintre viață și moarte, individ și comunitate, efemer și etern. Această complexitate tematică este în concordanță cu viziunea lui Mircea Eliade privind rolul mitului ca organizator al realității umane (Eliade, 1957, p. 127).Această legendă nu este doar un simplu text literar, ci un cadru experiențial în care comunitatea interiorizează norme morale, învață despre responsabilitate și își reafirmă legătura cu sacrul.

În epoca contemporană, mitul continuă să fie relevant, adaptându-se la noile forme de comunicare, literatură, artă, film și mass-media. Roland Barthes subliniază că „miturile se manifestă în mass-media, reclame, filme și literatură, construind eroi și narative care influențează percepțiile colective" (Barthes, 1957, p. 20). Această continuitate demonstrează că mitul nu este un vestigiu al trecutului, ci o resursă vie, capabilă să organizeze experiența umană și în lumea modernă, să ofere sens și să mențină legătura dintre trecut și prezent.

Mai mult, miturile globale, de la epopeile grecești la mitologiile asiatice sau africane, evidențiază că structurarea narativă a experienței umane prin mit transcende culturile și spațiile geografice. Joseph Campbell (1949, p. 142) subliniază ideea „monomitului" — existența unor arhetipuri universale care ghidează experiența umană, indiferent de timp și loc. Această universalitate arată că mitul nu doar explică lumea și ordonează experiența, ci servește și drept liant cultural, creând conexiuni între generații, comunități și civilizații.

Mitul, așadar, este un limbaj simbolic care permite omului să interpreteze complexitatea existenței, să reflecteze asupra propriei condiții și să se reconecteze cu originile sacre ale lumii. Legenda Meșterului Manole devine astfel exemplul perfect al modului în care mitul păstrează relevanța valorilor fundamentale — sacrificiu, creație, responsabilitate socială — și cum aceste valori se manifestă atât în context tradițional, cât și în formele moderne de expresie culturală.

În concluzie, lumea a fost și rămâne o poveste. Omul, fie el arhaic sau contemporan, are nevoie de narațiuni pentru a înțelege universul, a se regăsi pe sine și a reconstrui sensul lumii. Mitul, prin formele sale tradiționale sau adaptate, rămâne un limbaj universal, un cadru simbolic esențial pentru cunoaștere, reflecție și trăire umană. El continuă să fie o punte între trecut și prezent, între sacru și cotidian, între individual și colectiv, demonstrând că povestea nu este doar divertisment, ci un mod de a trăi, de a gândi și de a fi în lume.

Astfel, moștenirea mitului nu se limitează la literatura sau arta trecutului; ea se regăsește în fiecare act de creație, în fiecare manifestare culturală sau socială, oferind omului contemporan instrumente pentru a înțelege sinele, a structura experiența și a naviga complexitatea lumii moderne. În acest sens, mitul rămâne nu doar o relicvă culturală, ci un element vital al memoriei colective și al formării identității umane.

FORMS AND FICTIONS OF WAITING: TOWARD A POETICS OF EXPECTATION

Dorina Mădălina Lazăr
PhD Student, University of Bucharest

Abstract : Exploring the theme of a poetics of waiting allows us to understand waiting as a fundamental mechanism through which characters construct meaning, shape desire, and negotiate the passage of time. Emma Bovary illustrates a form of waiting nourished by romantic imagination: she projects herself toward an idealized future of passion that reality consistently refuses to deliver, revealing the destructive power of unfulfilled expectation. Madama Butterfly embodies a more sacrificial and faithful mode of waiting, anchored in unwavering trust and emotional devotion; her hope, sustained over years, collapses brutally when confronted with the truth, turning waiting itself into a tragic force. Beckett's Waiting for Godot, however, redefines waiting by stripping it of purpose or resolution. Vladimir and Estragon exist in a suspended temporality where anticipation becomes an absurd ritual, exposing the emptiness of hope in a world without guarantees. Together, these works demonstrate how waiting can generate illusion, sustain identity, or expose existential voids, confirming its central role in a poetics of waiting that interrogates the fragile tension between hope, reality, and human desire.

Il y a dans l'attente une forme de foi silencieuse, un espoir suspendu au fil du temps, une croyance que quelque chose ou quelqu'un viendra combler le vide. Mais que se passe-t-il lorsque cette attente devient mirage, lorsque ce qui devait advenir n'advient jamais ? Lorsque l'espoir, au lieu d'élever, enferme ?

Dans les pages de Madame Bovary, Emma attend. Elle attend l'amour comme d'autres attendent un miracle, une révélation, une fuite vers un ailleurs plus vaste, plus lumineux. Ses jours s'étirent dans la grisaille normande, et son cœur, saturé de romans et de rêves, bat à contretemps de sa vie. Elle guette dans chaque regard d'homme un signe d'embrasement, dans chaque dépense une échappée belle. Mais rien ne vient, ou trop peu. Tout est tiède, décevant, poussiéreux. L'attente devient gouffre, et Emma, ivre d'idéal, finit par tomber dans ce vide qu'elle refusait de voir.

De l'autre côté du monde, sur une colline de Nagasaki, Cio-Cio San, alias Madame Butterfly, fixe la mer. Chaque jour, elle scrute l'horizon, persuadée que le navire de son amant reviendra. Elle a foi, une foi pure, presque enfantine, en cet homme qui l'a épousée puis quittée. L'attente est chez elle prière, rituel, offrande silencieuse. Mais l'amour que Butterfly imagine est un mirage de papier. L'attente, trop longue, trop absolue, se referme sur elle comme un piège d'innocence. Et c'est encore une femme qui, croyant à la promesse de l'amour, meurt de l'avoir trop attendue.

Puis vient le théâtre nu, désert, de Beckett. Un arbre sec, deux hommes, un nom : Godot. Vladimir et Estragon attendent, mais qui, mais quoi ? Leur attente n'a ni objet clair, ni fin. Elle se résume à ce verbe-là, « attendre », comme une manière de tenir debout. Ils parlent, se disputent, se taisent. Ils ne partent pas. Car partir serait cesser d'espérer, et donc d'exister. L'attente devient leur façon de remplir le vide, de donner une forme à l'absurde. Mais elle n'ouvre aucune porte, elle est boucle sans fin, attente d'un Dieu qui ne viendra pas.

Trois figures, trois postures de l'attente. Emma, la romantique, attend l'amour comme une fiction à incarner. Butterfly, la fidèle, attend le retour comme une vérité promise. Vladimir et Estragon, eux, n'attendent rien de précis : leur attente est le seul repère dans un monde vidé de sens. Chez Flaubert, l'attente est rêve brisé, chez Puccini, elle est fidélité sacrifiée, chez Beckett, elle est condition existentielle. Mais dans tous les cas, l'attente révèle une humanité vulnérable, tendue vers un futur incertain. Elle reflète notre besoin de croire, de combler les silences, de donner un sens au temps. Pourtant, elle rappelle aussi que le monde n'a pas toujours de réponses à offrir, que l'espoir peut être un leurre cruel, et que parfois, il faut apprendre à vivre sans promesse.

Dans le présent travail, nous nous proposons donc, d'examiner la manière dont le motif de l'attente se déploie dans trois œuvres majeures, celles de Flaubert, Puccini et Beckett.

Madame Bovary : l'attente, du rêve à la désillusion

Dans Madame Bovary, Gustave Flaubert érige l'attente en véritable structure existentielle. Elle n'est pas seulement un état psychologique chez Emma : elle constitue le ressort tragique de son destin et l'instrument privilégié par lequel l'auteur déploie sa critique de l'imaginaire romantique. L'attente, oscillant entre espoir et inertie, devient le lieu où se cristallisent les illusions d'Emma et où se joue la mise en scène de l'écart entre rêve et réalité.

Emma entre dans la vie avec un imaginaire saturé de fictions. Les romans sentimentaux lus au couvent façonnent une sensibilité tournée vers l'exceptionnel et surtout vers un avenir mythifié. L'attente n'est donc pas d'abord engendrée par la vie réelle, mais par un modèle littéraire. Elle devient un horizon permanent, une projection hors du présent. L'existence quotidienne ne peut plus être acceptée telle quelle : elle doit tendre vers quelque chose de supérieur. Ce décalage fonde toute l'insatisfaction d'Emma. Flaubert utilise ainsi l'attente comme un mécanisme qui déplace l'héroïne hors du réel. Emma ne vit pas pour ce qui est, mais pour ce qui pourrait être. Son rapport au temps est distordu : le présent devient un simple obstacle entre elle et une promesse imaginaire empruntée aux stéréotypes romanesques.

Le mariage avec Charles, loin de combler les aspirations d'Emma, les renforce. Le personnage attend de l'union conjugale une métamorphose : une vie passionnée, la noblesse des sentiments, « quelque chose d'exaltant ». Or le quotidien provincial se révèle atone, répétitif, dépourvu d'événements. L'attente devient alors une sorte de tension permanente, un vide qui se creuse. La manière dont Flaubert décrit les premiers mois de vie conjugale souligne la lente corruption de cette attente : Charles, satisfait et sans imagination, n'alimente pas les désirs d'Emma. Le temps ne l'accomplit pas, il la ronge. L'attente devient stagnation. Elle se transforme progressivement en dégoût de soi et du monde.

Les deux amants Rodolphe puis Léon apparaissent comme des figures de substitution capables d'incarner, même provisoirement, l'idéal désiré par Emma. Pourtant, même dans l'amour, l'attente reste dominante. Rodolphe lui-même l'a bien compris : Emma veut être désirée, mais surtout rêver, anticiper ce désir. L'œuvre souligne souvent que l'élan d'Emma vers ses amants est moins lié à ce qu'ils sont qu'à ce qu'ils représentent. Même l'adultère devient une répétition du schéma de l'attente : Emma espère l'évasion, un départ, une transformation radicale de sa vie. Chaque relation ouvre un horizon qui ne se réalise jamais. Ainsi, lorsqu'elle prépare sa fugue avec Rodolphe, c'est la préparation même, le fantasme du voyage, qui lui procure un vertige ; l'abandon de Rodolphe révèle tragiquement la vacuité de cet horizon.

L'attente chez Emma traduit également une critique de la condition féminine au XIX^{e} siècle. L'inactivité imposée aux femmes de province les condamne à une vie de passivité temporelle. Emma ne dispose d'aucun espace pour réaliser ses aspirations esthétiques ou amoureuses ; son imagination devient son seul refuge. L'attente est ainsi le symptôme d'une privation structurelle : elle pallie l'absence de possibilité d'action. Dans son roman, Flaubert n'attaque pas seulement les illusions romantiques ; il expose aussi un système social où la temporalité féminine est bridée, répétitive, dépourvue d'événements structurants. Emma attend parce qu'elle n'a pas d'alternative crédible à l'attente.

L'endettement progressif scelle l'effondrement des dernières illusions. Emma ne peut plus reporter dans l'avenir un salut possible. La temporalité se resserre : l'attente devient angoisse puis panique. Le poison, ultime acte, brise finalement le cycle interminable de l'espérance déçue. Emma ne meurt pas seulement d'amours impossibles ou d'extravagances romanesques : elle meurt d'avoir trop attendu. Flaubert fait de la mort une clôture brutale qui met fin à la dynamique temporelle qui aura structuré tout le roman. La disparition d'Emma marque la victoire du réel sur l'illusion.

L'attente dans Madame Bovary ne constitue pas un simple état émotionnel : elle est la clé de lecture du roman tout entier. Elle structure le rapport d'Emma au monde, engendre ses désirs et ses souffrances, et révèle la critique flaubertienne de l'idéalisme romantique autant que des contraintes sociales imposées aux femmes. L'attente fait naître un mouvement constant vers un ailleurs inaccessible, inscrivant Emma dans un destin tragique où le temps, loin d'être une promesse, devient le piège dans lequel elle se consume.

Dans Madame Butterfly, de Giacomo Puccini, l'attente ne constitue pas seulement un ressort narratif : elle devient une véritable architecture symbolique, un principe organisateur de la perception, du langage et du destin. Puccini fait de l'attente un espace poétique où se révèlent les tensions entre illusion et réalité, entre désir et mort. L'œuvre se lit alors comme une longue traversée du temps suspendu, où chaque instant est un cristal fragile, chargé de promesses et d'ombres.

L'attente représente dans cette œuvre l'acte fondateur du personnage. Dès l'origine, Cio-Cio-San est définie par un mouvement d'élan : elle quitte son monde, renonce à son identité, et se livre tout entière à un avenir dont elle ne possède que l'esquisse. L'attente, chez elle, n'est pas simple patience : c'est un acte de foi, une construction active de sens. Elle invente l'homme qu'elle attend ; elle façonne, par son espérance, la figure idéalisée de Pinkerton. Cette dimension créatrice fait de Butterfly un personnage presque romanesque, dont le rapport à la réalité passe par un filtre lyrique constant. Son attente est une œuvre d'imagination, une fiction intime qu'elle nourrit de gestes et de rituels : guetter le port, écouter la rumeur du vent, dessiner mentalement le moment du retour. Ce sont autant de gestes d'écriture invisible.

Le temps s'impose comme une matière à la fois poétique et dramatique, venant intensifier et approfondir l'expérience de l'attente. Puccini, avec une intuition profondément littéraire, transforme le temps en substance artistique. Dans l'opéra, le temps n'est ni linéaire ni objectif : c'est un temps vécu, habité, intensément subjectif. Les trois années qui séparent la promesse du retour et l'apparition du navire américain sont, pour Butterfly, un temps immobile. Elles n'existent pas comme durée, mais comme persistance d'un unique sentiment : l'espoir.

La célèbre scène de la veillée, souvent commentée, est précisément une dramatisation du temps intérieur. Butterfly demeure droite, hiératique, tandis que la musique se resserre, se fait presque minimaliste. La nuit se prolonge au-delà du naturel, comme si elle résistait à l'aube par fidélité à la tension affective qui l'habite. Le temps se fait étau, puis souffle coupé, et le spectateur se trouve pris lui-même dans ce piège de l'attente.

L'attente, dans l'opéra, agit simultanément comme un voile et comme un instrument de dévoilement : voile, car elle empêche Butterfly de voir la vérité : la légèreté, voire la frivolité de Pinkerton, son incapacité à comprendre la profondeur du don qui lui est fait ; révélation, car elle met en lumière, par contraste, l'absolu de la fidélité de l'héroïne. C'est dans cette zone de tension que s'ancre la dimension tragique : plus l'attente se prolonge, plus se creuse l'abîme entre la vérité et le rêve, entre le monde extérieur et le monde intérieur.

Cette double nature de l'attente s'inscrit aussi dans le langage de l'opéra. Les mots de Butterfly sont constamment tournés vers l'avenir : elle parle non de ce qui est, mais de ce qui sera. Ainsi se construit une parole prophétique, qui anticipe sans cesse une réalité qui ne viendra pas. C'est cette langue du futur qui finit par trahir l'héroïne : elle en devient prisonnière.

Lorsque Pinkerton revient, ce n'est pas le temps rêvé qui rejoint Butterfly : c'est le réel qui brise la fiction. Son retour n'est pas la fin attendue, mais la fin du temps de l'attente, une fin brutale, presque obscène, tant elle écrase d'un coup tout ce qui avait été investi dans l'espoir. La dévastation de Butterfly n'est donc pas seulement sentimentale : elle est ontologique. C'est l'effondrement d'un monde imaginé, d'une temporalité construite, d'une identité façonnée autour d'une promesse. En choisissant la mort, elle choisit aussi de mettre fin à ce temps déchiré, à cette fracture entre fiction intime et vérité extérieure.

Ainsi Madame Butterfly apparaît-elle, dans sa profondeur littéraire, comme le drame d'un temps rêvé qui se heurte au temps réel. L'attente, loin d'être passive, est dans l'opéra une œuvre intérieure, une construction poétique qui élève Butterfly au rang d'héroïne tragique. Puccini ne met pas seulement en scène une femme abandonnée : il compose la fresque poignante d'une âme suspendue à l'infini d'un futur inventé, dont la beauté fragile se brise au contact du monde. Dans Madame Butterfly, l'attente ne constitue pas seulement un ressort narratif : elle devient une véritable architecture symbolique, un principe organisateur de la perception, du langage et du destin. Puccini fait de l'attente un espace poétique où se révèlent les tensions entre illusion et réalité, entre désir et mort. L'œuvre se lit alors comme une longue traversée du temps suspendu, où chaque instant est un cristal fragile, chargé de promesses et d'ombres.

Deux héroïnes façonnées par l'attente : Emma Bovary et Cio-Cio-San Bien que séparées par des mondes culturels, des époques et des univers artistiques distincts, Cio-Cio-San et Emma Bovary partagent une même condition tragique : leur vie intérieure se construit sur une attente qui finit par les détruire. Chez l'une comme chez l'autre, l'attente est moins une expérience temporelle qu'une manière d'habiter le monde, une façon d'espérer un hors-monde que la réalité dément continuellement.

Chez Butterfly comme chez Emma Bovary, l'attente est avant tout un acte d'imagination. Cio-Cio-San reconstruit Pinkerton en figure idéale, lui attribuant une noblesse et une fidélité qui n'appartiennent qu'à sa propre rêverie. L'homme réel s'efface derrière l'homme rêvé. L'attente prolongée n'est alors pas un vide, mais une création permanente : elle invente chaque jour le retour futur, qu'elle enlumine d'images presque sacrées.

De l'autre côté, Emma Bovary, nourrie des lectures romantiques et sentimentales de son adolescence, attend l'amour tel qu'il se déploie dans les romans : fulgurant, absolu, ravageur. Lorsqu'elle épouse Charles, elle attend de lui ce qui n'existe que dans sa bibliothèque. Puis elle attend des amants successifs la transfiguration qu'elle imagine. Elle n'attend jamais un être réel : elle attend le romanesque. Ainsi, toutes deux vivent dans une fiction qu'elles se donnent, une fiction qui soutient leur être mais qui finit par s'écrouler.

Le temps, chez Puccini, se dilate autour de l'attente. Les trois années d'absence ne sont pas perçues comme durée, mais comme intensité unique : un futur espéré qui absorbe tout le présent. Chez Flaubert, Emma souffre au contraire de l'immobilité insipide du quotidien. Ses journées semblent se répéter sans relief. Le temps « plate », comme dit Flaubert, devient une prison monotone où la jeune femme étouffe. Elle rêve d'un avenir éclatant, d'un événement qui la sauverait : un amant, une lettre, une fortune, mais rien ne vient. Dans les deux cas, le présent ne vaut rien : l'héroïne le traverse comme une chambre vide. L'attente est leur seule respiration.

La même incapacité à voir le réel se manifeste chez les deux personnages féminins. Emma et Butterfly souffrent d'un aveuglement analogue : elles ne distinguent pas ce qui est de ce qu'elles désirent. Elle repousse les avertissements, nie l'évidence, transforme chaque signe de désillusion en indice de confirmation. Le réel n'a pas voix au chapitre devant la puissance de son espérance. Emma, quant à elle, déforme le quotidien, interprète chaque geste, chaque parole selon les modèles romanesques qui peuplent son imagination. Son regard n'est pas dirigé vers le monde, mais vers la littérature qui la hante. Dans les deux œuvres, la tragédie naît de cet écart entre perception et vérité, entre projection intime et froide réalité.

La chute est, dans les deux cas, brutale, parce qu'elle détruit un monde intérieur entier. Quand Pinkerton revient, ce n'est pas l'homme attendu, mais l'être réel, accompagné de sa nouvelle épouse. C'est l'effacement soudain de trois années d'espérance. La mort apparaît alors comme un acte de cohérence tragique : si le rêve s'effondre, la vie qui lui est articulée ne peut survivre. Pour Emma, l'effondrement survient lorsque ses illusions, l'amour, la passion, l'ascension matérielle, s'évanouissent sous le poids des dettes et des trahisons. L'arsenic est sa manière de tuer non seulement la souffrance, mais l'attente elle-même devenue impossible.

Toutes deux meurent parce que la réalité ne correspond pas à la fiction qu'elles ont construite. Leur mort clôt le temps imaginaire qu'elles avaient seul habité.

L'attente sans objet : l'architecture de l'absurde chez Beckett

Dans En attendant Godot, Beckett érige l'attente en principe métaphysique, en matière dramatique et en destin humain. Ce n'est plus un simple ressort narratif, ni un intervalle entre deux actions : c'est le cœur même de la pièce, son moteur paradoxal, son souffle et son vide. L'attente se déploie comme condition existentielle, révélant la fragilité de l'homme confronté au néant et à l'incompréhensible.

Beckett place Vladimir et Estragon dans un entre-deux immuable : un chemin vague, un arbre rachitique, un temps indistinct. Ce décor minimaliste rend visible l'essence nue de l'attente : une tension sans objet, une ouverture vers un événement qui ne se produit pas.
Godot, figure mystérieuse, ne se définit que par son absence.

Ce qui est attendu demeure obscur, personne ne sait s'il est un homme, une idée, un salut, ou une simple illusion. L'attente devient alors une quête de sens dans un monde qui n'en offre aucun, un effort dérisoire pour structurer l'existence. Beckett montre que l'homme ne peut supporter le chaos qu'en se fixant un horizon, même fictif : l'attente est le dernier refuge face à l'absurde. Dans la pièce, tout sert à occuper le temps, à meubler l'inertie. Les dialogues vagabonds, les répétitions, les jeux burlesques ne sont pas des divertissements innocents : ce sont des antidotes contre le vide qui menace d'engloutir les personnages. « Il faut s'occuper », disent-ils, comme un mot d'ordre vital. L'attente devient un espace où les gestes perdent leur finalité, où la parole s'use, où la routine s'installe. Le temps ne progresse pas : il tourne en rond, comme les répliques, comme les personnages eux-mêmes. Ce ressassement souligne l'inanité de l'attente : elle remplace l'action, elle évite la conscience, elle maintient à la fois en vie et en paralysie.

Beckett universalise l'attente. Ce que vivent Vladimir et Estragon n'est pas une situation théâtrale particulière, mais l'image amplifiée de la condition humaine : nous attendons tous quelque chose : un signe, un sens, un avenir, une justification qui ne vient pas. Godot n'arrive pas, non parce qu'il est en retard, mais parce qu'il n'a peut-être jamais existé. Dans cette absence radicale, Beckett interroge la structure même du désir : nous attendons pour survivre, mais cette attente repose sur une fiction. Le tragique naît de cette lucidité : persister à attendre malgré l'absence de garantie, persévérer dans une espérance sans objet.

Le génie de Beckett réside dans sa capacité à transformer cette vacuité en matière poétique.
Le silence, la répétition, les ruptures, les dialogues déliés créent une musique de l'attente, une forme de poésie minimaliste où le non-dit pèse autant que les paroles. La structure même de la pièce, deux actes similaires, deux fois la même promesse non tenue, inscrit l'attente dans une boucle qui mime la cyclicité du temps intérieur. L'arbre qui verdit à peine, la lumière qui décline, le garçon qui revient avec le même message introduisent une variation infime dans une éternité immobile. Beckett sublime l'attente en la dénudant jusqu'à l'os, révélant la beauté austère et terrifiante de l'existence dépouillée de fiction.

Dans En attendant Godot, l'attente devient l'expression suprême de la condition humaine : une espérance sans fondement, un mouvement sans destination, une fidélité à ce qui n'a peut-être jamais été promis. Beckett transforme l'inertie en drame, le vide en matière, le silence en langage. L'attente n'est pas le prélude à l'action ; elle est l'action elle-même : infinie, absurde, inachevée.
Comme nous l'avons vu, l'attente, dans ces trois œuvres : Madame Bovary, Madame Butterfly et En attendant Godot, forme un vaste paysage existentiel où se dessinent trois visages de l'humanité : l'attente comme illusion romanesque, comme fidélité tragique et comme condition métaphysique. Si les époques diffèrent, si les cadres divergent- la province bourgeoise de Flaubert, le Japon rêvé de Puccini, la lande dénudée de Beckett -, une même pulsation innerve ces trois œuvres : le temps suspendu, tendu vers un avenir incertain, voire impossible.

Chez Flaubert, l'attente est d'abord une construction imaginaire. Emma ne se contente pas d'attendre : elle invente ce qu'elle attend. L'amour, la passion, l'éblouissement ne sont pas pour elle des expériences, mais des mythes acquis dans les pages romantiques qui ont nourri son adolescence. Ainsi, son attente se colore d'une esthétique : elle rêve en images, en métaphores, en drames somptueux. Elle attend un événement qui ressemblerait à un chapitre de roman, un embrasement qui viendrait dissiper l'ennui d'un quotidien trop plat. Chez Emma, l'attente est le moyen de fuir la réalité, une fuite en avant dans le rêve, dont l'effondrement mènera à la mort.

Avec Cio-Cio-San, l'attente se mue en acte de fidélité lumineuse, presque sacrée.

La jeune geisha ne fabrique pas un rêve : elle le sanctifie. Pinkerton devient dans son esprit non un idéal littéraire, mais un absolu moral, une promesse dont dépend toute sa vie. L'attente chez Butterfly se déploie dans le silence, dans la dignité, dans une immobilité presque rituelle. Elle ne cherche pas à embellir le futur : elle le tient pour certain, inébranlable.

Là où Emma attend pour combler un vide intérieur, Butterfly attend pour donner sens à son existence. Et pourtant, la chute est analogue : le réel se présente comme un verdict brutal qui anéantit l'édifice intime. L'attente devient alors tragique : elle n'a pas été illusion, mais aveuglement.

Avec Beckett, l'attente s'abstrait de toute psychologie pour devenir expérience métaphysique. Il ne s'agit plus d'attendre l'amour ni le retour d'un être cher : il s'agit d'attendre quelque chose, un sens, une présence, un salut que la pièce nie à mesure qu'elle en parle. Godot n'a de consistance que dans sa non-venue. Vladimir et Estragon attendent parce qu'ils ne peuvent faire autrement : l'attente est leur manière d'habiter le vide, de résister au néant. Cette attente n'est ni rêve, ni fidélité : c'est une structure de survie. Elle ne promet rien, mais elle maintient en mouvement une existence sinon immobile. L'attente devient ici l'allégorie de la condition humaine : persister malgré l'absence de sens.

Ces trois œuvres, loin d'être dissemblables, dessinent une gradation puissante du concept d'attente. Chez Emma Bovary, elle est romanesque, nourrie d'imaginaires qui donnent au désir une forme mensongère. Chez Cio-Cio-San, elle est tragique, portée par une foi qui dépasse la raison et qui finit par se confondre avec le sacrifice. Chez Vladimir et Estragon, elle est ontologique, dépouillée de tout objet, réduite à la simple expérience d'être au monde. L'attente, ainsi parcourue, apparaît sous ses trois visages les plus profonds : l'attente comme illusion, l'attente comme croyance, l'attente comme condition. Trois manifestations d'une même fragilité humaine : la tendance irréductible à orienter sa vie vers un avenir qui, souvent, n'advient pas.

Ces quatre figures, Emma, Butterfly, Vladimir et Estragon, ne nous offrent pas de leçon morale, mais un miroir. Car tous, à leur manière, nous ressemblent. N'attendons-nous pas, nous aussi, une réponse, un signe, une délivrance ? Et ne redoutons-nous pas, en secret, que ce que nous espérons ne vienne jamais ? C'est peut-être cela, le vrai théâtre de l'attente : non pas celui de l'arrivée, mais celui du manque et de ce que nous devenons en l'habitant.

CONCEPTUAL METAPHOR IN STEPHEN HAWKING'S THEORIES

Cristina Rusu-Marian
PhD Student, UMFST „G. E. Palade" of Târgu Mureş

Abstract: This study investigates the conceptual metaphor in Stephen Hawking's texts, with a focus on the volume "The Universe in a Nutshell". Starting from the theory of conceptual metaphor formulated by George Lakoff and Mark Johnson, we investigate how structured conceptual metaphors (e.g., "the universe in a nutshell / as a miniature space," "time as form," "curvatures of the space-time," "black holes as gates") make complex theoretical concepts accessible to the general audience. The study identifies and classifies recurrent metaphors in the text, maps them to conceptual frames (container, path, mechanism, entity), and examines their discursive functions: conceptual modelling, establishment of epistemic analogies, reduction of abstraction, and rhetorical persuasion. The analysis combines qualitative methods of discourse analysis with tools from cognitive linguistics to show how metaphors not only illustrate science but to contribute to the formation of the reader's mental representation of cosmological theory. The conclusion highlights the productive tension between scientific fidelity and communicative efficiency of metaphor, proposing criteria for the responsible use of metaphoricity in science communication and suggestions for further research on the pragmatics of metaphor in popular science texts.

In "The Universe in a Nutshell"[1], Stephen Hawking not only synthesizes the most advanced theories of 20th-century physics – general relativity, quantum mechanics, string theory, and quantum cosmology – but also manages to make them intelligible to a wide audience through an apparently simple instrument: the conceptual metaphor. His scientific language never remains cold or purely mathematical; on the contrary, he transforms the most difficult-to-imagine abstractions into vivid, familiar, almost tactile images, which radically restructure the way the reader perceives reality.

The present study aims to analyze two powerful and recurrent conceptual metaphors – true "cognitive bridges" between the world of everyday experience and the frontiers of contemporary knowledge: the metaphor "the universe in a nutshell" – the paradox of the infinite compressed into the finite, taken from Hamlet and transformed into an epistemological manifesto – and the metaphor "the shape of time," in which time is no longer a straight line but acquires a variable geometry, conical in the vicinity of gravitational extremes.

Each of these metaphors is not only an ornamental figure of speech but a true cognitive model that structures the reader's understanding, transferring properties from the source domain (familiar objects and experiences) to the target domain (abstract physical concepts). Morphosyntactic and semantic analysis of these expressions will highlight the way Hawking exploits the resources of language to make the invisible visible and the intangible tangible, thus demonstrating that the great scientific discoveries of the 20th century are not only equations but also extremely well-told stories.

Theoretical Framework

The theory of conceptual metaphor (George Lakoff & Mark Johnson, Metaphors We Live By[2], 1980) demonstrates that metaphor is not only a figure of speech, but a fundamental structure of human thought: "metaphors do not only reflect the way we perceive the world, but also how we form our thinking."[3] In the work entitled Metaphors We Live By, Lakoff and Johnson argue that metaphors are not only simple linguistic expressions, but fundamental structures of thought that affect the way we understand and act in the world. Thus, a definition of conceptual metaphor can be formulated as a mechanism through which abstract concepts are understood by means of concrete concepts, facilitating the transfer of meanings from one domain to another.

The functions of metaphors in scientific discourse are: cognitive (creates coherent mental models for invisible phenomena); didactic (reduces the distance between expert and non-specialist); heuristic (suggests new hypotheses and productive analogies); aesthetic and rhetorical (provides pleasure in reading and memorability). In the case of Hawking, metaphors are not simple "ornaments," they are the very skeleton of the explanation.

"The Universe in a Nutshell"[4]

The title-subtitle metaphor "The Universe in a Nutshell. The universe has multiple histories, each of them being determined by a small nut"[5] frames the entire volume as an image of miniaturization and containment. The title of Stephen Hawking's book is taken directly from a famous Shakespearean phrase in Hamlet: "I could be shut up in a nutshell and think myself a king of infinite space."[6] (Shakespeare, Hamlet, Act 2, Scene 2.) The end of the book is outlined by a paraphrase of Miranda from Shakespeare's The Tempest: "O, brave new world / Having such creatures in it."[7] This is the universe in a nutshell, says Hawking. Hawking transforms this paradoxical image into an ironic and profound title: the entire Universe (infinite, complex, with 10^{80} particles, billions of galaxies, 13.8 billion light-years) is "compressed" and explained in a thin, accessible book, like an infinity enclosed in a tiny nutshell.

As textual references, we have: "If the universe is, however, very small, as it was near the moment of the Big Bang,… the uncertainty principle[8] becomes very important."[9] (Hawking, p. 80), "Perhaps Hamlet wanted to say that although we human beings are physically limited, our minds are free to explore the entire universe."[10] (Hawking, p. 69), "… we have seen how the behavior of the vast universe can be understood in terms of its history in imaginary time, which is a small, slightly flattened sphere. It is like Hamlet's nutshell, and in this nutshell is encoded everything that happens in real time. Hamlet was right. We can be shut up in a nutshell and think ourselves kings of boundless space."[11] (Hawking, p. 99), "… the spontaneous creation of a brane-world[12] would have a history of imaginary time like a nutshell…"[13] (Hawking, pp. 195-196)

Conceptual values (source-target mappings) of the metaphor "the universe in a nutshell" are: container/boundary (p. 99): shell (small, delimited container) – the universe as an "encapsulated" totality, with clear conceptual edges; miniaturization/synthesis (p. 80): small object that "holds everything" – cosmological complexity compressed into a single, easily mentally manageable image; coding/compression (p. 99): nucleus concentrating information – cosmological histories "encoded" in a reduced model (e.g., the sphere in imaginary time); accessibility/legibility (p. 99): familiar, "hand-sized" object – abstract science made cognitively manipulable; tension (p. 99): small vs. infinite: tiny object - "infinite space" (frames the paradox of comprehensibility); unifying macro-frame: umbrella image organizing the book's themes; protection/stability (p. 99): shell that "closes"/establishes cognitive boundaries; full vs. empty (pp. 195-196): "empty shell"/"full shell" (brane world) – status of theoretical content; perspectival access (p. 99): view "from inside" the model.

Discursive functions of the metaphor "the universe in a nutshell" are: conceptual-structural: unifying macro-frame of the volume; persuasive: memorability, authority/cultural prestige (Shakespeare) with an enlightening effect (that "aha" moment). Benefits include: miniaturization providing cognitive synthesis, anchoring advanced ideas (branes) in a single image, providing accessibility through miniaturization and a narrative orientation. Risks include: confusing the metaphor with ontology; confusing analogy with ontology; underestimating system openness. These are mitigated by explicitly marking the imaginary status (imaginary time; "hypothesis without boundaries") through explicit intertextuality. Hawking cites Hamlet: "I could be shut up in a nutshell and think myself a king of infinite space."[14] Then he reinterprets the line in a cosmological key: the universe in imaginary time as "a small, slightly flattened sphere ... like the nutshell,"[15] "in this nutshell everything is encoded …"[16] and finally extends the intertext to Miranda's paraphrase from The Tempest: "O, brave new world / Having such creatures in it."[17] as a rhetorical closure. Thus, the "nutshell" metaphor is culturally anchored (Shakespeare) and scientifically re-signified (miniaturization/container).

The connection with Hamlet functions on three levels: 1. As an explicit intertextual source, Hawking cites Hamlet's line, culturally legitimizing the metaphor "the universe in a nutshell," providing a matrix for the image: small containment versus infinite space. 2. As scientific re-semantization, Hawking translates "nutshell" into cosmological terms: "small sphere in imaginary time." The mapping – a small container as a global model, "being shut up" a coding, synthesis of histories, "being king" having cognitive (not ontological) access to the totality. 3. As a rhetorical-narrative function, the intertext creates memory and ethos: Shakespeare as an "anchor" for the audience – engaging the beginning and the end (paraphrase from The Tempest, p. 200), giving the volume a narrative arc. It allows transition from literary language to scientific model without cognitive friction; miniaturization of concepts (imaginary time, branes) into a single, memorable image; articulation of a productive tension "small versus infinite" which supports the idea of coding/synthesis; circular closure of the narrative (opening with Hamlet, closing with The Tempest), reinforcing discourse cohesion.

The conceptual metaphor "The Universe in a Nutshell,"[18] in the Romanian language, from a morpho-syntactic point of view, is formed by the noun univers[19], neuter noun (derived from Latin universum, Fr. univers, Ger. Universum), singular, articulated with the definite article "ul," indicating a known topic, the totality of all known and possible worlds, and the locative prepositional phrase „într-o coajă de nucă" designates a small container, metaphorically a nucleus, composed of the preposition "în"[20] followed by the definite article "o"[21], feminine singular, contracted form (într-o), a contraction frequently encountered in spoken and written Romanian, followed by the common noun coajă[22], feminine singular, accusative, unarticulated, derived from Slavic koža – "skin" – "shell"; followed by the preposition "de"[23], which introduces the complement of material, of belonging, nucă[24], common noun, feminine singular, unarticulated genitive/dative, from Latin nux, nucis; a small, round, apparently insignificant object. Coajă de nucă is a fixed nominal expression, almost becoming a lexical compound in Romanian (figurative sense: extremely small space, apparently insignificant thing), creating a tactile, concrete image. This locative construction gives the correlation of content-container, interior-boundary, interior-boundary-exterior. (Interior: "the universe" as encapsulated totality [content]; boundary: "shell" as cognitive limit/frontier [what enters/what remains outside]; exterior: "infinite space" as conceptual background.) The semantic implications are cognitive finitude versus ontological infinity; stability (shell) versus variability (content). From a syntactic point of view, the complete structure of the title "universul într-o coajă de nucă" is an elliptical nominal sentence (without an explicit verbal predicate, typical of titles and sayings). The presence of the enclitic article in universul (not univers or un univers) suggests that it refers to the unique, known universe, the totality of reality. The "absence of a verb" creates a suspended nominal sentence, with the air of an axiom or proverb, which gives the title maximum force and memorability. Coajă de nucă functions as a "conceptual metaphor" of the container type (recipient): the infinite universe becomes the content of a finite and mundane container – irony and epistemological humility. From a morpho-syntactic point of view, the title universul într-o coajă de nucă is a perfectly constructed elliptical nominal sentence, in which: the semantic core is the opposition between immense ("universul," articulated) and tiny ("coajă de nucă," unarticulated, mundane); the attribute becomes the vehicle of the metaphor; the absence of a verbal predicate creates an effect of maximum condensation and paradox – exactly what the book itself promises.

At the pragmatic-discursive level, the metaphor has several functions: macro-framing of the volume (it represents the overall conceptual frame that organizes the themes, tone, and explanatory path of the book. Example: the metaphor "the universe in a nutshell" gives the general direction and links the sections together); narrative orientation (the way a metaphor guides the storytelling of ideas: it establishes a red thread: recurring and connecting chapters; it gives order to explanations: establishes beginning–middle–end [e.g., from "empty shell" to "full shell"]; it creates transitions: natural passages between themes [miniature – imaginary time – branes]; it focuses perspective: what we "see" inside/outside the "shell"; it motivates questions and mini-"scenes": "what fits inside?", "how does it curve?", "can it be traversed?"; it closes the arc: opening with hamlet, closing with the tempest, providing cohesion and memorability); mnemonic anchor: an element (word, image, metaphor) that fixes and facilitates the recall of an idea. Example: "the universe in a nutshell" serves as a mnemonic anchor for the entire explanatory framework of the book.

The metaphor "nutshell" functions as an umbrella metaphor: it concentrates complexity into a memorable container and establishes the narrative frame of the volume. It integrates the Shakespearean intertext with advanced concepts (imaginary time, branes), facilitating cognitive transfer. It requires the explicit delimitation of the limits of the analogy to avoid reifying the image into ontology.

"The Shape of Time"[25]

The conceptual metaphor "The Shape of Time. Einstein's general theory of relativity gives time a shape. How can this fact be reconciled with quantum theory?"[26] as a chapter title and subtitle introduces the transition from one form of time to another: absolute/universal time, personal time, time as a railway track, Newtonian time, time as an infinite line, distorted time, finite time, pear-shaped time, curved time, imaginary time, real time, ordinary time, complete time, flat time, looped time, four-dimensional time, etc. Some representative citations in this respect, to which we refer, are: "It follows not only that it would be possible to send signals faster than the speed of light,… but also that, in order to understand what instantaneous means, absolute or universal time would be needed, which relativity has removed in favor of personal time."[27] (Hawking, p. 14) "The model of time as a railway track. But is time like a main line that goes in only one direction – towards the future – or can it have a loop back, through which it reenters the main line at a previous switch?"[28] (Hawking, p. 30) "In the theory of relativity, which is in agreement with a large number of experiments, time and space are, however, indissolubly linked. Space cannot be curved without time also being involved. Therefore, time has a shape. By curving space and time, general relativity transforms them from a passive frame in which events occur into active participants, dynamic with respect to what happens."[29] (Hawking, p. 35) "Einstein's classical (non-quantum) general theory of relativity combines real time and the three dimensions of space into four-dimensional time."[30] (Hawking, p. 59) "Time has the shape of a pear. If we go back in time along the light cone, we observe its curvature toward the matter of the early universe. The entire universe that we observe is contained in a region whose boundaries shrink to zero at the Big Bang."[31] (Hawking, p. 41) "… imaginary time being perpendicular to real time, behaves as a fourth spatial direction. It can therefore have a wider range of possibilities than the railway of ordinary real time, which can have only a beginning and an end, or can loop in circles. In this imaginary sense, time has a shape."[32] (Hawking, p. 60)

Conceptual values of the metaphor "the shape of time" (source-target mappings) are: shape/geometry – moldable time (p. 35): time has "shape" (curves, profile), it is not a passive frame (relativity makes it a "participant"); curvature – gravity (p. 35): the curving of space also implies the curving of time; line/path – directionality: time as a "main line," direction towards the future; possibly "switch," "loops"; container/extremities – limits (p. 30): beginning/end (finite time), "flat time" vs. "distorted time"; dimensionality – integration (p. 59): four-dimensional time in space-time; time as axis in the "line of the world" (p. 60); orthogonality – alternative regime: "imaginary time" perpendicular to "real time" (behaves as a "fourth spatial direction"); topology (loops) – recursivity (p. 30): possibility of re-entering the "line" (loops); morphological profile (pear) – asymmetry/expansion (p. 41): constraint at the big bang, widening over time (light cone); agency – dynamism (p. 14): time moves from passive frame to "active participant" in the evolution of events; scale/miniaturization – focus (p. 35): local descriptions (regions of the light cone) vs. Global (cosmic history); continuity/discreteness – regimes (p. 35): "ordinary" time vs. "complete," "borderless"; stability/flatness – absence of forces: "flat time" as idealization; network/nodes – switches: points of conceptual bifurcation; metric – measurability: temporal "distances" (proper/coordinates); boundaries – horizons: limits of observability and causality; symmetry/asymmetry – arrow of time: difference between past and future (entropic/cosmological); texture – density of events: "distorted" vs. "flat" suggests rhythm/congestion of causality; map/diagram – visualization: light cone as a "scheme" of the shape of time; epistemic regime – heuristic: "imaginary time" as a computational/modeling instrument, not a physical entity.

Discursive functions of the conceptual metaphor "the shape of time" are: explanatory: translates relativity (curvature, light cone) into concrete images (line, path, pear); conceptual-structural: aligns time with the geometry of space-time (four-dimensional, curved); pedagogical: organizes didactic oppositions (real vs. Imaginary; flat vs. Distorted); heuristic: allows scenarios (loop, switch) to test conceptual consequences; persuasive: provides an "enlightenment effect" through memorable visualizations; metalinguistic/terminological: establishes vocabulary (real/imaginary, flat/curved); cohesive: links sections (time, space-time, black holes/wormholes).

In the Romanian language from a morpho-syntactic point of view, the conceptual metaphor "the shape of time" is composed of the common feminine noun forma[33] (Lat. forma, Fr. forme), singular, nominative, articulated with the definite article "-a," offering a concrete geometric image of time, and the common neuter noun timp[34], singular, genitive, enclitic articulated "-lui"; the whole nominal group is a possessive construction. In the cited passages, different forms of time appear: absolute/universal, personal, as a railway track, as an infinite line, distorted, finite, pear-shaped, curved, imaginary, real, ordinary, complete, flat, looped, four-dimensional, etc. Forma is a noun concretized through metaphor (time, which is abstract, suddenly receives a physical, palpable "shape," like a geometric object); timpului is a genitive attributive – in Romanian, it is the most natural and elegant way to express possession when the first noun is articulated. In conclusion: the shape of time becomes conical near a black hole; in space-time diagrams, the shape of time is represented as the vertical axis that narrows; the curvature of space-time modifies the shape of time; the shape of time differs from one observer to another; special relativity radically changed the shape of time; near the black hole, the shape of time is like a funnel, being the most visual and memorable construction. Specific morpho-syntactic and stylistic effects: transforming the abstract noun timp into an articulated possessor (timpului) and placing it in the genitive after forma radically concretizes the concept: time is no longer an invisible flow, but an object with a precise geometric contour; the choice of the noun forma (and not "structure," "curvature," "configuration") is deliberately sensory and visual – the reader immediately imagines a surface, a cone, a funnel. The construction – forma plus genitive noun – is one of the strongest and most elegant Romanian structures for scientific metaphors (cf. "curvature of space," "energy of matter," "density of the black hole"). The metaphor "the shape of time", from a morpho-syntactic point of view, is an extremely compact and efficient genitive nominal group: forma (articulated, concrete) plus timpului (enclitic articulated, abstract possessor transformed into possessed). This construction allows Hawking to make, in a few words, the huge leap from the traditional philosophical concept of linear time to the modern physical image of a time with variable geometry – and to do it in a perfectly natural and idiomatic way in Romanian.

The metaphor "the shape of time" manages to geometrize intuitions about time and to connect the popular level with the theoretical one (Lakoff & Johnson: shape/trajectory mappings – time). Some of the axes/directions of analysis would be: Geometrization: "space cannot be curved without time" (p. 33) – time as profile/belt; Light cone and directionality (pp. 59–60); Didactic models: "railway track," "main line," "switch/loop" (p. 30) – path scheme; Temporal regimes: opposition "real time" vs. "imaginary time" (pp. 59–60) – heuristic usefulness, but marking the non-ontological status of the "imaginary"; Metaphorical morphologies: "pear shape," "flat/distorted/curved time" – representations of expansion/asymmetry and the influence of gravity; Integration with space-time: four-dimensionality anchors the "shape of time" in the general geometric framework; prepares the ground for local phenomena (black holes/wormholes). Effects: increased comprehensibility and memorability ("aha" effect) and stabilization of a coherent didactic vocabulary. Risks include: reification (always specify it is a model/metaphor); avoid uncontrolled mixing of models (line vs. pear vs. loops) without explicit bridges; mark that "shape" is a metaphorical model, not an ontological property; "imaginary time": mark heuristic/mathematical status and domain of validity; mixing sub-metaphors: mark transitions and hypotheses when moving from line – loop – "pear shape"; visual overload: indicate what is didactic scheme vs. empirical result; extrapolation: mark the limits of the used theory (relativistic vs. quantum) and application conditions: gravity regimes (weak/strong), frame of reference (local observer vs. distant), proper time vs. coordinate time, homogeneity/isotropy hypotheses, classical limits, manifold smoothness, energy conditions and boundaries (e.g., "borderless"). Criteria for responsible use: clarify the domain of validity (where "shape" is only a heuristic instrument); explicitly mention the model–reality difference (e.g., "imaginary time" as a mathematical instrument); maintain terminological consistency (line/path/pear/loop linked through a common scheme); anchor in minimal formal landmarks (light cone, line of the world); use controlled illustrations (avoid graphics suggesting ontologization of the metaphor).

The metaphor "the shape of time" functions as a robust cognitive device that economically translates relativistic abstraction into easily mentally manipulable images (line, path, curvature, pear). It provides terminological coherence and a common framework to explain differences between real and imaginary time, between "flat" and "distorted" regimes, and to visually anchor formal concepts such as the line of the world or the light cone. By integrating it into the space-time architecture, the metaphor ensures continuity toward local phenomena (black holes, wormholes), enhancing both comprehensibility and memorability of the discourse. However, its efficiency depends on explicitly marking limits (heuristic status of "imaginary time," model–reality distinction) and maintaining consistency between sub-metaphors (line vs. loop vs. pear shape), to avoid reification and misconceptions.

Conclusions

The study has shown that, within the framework of conceptual metaphor theory (Lakoff & Johnson), Hawking's metaphors function as central cognitive devices: "the universe in a nutshell" provides the macro framework (container/miniaturization), "the shape of time" establishes the conceptual geometry. The recurrence and inter-metaphoric coherence facilitate public understanding of otherwise abstract concepts, but require responsible use: clarification of analogy limits, marking heuristic/speculative status, terminological consistency, and anchoring in relevant scientific frameworks (relativistic and quantum). The result supports the idea that metaphor, far from being mere ornament, is an efficient didactic architecture that shapes the reader's mental representations. Future research can experimentally test the effects of these metaphors on comprehension and can extend and compare them.

The two metaphors belong to a small number of primary conceptual schemes: container, path, object, substance, living organism. The Romanian language amplifies their force through the enclitic article, the flexibility of the genitive, and the richness of verbs of motion and deformation. Hawking demonstrates that cutting-edge scientific discourse can and should be narrative and poetic without losing rigor. His metaphors not only explain, but also create new ways of thinking about the universe – proof that advanced science and creative imagination are not separate domains.

FAILURE AND DEATH – ”SMALL DRAMAS OF PROVINCIAL LIFE”, 1983

Diana-Mihaela Sofian
PhD, “Alexandru Ioan Cuza” University of Iași

Abstract: The fragmented, detailed, unfolded, unstitched daily life will be meticulously analyzed in its articulations, the prose writers exercising the effects of handling metaprosaic procedures on the "valves of the derisory" of a candid, Chekhovian-like, languid existentiality. But for the "attempt at textualism", short prose was more at hand: textualism, the hyper-faithful reflection of small reality, authenticity, uninhibited testing of all levels of language, parodic addition and others are principles of eighties prose that tend to dynamite the coherence and serious meanings of the world, in the context of the double stake: pushing the efforts towards authenticity to the extreme and the acute awareness of the artificiality of prose.

Keywords: eighties prose; metaprosaic procedures; textualism; fragmentarism; authenticity.

Firește, proza scurtă nu este o descoperire optzecistă. Însă, pentru ca lucrurile să fie într-adevăr fireşti, adică bine situate între limitele adevărului, Radu G. Ţeposu a socotit necesară o scurtă plimbare prin peisaj: „redescoperitori ai prozei scurte” sunt, în primul rând, scriitorii generaţiei ’60: Marin Preda, D.R.Popescu, Fănuş Neagu, Constantin Ţoiu, Nicolae Velea, Ştefan Bănulescu, George Bălăiţă, Eugen Barbu, Sorin Titel, Augustin Buzura, Nicolae Breban şi Paul Georgescu sunt numele pe care criticul a ţinut neapărat să le menţioneze, deoarece, recunoscute sau nu, ele au constituit veritabile modele. Celor care au urmat li se amintesc inovaţiile: „prozatorii anilor ’70 […] au resuscitat proza scurtă, radiografia cinic-maliţioasă a cotidianului”, astfel că „idealul prozei mai noi pare a fi demontarea vieţii în fragmente şi detalii, iluminarea subterană, hiperrealistă a cotidianului.” [Țeposu, 2022: 19]. Şi cu asta vechea accepţie a realismului devine istorie.

Cotidianul fragmentat, detaliat, depliat, descusut, va fi analizat minuţios în articulaţiile sale, prozatorii exersând efecte ale mânuirii procedeelor metaprozastice asupra „supapelor derizoriului” unei existenţialităţi candide, moleşite cehovian. „Proza cotidiană optzecistă lua un fapt brut, relativ banal, dar reuşea să-i dea semnificaţii. Asta e diferenţa între literatură şi jurnalism” va spune, în celebrul său interviu, Nedelciu [Nedelciu, 1998].

Din această perspectivă, a începuturilor - aşa cum au fost, atitudinea postmodernistă pare luminată de alte raze şi în alte direcţii decât cele în care va fi constrânsă mai târziu, de teoreticienii care pretind drepturi exclusiviste: Nedelciu o va defini, motivând alegerile la care au fost constrânşi de împrejurări: „capacitatea de a amesteca, să zicem, timpii istorici, de a refuza anumite standarde ale literaturii, cum ar fi, ştiu eu, împărţirea pe genuri literare, deci curajul de a sări dintr-o parte într-alta, în chiar timpul derulării textului, fără grija canoanelor. Dacă te păstrai în canoanele schiţei, ale nuvelei, erai mai vulnerabil în confruntarea cu ideologul care voia să vadă ce ai tu de fapt în cap. Postmodernismul era o forţă de încifrare pentru noi şi o alegeam deliberat. Nu era o formă de exprimare care venea din conţinutul vieţii noastre, pentru că viaţa noastră nu era ca aceea a creatorilor postmodernismului, care avea un nivel de dezvoltare tehnologică diferit. Dar prin inteligenţa pe care ţi-o dă spaima şi căutarea de soluţii, pe care ţi-o impunea mediul acela în care trăiam, am ales postmodernismul ca o formă de încifrare care cumva îi încurca urechile cenzorului.” [Nedelciu, 1998].

Prin urmare, dacă romancierii de dinainte de’89 foloseau romanul ca supapă atât pentru nevoia de ficţiune, cât şi pentru la fel de permanenta nevoie de dez-iluzionare, dez-amăgire, dez-vrăjire a mentalului colectiv, optzeciştii optează : scurt! Nu, însă, pentru a răsturna canonul, nici pentru a face prestidigitaţie, scamatorie-inginerie textuală pe cm^2. Dacă marile parabole sociale necesitau o construcţie elaborată, stratificări semantice bine susţinute ficţional, căci altfel riscând să se prăbuşească sub greutatea propriei mize, genul scurt cere, şi acesta, dexteritate, de felul celei despre care vorbea Nedelciu, dar mai puţină experienţă. Faptul este recunoscut de Ioan Groşan, care nu se sfieşte să-şi arate limitele de creaţie, şi prin el ale ale generaţiei sale: „Mărturisesc că deocamdată nu mă încumet să scriu roman pentru că nu stăpânesc tehnicile necesare de construcţie epică. Chiar presupunând că aş avea experienţa mai multor tipuri de scriitură şi fondul problemelor care solicită spaţiul unui roman, a începe ridicarea construcţiei ignorând aprofundarea structurilor ei de rezistenţă mi se pare o întreprindere riscantă. Până una-alta prefer să studiez şi să mă calific la locul de muncă, proza scurtă." [Marineasa, 1998:605]

Posibil, dar să nu uităm de Daimonul (auto)ironiei care bântuie orice declaraţie a optzeciştilor care nu se intitulează teoreticieni puri şi duri. Căci nici Groşan, nici Nedelciu, nici Cimpoeşu nu vor abandona genul scurt, chiar dacă în timp şi-au dat măsura, largă, generoasă, ca romancieri.

Însă pentru „încercarea textualismului" şi a celorlalte mode (mofturi, unele), cum le numea Nedelciu, era mai la îndemână proza scurtă: textualismul, reflectarea hiperfidelă a realităţii mărunte, autenticitatea, testarea neinhibată a tuturor palierelor limbajului, plusarea parodică şi altele sunt principii ale prozei optzeciste care tind să dinamiteze coerenţa şi semnificaţiile grave ale lumii, în contextul dublei mize: „împingerea la extrem a eforturilor întru autenticitate" şi „conştientizarea acută a artificialităţii prozei" [Crăciun, 1998: 589].

În final, ca o sinteză la fiecare dintre încercările de împrejmuire conceptuală de mai sus, o statornicire a prozei scurte prin „ce nu vrea să fie": „analiza psihologică, metafora tradiţională, textul de dragul textuării, temele bătătorite, supunerea la tipicul eficienţei, automatismele, proza ca oglindă fidelă pentru reproducerea realităţii etc." după cum observă, în acelaşi volum, Maria Mailat.

Volumul de debut al lui Cimpoeşu, Amintiri din provincie, apare în 1983 la Editura Junimea din Iaşi şi primeşte, în noiembrie 1985, Premiul pentru proză, acordat de Asociaţia Scriitorilor din Iaşi, în cadrul Ediţiei a XIV-a a Zilelor „Mihail Sadoveanu".

Conţine, pe întinsul a 109 pagini, şapte nuvele: Revelaţia, Poveste intenţionat veselă, Într-o joi dimineaţă, Temă pentru acasă, Borny, Mambătrâna (selecţionată în 1998 de Gh. Crăciun pentru antologia de proză scurtă a generaţiei 80) şi Scrisoarea.

Semnalările în epocă au fost, totuşi, puţine, dar, cum remarca un tânăr critic contemporan, Cosmin Ciotloş, semnăturile erau „grele": la un an de la apariţia volumului, Val Condurache sublinia, într-un număr din 1984 al României literare, noutatea tematică în contextul literar al epocii: „trezindu-ne la o realitate de toate zilele, când derizorie, când fantastică, de coşmar, radiografiată minuţios cu aparate de mare precizie".

Analizat mai mult din perspectiva strategiilor, tematica fiind doar trecută în revistă, în regim de cronică sau recenzie literară, volumul a fost apreciat pentru siguranţa stilistică a autorului şi pentru rafinamentul tehnicilor narative. În volumul său de sinteză, unul din puţinele de gen apărute în epocă, Ioan Holban atrage atenţia asupra a ceea ce, după părerea noastră, constituie nucleul valoric al acestei cărţi: clivajul dintre firesc şi nefiresc generează absurdul, ivit în aparenţă pe neaşteptate: „În plină banalitate se petrece altceva". De fapt, remarcă Holban, exersarea, de către un personaj sau altul, a acestui altfel, determină „trecerea pragului spre absurd", tocmai prin „acumulare treptată a firescului" [Holban, 1987: 417].

Volumul s-a mai bucurat de caracterizarea generală realizată de Radu G. Ţeposu în Istoria sa: povestirile sunt „mici tablouri epice care arată multă artă a naraţiunii şi, deopotrivă, intuiţie a esenţialului", cărora, în 2005, le-a mai acordat atenţie Victor Marin Buciu, miza fiind o comparaţie cu proza altui optzecist, Ioan Groşan: universul acestor se circumscrie intenţiei autorului de a exersa un „nou realism al provinciei moldoveneşti, din epoca ideologiilor şi ambiguităţii (de)mitizărilor" [Buciu, 2005].

Considerăm că o analiză tematică, dincolo de simpla trecere în revistă a subiectelor tratate, va scoate la iveală şi alte calităţi ale volumului de debut.

Ele sunt relevate încă din titlul în aparenţă banal sau, cel mult, făcând o (falsă) reverenţă intertextuală către alt, hâtru şi mucalit şi acela, povestitor moldovean. Titlul anticipează, deci, jocul de la conţinut la strategii: Amintiri din provincie scrise de un tânăr autor (31 de ani) moldovean, ce vrea să spună acest lucru (titlu)? Cele două substantive implică ambele o trimitere spre indecis şi periferic: temporal, înspre un trecut evenimenţial ce se vrea recuperat/întemeiat prin memorie. Spaţial – înspre un oriunde dincolo de centru, zonă în care întâmplarea îşi dezvăluie simultan caracterul de banal şi excepţionalitate (tocmai pentru că se în provincie nu se poate întâmpla mai nimic care să merite să fie amintit, povestit într-o carte). De altfel, într-un interviu, autorul însuşi precizează: „Acolo era vorba de a realiza un tablou nostalgic al vieţii în provincie, cu micile ei drame, cu oamenii ei mărunţi si care totuşi ar avea ceva de spus, dacă ar avea ocazia" [Zotescu: 98]. Aşadar, autorul ca purtător de cuvânt al celor a căror existenţă conţine o doză de dramatism ce merită a fi luat în consideraţie.

Care ar fi aceste mici drame ale vieţii de provincie? Eh, banale întâmplări de toate zilele: ratarea şi moartea, acceptate cu o dulce moleşeală sau indiferenţă a neputinţei de a fi/ a înţelege altfel.

Viaţa - un vis nedefinit, de păpuşi automate

Despre mica dramă existenţială din nuvela Într-o joi dimineaţă, Val Condurache scrie că e „o simplificare la maximum" - şi „cu cruzime" - a „mecanicii sufletului", „un fiong în conştiinţa unei doamne bovarice"[Condurache, 1984]. Criticul subliniază caracterul iterativ al întâmplărilor relatate, dimineaţa zilei de joi semănând întocmai cu oricare altă dimineaţă a unei zile de lucru din viaţa familiei Cazan, deşi „tov-a Silvia Cazan", „şefă de cadre la o mare întreprindere dintr-un important oraş comercial", se întâmplă să aibă, într-o (oarecare) joi dimineaţă, revelaţia ratării fericirii posibile alături de iubitul ei din adolescenţă. Sau poate (textul e atât de abil construit, încât nu ne lasă, dar ne tentează la a crede) că are în fiecare dimineaţă conştiinţa ratării şi proiectează un etern – bovaric altceva. Momentul începerii acţiunii din povestirea Într-o joi dimineaţă nu e ales întâmplător: într-un univers haotic în severa sa ordine, microgrupul îşi pierde unitatea care-i legitimează, în fond, existenţa, în favoarea colectivului organizat după legi supra-individuale de la unitatea de lucru (doamna Cazan lucrează „la o mare întreprindere, într-un mare oraş industrial, este şefă de cadre", precizează naratorul) sau a marelui anonimat din mijloacele de transport în comun, la care sunt siliţi să recurgă mai toţi. Astfel că soţii iau act unul de altul doar dimineaţa, la micul dejun, întrucât în timpul zilei sunt la serviciu, iar seara adorm osteniţi: „Dacă nu s-ar vedea numai între orele optsprezece-douăzeci şi unu (sau ora de culcare) şi şase-şase patruzeci şi cinci), ar putea spune că sunt o familie model". Observaţia îi aparţine soţului, şi ironia pe care o implică dezvăluie faptul că, la rândul lui, îşi asumă resemnat banalul cotidian. Acceptarea e o formă de protecţie, o mască pe care şi-o pun unul în faţa altuia şi, alături de ceilalţi, în faţa societăţii.

Eşec sentimental ascuns definitiv în cutele sufletului, printr-o căsătorie care îi asigură o existenţă monotonă, în care gesturile şi cuvintele zilnice şi-au pierdut semnificaţia şi au devenit, prin repetiţie, mecanice, ritual impus de o mască sub care vidul sufletesc se contemplă reflectat în el însuşi. Un vid pe care cei doi soţi îl menajează cu grijă duioasă: se feresc să-şi spună gândurile, privirile ocolesc atent, căzând cu politeţe în gol. După brusca revelaţie din bucătărie, generată de un vis pe care în sfârşit şi-l aminteşte (ce putea să fie dacă…), îşi reia conştiincios drumul egal al fiecărei zile şi, în înghesuiala din autobuzul cel de toate zilele, are a doua revelaţie: bărbatul pe care îl întâlneşte în fiecare dimineaţă, cu care „colaborează adesea pe linie de serviciu" şi „a cărui privire o ocoleşte întotdeauna", este chiar iubitul ei din tinereţe, pe care îl visase în acea noapte. Iar ceea ce se străduia să-şi aducă aminte din visul nocturn era locul şi ora unei întâlniri ratate. A cărei şansă bărbatul o aruncă încă o dată în indefinit, mărturisind că „viaţa, nesuferita viaţă de om matur" îl împiedică. Luându-şi rămas-bun, de fapt adio de la posibilitatea de a fi trăit altfel, femeia săvârşeşte de fapt actul sinuciderii virtuale, în universul ei interior: „– Pa! – tov-a Silvia zice de fapt „pac" – şi se împuşcă şi moare şi ajunge la serviciu aşa moartă", unde îşi contemplă, într-o oglindă, chipul de care se teme că îi e dintr-odată străin, dar se linişteşte recunoscându-se pe ea „cea dintotdeauna" şi îşi începe noua zi de lucru, firească, familiară, la fel cu toate celelalte.

În intervalul dintre plecarea soţului la serviciu şi propria ei plecare, Silvia Cazan are, în această dimineaţă de joi, o dublă revelaţie: prima este generată de un vis avut în timpul somnului şi o proiectează în alt vis, cu ochii deschişi: viaţa ei putea fi trăită altfel, alături de altcineva, de iubitul ei din adolescenţă, Gabriel, pe care din timiditate (a ei) şi impulsivitate adolescentină (a lui) l-a respins când atracţia i-a adus prea aproape unul de altul, gest pe care nu l-a înţeles şi nu l-a acceptat cu resemnare niciunul dintre ei, până astăzi. Visul îi trezeşte amintirea şi îi umple sufletul de fiori uitaţi, perturbând firescul gesturilor de fiecare zi până acolo încât femeia are impresia că realul îi scapă de sub control: trezindu-se din somn, îşi repetă imperativ „să nu uit aia", fără a conştientiza despre ce vorbeşte şi se grăbeşte să intre în ritualul zilnic, dar „altceva, inexplicabil, incomod şi rău prevestitor" o face să uite să aprindă focul la aragaz, pentru a fierbe cafeaua. Derapajul de la ritualul zilnic o umple de spaimă nedefinită, deoarece nu ştie de ce şi cum s-a putut întâmpla să uite, să nu bage de seamă dacă a făcut un gest sau altul, atât de bine ştiute până atunci.

Iubirea – inexplicabilul necesar

Tema ratării marii iubiri adolescentine şi a (ne)acceptării firescului unei vieţi oarecare (însă nu a aceleia visate) este reluată în Borny. Medicul şi inginera, tineri, stagiari, se cunosc la ştrand – sub acelaşi duş – trăiesc marea iubire de-o vară „până când el n-a mai venit". Criza fetei părăsite pe neaşteptate se consumă năprasnic, dar nedumerirea rămâne. Şi, deşi amândoi îşi văd de viaţă, întemeindu-şi familii, planificând şi făcând copii, Dina continuă, în toţi aceşti ani, să-l sune „în fiecare zi când iese de la serviciu", pentru a-i cere explicaţiile datorate, pe care el le amână, bonom, la infinit…astfel că raţiunea ei de a traversa prin firescul fiecărei zile nu rămâne alta, ne lămureşte naratorul în final, decât aceea de a cere această explicaţie.

Şoricelul nimerit în grădina zoologică de la bloc

Un copil primeşte la şcoală Temă pentru acasă: Descrieţi o întâmplare deosebită din viaţa voastră şi descrie câteva zile din viaţa unei familii sâcâite de apariţia unui şoarece, pe care tatăl este somat să îl îndepărteze. Aventura se consumă în etape, banalul casnic cotidian devenind senzaţional nu atât prin strategiile de prindere a şoricelului, cât prin redarea prin lupă a chipurilor, comportamentului, limbajului adulţilor, înregistrate de copilul pentru care lumea celor mari e un univers de explorat.

Banalul - senzaţionalul morţii. Degradarea tragicului

Celelalte patru naraţiuni dezvoltă tema morţii în diferite împrejurări: povestirea care deschide volumul se intitulează Revelaţia,

La început problematic fără a fi misterios, fenomenul trecerii în nefiinţă este perceput ca spectacol al privirii. Când spaţiul dintre spectatorul neutru şi scena „ultimului act" devine interval cu limite imperios înglobante, statutul personajului se modifică, acesta transformându-se în actor, statutul personajului se modifică, acesta transformându-se în actor, cu o partitură şi un decor care îi definesc structura particulară de victimă a eternei agresiuni, căreia îi răspunde conform cu dimensiunea sa interioară.

Concretizată în act sau prefigurată la nivelul intelectului prin meditaţia asupra actului, partitura personajului, coordonatele spaţio-temporale şi, uneori, comentariul din umbră al naratorului, dezvoltă conotaţii în registrul simbolic al unui imaginar propriu unui univers în care condiţia umană se află într-o neputinţă totală, manifestată prin lipsa de demnitate şi de îndârjire în faţa propriei şi celei din urmă limite.

Deoarece nu-şi revendică niciun sens înalt al actului trăirii, personajele lui Cimpoeşu nu pot pretinde nici o demnă punere în relaţie cu moartea. Personajul din Revelația trăiește o experiență stranie, însă, prin natura profesiei sale de fotograf, obișnuit să satisfacă pretențiile clienților, oricare ar fi acelea, nu dă o prea mare importanță ciudățeniei la care asistă: două bătrâne își „regizează" moartea, în sensul că se vor fotografiate în sicriul așezat pe masă, cu flori și lumânări, în sfârșit, toată recuzita care să genereze efectul de real. Dacă se miră, are grijă să nu deranjeze prin aceasta cleintele. Care, ele, nu-și pun deloc problema ce ar putea crede fotograful. Terminând filmul, acesta își ia aparatura și pleacă acasă. În fața blocului, scoate o exclamație scurtă, de parcă și-ar fi amintit brusc de ceva ce îi produce nedumerire: „Ei, drăcie!" – și moare, fără ca nimic dinc e trăise să îi anunțe această întâmplare, decât visul absurd avut cu o noapte în urmă: „o linie dreaptă trasată cu creionul, o simplă linie nesfârșitää, atâta tot".

Înţelegând prin imaginea morţii desfăşurarea sub ochiul spectator al elementelor ce o semnifică, sesizăm două aspecte esenţiale: primul ţine de poziţia spectator-spectacol, al doilea, dedus

de aici, de semnificaţia spectacolului morţii. Observăm astfel o detaşare iniţială, o obiectivare a privirii. Funcţia ei este, aici, de înregistrare pe deasupra sensului şi totdeauna din afară, poziţia spectatotului fiind ocupată de narator sau de un personaj-martor. Moartea ca spectacol supus privirii e, din această perspectivă, moartea celuilalt, „moartea la persoana a treia" [Jankelevitch, 2001:17].

Farsa sinistră a lui hora incerta dezvăluie cinismul dezabuzat al cei din casă interogând-o pe bătrână asupra timpului morţii ei în Mambătrâna, aleasă de Crăciun pentru atologare. Farsă – atât pentru cel obligat să-şi pună problema dispariţiei sinelui, cât şi pentru cei care trebuie să asiste la acest eveniment exterior. Trimisă înapoi în sat cu salvarea, pentru a muri la casa ei, femeia este primită ca o străină de propriul fiu şi de restul familiei. Intrusei abia dacă i se oferă un pat, fără saltea, şi, în loc de plapumă, nişte ţoale aruncate peste trupul ei descărnat. Băiatul cel mic al nurorii este pus să o îngrijească, prilej pentru copil să o observe mai de aproape, cu cruzimea neînţelegerii fenomenului. Întrebând-o de ce miroase atât de urât, bătrâna îi explică, jenată, că asta se întâmplă deoarece, fiind pleurezică, transpiră şi, la spital ca şi acasă, nimeni nu şi-a pus problema să o spele. Recunoscătoare pentru faptul că băiatul o hrăneşte, bătrâna acceptă să îi dea acestuia nişte bani, ca să îşi ia o minge de fotbal, asta în condiţiile în care ceilalţi ai casei se întreabă dacă n-ar fi cazul să caute bani de înmormântare printre lucrurile muribundei. Sâcâiţi că nu mai moare, adulţii se simt uşuraţi când bătrâna îi cheamă să îi anunţe că „se duce". Spectacolul morţii ei devine un simulacru de ritual, ai casei simulează jalea şi aşteaptă, în realitate, ca totul să se termine cât mai repede şi să-şi continue somnul întrerupt, pentru ca a doua zi să reia treburile presante ale fiecărei zile.

Absurdul transpare din fiecare povestire, aşa cum spunea Ion Holban, prin acumularea firescului. Absurdul ca principiu de generare a câmpului tensional din text este magistral ilustrat în textul Poveste intenţionat veselă: un amărât se duce la medic cu aproape ultimii bani, pentru a fi operat de o banală apendicită. Doctorul este sfătuit de prieteni să îşi pună banii primiţi la CEC, pentru a vedea dacă va câştiga un autoturism. Norocul devine monstruos prin repetare, aducându-l pe doctor în pragul colapsului nervos. Pentru a pune capăt „blestemului", acesta decide să îi înapoieze pacientului suma primită iniţial, însă nu mai reuşeşte să dea de el. Când, în final, îi dă de urmă, află că nenorocitul murise în urma unei infecţii cauzate de operaţia pe care i-o făcuse.

Povestirea care încheie volumul, Scrisoarea, este un joc între mai mult decât absurdul situaţiei şi firescul cu care o acceptă cei din jur: personajul botezat de tatăl său O, adică „zero", pentru că nu dorise ca acesta să se nască, îşi scrie singur scrisori şi aşteaptă să le primească. Însă aceste scrisori sunt simple foi albe puse în plicuri albe, iar poştăriţa insistă să găsească adresa la care să le predea.

Moartea este imaginată aici ca o căutare oarbă, în ceaţa fiecărei zile: mesagerul ei este femeia-poştaş, dar sensul căutării este bidirecţional, cei doi căutându-se unul pe altul. Sătenii participă la o înmormântare misterioasă, despre care aflăm în final că este a poştăriţei. Dispariţia acesteia îi face să se simtă singuri, întrucât nu mai aveau pe cine să aştepte să le aducă Vestea.

Demersul nostru a urmărit evoluţia înţelegerii fenomenului morţii, în condiţiile situării faţă de şi faţă cu actul de a muri ca problemă a sinelui şi a celuilalt şi desfăşurarea, din perpectiva personajului, a unei palete variate de reacţii în faţa iminenţei şi efectivităţii morţii. „dezorientat de către adverbul iminenţei (în curând), când se află brusc faţă în faţă cu un viitor ce nu era făcut pentru a surveni în mod empiric, omul tinde să abstractizeze viitorul morţii proprii şi trăieşte sentimentul de angoasă, determinat de „transformarea bruscă a morţii într-un dat imediat, al sinelui implicat iremediabil", după cum precizează, în opul amintit, Jankelevitch. Prin urmare, a realiza moartea nu înseamnă doar a trăi ameninţarea morţii ca fiind efectivă şi apropiată, înseamnă, ipso facto, „a te simţi tu însuţi ameninţat personal". „Dacă persoana a treia este un principiu al seninătăţii", persoana I e, cu siguranţă, o sursă de angoasă. La persoana întâi, „mea res agitur", afirmă Lucreţiu.

Pentru a crea tragicul, Cimpoeşu insistă pe derizoriu. Moartea e un fenomen vag, cu greu înţeles, nu pentru misterul ei agresiv, care nu poate fi eludat, ci pentru iruperea ei scandaloasă în cotidian. Oamenii se simt deranjaţi de faptul de a (se) muri. Altădată, scriitorul se raportează la fenomen ca la un simplu spectacol oferit, în cadrul strâmt al colectivităţii unui cartier în care toată lumea cunoaşte pe toată lumea. Actorul este vreun vecin, până atunci cunoscut ca om serios, şi care, iată, aduce pe strada lui un intrus de care se văd deranjaţi în conştiinţa lor de cetăţeni şi de oameni ai muncii fără pată şi prihană.

Deși ia în răspăr și persiflează la aproape orice colț de text, făcându-ne complice cu ochiul, Cimpoeșu „ține la onoarea lui" de autor, mai mult, dovedește că ține mai ales la cea a personajelor sale, încercând să le zdruncine dulcea somnie a acestei conștiințe. Cu un discurs în esență sobru și lapidar, Cimpoeșu are, în mod categoric, apetență și competență în redarea complexității existenței intime și de relație. Programul să estetic este fixat cu precizie: un nou realism critic, unul fundamentat pe de o parte pe procedeele comicului generat atât situațional, cât și procedural, și, pe de altă parte, pe jocurile de perspectivă ale naratorului, care alternează ipostaze și roluri: de a observa, de a emite ipoteze sau de a le infirma și de a instaura, la nivelul semnificațiilor celor relatate, aerul de enigmă, de mereu posibilă dublă interpretare. Ceea ce poziționează textul pe o infinitatea de piste narative, permițând jonglarea cu posibilitățile mereu reluate și mereu abandonate ale hermeneuticii textuale. Toate acestea stăpânite cu o asemenea siguranță, încât mecanismele denunțării i pactului ficțional sunt inserate, ele însele, în actul denunțării cinice și tragice a existenței.

ANA NOVAC. EXILE AS A SPACE OF REWRITING: BETWEEN CAMP DIARY AND LITERARY WORK

Carmen-Ancuța Morari
PhD Student, „Babeș-Bolyai" University of Cluj-Napoca

Abstract: This paper explores how Ana Novac transforms her experience in the Auschwitz camp into a hybrid text that stands between a personal diary and a literary work. Her original notes followed typical diary conventions, capturing immediate reactions and documenting events as they were lived. However, when rewriting these notes in exile, Novac introduces narrative structure, stylistic choices, and subtle fictional elements that reflect the distance created by time and displacement. The study shows how exile becomes a space that allows traumatic memories to be reshaped and expressed in new ways. By combining documentary testimony with literary techniques, Novac's text challenges strict definitions of Holocaust diaries and offers insight into how survivors adapt their stories so they can be shared, understood, and preserved in cultural memory.

Keywords: Ana Novac; Holocaust testimony; Auschwitz diaries; memory; postwar remembrance

Evreii deportați în lagărele naziste au trăit experiențe-limită ce le-au destabilizat identitatea, iar narațiunile lor, scrise concomitent cu evenimentele sau retrospectiv, au devenit testamente pentru întreaga umanitate.

Odată ajunși în limbul infernului, puțini evrei supraviețuitori au reușit să își salveze notițele păstrate în lagăr. Literatura de specialitate confirmă imposibilitatea aproape totală a practicii scriptice în interiorul acestor spații de detenție, acest act sfidător fiind perceput ca o formă de revoltă pedepsit cu asprime. Lagărele au reprezentat un loc proiectat pentru a distruge ființa din temelii, fiind considerate ultima stație înaintea extincției. Acesta este și motivul pentru care numărul jurnalelor scrise în lagăr este relativ mic, comparativ cu cele scrise în ghetouri, unde, deși pericolele existau, victima dispunea de un grad mai mare de libertate.

Cu toate acestea, în studiul său consacrat jurnalelor naziste, Hélène Camarade remarcă faptul că „jurnalul este, de fapt, un gen la care victimele politicilor rasiale au recurs pe scară largă, atât înainte, cât și în timpul deportării."[1] Aceeași opinie este împărtășită și într-un studiu dedicat mărturiilor femeilor deportate din Franța, de către cercetătoarea Margaret-Anne Hutton, care subliniază numărul surprinzător de mare al scrierilor din interiorul spațiilor concentraționare, în ciuda dificultăților de a procura instrumentele necesare și a riscurilor enorme asumate de victime. Numărul redus de mărturii scrise la Auschwitz se explică, totuși, prin regimul extrem, care încerca să anuleze total orice formă de expresie individuală. Sub supraveghere continuă, actul scrierii era aproape imposibil în acel lagăr, majoritatea mărturiilor fiind redactate retrospectiv. În interiorul lagărului sau după eliberare, o parte dintre supraviețuitori au făcut din scris o misiune și o promisiune de a trăi pentru a-și spune povestea generațiilor viitoare, transformându-i astfel pe cititori în martori indirecți ai acestor experiențe, în sensul formulat de Avishai Margalit.

Pentru Margaret-Anne Hutton, prima versiune a jurnalului Anei Novac are o valoare documentară aparte, aceasta fiind redactată, parțial, în spatele sârmei ghimpate din lagărele Auschwitz și Plaszow, precum și în alte lagăre de tranzit. Adolescenta evreică cu dublă origine, maghiară și română, produce aici, conform recenziei ediției franțuzești Folio din 1996 „singurul jurnal care a ieșit vreodată dintr-un lagăr de exterminare nazist."[2] Treptat, s-au descoperit și alte jurnale provenind din acest lagăr, dar, din zona Transilvaniei de Nord, Ana Novac rămâne singura diaristă care a lăsat în urmă un jurnal despre dictatura hitleristă.

Născută în localitatea Dej în 1924[3], Zimra Harsányi și-a petrecut copilăria și primii ani ai adolescenței în Oradea, într-o comunitate evreiască puternic influențată de cultura maghiară.[4] Identitatea hibridă a scriitoarei va fi semnalată de ea însăși în prefața jurnalului: „M-am născut în 1929, în Transilvania[...] La vârsta de unșpe ani, m-am pomenit de naționalitate maghiară, fără să fi schimbat locul, strada și nici măcar cămașa. La paișpe ani am fost deportată la Auschwitz, pe motiv că eram evreică. La înapoiere, în 1945, eram din nou cetățeancă română."[5] Acest pasaj subliniază drama evreicei confruntate cu redefiniri succesive ale propriei identități, dictate de forțe exterioare.

Revizuirea granițelor României a prilejuit inițial bucurie în rândul comunităților evreiești maghiare și dezamăgire pentru evreii ardeleni din sudul Transilvaniei. Cei din urmă au rămas sub jurisdicție românească, continuând lupta cu legile drastice intrate în vigoare. Optimismul evreilor din Transilvania de Nord este însă repede învins. În timp ce, în România antisemitismul se manifesta prin acţiunile violente ale legionarilor, urmate de persecuţiile promovate de dictaturile constituite începând cu anul 1938, guvernele din timpul regimului horthyst propagau, de asemenea, antisemitismul[6]. Între 16 mai și 27 iunie 1944, guvernul maghiar condus de Horthy a adoptat 22 de legi anti-evreiești, mai mult de trei sferturi din populația evreiască din nordul Transilvaniei pierind.[7] Dacă până în luna aprilie, toți evreii fuseseră închiși în ghetouri, în luna mai, mulți dintre aceștia au fost transferați în cartiere periferice sau în fabrici abandonate. Zimra, împreună cu fratele și părinții săi, a fost constrânsă să se mute într-o fostă fabrică de cărămizi. La scurt timp după aceea au început deportările masive către Auschwitz.

În transporturile către lagărele morții, printre deportați s-a aflat și Zimra, împreună cu familia sa. Aceștia nu au călătorit însă împreună, adolescenta fiind separată de părinți și de fratele ei, probabil încă din gara Oradea, lucru care evidențiază brutalitatea fenomenului deportării. Separarea familiilor încă din momentul îmbarcării urmărea anihilarea oricărei forme de solidaritate și de sprijin afectiv. Zimra ajunge la Auschwitz la sfârșitul lunii mai, iar mai târziu i se va povesti că fratele ei a fost ucis în camerele de gazare chiar în ziua sosirii în lagăr. După o scurtă întâlnire cu părinții ei într-un lagăr de tranzit, Zimra nu îi va mai revedea niciodată, aceștia îmbolnăvindu-se de tifos la scurt timp după eliberare.

Tânăra evreică va petrece aproximativ unsprezece luni în lagărele naziste, prima destinație a traseului concentraționar fiind Auschwitz. De aici va fi transferată la Plaszów, pentru ca ulterior să fie readusă la Auschwitz, unde este condamnată la muncă silnică. În prefața jurnalului scriitoarea confirmă că a fost și în alte lagăre satelit unde nu a reușit să scrie. Motivul nu este clar, dar putem intui că graba, lipsa intimității sau controlul absolut al gardienilor au împiedicat-o să consemneze.
Analizând mai multe mărturii ale supraviețuitoarelor lagărelor, Louise O. Vasvári menționează că, în timpul detenției la Auschwitz, diarista a scris concomitent un jurnal și câteva poezii în limba maghiară. Acestea au fost consemnate pe fragmente de afișe propagandistice naziste, pe care protagonista le-a ascuns în pantofi și le-a memorat înainte de a fi nevoită să se despartă de

[3] Ana Novac a susținut că anul nașterii sale a fost 1929, ceea ce ar fi însemnat că avea paisprezece ani când se afla la Auschwitz; a se consulta, de exemplu, ediția franceză din 1982 a jurnalului ei intitulat „J'avais quatorze ans à Auschwitz". Cu toate acestea, conform documentelor din arhivele Securității, anul nașterii autoarei este 1924. Dacă acest an este cel corect, Ana Novac avea deja aproximativ douăzeci de ani în timpul deportării. În cazul în care scriitoarea a ales să își modifice anumite date biografice, este important de subliniat că acest gest nu este un caz singular, numeroși supraviețuitori ai lagărelor recurgând la practici similare.

[6] Ungaria a fost prima ţară europeană care va adopta legi antievreieşti după Primul Război Mondial, regimul autoritar al aliatului lui Hitler caracterizându-se printr-o politică agresivă: „În timpul stăpânirii ungare dintre anii 1940-1944, evreimea din Transilvania de Nord a fost supusă mai multor valuri de atrocităţi: mai întâi şirului de expulzări şi deportări în Galiţia, apoi «holocaustului prin gloanţe», urmat de lichidarea prin muncă forţată, înfometare şi boli, în detaşamentele de muncă şi, în final, deportarea în masă la Auschwitz-Birkenau, încheiată prin nimicirea quasi-totală în lagărele naziste de exterminare şi de muncă"; Zoltán Tibori Szabó, „Holocaust în Transilvania", în File din istoria evreimii clujene, vol. manuscrisele originale. O parte dintre notițele ei au fost scoase ilegal din Auschwitz, iar altele au fost rescrie după eliberare.[8]

La 6 mai 1945 este eliberată din ultimul lagăr, Kratzau, situat în Boemia, de către Armata Roșie. Ulterior este repatriată în Transilvania, care revenise între timp sub administrația românească. În 1947, prin Tratatul de la Paris, Transilvania de Nord a fost recunoscută oficial ca parte a României. Conform propriilor declarații, după eliberare a petrecut aproximativ doi ani într-un spital evreiesc din Cluj-Napoca, fiind grav bolnavă. Acolo a descoperit că a rămas singură pe lume, toți membrii familiei sale pierind.

În 1950 scriitoarea s-a stabilit la București, unde a locuit până în 1963, anul emigrării sale. A studiat teatrul, iar pe scenele bucureștene au fost montate primele ei comedii, așa cum nota în prefața jurnalului. Zimra Harsányi a devenit scriitoarea Ana Novac[9] și s-a alăturat Partidului Comunist, simpatizând cu idealurile acestuia. Schimbarea numelui sau a datei de naștere nu era ceva neobișnuit în perioada postbelică, numeroși evrei recurgând la astfel de modificări după eliberare, în momentul refacerii actelor de identitate.[10]

Scriitori români prestigioși, precum Camil Petrescu, Mihail Sadoveanu și Tudor Arghezi, au elogiat activitatea ei literară, iar publicul larg i-a apreciat comediile, fapt ce confirmă succesul de care s-a bucurat scriitoarea la începutul deceniului al cincilea.[11] Ultima piesă de teatru scrisă în România, „Ce fel de om ești tu?", în ciuda elogiilor inițiale, a fost aspru criticată, autoarea fiind acuzată de deviaționism ideologic. Astfel, Ana Novac este exclusă din Partidul Comunist în 1958 și din Uniunea Scriitorilor în 1960, fiind îndepărtată din mediul cultural oficial. Deși nu i s-a interzis oficial să publice sau să i se pună în scenă piesele, operele sale nu au mai fost nici tipărite, nici puse în scenă vreodată în România comunistă.[12]

La scurtă vreme, ea devine o „țintă" în dosarele Securității. Corina L. Petrescu analizează aceste dosare, examinând modul în care două surse ale Securității, „Magda" și „Karl Fischer", au contribuit la conturarea identității Anei Novac: „Ambele surse o prezintă pe scriitoare ca pe un element subversiv și un dușman al statului, o persoană considerată deviantă prin stilul ei de viață burghez, precum și prin atitudinea critică manifestată deschis față de regimul comunist din România."[13]

Într-un astfel de climat constrângător, Ana Novac nu și-a putut continua cariera. Aceasta alege calea emigrării ca soluție pentru libertatea scrierilor sale. Scriitoarea se mută inițial la Budapesta, iar de acolo la Berlin, unde scrie drame radiofonice pentru radioul german. În 1965 se stabilește la Paris unde va locui până la sfârșitul vieții. Cariera sa literară se consolidează, aceasta frecventând cercurile literare faimoase alături de numeroși intelectuali francezi și exilați români, printre care nu lipseau Jean-Paul Sartre, Simone de Beauvoir, Eugène Ionesco, Jean Pârvulesco și Monica Lovinescu. [9] Alegerea pseudonimului a fost uneori interpretată ca un gest simbolic, un ecou al numelui Annei Frank. Conform informatorilor Securității, Novac a mărturisit că lucrează la un jurnal mai valoros decât cel al Annei Frank. O altă explicație poate fi dorința de afirmare în lumea teatrului, complicatul nume maghiar, alături de prenumele evreiesc, fiind considerat în capitală mai degrabă nepotrivite pentru o carieră literară. Astfel, la fel ca mulți evrei care recurg la schimbarea numelui după stabilirea în capitală, Zimra încearcă să își creeze o nouă identitate. Pe de altă parte, conform sursei „Karl Fischer," Petru Dumitriu, prieten apropiat al scriitoarei, i-ar fi sugerat lui Harsányi să folosească pseudonimul „Ana Novac" (notă informativă din 8 Mai 1963, ACNSAS I 264513, p. 66) cf. [10] Unii evrei schimbau numele pentru a se distanța de trecut, a evita discriminarea sau a se reinventa în noile comunități de care aparțineau după eliberare. Alții modificau chiar și anul nașterii, întrucât acesta putea influența posibilitatea de a-și relua studiile, de a se reangaja sau de a obține anumite compensații și drepturi legale.

în România a scris piese de teatru realist-socialiste în limba maghiara, și traduse ulterior în română și idiș, în Franța, ea a continuat să creeze, în limba franceză, piese de teatru și romane autobiografice. Cercetarea operei Zimrei Harsányi/Anei Novac nu este o sarcină ușoară, manuscrisele acesteia fiind inaccesibile. Până în prezent nu a fost găsit niciun exemplar al operei sale interzise în România comunistă, iar originalul jurnalului nu este disponibil.

Jurnalul, cea mai faimoasă scriere a autoarei de origine română, rămâne un text învăluit în mister, prin existența mai multor variante publicate, cu mici diferențe între ele, care ridică oarecare întrebări privind autenticitatea scrierii și intențiile diaristei. Toate aceste versiuni, însă, păstrează aceeași reprezenare profundă a suferinței. Ana Novac și-a publicat jurnalul de mai multe ori de-a lungul vieții, nu doar în diferite limbi, ci și sub forma unor versiuni mai mult sau mai puțin editate. Materialul reelaborat în mod repetat face imposibil de stabilit cât a păstrat Ana Novac din jurnalele originale și cât a rescris ulterior.

După douăzeci de ani de la eliberarea din lagăr, cu ajutorul lui Jean Pârvulesco va apărea în 1966 prima ediție[14] a jurnalului în limba maghiară, sub titlul A téboly hétköznapjai: Egy diáklány naplójából, semnată Harsányi Zimra. Așadar, scriitoarea este nevoită să își caute libertatea de exprimare în exil. Regimul Kádár din Ungaria nu a manifestat o atitudine la fel de restrictivă în publicarea relatărilor memorialistice despre Shoah, atâta timp cât acestea îi prezentau pe evrei ca pe un grup de victime între altele și interpretau evenimentele anilor ’40 ca pe o confruntare între forțele fasciste și antifasciste.[15] În acest context, pentru că nu incrimina explicit statul maghiar ca responsabil pentru soarta evreilor, jurnalul Anei Novac se alinia principiilor ideologice din Ungaria și a putut fi publicat. Este singura versiune a jurnalului semnat cu numele real, Zimra Harsányi, autoarea adoptând ulterior pseudonimul „Ana Novac” pentru edițiile și versiunile următoare.

Cartea dispare însă repede din circulație, ceea ce o determină pe Ana Novac, odată ajunsă în Germania, să o republice în 1967 într-o limbă de circulație internațională, prin traducerea în germană realizată de Barbara Frischmuth.

În 1968, ajunsă în Franța, departe de presiunile ideologice, scriitoarea decide să rescrie jurnalul în limba franceză, accentuând de astă dată dimensiunea etnică și morală a mărturiei sale. Limba franceză devine un spațiu al libertății și al reconstrucției de sine, iar jurnalul a părăsit tonul strict documentar din versiunea maghiară, devenind o construcție narativă mai complexă, comparabilă cu mărturiile lui Primo Levi. Cu această versiune,[16] Ana Novac se distanțează de ideologia est-europeană, notițele ei devenind o operă literară care îi universalizează mărturia. În prefața acestei versiuni, diarista omite să menționeze versiunea inițială, redactată în limba maghiară. Această omisiune poate fi interpretată ca o încercare a autoarei de a se distanța de controlul ideologic al Europei de Est, mai precis de controlul regimului Kádár asupra primei ediții. Astfel, aceasta se definește drept autoare de limbă franceză și abia acum rescrie adevărata mărturie, eliberată de cenzură.

Jurnalul francez devine jurnalul original din punct de vedere moral, chiar dacă este o scriere retrospectivă și nu cronologică. Ana Novac transferă experiența Holocaustului dintr-un context local (Transilvania, Ungaria) într-unul european, în care mărturia capătă valoarea unui document al umanității.

În anii ’90, când memoria Holocaustului devenea tot mai semnificativă în discursul public, autoarea revizuiește versiunea în limba franceză, apelând din nou la notițele originale scrise în limba maghiară, din dorința de a reconcilia diferitele versiuni ale memoriei sale scrise. Ediția Balland din 1996, a patra versiune a jurnalului, devine o sinteză a celorlalte versiuni anterioare, în care vocea tinerei deportate se armonizează cu conștiința scriitoarei mature, care putea reevalua modul în care să transpună cel mai firesc autenticitatea experienței din lagăr. Această versiune devine forma canonică a scrierii, care va circula în toată lumea, fiind tradusă ulterior în numeroase limbi[17], inclusiv în limba română.[18]

Mărturia sa acoperă aproximativ cinci luni de detenție, din iunie până în octombrie 1944, și surprinde permutarea ei prin mai multe lagăre, deși nu în toate a reușit să consemneze. Tânăra era familiarizată cu genul jurnalului încă de la unsprezece ani, această practică devenind celebră printre adolescentele din familii educate, așa cum o demonstrează Philippe Lejeune. În continuare, Françoise Simonet-Tenant consideră că acest gen are un rol semnificativ în adolescență, scrierea într-un jurnal la această vârstă fiind precum un act de emancipare, un fel de rit de trecere spre vârsta adultă.[19]

Potrivit propriilor declarații, tânăra diaristă și-a început jurnalul în limba maghiară și s-a folosit mai întâi de ciotul unui creion găsit la Auschwitz, în nisip. Acest prim jurnal este alcătuit din bucăți de hârtie adunate cu dificultate, în special din fragmente de afișe dezlipite de pe pereții clădirilor din lagăr. La Plaszów, tânăra evreică convinge un Lagerkapo să îi ofere un caiet și un instrument de scris, motivând că este scriitoare. Proprii pantofi au devenit cea mai sigură ascunzătoare în timpul transporturilor, iar atunci când nu a mai fost posibil să își ascundă acolo notițele, autoarea a învățat pe de rost fragmente din jurnal, pe care le reconstituia imediat ce ajungea în alt lagăr. Cu ajutorul unui gardian, primul ei jurnal a fost scos pe ascuns din lagărul Plaszów și dus în casa unui fost portar din Oradea, pentru a fi păstrat în siguranță.[20] Scrisul a devenit pentru ea o rutină care îi permitea să reziste. Scria în baracă, mai ales noaptea sau în zorii zilei, dar și pe câmp, într-un adăpost improvizat, ori de câte ori reușea să se furișeze de la munca silnică sau când ploaia îi oferea un moment de refugiu.

Spre deosebire de jurnalul clasic, care se scrie concomitent cu desfășurarea evenimentelor, acest jurnal este o scriere retrospectivă. Notițele din manuscrisul original, scris la vârsta adolescenței, alternează cu textul matur și conștient în care Ana Novac reconstruiește experiențele trăite în lagăr. Cazul nu este unic în domeniul diaristicii, au făcut-o și Eliade, Lovinescu, Anaïs Nin, iar dintre jurnalele „reconstruite” ale adolescentelor evreice cele mai cunoscute sunt cel al Annei Frank și al lui Mary Berg, tânăra captivă a ghetoului din Varșovia, care deschide un jurnal la cincisprezece ani, iar apoi îl rescrie.

Asemenea celei din urmă, Ana Novac publică o scriere în care particularități ale jurnalului coexistă cu cele ale memoriilor, devenind un „jurnal hibrid”[21], după denumirea dată de Sue Vice. Între timpul experienței și timpul povestirii este un decalaj de aproximativ douăzeci de ani, iar dacă luăm în considerare versiunea canonică, tradusă ulterior în numeroase limbi, cea din 1996, intervalul se extinde la aproape cincizeci de ani−o distanță temporală care îi oferă diaristei posibilitatea unei priviri detașate asupra propriei experiențe.

Potrivit exegetei Béatrice Didier, există două categorii principale de diariști: cei pentru care jurnalul este un document a cărui valoare esențială este mărturia, și, prin urmare, evită orice formă de retușare, respectiv cei care finisează scriitura îmbunătățind-o, dar, în același timp, riscând să o

În ceea ce privește mărturiile retrospective, la fel ca Sue Vice, cercetătoarea Valerie Raoul consideră că ne aflăm în fața unui caz de graniță între ficțiune și jurnal, pe care îl definește drept caz ambiguu, rar întâlnit. În eseul pe care îl dedică acestui tip de scrieri, Raoul analizează și jurnalul Annei Frank, care conține elemente caracteristice romanului, aspect neobișnuit în jurnalele autentice, însă, în acest caz, dovezile externe confirmă veridicitatea textului.[24] Pentru a evita confuzia cu jurnalul fictiv, care aparține literaturii propriu-zice, vom invoca definiția jurnalului autentic, conturată în studiile dedicare scrierilor autobiografice feminine: „Adevăratul jurnal oferă o relatare despre oameni care există sau au existat, despre locuri marcate pe o hartă și despre evenimente care pot fi confirmate prin dovezi externe. Acesta pretinde că spune adevărul, iar faptele pot fi verificate. Naratorul-protagonist a existat înainte ca jurnalul să fie scris și a continuat să existe după ce acesta a fost încheiat. Chiar dacă autorul este mort, cititorul îi poate vizita mormântul. Există informații despre el și din alte surse, pe lângă cele conținute în jurnal."[25] Cazul Anei Novac confirmă această definiție, textul ei sprijinindu-se pe realitatea verificabilă a lagărelor și numerose documente biografice.

Autenticitatea jurnalului Anei Novac este incontestabilă, fiind susținută nu doar de conținutul mărturisirii, ci și de comentariile paratextuale care însoțesc textul. Declarațiile din prefață și din epilog au rolul de a autentifica această scriere, sugerând că aceasta se îndepărtează de ficțiune și se apropie de confesiunea sinceră. Cu toate acestea, Gérard Genette atrage atenția asupra faptului că, în orice scriere autobiografică, există inevitabil o formă de punere în scenă a sinelui, o construcție narativă prin care naratorul se reprezintă pe sine: „Ar fi o dovadă de mare naivitate să presupunem că expunerea vieții interioare este întotdeauna transparentă și complet lipsită de orice formă de joc actoricesc."[26] În continuare, referindu-se în mod direct la forma jurnalului, Genette observă că „mesajul paratextual al jurnalelor scriitorilor [...] este mai puțin dedicat expunerii adevărului decât producerii unui efect asupra autorului său".[27] Această observație relevă faptul că dimensiunea sa paratextuală nu reprezintă doar o expresie a sincerității, ci este și un mijloc de autocunoaștere a autorului.

Deși ștergerea „urmei" contemporaneității este etalată[28] atunci când naratoarea susține că doar recopiază manuscrisele originale din lagăr[29], natura hibridă a scrierii este dovedită de faptul că uneori protagonista pare să cunoască modul în care se vor desfășura evenimentele. Într-o discuție cu prietena ei cea mai bună, protagonista îi atribuie următoarele cuvinte: „Ce mai contează? Toate astea nu ne-apropie oricum de soluția finală? "[30] Utilizarea termenului eufemistic „soluția finală", deși acesta apărea în documente naziste încă din 1941, este puțin probabil să fie o simplă coincidență sau să fi făcut parte din vocabularul unor adolescente la acel moment.

Înregistrările nu primesc date concrete, dar în ciuda lipsei pactului cu calendarul, acestea urmează aparent o structură liniară și cronologică. Dacă într-un jurnal clasic, înregistrările sunt separate de date cronologice, notițele din jurnalul „Frumoasele zile ale tinereții mele" sunt separate prin asteriscuri. Deși lipsește data, anumite pasaje devin reprezentative pentru evenimente cheie din istoria evreilor închiși în lagăre. De pildă, fragmentul „Lagărul trăsnește-a fum. Un lot italian o să fie plasat la noi în baracă. De fapt sunt niște grecoaice din Rhodos"[31] se referă la arestarea evreilor greci de pe insula Rodos, din 18 iulie 1944, și la sosirea lor la Auschwitz pe 16 august 1944. În acest caz, referințele la evenimente reale conferă autenticitate textului.

În unele pasaje, momentul acțiunii și cel al scrierii se suprapun, creând impresia că diarista notează evenimentele chiar în momentele în care se petrec: „Scriu pe o ladă răsturnată."[32] Această simultaneiate dintre trăire și transcriere reprezintă o trăsătură a jurnalului ideal, în care experiența și relatarea se contopesc.

Indicativul prezent este reluat chiar și în secvențele de amintiri de dinaintea deportării, de exemplu cele despre fratele ei sau despre anii de gimnaziu. Prin această opțiune narativă, diarista subliniază actualitatea trăirilor, creând impresia că totul s-ar desfășura în fața noastră, în prezent. În același timp, această tehnică este una literară, frecvent folosită în proză, așa-numitul prezent narativ făcând povestirea mai vie: „Lecție de geografie cu frate-meu. Îmi știe punctul slab. «Zi-mi unde se află...», începe el[...] În băiatul ăsta calm și distant nu-mi mai recunosc frățiorul − cu trei ani mai mic decât mine."[33]

În jurnal, succesiunea însemnărilor nu urmează un fir linear, fiind adesea întreruptă de reflecții tematice, comentarii metatextuale sau fragmente anecdotice, ceea ce face dificil pentru lector să stabilească timpul, dar mai ales spațiul evenimentelor, mutarea dintr-un lagăr în altul fiind rareori menționată. Totuși, aceste „pauze" narative oferă explicații, interpretări și detalii despre realitatea trăită, jurnalul fiind mai mult decât o înregistrare documentară riguroasă a faptelor.

Este evident că avem de-a face cu un jurnal în care funcția estetică este intenționat programată. Astfel, se poate recunoaște ceea ce Michel Braud numește „un joc între familiaritatea diaristului cu limbajul, căutarea estetică care îi animă activitățile cotidiene și dorința acestuia de a-și afirma un statut social prin scris."[34]

Numeroasele versiuni ale manuscrisului, dar și persistența naratoarei de a-și continua exercițiul scrisului chiar și în condițiile ostile ale lagărelor, demonstrează aspirația la statutul de operă literară. Jurnalul devine opera vieții sale, un text pregătit să depășească limitele documentului confesiv și să devină o creație artistică. De pildă, dialogul cu un Lagerkapo, subliniază pe de-o parte ironia fină, constantă în întregul jurnal, dar și conștiința valorii scrisului, așa cum reiese din schimbul memorabil de replici: „N-aș fi nădăjduit niciodată să am sub ordin o scriitoare. Apropo, cum stai cu romanul tău?/-Nu-i un roman, e un jurnal [...]Va fi tradus./-În germană?/-În toate limbile./-Da...firește..."[35]

Pentru Margaret-Anne Hutton acest jurnal precoce al tinerei din Transilvania este elegant și manierat, în ciuda reelaborării ulterioare.[36] Aceasta observă că autoarea este evident preocupată de stil, de dorința de a găsi cuvintele cele mai potrivite pentru a reda experiența.

Printr-un stil care se înscrie în registrul grotescului descris de Bakhtin, diarista își prezintă experiențele din lagăr într-o manieră paradoxală: gravă prin conținut, dar ludică în expresie.

Un instrument important al naratoarei este ironia, un amestec de luciditate și de cinism emoționant, care emană din condițiile extreme ale vieții din lagăr și îi servesc ca un mecanism de apărare psihologică. Așa cum se observă chiar din titlu, „Frumoasele zile ale tinereții mele. Jurnal de la Auschwitz", prin ironia amară, autoarea pune în contrast inocența evocată de „frumoasele zile" și realitatea infernală a lagărului. Potrivit lui Margaret-Anne Hutton, comentariile reflexive despre umor

și ironie sunt comune în mărturii[37], iar umorul negru este un instrument al supraviețuirii, dar și al rebeliunii,[38]așa cum confirmă și jurnalul tinerei deportate: „numai umorul evreiesc ne-ajută să suportăm tot restul– pe legea mea, nu văd ce se-alege de evreii fără umor.”[39]

Dacă în prima etapă a încarcerării în lagăr umorul servea ca stimulent al solidarității deținuților, în continuare el capată o direcție precisă, deconstrucția persecutorilor naziști.[40] Prin folosirea ironiei și a râsului, naratoarea demontează puterea autorităților din lagăr. Raportul de forțe se inversează prin limbaj, iar victima persecutată recâștigă controlul simbolic asupra călăilor.

Realizarea portretelor torționarilor devine o formă de sfidare și de răzbunare, chiar dacă rareori le spune și numele. Acestea seamănă a caricaturi animaliere, menite să-i deposedeze de forța lor. Spațiul lagărului de la Plassów și gardienii sunt descriși printr-un registru bestiar: „aici, unde doar se latră”[41], gardianca „Mutră de Păpușă”, cu biciul în mână, are o figură grotescă, deținuta-șef are „o mutră de maimuță bătrână, tristă, fardată violent [...]acest Janus femelă, jumate maimuță, jumate orătanie”[42], comandantul este „balena gâfâitoare”[43], călare pe calul său alb, iar torționarul singuratic Jurek este numit succint „fiara” și „bruta”[44]. Folosirea registrului animalier dezumanizează persecutorii și astfel frica este neutralizată.

Râsul și ironia se îndreaptă însă și asupra prizonierilor, inclusiv asupra protagonistei, care refuză să se compătimească, autointitulându-se „sperietoarea lichefiată”[45], iar detalii aparent banale, precum saboții olandezi, pe care îi poartă în locul pantofilor care i s-au furat la Auschwitz, devin surse de ilaritate: „Îmi târâi cum pot «bărcile» prin noroi. Toată lumea mă consolează [...] ținându-se de burtă de atâta râs, asigurându-mă că după ce-o să înghețe noroiul o să pot face după pofta inimii schi de teren sau alte sporturi de iarnă.”[46] În logica lagărului, „râsul nebun” pare a fi singurul răspuns al prizonierilor la suferința îndurată, căci, după cum reflectează naratoarea „lacrimile sunt primele care seacă.”[47] Într-un alt episod, de data asta de la Plassów, umorul negru subliniază absurdul tragic al evreilor care trebuie să-și anunțe profesiile: „Întrebarea e: în ce să te specializezi? Posibilitățile-s cu carul, și n-avem decât zece minute ca să hotărâm dacă vrem să fim croitorese, infirmiere, dansatoare ori dactilografe.”[48] Aceste episoade comice funcționează ca o formă de distanțare psihologică față de realitatea amară.

În galeria prizonierilor din lagăr, fiecare colegă de baracă are un rol distribuit, naratoarea fiind la fel de lucidă și neiertătoare. Surorile Falk sunt descrise cu un umor grotesc, autoarea demascându-le egoismul și meschinăria :„Natura se-ntrecuse cu gluma ca să le facă: era probabil pusă pe năzbâtii când le-a pricopsit cu asemenea trompe[...] Nu-ncape nicio îndoială c-or să scape vii din lagăr; iar presupunând că planeta noastră ar fi pustiită de vreun cataclism, parcă și văd alea trei trompe [...] adulmecând prin aer [...] după niscai «afaceri» posibile.”[49]

Portretul savuros al „suavei” Julieta, una dintre colegele de baracă, demonstrează un simț rafinat al observației, ironia și umorul subtil: „Închipuiți-vă un trup de băiețoi, lung, subțire și plat, cocoțat pe niște stâlpi în stare să susțină o catedrală, cu turnuri cu tot[...] De aproape pare tinerică, dar ce contează, fenomenele sunt în afara timpului. Exagerez?[...]Dar ea însăși nu-i un soi de exagerare, rodul unei imaginații dezlănțuite?”[50]

Pentru Philippe Lejeune, începutul şi sfârşitul unui jurnal nu sunt simple convenţii editoriale, ci ritualuri care marchează intrarea autorului în actul scrierii și ieșirea din acesta, transformând experiența individuală într-o formă de existență narativă[51].

Începutul acestei scrieri se distinge de începutul altor jurnale, întrucât intriga lipsește. Plecarea din gara Oradea nu este evocată, întrucât nu a fost niciodată scrisă. Protagonista nu consemnează niciun detaliu despre circumstanțele sosirii în lagăr. Totuși, pe baza altor mărturii similare, ne putem imagina cum s-au petrecut lucrurile. La coborârea din trenuri avea loc o primă selecție între cei trimiși direct la moarte și cei condamnați la muncă silnică. Amânarea acordată nu reprezenta altceva decât o lungă agonie, după câteva luni petrecute în coloniile de muncă deportații ajungând să semene cu niște cadavre vii. Pentru prizonieri, speranța de viață era de trei până la patru luni, așadar a rămâne martor și a supraviețui echivala cu un adevărat miracol. Oboseala, malnutriția, bătăile și umilințele constante au dus treptat la distrugerea sănătății morale și fizice a deportaților.

Ana Novac, asemenea lui Elie Wiesel, a reușit să supraviețuiască în lagărele naziste aproape unsprezece luni. Aceasta își începe jurnalul direct în interiorul lagărului, folosind prezentul etern, fără a oferi detalii despre identitate, familie sau trecut, așa cum se întâmplă, în mod obișnuit, în alte jurnale. Puține informații despre acestea apar în cateva scurte pasaje cu caracter memorialistic, însă cele mai multe provin din paratext. Intriga jurnalului o descoperim abia la pagina 147:

Această absență nu e întâmplătoare. Lipsa amintirilor din momentul deportării poate fi înțeleasă, în sensul dat de Aleida Assmann, ca o formă de amnezie protectoare, în care trauma este temporar blocată, urmând să fie reactivată și resemnificată prin actul scrierii: „Prin traumă înţeleg o amintire blocată, care nu e integrată în conştiinţă, ci închisă într-o «criptă» inaccesibilă, provocând o agitaţie care persistă pe termen lung sub forma de simptome difuze.”[53]

Fragmentul inițial stă sub semnul unei fracturi identitare care semnalează distanța dintre eul care a trăit experiența și eul care rememorează. „Ce naiba oi fi notat pe pagina-asta? Habar n-am...Cea care descifrează paginile astea străvechi e-o străină. Nu fac altceva decât să recopiez.”[54] Interogația retorică trădează dificultatea de a reface autentic experiența trăită, dar și o posibilă neîncredere în fidelitatea propriei memorii. Următorul pasaj semnalează că autoarea, naratoarea și protagonista coincid biografic, dar nu și textual și temporal. Ana Novac reia manuscrisul pentru a-l rescrie, iar vocea naratoarei comentează retrospectiv experiențele personajului principal − adolecenta care a îndurat suferințele din lagăr − filtrându-le prin propria conștiință a martorului supraviețuitor. Ultima frază, cu rol metatextual, îl atenționează pe lector că va încerca să salveze urmele trecutului printr-un act de reconstituire. Recopierea poate însemna, în termenii Aleidei Assmann o formă de reactivare a memoriei, prin care experiențele individuale sunt prelucrate, ordonate și transferate din memoria comunicativă limitată, în memoria culturală, capabilă să le confere durabilitate.

Jurnalul se încheie tot în lagăr. Bolnavă de pleurezie și de febră tifoidă, protagonista cade la pat și ajunge într-un spital de langă Wiessau, cu paltonul ticsit de manuscrise. Păstrează totuși speranța de a primi hartie pentru a-și recopia notițele: „De nu, «omenirea» (legatarul meu universal) o va face-n locul meu.”[55] Această replică exprimă încrederea în supraviețuirea memoriei prin cuvânt și transferul mărturiei către posteritate, jurnalul devenind o moștenire morală pentru ceilalți. dacă subiectul dispare, rămâne textul. Finalul are o tonalitate optimistă, dominată de dorința de a supraviețui: „Febra! Nu-i oare-un semn de viață, dovada că mă bat, mă-ndărătnicesc?”[56]

Jurnalul Anei Novac exprimă tensiunile inerente procesului de rescriere a unei experiențe traumatice, proces realizat în exil și marcat de distanța temporală și identitară față de evenimente. Hibriditatea textului – oscilând între jurnal și construcție literară – ridică întrebări despre limitele autenticității și despre rolul pe care ficțiunea îl poate avea în transmiterea mărturiei. Intervențiile biografice intenționate, practică frecventă în rândul supraviețuitorilor, arată fragilitatea memoriei și încercarea de a reconstrui sinele pierdut în urma traumei. Prin această scriere, Novac convoacă cititorul ca martor indirect, dar îl confruntă simultan cu problemele reprezentării experienței lagărului.

THE REPRESENTATION OF TORTURE AND RESISTANCE IN ANA NOVAC'S DIARY: BETWEEN MEMORY AND TESTIMONY

Carmen-Ancuța Morari
PhD Student, „Babeș-Bolyai" University of Cluj-Napoca

Abstract: This proposal examines how Ana Novac's journal works both as a way for the author to cope with her own traumatic experience and as a form of testimony that contributes to collective memory. The journal records the many forms of terror present in the Nazi camps—violent language, physical aggression, the shaving of hair, tattooing, beatings, torture, and constant exposure to death. At the same time, it shows how prisoners resisted by trying to preserve their identity through daily labor, solidarity with their companions, improvised fashion, surrogate family bonds, and small subversive actions, including spreading rumors of liberation. By combining these two dimensions, Novac's writing demonstrates how individual memory becomes part of a larger effort to remember and communicate camp experience. In this way, the journal not only documents survival and suffering but also takes part in shaping how these events enter cultural and historical memory.

Keywords: Ana Novac; Holocaust testimony; memory; narrative resistance; camp violence

Încă din prefața propriului jurnal, Ana Novac face o mărturisire despre motivația scrierii sale care intră în contradicție cu numeroase pasaje ulterioare. Aceasta neagă intenția programatică de a scrie cu o misiune morală, pentru posteritate: „Mi-ar plăcea să pot spune că mi-am impus corvoada asta pentru a completa memoria omenirii cu detalii [...] Ar fi nobil, dar fals."[1] Prin această afirmație, Ana Novac deplasează accentul de la dimensiunea colectivă a scrierii spre funcția sa de rezistență identitară, mărturisind că a supraviețuit prin libertatea cuvântului. Ea explică motivele care o împing să scrie: „să scap de obsesia potolului, [...]să-mi împiedic înecul în gloată [...]să am un teritoriu, o existență «privată»; să nu-i cânt în strună destinului meu."[2] Jurnalul devine astfel un refugiu interior, un spațiu de afirmare a sinelui.

Citind jurnalul, lectorul descoperă însă ambele funcții ale scrisului, cea personală, de autoconservare, dar și cea testimonială. Jurnalul este o scriitură subversivă care demască realitatea oficială, așa cum subliniază Felicity A. Nussbaum: „Discursul marginalizat și neautorizat al jurnalului are puterea de a perturba profund versiunile autorizate ale experienței și, poate, chiar de a dezvălui ceea ce s-ar putea numi caracterul aleatoriu și arbitrar al construcțiilor autorizate și publice ale realității."[3] În jurnalul Anei Novac, vocea unei tinere evreice deportate din Transilvania contrazice discursul oficial despre memoria colectivă și despre condiția umană.

Motivată să scrie și să înregistreze evenimentele din lagăre, scenă cu scenă, Ana rezistă să se predea foametei, muncii istovitoare, violenței și suferinței, așa cum subliniază . Myrna Goldenberg: „Jurnalul este mai mult decât un artefact al vieții în lagăre. Este un artefact al rezistenței."[4]

Actul de a nota este un gest vital, o formă prin care ființa sa trăiește indiferent de ceea ce i se întâmplă: „Aici nu există decât un singur teritoriu care mă privește: caietul meu."[5] Protagonista își poartă jurnalul asupra ei, inclusiv la cariera de piatră, ascunzându-l cu grijă și protejându-l ca pe o extensie a propriei sale ființe. Îl caută neliniștită atunci când îl rătăcește, se teme că l-a pierdut sau că ar putea fi confiscat în timpul transporturilor, semn că scrisul îi conferă sens în lumea absurdă în care se regăsea. Mărturisirea „Trăiesc! Scriu...[...] aleg cuvintele, «formulez»"[6] evidențiază această fuziune dintre viață și scris. Instrumentul de scris, un simplu creion găsit în nisip, devine o armă de luptă: „Fleacul ala ros, adunat de prin noroaie, îmi redă minut cu minut, pe ascuns, ceea ce o lume-ntreagă de smintiți caută să-mi smulgă."[7] Ideea de luptă simbolică împotriva autorităților naziste este reluată într-un alt pasaj: „mai presus de frați [...] există un comandou clandestin − o armată de slove pe care eu o conduc pe tăcute."[8]

Atunci când trupul îi este agresat, eul diaristic se refugiază tot în universul scriptural: „Aici nimeni nu mă rănește, nu m-atinge pe mine, ci doar pielea mea: să devin tot mai mult o piele, pe zi ce trece!"[9] Scrisul oferă un dublu strat de protecție, este o a doua piele care apără ființa de la dezumanizarea completă: „eu am două piei [...] cea de-a doua − notițele mele − e poate ceea ce împiedică tot restul să se năruie."[10] Într-o lume în care numerele înlocuiesc numele, jurnalul asigură supraviețuirea eului autentic: „Numărul ne servește de travestiu. O întâlnire de măști. Făptura omenească pitită îndărăt ascunde cât poate ceea ce odinioară își etala cu voluptate: sufletul. Așa se călește platoșa, dură îndurătoare."[11] În același sens, pasajul „Barem să mai dau jos din povara asta de gânduri zdrobitoare. Să mă dezbar de ele"[12] relevă rolul terapeutic al scrisului, care devine și un mijloc de eliberare a traumei suferite.

Funcția testimonială devine explicită pe parcursul jurnalului, naratoarea reflectând asupra efortului fizic al scrisului și conștiința unei datorii morale. Actul scrierii este perceput, uneori, ca o muncă istovitoare, autoarea recunoscând că a transcris unele pagini de patru ori: „Fiece rând duhnește-a sudoare, altminteri nu se putea![...]E o luptă continuă între oboseala mea și cumplitul «trebuie»."[13] Aceasta mărturisește că lucrează „pe rupte la ce-mi mai rămâne din jurnalul ținut la Auschwitz; lucru plicticos, dar urgent." [14] Obligația morală este certificată în pasajul în care plânge pierderea mamei adoptive care i-a transportat manuscrisele în tren: „E din ce-n ce mai mult un soi de datorie pe care sculptorița mi-ar fi lăsat-o luându-și tălpășița."[15] Deși uneori se simte „«înhămată» la el ca la un car infernal"[16], nu abandonează această muncă sisifică, continuând să noteze chiar și în timpul mutării de la un lagăr la altul: „trebuie să mă grăbesc, noul material se-adună primejdios de rapid."[17]

Treptat vocea diaristică se transformă în vocea martorului. Protagonista declară: „E limpede că nu pentru mine scriu [...]Fie ca notițele astea să figureze printre mărturii în ziua răfuielilor! Dar, și de-aș rămâne unica mea cititoare, tot aș scrie! Mi-aș da tot atâta osteneală să găsesc cuvântul cel mai

potrivit, cel mai tare."[18] După cum subliniază Barbara Foley, dacă intimitatea și confidențialitatea sunt caracteristice jurnalului obișnuit, „în jurnalul Holocaustului, experiența personală tânjește să fie recunoscută ca un registru al destinului unui întreg «popor»"[19]

Jurnalul devine și un mijloc de salvare a memoriei celorlalți, o încercare de a împiedica uitarea. Printre consemnări, este amintită figura lui Edith Berkovitz, o fată responsabilă și corectă, lucru rar întâlnit printre prizonieri: „Iată de ce mi-ar plăcea ca numele ei să fie smuls uitării."[20] Totodată, aceasta își asumă condiția de martor atunci când recunoaște importanța scrierii sale pentru generațiile viitoare: „Dacă ni s-ar întâmpla ceva rău, caietului meu ori mie, expresia asta s-ar pierde, și ar fi păcat. Putea fi de folos vreunui istoric."[21]

Totodată, naratoarea este conștientă de limitele mărturiei sale. Ea afirmă că faptele sunt cele care contează cu adevărat − „Aici nu există decât un stăpân, faptul. Eu nu-s decât un scrib în slujba lui"[22] −dar recunoaște și imposibilitatea de a reda integral experiențele din lagăr: „Admit că sunt un martor părtinitor; dar cum aș putea supraviețui altminteri aventurii ăsteia fără să-mi pierd mințile într-însa? [...]Poi cum aș putea pretinde oare să dau o imagine exhaustivă despre lagăr? (asta ori să golești marea cu polonicul, e totuna)."[23] Astfel, jurnalul nu oferă o imagine completă a infernului concentraționar, ci urmele protagonistei care își caută vocea printre ruinele limbajului, încercând să dea sens unei lumi indescriptibile.

Dimensiunea torturii și a supraviețuirii în lagărele naziste

Lagărele de concentrare reprezintă spațiile în care puterea absolută a autorităților se confruntă cu neputința totală a victimelor. Așa cum observă Hannah Arendt, prin construirea acestor locuri, un regim totalitar nu urmărea doar supunerea, ci și anihilarea completă a ființei umane, prin distrugerea statutului său juridic, social și etic[24]. Captivitatea în lagărele de concentrare constituie, potrivit autoarei studiului „Originile totalitarismului", teroarea „fără precedent" [25]. Dominația totală în lagăre nu a fost, însă, total realizată, o parte dintre victime devenind dovada rezistenței spiritului uman în fața mecanismului opresiv care urmărea disoluția completă.

Odată ajunși în lagărele naziste, deținuții erau supuși unui sistem de tortură complex și permanent, manifestat sub multiple forme: verbale, psihologice și fizice. Cei persecutați ajung să pară un „alai de mumii sculate din mormânt"[26] „strigoaice"[27] sau „marmote"[28], relatează naratoarea.

Diarista scrie în principal despre captivitatea în două lagăre, Auschwits și Plaszów, două veritabile anticamere ale iadului. Pentru protagonistă, aceste spații erau „infernul dogoritor"[29]. În acest sens, Anette Wieviorka observă că printre cele mai frecvente referințe intertextuale asociate imaginarului concentraționar se numără cea a infernului dantesc.[30] .

Lagărul Plaszów, situat într-un cartier al Cracoviei, reprezintă astăzi un celebru loc al memoriei colective, păstrat în conștiința culturală, mai ales datorită peliculei „Lista lui Schindler". În timpul funcționării sale, evreii deportați au lucrat atât în cariera de piatră, cât și în fabricile din zonă, cea mai cunoscută dintre acestea fiind, fără îndoială, fabrica de email a lui Oskar Schindler.

Protagonista jurnalului ajunge în acest lagăr după o scurtă perioadă petrecută la Auschwits. Locul este denumit ironic Olimp[31], o denumire care contrastează puternic cu realitatea brutală a spațiului concentrațional dominat de stâlpi electrici și barăci împrejmuite de sârmă ghimpată. Convoiul de prizonieri este întâmpinat, încă de la intrarea pe poarta de fier, cu inscripția „Arbeit macht frei" („Munca eliberează"), o formulă propagandistică menită să manipuleze psihologic prizonierii. În această lume sterilă și dezolantă în care este captivă, protagonistei i se pare, pentru un moment, că zărește un deal, care se dovedește însă a fi o movilă obișnuită. Tânăra are revelația lipsei vegetației și a culorilor în acel univers monocrom și absurd: „Deodată pricep ce lipsă anume târăsc după mine atât de dureros: lipsa verdelui [...] Nu cumva și pe copaci îi «extermină» ăștia?"[32]

Amplasat ironic tocmai pe locul unui fost cimitir evreiesc, unde deținuții descoperă adesea rămășițe umane, acest lagăr oferă condiții mai suportabile, după cum menționează eroina: barăcile sunt mai puțin înfricoșătoare, iar în spațiul de dormit sunt doar trei persoane pe un pat, detaliu care atrage atenția asupra unei forme iluzorii de normalitate.

Protagonista primește o matricolă cu numărul 1555 și reacționează ironic, percepând acest act birocratic ca pe o formă de recunoaștere a propriei existențe. Aceasta consemnează că acum duce „o viață de prizonier onestă și legală", adăugând: „Avem deci din nou un nume, o dată de naștere, o profesie. Mă uit la mine cu un respect reînnoit. Să fiu înregistrată, să figurez undeva, simțul legalității."[33] Deposedată de propria identitate odată cu sosirea în primul lagăr, protagonista își exprimă, în acest pasaj, nevoia profundă de legitimare în acest univers care i-a răpit libertatea și demnitatea.

Condițiile alimentare degradante devin și ele o formă de tortură. Comparând hrana din lagărul anterior, care conținea urme de nisip, cu „meniurile" de la Plaszów, personajul observă o degradare și mai accentuată a acestora, descoperind „pietre gogâlțâind prin lăturile astea chioare precum cartofii într-o tocană."[34] Lipsa hranei devine o tragedie colectivă, în care instinctul de supraviețuire domină orice alt sentiment :„vestea că azi nu va fi pâine (o eroare de calcul la bucătărie) ne-a zguduit mai rău decât drama masacrării unei întregi familii poloneze."[35]

Pe 6 august, între cei 7.500 de prizonieri trimiși de la Plaszów la Auschwitz, se afla și protagonista[36]. În prezent, acest lagăr a devenit unul dintre locurile memoriei cele mai studiate ale secolului trecut . Considerat cel mai letal lagăr de concentrare nazist, locul unde trupele SS au ucis aproximativ un milion de evrei, acest tărâm al suferinței din sudul Poloniei, pe atunci teritoriu anexat Germaniei, ocupă în prezent un loc central în memoria colectivă. Ca emblemă globală a răului, Auschwitz nu era un singur lagăr, era un conglomerat vast și întins de sublagăre și sectoare, separate de granițe vizibile și invizibile. Condițiile prizonierilor variau semnificativ, în funcție de locul în care erau deținuți, tratamentul, rutina zilnică și munca forțată. Singura evadare posibilă era moartea, prin coșul crematoriului.

În „cripta asta uriașă"[37], pielea protagonistei a fost însemnată cu numărul A-17587. Tatuarea unui număr pe brațul prizonierilor a fost una dintre formele cele mai cinice ale sistemului concentrațional nazist. Odată cu creșterea masivă a numărului de victime, registrele scrise au fost înlocuite cu această metodă pentru identificarea prizonierilor. Dacă matricola primită la Plaszów îi oferea protagonistei o oarecare formă de legitimare, tatuarea numărului pe piele echivalează cu dispariția totală a identității, fiind redusă la un număr. Episodul este interpretat de naratoare cu luciditate, fiind descris pe un ton neutru, fără multe detalii, aparent detașat: „Tatuaj. Mi s-au imprimat niște cifre mărunte pe dosul brațului stâng [...] după zvonuri, un tatuaj e ca o asigurare pe viață de-o lună-două."[38]

Condițiile de detenție se dovedesc mult mai aspre decât cele din lagărul Plaszów. În barăci, zece deținute împart același spațiu de dormit, somnul pe spate fiind imposibil, din pricina înghesuielii și a aerului irespirabil. Eroina este separată de fostele sale camarade, fiind repartizată în lagărul B, unde descoperă o lume complet diferită.

O baracă uriașă este destinată nevoilor fiziologice[39] ale prizonierilor, purtând denumirea ironică de „Latrina!", un spațiu pe care naratoarea îl descrie, apelând la umor: „I se zice «clubul», și pe drept cuvânt, e-un centru internațional, cel mai năstrușnic cu putință."[40] Dincolo de rolul primar pe care îl îndeplinea, această baracă era și un loc de întâlnire pentru oamenii de diferite naționalități, un microcosmos al umanității care se lupta să supraviețuiască.

Deși protagonista nu descrie transportul din gara Oradea spre lagărele naziste, ea notează drumul dintre două lagăre importante, accentuând condițiile inumane și continuarea procesului de dezumanizare.

Călătoria desfășurată pe parcursul mai multor zile, cu destinația Cracovia, se desfășoară în condiții extreme, marcate de foame, frig și întuneric. Protagonista se simte anulată ca om: „ne deprindem să fim. Pe urmă vine frigul, foamea și scândurile alea groaznice, murdare! În doar jumătate de ceas, aducem cu niște mâțe negre."[41] Epuizarea fizică și psihică este totală: „Îmi lipsea până și puterea de a-mi mai închipui că-s moartă de mult."[42] În timp ce deținuții se aranjează în coloană, naratoarea surprinde, cu ironie amară, cum dintr-unul dintre vagoane coboară niște porci grași „îngrijiți, curați, rozalii"[43], contrast menit să ilustreze valorile inversate și absurdul din universul concentraționar: lumea animală este privilegiată, în timp ce ființa umană este umilită și lipsită de demnitate.

Depersonalizarea evreilor continuă imediat după sosirea în lagăr, când, în urma primei selecții, aceștia sunt obligați să se dezbrace în public. Pentru o parte dintre victime, acest moment se dovedește traumatizant, marcând începutul pierderii individualității. Trupul devine neputincios și supus, iar despuierea publică capătă astfel o funcție ritualică, semnificând trecerea de la statutul de persoană la cel de obiect, expus privirii tuturor. Femeile, printre care se află și protagonista, sunt botezate batjocoritor „nudistele", etichetă care subliniază anularea simbolică a corpului feminin. Pe „cimentul rece ca gheața", frigul cumplit devine o altă formă de tortură, iar imaginea trupurilor lipite unele de altele devine un simbol al uniformizării femeilor captive: „Strânse ciorchine ca un singur trup, ca un soi de monstru sforăind , gemând și tușind din mii de gâtlejuri. Nemții ne despart, din când în când, cu lovituri de crăvașă. Dar imediat ne bulucim la loc, căci ne temem de frig mai rău decât de lovituri."[44]

Un alt atac direct asupra identității corporale, dar și al feminității este rasul podoabei capilare, un gest justificat de prevenirea infestării cu păduchi. În realitate, și această acțiune are o funcție simbolică, depersonalizarea și omogenizarea. Corpul feminin evreiesc este transformat într-un corp neatrăgător, protagonista descriind tabloul grotesc din fața ei: „gloata scăfârliilor fără păr, albeața lor respingătoare: ai fi zis că-s straturi de varză."[45] Pentru protagonistă, tunsul devine o experiență a rupturii de sine: „Mi se pare că orice chin, orice pierdere ar fi blânde față de asta! De parcă mașina de tuns m-ar fi tăiat de mine însămi."[46] Lipsite de trăsăturile individuale care le confereau identitate, femeile evreice devin ființe anonime, dizolvate într-o masă indistinctă de trupuri, unde diferențele sunt complet suprimate.

Câteva luni mai târziu, când protagonista găsește o oglindă și se privește, își dă seama că nu se mai recunoaște. Pierderea treptată a feminității și a atractivității sunt descrise cu o ironie amară în momentul în care îmbracă o haină găsită într-un depozit: „în rochia-cămeșoi fâlfâind în mijlocul scândurii mele, cu cele două bețe de chibrit ieșind de sub poale, cu țeasta pleșuvă...irezistibilă."[47] O reacție similară are atunci când se privește într-un geam „e cu putință ca gâtul să se mai dește la vârsta mea? În schimb, capu-mi pare cârpit din petece. Cum mi-a putut scăpa una ca asta? Mă sfătuiesc singură să evit geamurile."[48]

Dezumanizarea evreilor în lagăre era susținută mai ales prin injurii și pedepse aspre. Potrivit Ruxandrei Cesereanu, acest imaginar violent des-ființează omul. Atacurile evreilor s-ar înscrie în ceea ce exegeta numește „registrul subuman", care presupune „declasarea celui incriminat prin raportarea sa la un statut diferit de cel omenesc.[...] structura de rebut şi paria a celor vizaţi", sau un „atac corporal în care subiectul acuzat este desconsiderat fizic şi umilit."[49]

Agresiunea verbală asupra evreilor prizonieri constituie o altă formă de manifestare a antisemitismului din lagărele naziste. În cazul grupului de femei din care face parte și protagonista, abuzul verbal devine o armă de control, folosită de gardieni, nu doar pentru a insufla frică, ci și pentru a provoca un dezechilibru emoțional. Exemplele notate de diaristă ilustrează foarte clar violența lingvistică a paznicilor: „O să crăpați"[50], „Tâmpitelor,[...] marș la coteț"[51], „ptiu, parazitelor"[52], „porcilor, mișcați-vă mai iute."[53] Aceste amenințări și expresii reduc femeile la o condiție animalică, negându-le umanitatea. Așa cum explică și Julia Kristeva în studiul „Pouvoirs de l'horreur", limbajul abject funcționează ca un mecanism de excludere, prin care victima este transformată într-un corp respins, impur: „Așadar, nu lipsa de curățenie sau de sănătate provoacă abjecția, ci ceea ce tulbură identitatea, sistemul, ordinea. Ceea ce nu respectă granițele, pozițiile, regulile."[54] Or, în imaginarul antisemit, evreul este elementul tulburător care amenință coerența sistemului.

Astfel de cuvinte denigratoare au fost însoțite adesea de agresivitate fizică, ale cărei urme se imprimau nu doar pe trup, ci și în structura psihologică a ființei. În această lume a „dominației totale", după cum o descrie Arendt, apogeul autorității îl reprezentau crima, adesea pentru infracțiuni imaginare sau mai puțin importante, tortura și bătaia. Aceste forme evidențiază neputința victimelor, dar și a privitorilor, de cele mai multe ori crimele și bătăile fiind făcute publice, sub formă de spectacol.

De departe de a fi acte monstruoase, loviturile cu biciul, cu bâta sau cu crăvașa sunt gesturi reflexe pentru gardieni, transformate într-o rutină firească. Această „banalitate a răului", în termenii Hannei Arendt, arată cum în lagăr, nu se dezumanizează doar prizonierii, ci și agresorii, pentru care bătaia sau tortura, nu sunt excepții, ci simple acte administrative din fișa postului.

În lagărul de la Plassów, comandantul instituie teroarea ca spectacol, transformând execuțiile în ritualuri publice, care îi intimidează atât pe cei obligați să asiste în centrul pieței, cât și pe noii sosiți, printre care se află și protagonista, care privesc de la fereastra barăcii:„Spânzurătoarea ține de culoarea locală: e o tradiție la Plassów. O «metodă» preconizată de comandantul lagărului[...] Pe cei mai mulți, o vorbă necugetată, o strâmbătură, sau chiar simpla bănuială că n-ar prea avea la inimă Reich-ul i-a adus dinaintea stâlpului[...] amărâții ăștia au «onoarea» de-a se zvârcoli horcăind într-un cadru solemn, sub ochii a mii de spectatori."[55]

Relatările celorlalți despre cruzimea excesivă a comandantului completează acest tablou grotesc al puterii sadice: „Se zice că estetismul comandantului merge până într-acolo încât, într-o zi,

i-a zburat creierii unei fete pentru că avea șireturile prost înnodate."[56] Chiar dacă nu îi rostește numele, portretul corespunde în mod evident comandantului lagărului din 1944, Amon Göth, recunoscut pentru violența sadică expusă public.

Un alt pretext minor declanșează o șocantă scenă de execuție: uciderea unei fete care adormise și nu ajunsese la apelul din zori. După ce este lovită cu cravașa, victima trebuie să se dezbrace și să aștepte, în văzul tuturor, organizarea ritualului. Călăul, un neamț asasin pe nume Otto, un „Goliath cu părul gras și tuns cazon,"[57] se pregătește cu o meticulozitate tulburătoare: „Își scoate haina de piele, o așterne pe jos după ce-a împăturit-o cu grijă. Modul asta îngrijit și măsurat de a-și pregăti omorul mă dă peste cap mai rău decât tot ce urmează."[58] După execuție, însemnările naratoarei concentrează absurdul universului concentrațional, unde pierderea unei vieți este nesemnificativă: „Cea care a-ncetat să mai fie un număr e luată de-acolo. Apelul continuă."[59]

Prezentarea la apel nu este doar o formă de control colectiv, ci mai ales un exercițiu al umilinței. Prizonierii trebuiau să fie prezenți la numărătoare, indiferent de oră sau de condițiile meteorologice, iar incertitudinea legată de ceea ce urma să se întâmple genera o frică permanentă: „fiecare își făcea testamentul înainte de fiecare apel [...]nota pe-un petec de hârtie cui își lăsa moștenire perna, pătura, hainele de vară ori de iarnă, în caz că..."[60]

Lipsiți de orice obiect personal – ceasuri, calendare – deținuții trăiau într-un prezent continuu, măsurat nu de ore, ci de semnalele sonore ale lagărului: gonguri, sirene, fluiere. Acestea impuneau ritmul existenței și oricine pierdea ritmul își putea pierde viața.

Uneori, naratoarea nu descrie direct evenimentele, ci redă ceea ce protagonista aude de la o altă prizonieră, devenind astfel un martor indirect. Prin vocea lui Frau Ellis, cititorul află cum victimele erau obligate să participe la propriul ritual al morții:

„Cei selectați pentru «incursiune » trebuiau întâi să-și sape singuri groapa, apoi, când se despuiaseră și-și puseseră jos tot ce-aveau pe ei [...], trebuiau să-ngenuncheze pe marginea gropii și să-și aștepte gloanțele-n spate[...] țipete suiau din gropi ceasuri în șir după execuție[...] Nici vorbă se se îngroape trupurile, se-arunca doar niște nisip peste ele, de nu ne mai dădeam seama dacă pășim peste oseminte mai vechi sau mai noi."[61]

La Auschwitz, protagonista va trăi una dintre cele mai violente experiențe de tortură. La sfatul unor camarade, adolescenta îndrăznește să se așeze la coada altei barăci pentru a primi o porție suplimentară de hrană. Acțiunea este descoperită, iar tânăra este pedepsită prin lovituri repetate. În mod neașteptat, protagonista se revoltă, lovind gardianca: „Un calm divin m-a cuprins. De parcă gestul ală, senzația aia le-așteptasem de când m-am născut."[62] Gestul de a riposta, echivalează, chiar dacă pentru scurt timp, cu restabilirea demnității. „Îndrăzneala" îi aduce o pedeapsă exemplară, care reconstituie ierarhia dintre stăpân și prizonier:„Am rămas vreme de două ceasuri îngenuncheată-n mijlocul Appelplatz-ului, cu câte-o cărămidă-n mâinile ridicate. De câte ori mi se-ndoia cotul, iapa aia, care nu mă slabea din ochi, îmi îndrepta la loc brațele, aplecându-se uneori să-mi iscodească figura [...] Mi-aduc încă aminte că, vrând să-mi ia cărămizile din mâini, au trebuit să tragă zdravăn de ele, degetele-mi erau lipite."[63]

Munca silnică, prezentă ca un fir roșu în mărturiile despre captivitatea în lagăr, dobândește, în acest jurnal, o dublă semnificație: pe de-o parte este o formă de teroare, iar pe de altă parte, paradoxal, de supraviețuire.

De-a lungul perindării prin lagăre, protagonista este nevoită să execute cele mai diverse munci, indiferent de anotimp, arșiță sau furtună. Ea devine, pe rând, zidar, „terasieră", muncitoare într-o carieră de piatră, într-o fabrica de cărămidă, într-un depozit de rufe, la un atelier de faianță sau este trimisă la cules de cartofi.

Printre cele mai dificile munci se numără cea de la cariera de piatră. Efortul fizic este uriaș, mai potrivit pentru un bărbat decât pentru o adolescentă, iar supravegherea este strictă și neîntreruptă: „Uneori târâiam adevărate blocuri, pe care abia izbuteam să le ridicăm [..] Câte un kapo la douăzeci de deținute; n-aveam nicio clipă de răgaz, chiar atunci când balaurul nostru se uita aiurea [...] Îndărătul lor ședeau proțăpiți niște SS-iști."[64]

Există însă și locuri unde condițiile de muncă nu sunt așa de aspre. Protagonista notează cu surprindere un transport cu trenul care pare să contrazică brutalitatea cunoscută până atunci: prizonierii primesc ceai și pături, geamurile nu au gratii, iar în vagoane există banchete. Ajunse la atelierul de faianță unde urmează să muncească, femeile constată o atmosferă nemaîntâlnită: paznicul, mirat de capetele lor rase, le cere să și le acopere cu prosoape, iar protagonista notează cu ironie: „suntem tot în Reich, dar într-un Reich de nerecunoscut, curtenitor, amabil, o țâră cam romanțios."[65] Condițiile par mai decente, nu există garduri cu sârmă ghimpată ca în celelalte lagăre, fiecare deținută are propriul culcuș, pătură, pernă, lingură și farfurie, iar hrana este neobișnuit de consistentă: „potolul e-o adevărată supă de carne, cea mai delicioasă, dar și cea mai limpede care s-a gustat vreodată în lagăr."[66]

Cinci dintre deținute, printre care și protagonista, sunt trimise la cules de cartofi, iar drumul până acolo, făcut cu șareta, în afara lagărului, provoacă bucurie și sentimentul libertății. La finalul zilei, femeile sunt răsplătite cu un adevărat ospăț, fiind servite cu polonicul mâncăruri de care nu avuseseră parte în lagăre. Acest episod marchează o scurtă ieșire din infern, în care suferința pare suspendată, dar care, prin contrast, evidențiază și mai mult absurdul universului totalitar.

În fața agresiunilor verbale și fizice, o formă de apărare posibilă era tăcerea. În lagărele de concentrare sau de muncă forțată, sub amenințarea constantă a morții care plana asupra fiecărui prizonier, tăcerea a devenit e o strategie instinctuală de supraviețuire: „Sunt clipe în care a-ți da în vileag gândul[...] e ceva complet deplasat, aproape ridicol. De-aia trăim cu toatele închise-n carapace."[67]

În ciuda tăcerii, a suferinței și a neputinței pe care adesea o arată, prizonierii au găsit moduri ingenioase de a-și reconfigura viața cotidiană, încercând să își recupereze, măcar parțial, o formă de autonomie în interiorul spațiului totalitar. Deși regulile lagărelor nu puteau fi total încălcate, a existat întotdeauna o formă de indisciplină subversivă. Evreii și-au construit simbolic locuri pentru a se întâlni, a comunica sau a face troc, eliberându-se pentru scurt timp de constrângerile sistemului. Depozitul de haine vechi, unde lucrează protagonista, devine un punct de întâlnire între prizonieri: „Depozitul e-un loc de trecere [...]Ține loc de crâșmă, de poștă, de cazinou, acolo se face schimb de vești, de bârfe, de coșmare."[68]„Clubul" nu este doar un loc destinat nevoilor fiziologice, ci, mai ales, al schimbului de informații secrete între deportații evrei, departe de gardienii intruzivi. În acest spațiu pestilențial, protagonista primește un sfat care o va salva de la moarte: să găsească mijloacele necesare pentru a se transfera din lagărul de triere în care se aflau, la un lagăr de muncă.

În ciuda suferinței din jur, în baraca franțuzoaicelor de la Auschwitz, femeile organizează activități menite să readucă veselia pe chipurile prizonierelor, notează diarista: „e-un adevărat centru anti-deprimare. Mereu pe cale de-a «organiza» ceva: întâlniri, dezbateri, câte-un concert, câte-un recital etc."[69] Optimismul lor transcende granițele acestei lumi, unele ajungând să încerce contactarea morților pentru a afla data eliberării lor. Deși pare că le admiră vitalitatea, protagonista păstrează distanța, naratoarea consemnând grav: „Merg rareori la ele, căci «civilizația» nu-mi spune nimic în zilele în care aerul miroase-a fum, a carne la grătar."[70]

Ajutorul reciproc și solidaritatea au reprezentat factori cheie care au contribuit la supraviețuirea în lagăre. Naratoarea înregistrează existența unor relații tensionate între prizoniere, unele soldate chiar și cu bătăi în interiorul barăcii[71], însă nu insistă asupra acestor episoare. În schimb, accentul confesiunii ei cade pe figurile prietenoase și pe legăturile de solidaritate care se formează acolo.

O parte din curajul adolescentei provine din relațiile cu celelalte femei. Autoarea prefeței jurnalului tradus în limba engleză, Myrna Goldenberg, consideră că în interiorul lagărului, femeile formează „familii surogat" sau „familii substitutive" menite să umple golul afectiv provocat de separarea de familie și de prieteni. În lagărul de la Plassów, Zimra și Sofia sunt percepute drept „surori de lagăr"[72], iar sculptorița este desemnată „mama din lagăr."[73]

O altă prizonieră, denumită în jurnal „sculptorița", devine figura maternă a protagonistei, oferindu-i ajutor oricând era nevoie. De pildă, femeia își termină cota de muncă, tocmai când protagonista este pe cale de a ceda din cauza epuizării, și o înlocuiește. În timpul călătoriei de trei zile cu vagonul de vite de la Plaszów la Auschwitz, sculptorița are grijă de ea și îi transportă carnetele cu însemnări în ghetele sale. Pentru a se elibera de chinurile cumplite îndurate în vagonul supraaglomerat, aceasta alege să își curme viața, strangulându-se cu propriile șireturi. Episodul în care naratoarea relatează moartea „mamei din lagăr", tocmai în trenul unde aceasta îi fusese atât de devotată, este de o tristețe ieșită din comun. Scena este consemnată după sosirea la Auschwitz, pe un ton sobru, tuburător: „«Sfatul celor trei» nici vorbă să se mai reunească. Principalul membru a dezertat [...]Vreme de trei zile, mă ocrotea ca pe-un bebeluș[...] când a fost cât pe ce să leșin, și-a croit drum, îmbrâncind trupuri moarte sau vii, izbutind să mă târască până la peretele vagonului, ca să pot respira printre rosturi."[74]

O figură masculină protectivă apare în jurnal odată cu transferul personajului central într-un lagăr de muncă, cu condiții mai bune, acesta fiind numit afectuos „tăticu."[75] Fost negustor de pește, acest gardian se arată mai grijuliu cu tinerele deportate, manifestând o atitudine paternă.

Printre preocupările specifice femeilor deportate, care le-au ajutat să își păstreze speranța și sentimentul propriei identități, s-a numărat și interesul pentru îmbrăcăminte. Potrivit cercetătoarei Margaret-Anne Hutton, capacitatea de a repara și confecționa haine, respectiv de a menține un aspect îngrijit, s-au dovedit a fi strategii semnificative de supraviețuire în lagăre.[76] În acest jurnal, protagonista semnalează importanța prizonierelor croitorese care erau des solicitate pentru modificarea hainelor care intrau în posesia lor. Acestea proveneau, de cele mai multe ori, din loturile de haine confiscate celor nou-sosiți, sau de la prizonierii decedați. Ea notează cu optimism: „ne-a sosit o încărcătură de haine. Sunt de toate, de la furouri pân' la paltoane. După un ceas, suntem de nerecunoscut!"[77] Dacă uniformele impuse și capul ras le făcea pe prizoniere să arate aproape identic, orice piesă vestimentară diferită le permitea să recupereze o urmă de individualitate.

În eseul „The Bricolage of Death", Noah Benninga abordează tema „modei de la Auschwitz", analizând modul în care vestimentația putea deveni un instrument de negociere a supraviețuirii. Aspectul exterior al prizonierilor influența deciziile trupelor SS. În timpul trierilor, o ținută mai îngrijită sporea șansele celor persecutați de a fi selecționați pentru muncă, și nu pentru moarte: „Prizonierii care reușeau să obțină [..] resurse materiale își asigurau supraviețuirea și își creau iluzia unei vieți normale."[78] Protagonista primește o rochie de la una dintre bucătăresele familiei sale, Edith, pe care o reîntâlnește după mulți ani în lagăr. Gestul banal al îmbrăcării este transformat într-un moment de fetișizare a obiectului: „Îmi strâng pe mine rochia de flanelă. Cum să descriu fericirea pielii mele sub dezmierdarea țesăturii pufoase?"[79]

Alteori, însă, amestecul haotic de piese vestimentare le face pe prizoniere să se simtă și mai înstrăinate de cine erau cu adevărat, asemănându-se mai degrabă cu „vreun trib debarcat de pe altă planetă [...] deghizat după moda pământenilor [...]nimic nu le șade ca lumea."[80]

Speranța reprezintă una dintre cele mai puternice forme de rezistență interioară în universul lagărelor de concentrare. Ea este întreținută de încurajările celor apropiați, dar și de zvonurile sau de bârfele care circulau periodic. Acest topos, regăsit în multe scrieri testimoniale, e foarte valoros, întrucât reflectă atmosfera și starea de spirit a celorlalți prizonieri. Chiar dacă unele dintre zvonuri nu coincid cu faptele, ele sunt așteptate permanent și provoacă îngrijorare dacă nu apar: „Vitamina I (vitamina iudaică, așa numim noi veștile de pe front) nu mai sosește."[81] Atunci când însă apar, speranța protagonistei se luptă cu scepticismul: „Se-aud tunurile. Sosesc, sosesc, sosesc! Ce altceva ar putea să-nsemne? Daca-ș putea crede barem o sutime din veștile care ajung zilnic până la baracă drept «ultimele» și «cele mai sigure»!"[82]

Așadar, jurnalul Anei Novac se impune ca o mărturie lucidă și originală a universului concentraționar, în care actul scrisului devine o formă de rezistență, de reconstrucție a sinelui și de transformare a traumei în discurs. Ironia, umorul și luciditatea demască absurdul sistemului, iar rescrierea amintirilor marchează trecerea de la experiența individuală la o memorie colectivă a suferinței.

CARCERAL POETRY OF THE AIUD PRISON – CONCEPTUAL DELIMITATIONS

Adriana Maria Călugăr (Cutean)
PhD Student, „1 December 1918" University of Alba Iulia

Abstract: The study examines theoretical aspects, the defining features of carceral poetry, and the fundamental role played by the poetry created in Aiud Prison. The poems composed within this penitentiary constitute an alternative mode of expressing inner experiences through nonconformism and refusal to comply with the ideological norms imposed by the communist system, being regarded as existential documents of the prisoners' resistance. The particular and nonconformist character of these creations is revealed through emblematic verses written either by established poets or by authors who emerged directly from the concentrationary space. Carceral poetry generated in the Aiud environment forms a body of texts with a distinct identity, developed at the intersection of the restrictive experience of political imprisonment, the processes of resistance through creative expression, and the need to reconfigure subjectivity through language under oppressive conditions. Carceral poetry thus fulfills a dual function: it operates both as testimony and as an act of survival.

Keywords: resistance; carceral poetry; prison; identity; testimony

Poeziile care au fost create în Închisoarea Aiud sunt „expresia directă, sinceră, curată şi categorică a rezistenţei româneşti anticomuniste"[1], născute din suferinţă, umilinţă şi teroare, individualizate în literatura română prin accentele specifice şi prin structura proprie. Sunt expresii directe ale sufletelor claustrate, amprentate de „o undă de amărăciune şi de meditaţie", concepute ca rod al unor „trăiri intense, reale, neimaginate". Aceste creaţii sunt o altă manieră de exprimare a trăirilor prin nonconformism şi nesupunere la normele ideologice impuse de sistemul comunist, considerate documente existenţiale ale rezistenţei deţinuţilor. În prelungirea poveştilor inedite de viaţă, a memoriilor, a jurnalelor din perioada detenţiei care relatează punctual şi faptic realitatea trăită, poezia carcerală „dezvăluie un adevăr estetic ce exorcizează maleficul"[2], iar creatorul acesteia se înfăţişează cititorului „cu sufletul în palme".

Într-o perioadă în care poezia românească a fost trădată şi redusă la lozinci politice care preamăreau sistemul, în spaţiile carcerale comuniste se crea poezie: „Creată în condiţii nefireşti, sub presiunea realităţilor dramatice din închisori, această poezie se constituie într-un important document de viaţă şi de istorie furată, denunţând astfel adevăruri greu de imaginat pentru cei ce «n-au stat cu noi în celule»"[3].

Rolul primordial al poeziei create în Închisoarea Aiud e mărturisit de cei care au trăit experienţa carcerală. Poezia a fost „alături de rugăciune, hrană sufletească, scară către cer, întărire şi izvor de trăire în mijlocul unui regim inuman. Valoarea ei nu este în primul rând literară, ci aceea de mărturisire a suferinţelor şi condiţiilor de detenţie, şi mai ales a modului cum s-au reflectat acestea asupra sufletelor, asupra stării interioare a celor întemniţaţi. Toată această imensă suferinţă ce au îndurat-o a determinat o profundă interiorizare, o puternică legătură cu Dumnezeu. Deţinuţii s-au împuţinat trupeşte, dar s-au îmbogăţit sufleteşte. De aceea, poezia este plină de simţiri curate şi gânduri înalte."[4] În opinia Crinei Palas, poezia carcerală este „un poem al suferinţei", deoarece „suferinţa este izvorul sevei acestui tip de creaţie, dar totodată este şi „un poem al credinţei". Iulia Pop consideră că „Poezia închisorii reflectă, alături de memorialistica propriu-zisă, o rezistenţă spirituală, valorizând, prin restituire, rezistenţa din anii de supliciu."[5]

Paul Goma afirmă: „poezia de închisoare nu trebuie justificată din afară nici măcar de către puşcăriaşii odată liberaţi. Vreau să spun: poezia de puşcărie, scoasă dintre ziduri, din mediul în care a fost produsă, propusă, învăţată (deci folclorizată, deci devenită cu adevărat a fiecăruia), moare, se usucă, nu suportă lumina şi vântul, ca Riga Crypto. Într-un fel aceasta e tragedia poeziei lui Nichifor Crainic şi a lui Radu Gyr: nu suportă libertatea... Poezia de puşcărie n-are ce face cu libertatea, după cum libertatea respinge această poezie, şi a cărei valoare - şi încă ce valoare! - şi rost avea numai acolo... Orală, prin circumstanţe, dar şi prin esenţa ei (destui poeţi şi-au «scris» poeziile în închisoare pe gamelă, pe săpun, rugând pe câte un coleg cu memorie mai bună să le ţină minte... Fără ca prin aceasta să scrie poezie de puşcărie) e născută din şi pentru puşcărie."[6]

Poezia carcerală publicată după ieşirea din închisoare sau după 1989, în funcţie de caz, vine în completarea jurnalelor, a memoriilor şi a mărturiilor din anii petrecuţi în spaţiul concentraţionar şi dezvăluie „un adevăr estetic ce exorcizează maleficul, iar autorul se prezintă lectorului cu sufletul în palme"[7] şi „aşa cum textele memorialistice se ţes în jurul unor elemente - ancoră ce articulează discursurile în funcţie de repere temporale şi spaţiale, poezia închisorilor se construieşte având în centru metafore ce coagulează întregul edificiu liric, veritabile teme obsesii"[8].

Poezia carcerală „nu poate fi simţită şi trăită la cote reale decât de cei ce şi-au însuşit-o ca modalitate spirituală de supravieţuire în universul închisorilor"[9]. Nume ale unor scriitori importanţi ai literaturii române precum Nichifor Crainic sau Radu Gyr au fost interzise în viaţa literară şi culturală a ţării însă în lumea gulagului românesc „se bucurau de o faimă greu de imaginat". Alături de aceştia numeroşi alţi poeţi s-au făcut remarcaţi în spaţiile concentraţionare comuniste din ţara noastră. Cu certitudine au existat numeroşi deţinuţi care au cu început versuri şi poezii în spaţiile de detenţie însă creaţiile lor nu au fost transmise pe cale orală şi colectivă şi într-o astfel de situaţie „s-au eliminat singure în procesul de selecţie a valorilor".

Poezia românească de închisoare are un caracter particular, un caracter nonconformist care permite deţinutului politic să-şi exprime liber sentimentele contradictorii faţă de doctrina comunistă „de a da frâu liber propriilor nelinişti, fără teama cenzurii"[10], având avantajul de a circula şi de a se extinde pe cale orală, fiind „asumată de întreaga colectivitate"[11], ca „bun comun" care a avut rolul definitoriu de a impulsiona rezistenţa deţinuţilor și de a exprima „un crez politic clar, precis, hotărât şi optimist, atât de necesar în detenţie, poeziile create în iadul închisorilor şi lagărelor morţii sunt astăzi dovezi incontestabile că a existat în ţara noastră o dârză rezistenţă împotriva comunismului"[12]. Prof. univ. dr. Aurelian I. Popescu consideră că „Poezia rostită de fapt cu cătuşe la mână de deţinuţii politici din România reprezintă un arhipelag al rezistenţei. Este, în felul ei, un Arhipelag gulag al lirismului, o dovadă a numărului de martori-martiri din România."[13] Zbuciumul se naşte din suferinţă. Se evidenţiază o oglindire perfectă a jertfei intelectualităţii din România subjugată sistemului dictatorial comunist, în literatura concentraţionară publicată după anul 1989. Prin aceasta, se dezvoltă semnificaţii profunde şi se facilitează accesul în „subteranele identitare ale românismului". După 1989, a început recuperarea istoriei recente a rezistenţei în faţa abuzurilor impuse de sistemul comunist.

Deţinuţii memorau versuri din nevoia de a avea activitate intelectuală, singura care putea să le asigure „un mod de existenţă în concordanţă cu structura lor sufletească". Aceste activităţi alese de deţinuţi aveau o explicaţie simplă şi clară, deoarece „între zidurile închisorilor nevoia de cultură era comparabilă cu nevoia de hrană şi de libertate, depăşindu-le însă în condiţiile unei detenţii în care presa şi cartea erau interzise"[14]. Sunt rememorate diversele metode de a transmite poeziile create în spaţiul carceral, pe cale orală, pe talpa bocancului cu un cui sau ac, după ce dădeau cu D.T.T.: „Ţinuţi în frig, în celule întunecoase, înfometaţi şi terorizaţi de temniceri, deţinuţii riscau pedepse grele recepţionând sau transmiţând prin morse o poezie necunoscută încă. Un deţinut venit din altă închisoare era întrebat, printre altele, şi dacă ştie poezii din închisoare."[15] Foarte mulţi dintre cei care au fost încarceraţi nu au fost scriitori, nu au avut nicio legătură cu literatura înainte de a trăi experienţa carcerală. Prin poezie, şi-au găsit puterea de a lupta, de a rezista în temniţă, de a-l întâlni pe Dumnezeu.

În teza de doctorat Literatura detenţiei şi a rezistenţei anticomuniste, Crina Mihaela Palas încearcă o definire a conceptului de poezie carcerală, astfel: „poezia creată în timpul detenţiei şi al rezistenţei anticomuniste de către cei care au trăit experienţe personale în perimetrul concentraţionar"[16], iar din perspectiva Iuliei Pop, „poezia rămâne singura modalitate de (auto)susţinere morală prin care încarceraţi şi-au păstrat verticalitatea sufletească"[17].Câteva caracteristici care conturează specificul poeziei temniţei aiudene sunt: este o poezie care are caracter politic, antisovietic, anticomunist, autorii creaţiilor scrise în spaţiul carceral sunt deţinuţi politici, are elemente specifice folclorului, poeziilor populare, are caracter oral, fiind transmisă prin viu grai de la un deţinut la altul, are caracter colectiv, deoarece circulă în mai multe variante, fiind un produs al mai multor autori. Putem afirma că poezia închisorilor este o poezie folclorică şi politică. În Istoria literaturii române de azi pe mâine, Marian Popa afirmă că „deţinutul politic român este convins de nevinovăţia sa, se consideră victima tragică a unei injustiţii inamice arbitrare şi aberante impusă de străini, oricum incompatibili cu o axiologie bazată pe criterii ale transcendenţei."[18] Este o creaţie literară care aduce eliberarea, libertatea interioară care cultivă memoria. Viorel Gheorghiţă afirma că raţiunea poeziei universului carceral își are fundamentul nu în obiectul propriu-zis, ci în act, deoarece „actul modifică sufletul."

Autorii creațiilor carcerale nu scriu „programat", nu vor să impresioneze, ci urâtul însuşi e o „coordonată exterioară a propriilor catacombe". Deţinutul politic creează o poezie folclorică, din dorinţa acerbă de a îşi exprima liber emoţiile trăirile şi sentimentele, într-o manieră subiectivă şi originală: „Poeziile închisorii capătă o adevărată semnificaţie de creaţie populară, satisfăcând nevoia de expresie a celor ce erau lipsiţi de orice contact cu cartea. De multe ori, au tradus emoţii ce nu erau numai ale autorului, ci ale celor din jurul lui care constituiau astfel un public activ, câteodată interesat pentru prima oară de opera literară"[19]. Folclorul temniței aiudene era într-o continuă evoluție, comunicarea se făcea prin codul Morse, prin perete sau prin țevi, creațiile literare ale deținuților circulau pe cale orală liber, având un caracter colectiv și devenind ale tuturor celor care au contribuit la realizarea lor.

Poezia temniţei aiudene urmăreşte tiparul poeziilor populare româneşti, creată dintr-o nevoie irepresibilă de exprimare a stărilor sufleteşti. Iniţial a fost creată „în minte" şi „scrisă" prin mijloace originale, folosite cu inventivitate de cei care erau încarceraţi, deoarece instrumentele de scris sau hârtia erau interzise cu desăvârşire. Unii poeți s-au născut în închisoare, alții au fost poeți consacrați, scriitori care s-au remarcat în perioada interbelică cu scrieri valoroase, dar au fost condamnați în urma opțiunilor religioase sau politice, precum Radu Gyr, Nichifor Crainic, Vasile Voiculescu.

Trăsături definitorii ale poezie carcerale

O caracteristică specifică poeziei carcerale este faptul că aceste tipuri de poezii sunt creaţii colective: „Cât de mult mai sunt aceste poezii, create în închisoare, opere ale autorilor lor, cu sensul de text non varietur, având un singur autor, este greu de spus dar nu imposibil"[20]. Pentru unii deținuți, creația literară este o muncă asiduă, tratată cu seriozitate, toate operele fiind înregistrate în memorie. Acest aspect este meritoriu pentru foștii deținuți care au avut capacitatea intelectuală de a memora, de a menține vii în minte, fără a le estompa, ca ulterior, după ce au fost eliberați din închisoare să le poată scrie pe hârtie și să le publice.O altă trăsătură definitorie a liricii carcerale este transmiterea prin viu grai, acestea fiind creaţii orale: „Circulaţia lor în variante orale, exodul acestor poeme spuse prin multe închisori şi păstrarea lor în memoria celor ce şi le-au însuşit complică operaţia de atribuire strictă a fiecărui titlu. Spunem «însuşit» şi nu «învăţat» pentru că fiecare poem era receptat şi considerat ca o expresie a propriilor trăiri de cel care îl învăţa pe dinafară”[21].

Cu o atenţie deosebită şi cu o grijă excesivă, aceste creaţii ale carcerei aiudene au fost memorate de către deţinuţii care aveau memorie foarte bună. Grigore Caraza este unul dintre deţinuţii Închisorii Aiud care a memorat peste 10.000 de versuri din creaţiile lui Radu Gyr sau Nichifor Crainic. Grigore Caraza redă momentul întâlnirii sale cu Zahu Pană, după ce a fost eliberat și a ajuns în SUA. Acesta spune că Zahu Pană ştia că în temniţa aiudeană unii deţinuţi îl numeau pe Grigore Caraza „trilogia de versuri”, deoarece memorase mii de versuri ale lui Radu Gyr, Nichifor Crainic precum şi versuri ale mai multor poeţi din închisorile comuniste. Atât Nichifor Crainic, cât şi Radu Gyr îl numeau pe Grigore Caraza „volumul” lor de poezii.

Zahu Pană l-a invitat pe Grigore Caraza să scrie împreună un volum de poezii numit Poezii din închisori, deoarece ştia că acesta memorase foarte multe poezii în timpul detenţiei sale în Închisoarea Aiud şi că deţinea un bagaj suficient de generos pentru a scoate o carte şi insistând asupra ideii de a i se recunoaşte drepturile de autor. Zaharia Pană i-a propus lui Grigore Caraza să-şi refacă poeziile, să le scrie, să i le dicteze sau să le înregistreze pentru a fi cât mai rapizi şi eficienţi în terminarea volumului de poezii: „începând din acel moment am refăcut toate poeziile învăţate în temniţă, dictându-i din memorie sute de poezii ale lui Gyr, Crainic şi încă cincisprezece poeţi pe care i-am întâlnit în primii cincisprezece ani de la Aiud”[22]. Dintre acestea, circa 1800 i le-a dictat lui Zaharia Pană, iar aproximativ 50 de poezii le-a refăcut cu mare precizie. Caraza susține că a refăcut două dintre poeziile lui Zahu Pană pe care le-a memorat tot în Închisoarea Aiud. Acestea sunt Vizită şi La roabe.

Poezii din închisori este o culegere antologică, din opera lirică a peste 50 de poeţi cunoscuţi şi anonimi, apărută în anul 1982, la Editura Cuvântul Românesc. Volumul a apărut în 596 de pagini, aproximativ 300 de pagini reprezentând munca lui Caraza. Acesta mărturiseşte că pentru o perioadă îndelungată aflat la secţia I bolnavi cronici unde se regăseau Radu Gyr, Nichifor Crainic şi Ioan Petrovici s-a făcut remarcat în rândul acestora şi a celorlalţi deţinuţi prin faptul că era chemat să i se dicteze poezii pentru că le reţinea foarte uşor „când eram scoşi la plimbare stăteam permanent în preajma lor iar când aveau de dictat o poezie stăteam în faţa lor. După ce mi-o spuneau şi a doua oară, treceam în spatele lor şi o redam exact. Prin aceşti mari oameni, eu, un anonim căpătasem alte proporţii în ochii camarazilor de suferinţă”[23].

Cartea lui Zaharia Pană a fost tipărită în 1500 de volume şi numele lui Grigore Caraza nu a fost menţionat pe copertă în calitate de coautor şi nici în prefaţa cărţii nu a fost specificată contribuţia exactă pe care Caraza şi-o adusese la editarea acelui volum: „iată-mă furat de un om despre care crezusem că trecut prin temniţa Aiudului, mai păstrase în el o fărâmă de conştiinţă curată. Din păcate, era acelaşi care furase buna credinţă şi conştiinţa atâtor deţinuţi politici mulţi dintre ei martiri ai neamului românesc în timpul reeducării lor din Aiud”[24]. Grigore Caraza se confesează că în timpul detenţiei el s-a străduit să memoreze cât mai multe poezii „eu mă chinuiam să învăţ cât mai multe poezii, pentru a le a scoate afară cu intenţia de a le respecta dorinţa celor care mi le încredinţaseră de a le publica aducându-mi fie şi în felul acestora o modestă contribuţie la îmbogăţirea culturii româneşti. Şi n-a fost deloc uşor.”[25]. Pentru că nu aveau voie să vorbească între ei, Caraza a fost prins în nenumărate rânduri cu poezia notată pe pingeaua bocancului pentru care a plătit cu zile de carceră şi izolare. A recurs şi la alte metode mai anevoioase şi astfel, scria câte o poezie pe cureaua pantalonilor sau pe bucăţi de sticlă peste care aşternea un strat subţire de săpun un alt strat de D.D.T., apoi cu un vârf de sârmă, aşchie de lemn sau ciob de sticlă care înlocuiau creionul, scria versurile pentru a le putea memora mai repede: „privilegiul de a memora peste 10.000 de versuri în închisoare de la marii poeţi ai neamului, de a înmagazina un tezaur care în mare parte s-ar fi pierdut, l-am plătit din greu cu sacrificii, cu luni de izolare, carceră, regim de neagra sau bătăi crunte. Ştia oare domnul Pană câte am răbdat câtă suferinţă şi foame am făcut pentru ca el să-mi fure singura mea bucurie pe care atât de greu o adunasem în ani de osândă?”[26]

O altă trăsătură fundamentală a poeziei carcerale este libera răspândire în mai multe variante. Poezia închisorilor circulă în mai multe variante: „Apariţia variantelor se datora nu numai tendinţei unora de a interveni în text pentru a-l adapta viziunii sale, ci şi datorită infidelităţii memoriei şi chiar uitării, de cele mai multe ori parţiale, a textului poetic. În închisoare nimeni nu obliga pe cineva să înveţe poezii. Dimpotrivă. Crearea şi transmiterea lor era interzisă şi devenea foarte periculoasă atât pentru poet, cât şi pentru cel care şi-o însuşea.”[27]. Recuperarea poeziilor create în închisoare se poate realiza doar prin intermediul acestor variante, fiindcă „este greu de stabilit textul de bază la care s-a oprit poetul şi aceasta cu atât mai mult cu cât chiar creatorul versurilor, neavând posibilitatea să şi le noteze, le comunica el însuşi în variante.”[28]. Transcrierea textelor autentice ale poeziilor create în spaţiul carceral având la bază manuscrisele care s-au păstrat de către apropiaţii sau familiile poeţilor a scos în lumina tiparului existenţa multiplelor variante care au circulat în rândul deţinuţilor politici. Astfel, se evidenţiază o altă caracteristică specifică poeziilor populare, şi anume transmiterea prin viu grai. Există anumite mărturii care evidenţiază această trăsătură specifică folclorului. De exemplu, poezia Foamea scrisă de Nichifor Crainic apare tipărită în două variante: şi o variantă se găseşte în volumul de versuri create în temniţa Aiudului, Şoim peste prăpastie. Versuri inedite create în temniţele Aiudului, iar o altă variantă este publicată în revista „România liberă” nr. 21/1990.

Despre memorarea poeziilor închisorilor nu se poate afirma că au fost învăţate „pe de rost”, pentru acest proces este mult mai potrivită expresia „apprendre par coeur”, din perspectiva criticului Nicolae Manolescu face referire la iubirea faţă de ceea ce memorăm nu la „lectura în orb”. Inima deţine un rol semnificativ, fiindcă un om poate memora doar ceea ce i-a mers direct la inimă. Poeziile carcerale au atins inimile deţinuţilor care s-au străduit să le memoreze. Astfel, se evidenţiază o altă trăsătură definitorie a liricii carcerale specifică folclorului românesc, şi anume, transmiterea lor în mai multe variante.

O altă trăsătură specifică liricii carcerale este alegerea formei poeziei clasice, cu catrene, versuri cu măsură egală în majoritatea situațiilor, în care versurile rimează, cu scopul de a fi reţinute mult mai facil. Poeziile carcerale se situează într-o categorie de texte literare care este greu de clasificat şi nu pot fi încadrate în tiparele obişnuite ale literaturii. Acestea au reprezentat „hrana spirituală” a deţinuţilor, un mijloc de rezistenţă morală.

O altă caracteristică distinctivă este interferenţa cu rugăciunea, deoarece ambele au fost soluţii adoptate de foştii deţinuţi pentru a supravieţui condiţiilor precare din spaţiul carceral aiudean. Ion Caraion, un alt fost deţinut politic mărturiseşte că poezia a reprezentat salvarea sa de la moarte şi de la nebunie: „La un moment dat spre a-şi găsi o supapă de salvare, spre a modifica barem în parte ucigătoarea monotonie a celulelor, spre a nu înnebuni efectiv ori a se sinucide, mai fiecare captiv se apucase după mult puţinele-i puteri, să scrie în versuri. Care în gând, care pe o bucată de sticlă, care pe o tăbliţă de lemn, pe un papuc, pe o pingea sau pe o coajă de săpun sau pe spatele gamelei.”[29] Rugăciunea, amintirile, prelegerile, lecţiile de limbi străine, creaţiile literare povestirile au devenit mijloace de rezistenţă psihică şi spirituală, o modalitate de a compensa frustrările psihice şi fizice la care cei încarceraţi au fost supuşi, semnificative mijloace de eliberare şi dobândire a „libertăţii” interioare.

Viorel Gheorghiţă, un fost deţinut politic încarcerat în temniţa aiudeană, mărturiseşte în cartea sa, Et ego Sărata – Piteşti – Gherla – Aiud. Scurtă istorie a devenirii mele, cum s-a mântuit prin poezie, prin mărturisire, „prin cuvânt, prin cuvântul rostit...”. Această mărturie este impresionantă şi emoţionează profund lectorul: „ nu e, prin urmare deplasată afirmaţia că în ziua în care, somat de nu ştiu ce demon, la Aiud fiind, am încropit primul meu vers arestat, m-am născut a doua oară, prin poezie, eu care, liber fiind, nu am slujit poezia, mai mult, am trădat-o. Primele lanţuri care au cedat au fost acelea care mă ţineau răstignit, pe crucea fără aparenţă a unui prezent perpetuu, împiedicându-mă să îmi simt rădăcinile şi să-mi asum trecutul. Efectul: introspecţia lirică, prin mijlocirea poemului scurt, de formă fixă sau evaziunea aparent epică, prin intermediul baladei extrapolate... În temniţele comuniste din România poezia a fost convertită - în intimitatea lui, procesul îmi scapă - în pâine şi vin, în trup şi sânge sacru."[30]. Poezia deținuților a fost „o soluţie de rezistenţă, un reazem sufletesc".

Se remarcă faptul că poezia carcerală „nu cultivă o estetică a urâtului". Crina Palas consideră că „Fie că este demascare a chinurilor, noian de amintiri, mărturisire de credinţă, rugăciune sau disperare, strigăt de durere, testament sau îndemn la luptă, cea mai importantă calitate a poeziei de detenţie este aceea a existenţei sale."[31]. Poezia închisorilor a fost supranumită „poezia celor 3 F (foamea, frigul, frica); totuşi, se poate constata că nu este o poezie a jelaniei sau a răzbunării". Cele mai semnificative teme specifice poeziei închisorilor sunt: frigul, foamea, fierul, frica, ritualul cotidian, bătaia, rugăciunea, relaţia cu divinitatea, singurătatea, sărbătorile religioase. Se remarcă ilustrarea unor teme predilecte ale creaţiilor carcerale şi a funcţiilor poeziei în spaţiul de detenţie.

Foamea, frigul, umilinţele, întunericul, lanţurile nu au putut împiedica „actul creaţiei literare". Deţinuţii au creat o literatură cu o forţă inimaginabilă, cu toate că intenţia comuniştilor a fost de a anihila valorile şi de impune non-valori ca reper unic: „Întemniţaţii au înnobilat cultura română cu creaţii de o valoare inestimabilă"[32]. Talpa bocancului, pereţii, săpunul, gamela au înlocuit hârtia. Poezia carcerală creată de Radu Gyr este „revelatorie mai ales ca defulare şi compensare a frustrărilor la care deţinuţii politici au fost supuşi riguros, punitiv. O astfel de poezie ajungea într-adevăr să ţină locul rugăciunii, dragostei şi chiar al vieţii."[33] Poezia carcerală are o valoare literară de netăgăduit care este dublată de o incontestabilă valoare spirituală.

Viorel Gheorghiţă consideră că „Raţiunea de a fi a poeziei universului concentraţionar rezistă nu în obiect, ci în act. Faptul de a o fi scris – impropriu spus, despre creion şi hârtie neputând fi vorba –, ca şi acela de a o fi memorizat e relevant, nu poemul ca atare. Actul modifică sufletul. Poemul poate fi confiscat, poate fi tezaurizat, poate fi ars; actul, odată produs, nu. În umbra celulei, sub bolta fără lumină a minelor de plumb, alături de libărci şi de trupuri schiloade, neînsufleţite uneori, împreună cu rugăciunea, poezia a fost un asemenea cuvânt, nu mântuit, prin rostire, cum spune Lucian Blaga, ci mântuitor. Un omagiu mai deplin decât acesta, adus poeziei, consider că nu e cu putinţă. În temniţele comuniste din România, poezia a fost convertită în pâine şi vin, în trup şi sânge sacru. Şi cât de bine şi frumos ar fi ca această convertire să rămână un câştigat"[34]. Adrian Popescu consideră că Radu Gyr este un poet „antiretoric, anticalofil, de o oralitate frustă uneori, dar atras de idealul eroic. Lirica lui de detenţie îşi depăşeşte epoca şi rămâne vie şi neîncadrabilă în schemele stricte ale unei şcoli sau estetici."[35] Petre Pandrea afirmă că Radu Gyr este un „rapsod popular al puşcăriilor."[36] Demostene Andronescu, una dintre vocile lirice reprezentative ale Închisorii Aiud este considerat de critica literară „ultimul mare poet în viaţă al temniţelor comuniste".

O soluţie de rezistenţă în interiorul temniţei a fost „întâlnirea cu poezia", prin intermediul căreia mulţi deţinuţi au reuşit să supravieţuiască. Textele care au fost plăsmuite în spaţiul carceral sunt „o răscumpărare prin artă a unei vieţi furate"[37]. Putem afirma că textele liricii carcerale aiudene nu sunt doar elemente care reproduc lumea spaţiului concentraţionar, cu coordonatele specifice coordonatelor spaţiale, temporale şi umane reale, determinate, ci sunt creatoare ale unor lumi obscure, necunoscute celor din spatele zidurilor. În comparaţie cu memorialiştii, poeţii închisorilor nu se limitează la transmiterea unor informaţii clare, reale, la mărturisirea unor experienţe, ci „configurează sensuri”. Poezii precum Unde sunt cei ce nu mai sunt? a lui Nichifor Crainic, Iisus în celulă a lui Radu Gyr, pot fi considerate texte reprezentative pentru literatura română din perioada 1950-1960.

În concluzie, universul liricii carcerale se conturează prin caracterul religios, folcloric, patriotic, politic, anticomunist.

RELATIONSHIP – INTERRELATIONSHIP DEFINITIONS AND CATEGORISATIONS IN SPECIALTY LITERATURE

Daniela Băban (Trăistaru)
PhD Student, University of Craiova

Abstract: The word is considered the basic unit in traditional grammar. The term itself has different meanings, depending on the level of language analysis. Words are considered totally abstract units at the language level, whose only properties are those of having combinatory and contrasting functions. At the level of speech they are realized as groups or complexes of elements of expression (from a phonological point of view). For all those who accept the word as the fundamental unit of language (and they form the quasi-unanimity of linguists) it is treated under the aspect of inflection. Language research has been placed in a dual perspective of approach, synchronic / diachronic, depending on the consideration of phenomena on the axis of simultaneity (synchronic, descriptive analysis) or succession (diachronic, historical analysis). The achievements of humanity on many levels are the fruits of its efforts throughout history. They would not have been possible if there had been no words, no linguistic signs, which transmit ideas and information, through speech or writing, from one generation to another, from one individual to another.

1. Introducere

Diversitatea copleșitoare a nivelurilor de comunicare – de la cel interpersonal până la cel planetar – precum și inevitabilele lor întrepătrunderi și condiționări, ne fac să împărtășim opinia potrivit căreia o singură disciplină nu ar putea face față investigării unui asemenea conglomerat.

Provenit prin filiera franceză, verbul a comunica are în limba română un „frate bun", fapt ce ne îndreptățește să vorbim de existența unui dublet etimologic. Cu transformările proprii trecerii de la latina vulgară la protoromână, lat. communicare a fost moștenit sub forma a cumineca, având sensul de „a se împărtăși" (în accepția ritualului creștin). Înțelesul exista și în latina târzie, unde a dat naștere lui excommunicare, adică „a opri de la împărtășanie" - ceea ce echivala cu excluderea din comunitatea religioasă. Iată cum pentru noi, românii, sensul originar al comunicării este deopotrivă profan și sacru: comunicarea stă la baza organizării sociale, mijlocind raporturile „orizontale" dintre oameni, dar angajând și aspirațiile lor „verticale", într-o mișcare ascensională către planurile superioare ale existenței. Când trebuie să definească comunicarea, majoritatea vorbitorilor se gândesc la „a aduce la cunoștință", „a da de știre" sau „a informa". Comunicarea înțeleasă ca proces are la bază patru componente fundamentale: emițătorul, canalul, informația și receptorul. Esența procesului constă din transferul sau trimiterea informației de la receptor la emițător. Acest model elementar trebuie însă extins, deoarece comunicarea nu se încheie niciodată cu simpla preluare sau receptare a informației. În primul rând, nu trebuie omisă circulația informației și în sens invers (feed-back), deoarece comunicarea nu se realizează decât în vederea obținerii unui răspuns. În al doilea rând, comunicarea este un proces intenșional: emițătorul transmite receptorului o informaţie prin intermediul unui canal cu scopul de a produce anumite efecte asupra receptorului. În al treilea rând, toată această „desfășurare de forțe" nu s-ar dovedi pe deplin eficientă daca nu s-ar acorda importanță atât codajului cât și decodajului mesajului transmis. În al patrulea rând, nu trebuie ignorată nici posibilitatea aparițiilor unor erori de codare sau decodare, precum și imixtiunea unor factori perturbatori. Toate aceste elemente vor diminua reușita comunicării.

Privită ca un act de punere în relație a emițătorului cu receptorul, comunicarea poate fi înțeleasă drept „ansamblul proceselor fizice și psihologice prin care se efectuează operația punerii în relație cu una sau mai multe persoane, în vederea atingerii unor anumite obiective.

Problemele teoretice principale au vizat mecanismele de producere a limbii, componenta ei, regulile ei de funcționare. Obiectul acestei preocupări de cunoaștere pentru a deveni știință şi-a delimitat obiectul de studiu care este limba, caracterizată prin trăsăturile sale specifice, şi anume de a fi mijlocul articulat de comunicare între oameni.

Abia însă Ferdinand de Saussure a contribuit decisiv la progresul cercetării lingvistice prin faptul că el a trecut de la acea sumă de afirmații despre limbă, formulate de precursori, la o poziție radical diferită. El a expus într-un sistem coerent concepte proprii lingvisticii, plecând de la premisa că „limba este un sistem riguros şi teoria trebuie să fie un sistem la fel de riguros ca şi limba".

Într-o primă etapa a elaborării teoriei sale, Ferdinand de Saussure considera semnul lingvistic ca un rezultat al reuniunii dintre semnificant și semnificat, prin care înțelegea imaginea acustică si respectiv conceptul. Ulterior, el va considera semnificantul și semnificatul ca părți constitutive ale formei lingvistice, termenul semn identificând-se cu semnul minimal - cuvântul sau morfemul. Codul lingvistic este astfel constituit dintr-o multitudine de semne izolate, fiecare din ele asociind unui sunet anume un sens anume. Saussure a insistat asupra unei distincții clare între referentul semnului (ansamblul de obiecte din realitate la care trimite semnul) și semnificatul sau (entitatea lingvistică legată de semnificant).

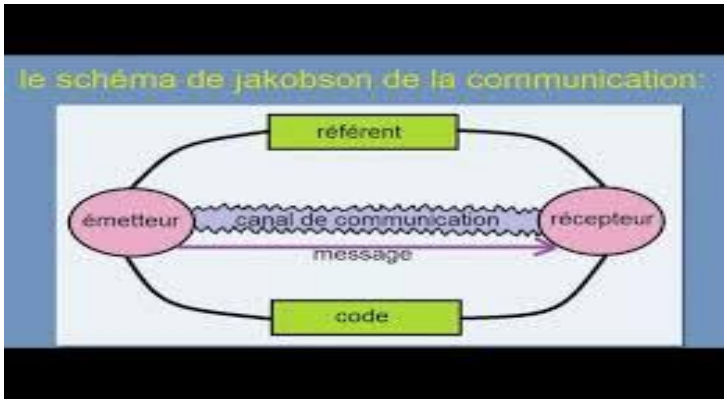
Comunicarea umană se bazează pe stimuli senzoriali, astfel că receptorul înregistrează un suport perceptibil (de natură variabilă) și reține un sens, o semnificație. Semnul poate fi considerat ca fiind tocmai „acest suport perceptiv și cea mai mică unitate ce are un sens într-un cod dat". Semnul este rezultatul asocierii dintre un element perceptiv – semnificantul – și un element conceptual neperceptibil – semnificatul. Relația dintre semnificant și semnificat este semnificația. Reprosul adus lui Saussure a fost acela că a neglijat relația dintre semn și realitate (semnul lingvistic și realitatea la care se referă). Realului îi aparțin referenții, adică lucrurile din natură, artefactele, ființele și plantele pe care nu le putem trece cu vederea. Neluarea în calcul a funcției referențiale nu a însemnat totala ei respingere; punerea ei în paranteze din rațiuni metodologice poate să apară ca justificată la nivelul analizei formale imanente limbajului, dar nu mai poate fi susținută la nivelul unei analize globale a noțiunii de semn. Odată organizate semnele într-un sistem, putem vorbi și de o ordine paradigmatică. Această ordine ne permite să constatăm dacă două semne sunt identice sau diferite, dacă unul îl include sau exclude pe celălalt, dacă unul îl implică sau îl presupune pe celălalt.

Ideile teoretice principale saussuriene sunt:

- ideea de valoare relațională, opozitivă, a entităților lingvistice;
- ideea conexă de sistem;
- ideea necesității consecvente de a distinge o lingvistică a stărilor de o lingvistică a realizărilor şi a evoluțiilor.

Comunicarea gândurilor, sentimentelor și dorințelor umane se realizează prin limbă, un sistem complex de comunicare alcătuit din sunete articulate, care și-a disputat mereu întâietatea față de alte sisteme de comunicare: în primul rând datorită dublei articulări, în al doilea rând deoarece celelalte sisteme de comunicare au nevoie de concursul ei pentru a fi descrise, iar în al treilea rând deoarece limbile naturale constituie atât prin semnificantul, cât și prin semnificatul lor, punctul de plecare în construirea altor sisteme de semne, cum ar fi limbajele artificiale.

Limba nu este același lucru cu vorbirea. Limba este un „tezaur" de semne care poate fi utilizat doar cu ajutorul vorbirii. Vorbirea este cea care pune în funcțiune codul și conduce la producerea mesajului. Limba este pasivitate pură, iar stăpânirea ei este legată de facultățile „receptive" ale intelectului, cu precădere memoria, în vreme ce orice activitate legată de limbaj ține de vorbire. Schemei, adică formei limbii îi corespunde, în vorbire, uzajul, adică ansamblul obiceiurilor lingvistice ale unei societăți date. Limba se definește cu ajutorul axei paradigmatice (relații de tipul „sau…sau", în vreme ce vorbirea apelează la axa sintagmatică, adică la relații de tipul „și... și". Cunoașterea limbii ține de competența subiecților vorbitori, în vreme ce producerea și interpretarea enunțurilor în procesul vorbirii ține de performanță. Este interesant de remarcat faptul că o mare parte din performanțele noastre ca vorbitori, cum ar fi intuirea efectelor pe care o frază le poate produce în context sau posibilitatea reducerii ei datorită situației de discurs, nu țin de competența lingvistică, ci de cunoștințele noastre despre lume și cei din jurul nostru și modul în care gestionăm relațiile interumane.



Definiţiile ştiinţifice ale limbii sunt numeroase. Reținem că limba este instrument de comunicare prin care experiența umană se analizează, diferit în fiecare colectivitate [în sens larg, n.n.], în unități dotate cu conținut semantic şi cu o expresie fonică, monemele; această expresie fonică se articulează, la rândul ei, din unități distincte şi succesive, fonemele, în număr determinat în fiecare limbă, a căror natură şi raporturi mutuale diferă de asemenea de la o limbă la alta. De asemenea, limba, în sens riguros științific, desemnează un ansamblu de sisteme legate unele de altele; unitățile fiecăruia dintre aceste sisteme (sunete, foneme, morfeme, lexeme, cuvânt) sunt identificate în funcție de relațiile de echivalență sau de opoziție dintre aceste unități. Lingvistica este știința care studiază din toate punctele de vedere posibile limbajul uman articulat, în general şi în formele sale specifice de realizare, adică în actele lingvistice şi în sistemele de izoglose, care, tradițional sau convențional, se numesc limbi. Lingvistul de origine rusă Roman Jakobson identifică şi alți factori constitutivi ai actelor de vorbire. Transmițătorul (emițătorul) trimite un mesaj destinatarului (receptorului); pentru ca mesajul să-şi îndeplinească funcția e nevoie de un context la care se referă (de un „referent”), de un cod comun sau parțial comun transmițătorului şi destinatarului şi de un contact, o conductă materială sau o legătură psihologică între cei doi. Mesajul este unitatea de baza a comunicării, situat de fapt la intersecția dintre comunicare și reprezentarea realității. El poate fi alcătuit din cuvinte scrise sau rostite, imagini vizuale, muzică, zgomote, semne, simboluri, culori, gesturi etc. Suportul fizic al mesajului este oferit de canal, care îndeplinește și funcția de cale de transport sau distribuție a mesajului.

Finalitatea procesului de comunicare există în măsura în care mesajul codificat de emițător este decodificat și acceptat de receptor. cunoașterea codului informației obligă la respectarea semnelor și simbolurilor folosite, iar eventualele erori vor putea fi cu ușurință detectate și corectate. Când semnificația este codificată în cuvinte, mesajul este unul de tip verbal, iar comunicarea este verbală. Dacă semnificația este purtată prin altceva decât cuvinte, mesajul și comunicarea sunt non-verbale. Conținutul și maniera în care se comunică se află sub influența contextului comunicării. Evaluarea lui implică analiza mai multor dimensiuni contextuale: fizică, temporală, culturală, socială și psihologică. Capacitatea de comprehensiune a receptorului nu trebuie niciodată ignorată, iar mesajul trebuie atent construit. Inteligibilitatea unui mesaj este dată nu numai de aportul de noutate în formă și conținut, dar și de structura lui mult prea elaborată, sau dimpotrivă, mult prea banală și previzibilă. Schimbul de mesaje între participanţii angrenați în comunicare devine interacțiune.

Cuvântul rostit sau scris înseamnă limbaj verbal și comunicare verbală. Numai că oamenii nu se limitează numai la schimburi de cuvinte; ei comunică și cu ajutorul altor semne - distanțe, îmbrăcăminte, gesturi, obiecte, para-limbaj, reprezentări grafice, tăcere etc. Homo significans „gândește numai în semne”, după cum spunea filosoful Charles Sanders Peirce. Semnele sunt cuvinte imagini, mirosuri sau obiecte, numai că toate aceste lucruri devin semne numai dacă noi le învestim cu înțelesuri. „Nimic nu este semn”, spunea Peirce, „dacă nu este interpretat ca semn.” Orice poate fi semn atât timp cât cineva îl interpretează ca semnificând ceva”. Semnul este „acel ceva care ține locul a altceva pentru (sine) ceva” și ne permite „să ducem lumea cu noi fără a avea nevoie să o luăm într-o valiză.”

Fiecare dintre acești factori, dispuși conform schemei context mesaj transmițător contact cod determină o altă funcție a limbii: referențială, poetică, emotivă, fatică metalingvistică.

Nivelurile comunicării

Comunicarea umană se poate desfășura pe cinci niveluri relativ distincte:

1. Comunicarea intrapersonală este comunicarea în și către sine. Fiecare ființă umană se cunoaște și se judecă pe sine, își pune întrebări și își răspunde, astfel că această comunicare cu propriul forum interior devine o sursă de echilibru psihic și emoțional.
2. Comunicarea interpersonală este comunicarea între oameni. Obiectivele acestei comunicări sunt extrem de multiple și complexe: cunoașterea celor de lângă noi, crearea și întreținerea legăturilor umane, persuadarea interlocutorului, recunoașterea valorii personale, satisfacerea nevoilor afective, de control și dominație etc. Comunicarea interpersonală directă presupune inițierea de contacte personale nemijlocite și interactive între oameni, pe când cea interpersonala indirectă are nevoie de mijloace și tehnici secundare de punere în contact uman (scrierea, înregistrările magnetice sau transmisiile prin unde sau fibră optică).
3. Comunicarea de grup se derulează în colectivități umane restrânse, de maximum 11 persoane - echipe, familii, cercuri de prieteni, colegii de redacții etc. La acest nivel se asigură schimburi de idei și emoții, se împărtășesc experiențe și se caută soluții de rezolvare a problemelor, se iau decizii și se aplanează conflicte.
4. Comunicarea publică își are rădăcinile în retorica antică. Discursul public nu viza doar transmiterea de informații, ci mai ales schimbarea opiniilor și acțiunilor publicului, influențarea sentimentelor acestora. Eficiența unei astfel de comunicări se afla deopotrivă în mâinile oratorului și ale publicului său.
5. Comunicarea de masă se referă la producerea și difuzarea mesajelor scrise, vorbite, vizuale sau audiovizuale de către un sistem mediatic instituționalizat către un public variat și numeros. Motivele care stau la baza consumului de mesaje mediatice vizează informarea, construirea identității personale, integrarea și interacțiunea socială și divertismentul.

Independent de reflecțiile lingviștilor, filosofii Scolii din Oxford au ajuns la concluzii similare și chiar le-au depășit, în sensul că au integrat în acțiunea inerentă vorbirii o parte mult mai considerabilă a activităţii umane.

Filosoful englez J.L. Austin, spre exemplu a ajuns la o primă concluzie potrivit căreia enunțurile pot fi performative si constative. Enunțurile constative descriu un eveniment, fără pretenția de a modifica o stare de fapt, pe când cele performative, transformă realitatea.

Ulterior, Austin a revenit asupra acestei distincții mult prea tranșante, arătând că de fapt constativele posedă și ele, într-o formă mai puțin spectaculară, o valoare de acțiune, similară cu cea a enunțurilor performative. Astfel, dacă spunem „A venit reporterul", nu ne mulțumim numai să reprezentăm un fapt, ci să îi afirmăm în același timp și realitatea, invitând la acțiune (Trebuie să mergi mai repede în sala de conferințe).

Neputând opune enunțurile constative celor performative, Austin a creat o teorie generală a actelor de limbaj (sau acte de vorbire), valabilă pentru toate tipurile de enunț. Astfel, atunci când locutorul enunță o frază oarecare el efectuează trei acte simultane:

- un act locutoriu care constă din articularea și combinarea de sunete, evocarea și combinarea sintactică a noțiunilor reprezentate de cuvinte;
- un act ilocutoriu, în măsura în care enunțarea frazei reprezintă prin ea însăși un anume act, cum ar fi actul de a promite sau de a ordona;
- un act perlocutoriu, în măsura în care enunțarea servește unor scopuri mai îndepărtate, pe care interlocutorul poate să nu le sesizeze, deși cunoaște perfect limba (putem adresa cuiva o întrebare din dorința de a-l ajuta, încercând să-l punem în încurcătură sau pur și simplu pentru că dorim să-l facem să creadă că ținem la opinia lui).

Oamenii trăiesc în comunitate în virtutea lucrurilor pe care le au în comun; iar comunicarea este modalitatea prin care ei ajung să dețină în comun aceste lucruri. Pentru a forma o comunitate sau o societate, ei trebuie sa aibă în comun scopuri, convingeri, aspirații, cunoştinţe - o înțelegere comună - „același spirit" cum spun sociologii.

2. Relaţie referenţială - relaţie structurală

Relația, este un pivot și un liant al organizării comunicării prin limbaj, este unitatea a două laturi: una care definește comunicarea și enunțul ca fapt al vorbirii pe de o parte şi faptul comunicat pe de alta parte.

2.1. Prima latură, numită şi relația referențială, îndeplinește o funcție logică, asigurând coerența faptelor enunțate, fără de care un enunț nu există în calitate de comunicare. Se poate spune deci că, din perspectivă logico-semantică, relațiile sintactice reprezintă „interpretarea lingvistică a unor raporturi logice, prin care se reflectă în planul gândirii conexiuni extralingvistice, extrinseci (între „obiecte") şi intrinseci (interioare „obiectelor", de tipul parte întreg, conținut – formă, substanță – calități, statice sau dinamice etc).

3. Relaţia lingvistică

Relația lingvistica exprimă raporturile, legăturile care se stabilesc între unitățile lingvistice, indiferent că este vorba de unități nedotate cu semnificație (între foneme) sau de unități care au calitatea de semn lingvistic (între morfeme/moneme, sintagme, propoziții).

La nivelul metalimbajului lingvistic, termenii „raport" şi „relație" sunt întrebuințați ca aflați în sinonimie totală, cu o frecvență de utilizare comparabilă. Opțiunea pentru unul sau altul dintre acești termeni pare să se coreleze cu distincția sintaxă tradițională / sintaxă modernă - structuralistă şi generativ – transformațională.

Relațiile sintactice constituie modalitatea prin care nivelul lexical se integrează în nivelul sintactic.

Atât în lingvistica generală, cât şi în cea românească există diferite opinii în privința conceptelor de „raport" şi de „relație" sintactic(ă) şi a tipologiei acestora. În studiul de față, utilizăm termenul „raport sintactic", prin care înțelegem legăturile gramaticale care se stabilesc în interiorul grupurilor sintactice şi între unitățile sintactice de același rang, de niveluri diferite sau de niveluri interdependente. În ceea ce privește tipologia raporturilor sintactice, considerăm că în limba română sunt trei raporturi sintactice fundamentale: coordonarea, subordonarea şi inerența. Celelalte „așa-zise" raporturi sintactice sunt varietăți ale raporturilor de bază sau se prezintă ca niște invenții ocazionale, particulare sau individuale ale cercetătorilor.

Deși între raport şi relație nu se poate face o demarcare tranșantă de înțeles, totuși între îmbinările raport sintactic şi relație sintactică semantica lor trebuie să se reducă la anumite conotații de sens.

Relația sintactică ține de gradul de solidaritate, coeziune, dintre elementele structurale ale unității sintactice. Parametrii relației sintactice sunt foarte largi – de la legătura indispensabilă dintre constituenți (coeziune maximă), până la autonomia deplină a lor". P. Tolocenco menționează că „raportul sintactic ia naștere între constituenți sintactici aflați într-o relație sintactică şi este susținut de semantica lor. Raportul semantic este predeterminat de gradul de legătură între elementele ce generează acest raport. Raportul sintactic va contribui la apariția funcției sintactice – această abstracție generată de corelația dintre raportul sintactic şi raportul semantic ale constituenților, susținută de elementele joncționale". Autorul accentuează în concluzie că „între relația sintactică şi raportul sintactic există o corelație, însă ea nu este determinantă. De exemplu, elementele propoziției se pot afla în raport de acord, recțiune puternică, recțiune slabă, aderare, acestea operând şi anumite funcții, însă raportul sintactic este unul, cel de subordonare" .

Pentru a stabili conceptul de raport sintactic, e necesar să pornim de la actul de comunicare, care implică din partea locutorului două operații:

a) selectarea unităților lingvistice din plan paradigmatic, în acord cu intenția de comunicare şi

b) combinarea acestor unități în plan sintagmatic, într-un ansamblu organizat de asemenea manieră, încât locutorul să transmită informația dorită, să ceară o informaţie ori să-şi exprime voința, intenția etc., iar receptorul s-o poată recupera .

În literatura de specialitate, raporturile/relațiile sintactice sunt definite astfel: un raport, o proporție sau o legătură necesară care se stabilește între componentele unui întreg; element de bază prin care se realizează procesele de structurare şi de funcționare a unităților sintactice asigurând coeziunea sintactică şi coerența semantică; „interpretarea" lingvistică a unor raporturi logice; relațiile/ legăturile – marcate lingvistic – ce apar la nivelul unităților sintactice, care au astfel un conținut şi o formă; legăturile care se stabilesc la nivelul unităților sintactice, legături atât semantice, cât şi marcate formal, având şi „conținut" raportual (identificabil prin nivelul unităților sintactice unde se contactează aceste raporturi sintactice), şi formă raportuală specifică (reprezentată de mărcile care individualizează fiecare raport sintactic; raportul sintactic este un instrument al coeziunii la nivelul expresiei şi al coerenței conținutului unei unități sintactice, instrument cuantificabil lingvistic şi desfăşurat, de regulă, între doi poli ş.a.

În opinia noastră, prin raport sintactic trebuie să se înțeleagă legăturile gramaticale care se stabilesc în interiorul grupurilor sintactice (subordonare: acord, recțiune şi aderență), între diverse unități sintactice de același rang sau de aceeași importanță (propoziții coordonate: copulativ, adversativ, disjunctiv, concluziv şi juxtapus), între două unități sintactice de rang diferit sau cu valori inegale (subordonare necircumstanțială şi subordonare circumstanțială) sau între unități sintactice ale căror valori nu pot exista de sine stătător, adică ele se află într-o dependență bilaterală sau reciprocă, sau interdependență (la nivelul propoziției: între subiect şi predicat, iar la nivelul frazei – între propozițiile subiective şi predicatul impersonal din propoziția precedentă sau între predicative şi verbe de relație – predicate incomplete din propoziția precedentă.

Având în vedere diversitatea terminologiei întâlnite în abordarea relațiilor, cât şi numărul diferit de relații discutate în funcție de fiecare autor, trebuie să facem mențiunea că nu ne propunem aici să prezentăm toate informațiile discutate în gramatici ci doar unele, care apar la mai mulți autori.

4. Relaţiile structurale - clasificare

Relațiile structurale care organizează enunțul sunt: de dependență, de non-dependență sau de coordonare și de echivalență sau apozitivă.

4.1.Relația de dependență sau de subordonare

Relația de dependență/subordonare este relația fundamentală în funcție de care se organizează informația care se comunică. După felul în care intră în relație elementele participante la respectivul tip de raport sintactic, se poate vorbi despre dependență bilaterală şi dependență unilaterală.

Relația de dependență bilaterală/interdependență este o formă specială de dependență între doi termeni care se presupun reciproc (Sb.+ P.) şi formează nucleul unui enunț structurat. Fiecare dintre termeni impune celuilalt anumite restricții referitoare la categoriile gramaticale implicate în realizarea funcției respective. Interdependența sau dependența bilaterală (între subiect şi predicat: ambele răspunzând negativ testului omisiunii, subiectul este întotdeauna presupus) reprezintă „forma de dependență maximă".

Relația de dependență unilaterală: în structuri binare şi ternare

- asociază 2 termeni: regentul (care nu poate fi omis) şi adjunctul (care este omisibil fără să dezorganizeze comunicarea).
- se poate manifesta şi în structuri cu 2 regenți: NP (Casa este mare.), complement secundar (Îl învață poezia.), predicativ suplimentar (El vine preot la noi în sat.), circumstanţial opoziţional (În loc de el a venit soră-sa.), cumulativ (Pe lângă el a venit şi soră-sa.), sociativ (Plec împreună cu ceilalți.), de excepție (În afară de el n-a mai venit nimeni.).

G.A.L.R. discută poziția sintactică de atribut circumstanțial ca pe o relație de dependență complexă: Băiatul, speriat, a luat-o la goană. – adj. este subordonat sintactico-semantic subst., dar depinde semantic şi de verb.

Spunem că un cuvânt este subordonat altuia (regent) sau o propoziție se subordonează alteia (regentă), când acestea depind gramatical de cuvântul sau de propoziția respectivă.

Relația de dependență reprezintă relația fundamentala în funcție de care se organizează informația care se comunică. Se caracterizează prin existența unui termen obligatoriu exprimat și neadmisibil (denumit regent, a cărui absență determină dezorganizarea enunțului) și a unui termen dependent, care, de regulă, poate fi omis.

Absența termenului dependent anulează relația de dependență, dar nu dezorganizează enunțul privit ca unitate sintactică (compară: Văd o floare frumoasă./ Văd o floare.; Vine la București./ Vine.).

Modalități specifice de realizare a relației de dependență:

După nivelul lingvistic la care acționează, mijloacele care participă la exprimarea relațiilor de dependență pot fi fonetice, morfologice şi sintactice.

- Mijloacele fonetice care participă la exprimarea relațiilor de dependență, atât la nivel sintagmatic, cât şi la nivel frastic, sunt accentul, intonația şi pauza (mijloace prozodemice), componente inerente comunicării orale, precum şi semnele ortografice şi de punctuație, ocurente în comunicarea scrisă.
- Accentul pune în evidență o anumită silabă, prin durată, înălțime şi intensitate. De exemplu, în enunțul: Iar cérul este tatăl meu, Şi mumă-mea e márea. – funcția de subiect este deosebită de cea de nume predicativ prin accentul care evidențiază cuvintele cerul, respectiv marea. Tot prin accent se diferențiază subiectul de vocativ: Ileana citește vs. Ileana, citește!
- Intonația, ca variație melodică a timbrului vocal, este prezentă în orice act de comunicare orală şi participă nemijlocit la semnificație. La nivel sintactic, intonația constituie unicul mijloc de diferențiere a enunțurilor asertive de cele interogative: Ai ajuns acasă. vs. Ai ajuns acasă?, a enunțurilor interogative de cele exclamative: Cine a mai văzut așa ceva? vs. Cine a mai văzut așa ceva!
- Pauza, ca marcă a limitei unei articulații a discursului, se manifestă în zonele de incidență ale unităților sintactice, asigurând împreună cu accentul şi intonația decupajul şi receptarea analitică a enunțului. Astfel, în cazul frazei: Când a plecat el avea zece ani. - decupajul se poate face în mai multe feluri rezultând semnificații diferite: Când a plecat el / avea zece ani. sau Când a plecat / el avea zece ani. Pauza poate funcționa şi ca indice extern de predicație: Vorba lungă, boală curată.

Mijloacele morfologice au ca formă de manifestare variația de expresie a cuvintelor, adică flexiunea.

Modalitățile prin care mijloacele morfologice se implică în exprimarea relațiilor sintactice de dependență, atât la nivel sintagmatic, cât şi la nivel frastic, sunt recțiunea şi acordul.

La nivelul propoziției: prin acord, recțiune, joncțiune (prepoziții) şi topică.

a. Flexiunea – (schimbarea formei cuvântului), de exemplu, cazurile oblice la substantive sau pronume marchează dependența unui cuvânt de altul (culoarea cerului, povestesc copilului, citesc cartea, meseria lui).
b. Acordul – adică potrivirea de formă (gen, număr, caz, persoană) între cuvântul subordonat şi regentul său (casă albă, copii sănătoşi). Un tip special de acord (reciproc) se realizează între subiect şi predicat. Acesta din urmă impune subiectului cazul nominativ, iar predicatul se acordă în număr şi persoană cu subiectul (el scrie, ei scriu).

Raportul sintactic dintre subiect şi predicat are unele particularități, motiv pentru care este considerat un raport de interdependență: predicatul stă la persoana şi numărul pe care le impune subiectul (Noi mergem la şcoală. Tu eşti inteligent); când numele predicativ este un adjectiv, acesta se acordă cu subiectul în gen şi număr (Rezolvarea este dificilă. Copiii sunt cuminți).

Acordul după înțeles.

Uneori, când subiectul propoziției este un substantiv colectiv, urmat de un determinant la plural indicând membrii acestei colectivități se dă prioritate înțelesului şi verbul se acordă cu acest al doilea substantiv, care impune ideea de pluralitate: Mulțimea beneficiarilor au reclamat că lucrările nu s-au terminat la timp. Majoritatea elevilor au răspuns foarte bine la examen.

Când subiectul este pronumele fiecare, însoțit sau nu de o determinare la plural, el poate fi acordat cu un predicat la plural, dacă în propoziție există un complement distributiv: Au sădit fiecare câte un pom în grădina școlii. Când subiectul este nici unul (echivalent cu toți) verbul poate sta la plural: Nici unul nu știam poezia pe dinafară.

Acordul prin atracție.

Uneori predicatul nu se acordă cu subiectul lui, cum ar fi normal, ci cu un alt cuvânt mai apropiat ca poziție de predicat şi care se impune atenției. Este vorba, în acest caz, de acord prin atracție: De exemplu, există tendința de a acorda verbul nu cu subiectul său, ci cu numele predicativ: Subiectul piesei erau trandafirii* (şi nu era trandafirii – cum ar fi corect). Două milioane de lei este o sumă mare* (şi nu sunt o sumă mare – cum ar fi corect)

Aceste construcții sunt greșite. În ciuda acestui fapt, ele sunt din ce în ce mai frecvente astăzi: În ce privesc declarațiile martorilor, acestea coincid.* Ce-s cu banii ăştia pe masă?* Acordul după înțeles şi mai ales cel prin atracție sunt abateri de la normele limbii literare, deşi există unele situații când acestea sunt tolerate: A fost odată un moş şi o babă…

c. Recțiune - adică subordonatul stă la forma flexionară pe care o impune regentul său (telefonez colegilor (dativ), redactez o scrisoare (acuzativ)). În recțiune, termenul regent impune termenului dependent anumite restricții gramaticale (cazuale şi de selectare a prepozițiilor). Relația de interdependență presupune şi recțiune (vb. impune nominalului cazul N); o serie de verbe au regim special prin care impun anumite cazuri: a conta pe, a depinde de; subordonarea față de un adj./adv. uneori impune cazul D: drag cuiva, util cuiva. G A L R menționează şi unele adverbe care cer atât D, cât şi Ac: El se purta aidoma tatălui său/El se purta aidoma cu tatăl său.

- juxtapunere – sau simpla alăturare a celor două cuvinte, fără element de legătură (Radu, fratele meu…, plecăm mâine). Spunem că doi termeni sunt juxtapuşi atunci când sunt plasați unul lângă altul, fără ca între ei să existe un element de coordonare sau de subordonare.

Acești termeni pot fi cuvinte, grupuri de cuvinte sau propoziții: De pe faleză admiram cerul, marea, apusul de soare. El intră ca o furtună, se repede la telefon, formează un număr. El a ajuns foarte târziu: avusese o pană de cauciuc.

- joncțiunea – legătura se realizează prin prepoziții care preced cuvântul subordonat (floare de cireş, vine spre casă, apare la geam, vorbeşte despre tine).
- aderența – mijlocul prin care o unitate sintactică dependentă intră în relație cu un regent, prin simpla alăturare, fără a implica prezența unor mărci gramaticale sintetice sau analitice. Se manifestă numai la nivel sintagmatic şi angajează, în general, părți de propoziție exprimate prin părți de vorbire neflexibile.

Prin aderență se exprimă, spre exemplu, dependența unui adverb față de un regent verbal, nominal sau adjectival: Toamna se numără bobocii. Vorbeşte repede. Mersul cu fața înapoi îl amețeşte. Era condus de sentimente profund umane.

- topica – sau ordinea cuvintelor poate marca funcția sintactică a acestora, de exemplu, în: „Lupul vede oaia.” - lupul este subiectul (în nominativ), iar oaia este complement direct (în acuzativ). În: „Oaia vede lupul”, raporturile sunt inversate.

Concluzii

Cuvântul este considerat unitatea de bază în gramatica tradițională. Termenul ca atare are accepții diferite, în funcție de palierul de analiză a limbii. Cuvintele sunt considerate unități total abstracte la nivelul limbii, ale căror unice proprietăți sunt acelea de a avea funcții combinatorii şi de contrast. La nivelul vorbirii ele se realizează ca grupuri sau complexe de elemente ale expresiei (din punct de vedere fonologic). Pentru toți cei care acceptă cuvântul ca unitate fundamentală a limbii (şi ei formează cvasiunanimitatea lingviştilor) el este tratat sub aspectul flexiunii. Flexiunea (morfologia) se ocupă de structura internă a cuvintelor. Flexiunea este corelată cu sintaxa, care îşi propune să explice „modul în care cuvintele se combină pentru a forma propoziții”. Noțiunea de bază a sintaxei este propoziția. În accepția lingvisticii moderne, din gramatică fac parte numai flexiunea şi sintaxa, şi nu întregul studiu al limbii, cum a fost considerată ea din cele mai vechi timpuri de către greci, cu deosebire, dar şi de Pānini, în gramatica limbii sanscrite. Gramatica tradițională, numită şi „noțională” pornește de la ipoteza că există categorii universale ale gramaticii – „părțile de vorbire” şi „categoriile gramaticale” (timpul, modul, genul, numărul ş.a.), valabile pentru toate limbile. Datorită corespondențelor dintre modurile de „a fi” şi de „a semnifica” este posibilă cunoaşterea lumii.

O altă consecință a analizei semnului lingvistic în perspectiva raportului dintre signifiant şi signifié este demonstrația că legătura dintre ele este arbitrară şi, prin extrapolare, semnul lingvistic este considerat drept arbitrar. Cercetarea limbii a fost plasată într-o dublă perspectivă de abordare, sincronică / diacronică în funcție de considerarea fenomenelor pe axa de simultaneitate (analiza sincronică, descriptivă) sau de succesivitate (analiza diacronică, istorică). În primul caz, lingvistul analizează relațiile existente între elementele limbii la un moment dat, iar în al doilea caz se fac referiri la etape cronologic anterioare. Limba în sine este considerată de Saussure lineară, ea nu permite producerea sau receptarea simultană a două elemente, ci ele se ordonează totdeauna într-un şir, mai mult sau mai puțin extins, numit sintagmă. Sintagma alături de paradigmă („expresie sau rezultat al raporturilor asociative, paradigmatice pe care orice element lingvistic îl suscită în vorbitor sau ascultător”) sunt factorii fundamentali ai mecanismului limbajului uman. Valoarea fiecărui element dintr-o sintagmă depinde de contrastul creat față de elementul care îl precedă şi de cel care îi succedă, funcția sa în limbă este determinată de opoziție. Afirmația „dans la langue il n'y a que des différences” este fundamentală pentru lingvistica modernă. Ideile lui Saussure au avut cel mai mare impact în lingvistică, dar şi în cultura mondială, chiar dacă au trebuit să treacă câteva decenii până să se impună definitiv.

Performanțele obținute de omenire pe multiple planuri sunt roade ale eforturilor depuse de aceasta de-a lungul istoriei. Ele n-ar fi fost posibile dacă n-ar fi existat cuvintele, semnele lingvistice, care să transmită prin viu grai sau în scris, de la o generație la alta, de la un individ la altul, idei, informații. Pentru ca o informaţie (mesaj) să poată fi transmisă, ea trebuie să fie codificată. Acest proces se realizează, cel mai ades, prin intermediul limbii, care este un cod, un ansamblu de semne cu o organizare proprie, ce funcționează după anumite reguli. Persoana care codifică informația şi transmite mesajul are rol de emițător, iar cea care primește semnalele şi le decodifică are rol de receptor. Aceste roluri se schimbă în procesul comunicării, emițătorul devenind receptor şi invers. Semnele utilizate în transmiterea informației trebuie să fie cunoscute atât emițătorului, cât şi receptorului.

THE TRAGEDY OF A BORDER-CROSSER IN ANDREEA RĂSUCEANU'S NOVEL VÂNTUL, DUHUL, SUFLAREA

Zinica Maria Bejan
PhD Student, UMFST „G. E. Palade" of Târgu Mureş

Abstract: Vântul, duhul, suflarea (2020), the second novel published by Andreea Răsuceanu, presents the tragedy of a man who attempts to flee the country by crossing the border and disappears in the merciless waters of the Danube. The novel explores themes such as identity, memory, and urban space – the city of Bucharest. During the communist years, in a moment of despair, G. makes a failed attempt to emigrate. His family remains under the terror of uncertainty and absence. By turning such an episode into fiction, the novel captures the consequences of this kind of tragedy: the suffering of children deprived of paternal love and the competition that arises between them for their mother's love and attention, as well as the ways in which those left behind manage to cope with absence.

The distinctiveness of the novel also lies in "a cohesion between the critic's voice and that of the prose writer, one that surpasses the elegance of the writing and the sphere of common preoccupations." The book is a remarkable blend of fiction and documentary material and stands out in contemporary prose through the numerous prizes it has received. Part of the novel depicts events set in the mid-nineteenth century, which testifies to "an organic, radical need to reconstitute states of mind, to relive, through the greatest (yet impossible) fidelity of evocation, lost time." Written partly during the period marked by the pandemic, it conveys the fear and dramatic tension that dominated that interval, thereby further intensifying the tragic dimension of the events narrated.

Keywords: identity; memory; migration; attempted escape; absence

Repere biografice și influențe în opera autoarei

Andreea Răsuceanu este o voce relevantă care se impune din ce în ce mai mult în literatura română contemporană. Cu o dublă orientare, una critică și una creativă, autoarea este plasată într-o poziție distinctă în peisajul literar românesc, fiind cea care realizează o punte între studiul academic al literaturii și ficțiunea modernă. Consolidarea numelui său în literatura contemporană s-a realizat îndeosebi prin trilogia romanescă O formă de viață necunoscută – Vântul, duhul, suflarea – Linia Kármán și prin studiile sale de geografie literară dedicate Bucureștiului, orașul natal.

Urmează, între anii 1998 și 2002, cursurile Facultății de Litere în cadrul Universității din București, iar în anul 2009 obține titlul de doctor în filologie cu teza „Mahalaua Mântulesei, drumul către modernitate." Colaborează constant cu diverse reviste literare de prestigiu precum „Viața Românească", „România literară", „Observator cultural", „Dilema veche" ș.a., unde publică cronici, interviuri, traduceri, eseuri. Începând cu anul 2017, Andreea Răsuceanu coordonează seria de literatură contemporană în cadrul Editurii Humanitas[1]. Acest traseu scoate în evidență atât calitatea de cercetător în domeniul filologiei, cât și pe aceea de scriitoare implicată în mod activ în viața literară românească.

Opera scriitoarei relevă câteva linii tematice și conceptuale recurente. Astfel, influența orașului natal se manifestă pregnant, Bucureștiul devenind un spațiu al memoriei și al identității. Prin preocuparea sa pentru oraș, autoarea îi oferă acestuia statut de entitate cu dimensiuni sociale, istorice. Spre exemplu, în Bucureștiul literar. Șase lecturi posibile ale romanului, sunt reconstruite hărți mentale ale orașului prin lecturi variate, punând astfel în lumină șase fețe ale orașului: „există între literatură și oraș o serie de nebănuite, imperceptibile legături insuficient exploatate pînă acum. Dacă literatura dezvăluie o altă modalitate de raportare la spațiul urban, reciproca e și ea valabilă: orașul îl învață pe cel care îl citește să înțeleagă astfel literatura. Perspectiva celui care caută în Bucureștiul de astăzi rudimentele orașului din trecut va fi infinit îmbogățită de lectura unei literaturi care încearcă să-l reconstituie, la fel cum, pentru cititorul acestei literaturi, raportarea la spațiul real, concret al orașului va fi una diferită."[2]

O literatură dinamică, care să permită cititorului să perceapă toposul în care se desfășoară evenimentele relatate ca pe un palimpsest de sensuri propune și romanul pe care îl vom avea în vedere în cele ce urmează - Vântul, duhul, suflarea; se observă și aici aceeași multitudine de valențe puse pe seama unui spațiu devenit „personaj". C-ul, un sat din apropierea Dunării, funcționează ca spațiu genealogic, loc în care se sedimentează istoria familiei; ca topos al repetării producând peste generații alte exiluri, alte dispariții sau ca spațiu al patriarhatului care se destramă, lăsând în urmă familia. În plus, pe măsură ce se derulează evenimentele, acțiunea se mută treptat în spațiul urban. Se conturează în felul acesta imaginea unui oraș post-comunist privit în permanență prin comparație cu lumea rurală din C.. Lumea urbană devine treptat expresia unui aer greu de respirat, dominat de spații tranzitate și haos, care în loc să ofere stabilitate identitară, accentuează impresia de rătăcire. Cu toate că, așa cum mărturisea tocmai autoarea, satul C.[3] este construit literar pornind de la un topos real, legat biografic de autoare, el apare în roman ficționalizat și anonimizat prin inițiala C., tocmai pentru a funcționa ca topos literar, nu doar ca simplă localizare geografică: „De fiecare dată, atunci cînd credeam că proiectul satului C. s-a încheiat, mai descopeream niște documente care îmi revelau elemente legate de topos-ul adevărat, real, care mi-a inspirat acest sat, și astfel îmi veneau noi idei."[4] Satul devenit material de ficțiune este abordat printr-o sensibilitate teoretică asumată, justificată prin preocuparea autoarei pentru geocritică[5], studiul literaturii prin intermediul spațiului. Astfel, toposul nu rămâne doar un fundal, ci devine pol de semnificații.

În aceeași notă care vizează influențele biografice în scrierile Andreei Răsuceanu, se remarcă și apariția unor teme precum identitatea, relația individului cu spațiul (fie el urban, rural sau intim), limitele sinelui sau memoria personală și colectivă. Această orientare tematică oferă un caracter intim prozei sale, autoarea mărturisind „pentru mine, scrisul e un mod de a te decupla de la realitate, dar nu de tot, ci păstrând-o undeva în vizor, ca și cum ai surprinde-o cu privirea periferică, știi că e acolo, își desfășoară întâmplările și împreună cu ele înaintezi și tu, dar în același timp te detașezi și scrii despre ele."[6] Se conturează, astfel, dialectica dintre real și imaginar, trecut și prezent, public și privat.

Această polivalență (critic, eseist, prozator, traducător, editor) o înscrie pe Andreea Răsuceanu într-un registru al autorilor care nu doar creează literatură, ci contribuie activ la configurarea și medierea unei scene literare contemporane complete. Scrierile sale nu sunt doar un act estetic, ci un spațiu de reflecție identitară, socială și urbană.

Vântul, duhul, suflarea* (2020), al doilea roman publicat de Andreea Răsuceanu, prezintă tragedia unui frontierist, dispărut în nemiloasele ape ale Dunării. Romanul valorifică teme precum identitatea, memoria și spațiul urban - Bucureștiul. În anii comunismului, într-un moment de disperare, se conturează o încercare eșuată de emigrare a lui G.. Familia rămâne sub teroarea incertitudinii și a absenței. Valorificarea unui astfel de episod prin intermediul ficțiunii surprinde urmările unei astfel de tragedii: suferința copiilor lipsiți de dragoste paternă și competiția care se naște între ei pentru dragostea și atenția mamei, felul în care cei rămași în urmă reușesc să gestioneze absența. Specificul romanului este dat și de „o coeziune între vocea criticului și cea a prozatorului care depășește eleganța scriiturii și sfera preocupărilor comune."[7] Romanul este o remarcabilă îmbinare de ficțiune și document și se remarcă în proza actuală prin numeroasele premii obținute. O parte a romanului surprinde întâmplări plasate la mijloc de secol XIX, fapt care probează „o nevoie Structura narativă se construiește în jurul unei permanente interferențe între istoria personală și cea colectivă; naratoarea, Iolanda, scrie o scrisoare părinților săi adoptivi, pornind de la o fotografie din anul 1956: „Sus, pe perete, deasupra patului unde dormeam eu și Tamara, era o fotografie mare, în ramă aurie, cu noi trei. Constantin era încă de pe atunci cărunt."[9] Se remarcă, în felul acesta, încă de la început un cadru autobiografic, reflexiv, unde reconstruirea și rememorarea devin mecanismele principale de construire a sensului. Primele pagini ale romanului aduc în atenția cititorului unele elemente care vor deveni nuclee narative și imagini recurente: casa din C.; fotografia veche; figura lui Constantin, fratele aflat pe front; povestea lui G., marele înecat; biografia lui Mihalachi sau experiențele Iolandei în București. Fotografia funcționează ca un obiect-prag deoarece ea conține, în formă miniaturală, coordonatele principale ale romanului: familia, satul natal, casa, relația cu trecutul, dar și absențele sau traumele încă neexprimate.

Romanul ca palimpsest al memoriei: scrisoarea, fotografia, timpul, spațiul

Alternanța și suprapunerea unor planuri temporale organizează toate aceste elemente în funcție de trei mari etape din existența Iolandei: copilăria și adolescența în satul C., tinerețea și maturizarea în anii '80, în Bucureștiul comunist, prezentul confesiv al naratoarei / maturitatea. Prima etapă este legată de destinul membrilor familiei (Constantin - trecut prin experiența frontului; Tamara - mama adoptivă), de prezența episoadelor legate de biserică, de casa ologului (Mihalachi). Sunt inserate aici și primele semne ale presiunii politice din perioada postbelică, instaurarea regimului comunist în mediul rural. Apoi, etapa de tinerețe o surprinde pe Iolanda părăsind satul C. pentru a se pregăti să devină avocată în București. Parcursul femeii în mediul urban se constituie printr-o serie de evenimente care o vor maturiza și vor avea un rol hotărâtor în conturarea identității acesteia. Preocuparea ei pentru cariera de avocat nu o împiedică să se îndrăgostească de G., trăind profund experiența unei povești de iubire care va culmina cu tentativa bărbatului de a trece înot Dunărea, în august 1983. Etapa cuprinde și episoade care descriu atmosfera de sărbătoare în perioada comunistă: „ De fapt, aproape în fiecare an, în luna mai, de Sărbătoarea Bujorului, poarta e adusă din magazia cooperativei și montată la loc, ca delegația tovarășului să poată trece prin ea. După ce pleacă, e scoasă și dusă înapoi."[10] Prezentul confesiv al Iolandei se concentrează în jurul momentului în care este redactată scrisoarea adresată părinților adoptivi. Naratoarea este ajunsă la vârsta maturității, iar acum reia evenimentele trecutului și le reconfigurează. Este important de menționat aici faptul că acest episod situat în deschiderea romanului și care prezintă redactarea scrisorii și, implicit rememorarea unor evenimente, va realiza o relație de simetrie, fiind dublat de un episod din finalul romanului, atunci când Petru scrie o scrisoare[11] prin care reușește să adauge o nouă perspectivă asupra acelorași episoade.

Cele trei niveluri sunt parcurse printr-o succesiune de salturi, anticipări, reveniri narative. Spre exemplu, un episod din tinerețea bucureșteană este brusc întrerupt de o rememorare a unui moment din copilărie; o scenă petrecută în satul C. în perioada copilăriei naratoarei este evocată prin prisma cunoștințelor ulterioare despre G. sau despre degradarea ulterioară a lumii rurale. Ordinea povestirii nu este ordinea în care s-au produs evenimentele, ci ordinea în care Iolanda descoperă și atribuie un sens acestor evenimente, privindu-le retrospectiv: „se regăsește mereu o noțiune naivă a povestirii, ca înșirare dezlînată de evenimente. Nu se observă decât caracterul configurat, care stă la baza inteligibilității sale. În același timp se ignoră distanța pe care povestirea o instaurează între ea însăși și experiența trăită. Între a trăi și a povesti se deschide o distanță, oricît de mică. Viața este trăită, istoria este povestită."[12] Această stratificare din punct de vedere temporal oferă romanului capacitatea de a lăsa impresia unui palimpsest: fiecare revenire asupra unui episod, fiecare rememorare a sa, îi adaugă o nouă interpretare care scoate la iveală o nouă identitate a femeii care interpretează și reinterpretează episoadele cândva trăite. Copilăria petrecută în satul C. este rememorată prin perspectiva unei traume ulterioare, și anume dispariția lui G., tinerețea trăită în perioada comunistă este reinterpretată prin prisma prăbușirii regimului și a perioadei de tranziție, iar prezentul confesiv al Iolandei este fragil, marcat de conștiința apropierii de moarte.

Iolanda își asumă în mod explicit un „eu" care se adresează în mod direct unui „voi", transformând în felul acesta narațiunea într-un discurs orientat, cu un destinatar concret. În cadrul acestui discurs, fiecare rememorare este trecută și prin filtrul relației dintre naratoare și părinții săi. Reținem faptul că „persoana, înțeleasă ca un personaj într-o povestire, nu este o entitate deosebită de ‹‹experiențele›› sale. Dimpotrivă , ea împărtășește condiția identității dinamice specifice istoriei povestite. Povestirea construiește identitatea personajului, pe care o putem numi identitate narativă, elaborând-o pe cea a istoriei povestite. Identitatea istoriei este cea care constituie identitatea personajului."[13] Astfel, actul de a povesti devine aici aproape imposibil de separat de actul de a cere înțelegere sau de a se justifica. Configurarea identității Iolandei nu se face doar în fața unui probabil cititor abstract al scrisorii, ci se realizează printr-un dialog imaginar între ea și cei care i-au dat (sau, mai degrabă, i-au refuzat) apartenența familială.

Fotografia din 1956 poate fi interpretată ca fiind o însumare de simboluri deoarece concentrează un întreg scenariu. Prin faptul că imaginea vizuală este cea care declanșează fluxul narativ, romanul surprinde un caz de memorie individuală mediată de un obiect concret, cu multiple posibilități interpretative. Iolanda devine un narator cu un statut dublu: pe de-o parte, ea aparține lumii povestite, fiind personaj, iar pe de altă parte, ea aparține nivelului interpretativ fiind cea care comentează, explică, evaluează episoadele pe care le traversează.

Tonul confesiv oferit de scrisoarea adresată părinților este adesea întrerupt de momente de anchetă, care îi scot în evidență calitățile profesionale; Iolanda reconstituie în detaliu circumstanțele cazului G., urmărind retrospectiv relațiile lui cu diferite persoane, posibilele complicități, detaliile pregătirii pentru a trece înot granița, eșecul, consecințele: „Dacă ar trebui să fac un memoriu despre asta, ce aș scrie în el? [...] pârâtul G. Vasilescu, dorind să traverseze Dunărea înot [...] și apoi să meargă mai departe, în America, țara tuturor visurilor împlinite, tărâmul celor viteji, a fost reperat de grăniceri și împușcat cu un număr de trei gloanțe, dintre care unul i-a perforat plămânul drept, provocându-i răni incompatibile cu viața. Oficial, acesta s-a înecat și trupul i-a fost dus probabil în aval, spre Cazane. Neoficial, așa cum am aflat la scurtă vreme după încheierea anchetei, a fost împușcat de trei ori."[14]

În același timp, personajul-narator, Iolanda, revine în mod repetat asupra propriilor decizii, realizând o autoanaliză morală. Aceasta își pune întrebări despre ce ar fi putut face, ce a știut și nu a spus, cum se poziționează față de regimul politic al vremii. În felul acesta, privit dincolo de detaliile de anchetă pe care le oferă, romanul surprinde o latură justificativă a narațiunii, o încercare a vocii narative de a-și explica propria atitudine, propriul comportament în raport cu evenimentele: „Vom cerceta apoi în ce mod povestirea, care nu este niciodată etic neutră, se dovedește a fi primul laborator al judecății morale. Constituirea reciprocă a acțiunii și a sinelui va fi urmărită pe acest dublu versant, practic și etic, al teoriei narative."[15] Această dualitate a narațiunii îi permite protagonistei să treacă printr-un proces de evaluare internă, care îi va permite să-și reconfigureze raportul cu sine, dar și cu ceilalți: părinți, copii, G. Relatările diferitelor episoade devin astfel o formă de judecată de sine, un act care unește dimensiunea autobiografică cu cea etică.

În final, vocea narativă a Iolandei este dublată de scrisoarea lui Petru, care introduce o nouă perspectivă asupra acelorași întâmplări. Petru analizează din propria perspectivă evenimentele legate de propria evoluție și pe cele legate de G., de încercarea bărbatului de a trece Dunărea înot. Chiar dacă aparent scrisoarea lui Petru are doar funcția unui epilog, aceasta reușește să scoată în evidență caracterul polifonic al romanului, al adevărului narativ: „o alteritate care nu este – sau nu este doar – rezultatul unei comparații, un fel de alteritate constitutivă ipseității înseși. [...] ipseitatea sinelui implică alteritatea într-un grad atât de profund, încât una nu poate fi gândită fără cealaltă, încât una trece mai degrabă în cealaltă, cum s-ar spune în terminologia hegeliană. Urmărim să îi acordăm termenului ‹‹ca›› o semnificație forte, dar care să nu fie doar cea a unei comparații – sinele asemănător cu un altul – ci și cea a unei implicații – sinele în calitate de ... altul."[16] Toate experiențele Iolandei nu pot fi epuizate doar prin relatările și interpretările ei. Există un altul, Petru, care vede, interpretează și relatează altfel evenimentele; biografia Iolandei este expusă structural unui alt punct de vedere – sinele nu există decât în raport constitutiv cu un altul. Romanul pune în evidență această expunere a identității printr-un joc simetric între cele două scrisori: pe de-o parte scrisoarea-confesiune a Iolandei, care deschide textului, iar pe de altă parte scrisoarea-mărturie a lui Petru, care închide firul narativ.

Privite din perspectiva antropologiei imaginarului, spațiile principale din roman, satul C., și Bucureștiul, funcționează ca arhive ale memoriei. Acestea nu rămân cu statutul de simple decoruri, ci reprezintă adevărate depozitare de traume, speranțe, istorii. Satul C. apare ca un loc în care se concentrează episoade diverse precum viața și moartea lui Mihalachi (în capitolul în care îi poartă numele), boala lui Constantin, ritualuri de înmormântare, dar și aspecte ale istoriei (perioada Republicii Populare, epoca Dej). Satul este un loc al stratificării istorice, iar sub aparenta continuitate tradițională se ascunde ruptura, violența și adaptarea forțată la un regim politic impus.

La rândul său, Bucureștiul este reprezentat prin spații emblematice: cartierele, tribunalul, cheiul. Este interesant de observat aici corelația care se realizează între tribunal și cheiul apei, o metaforă a judecății plasate pe marginea limitei, în apropierea trecerii: „Tribunalul, locul unde pentru cei mai mulți se sfârșea ceva, era pentru mine începutul. O copie a lui apărea, răsturnată și mișcătoare, dincolo de cheiul mărginit de grilajul din fier forjat, uneori ușa grea din lemn se deschidea și cineva pășea fără să se scufunde în întunericul apei, în jos pe treptele albe, dispărând de-a lungul bulevardului. Ochiul verde al apei strângea totul în el, într-un oraș subacvatic în care oamenii se mișcau la fel ca deasupra, semafoarele clipeau, marele orologiu cu numere romane bătea orele rotunde ale zilei."[17] Asocierea celor două repere concentrează, în miniatură, temele romanului: început/ sfârșit, viață/moarte. Începutul pe care tribunalul îl reprezintă pentru Iolanda însemnă o nouă identitate: o nouă profesie, într-un loc nou - București. Este spațiul de frontieră care face trecerea de la viața în lumea rurală la cea din oraș. Copia răsturnată și mișcătoare a tribunalului sugerează că lumea din apă este o inversiune a ordinii terestre („răsturnată") și se află în continuă deformare („mișcătoare"). Cronologic, secvența este anterioară episodului explicit al dispariției lui G. în apele Dunării, însă imaginea anticipează scenariul înecului. Secvența tribunalului care se reflectă în apele Dâmboviței este o prefigurare simbolică a morții lui G., o imagine a apei întunecate, la marginea orașului, de care oamenii se apropie fără a se scufunda, dar în spatele căreia se insinuează deja figura celui care, într-o zi, se va scufunda cu adevărat. Dunărea este locul real al morții, în timp ce apa de lângă tribunal funcționează ca o arhivă simbolică a tuturor destinelor „înecate", între care figura lui G. ocupă un loc central.

În ambele cazuri, rural și urban, spațiul funcționează ca o memorie materială. Casa, biserica, tribunalul, cheiul sunt locuri care păstrează evenimentele desfășurate, iar Iolanda se întoarce la ele pentru a le analiza și a le aduce în prezentul narativ.

[17] Andreea Răsuceanu, op. cit., p. 29.

Semnificațiile romanului nu pot fi separate de reflecția asupra timpului și a morții. Figura marelui absent, G., marchează o ruptură profundă în existența Iolandei. Dispariția lui nu este doar un eveniment, ci va deveni un reper în biografia femeii; există un înainte și după G. Scrisul femeii este, din această perspectivă, o formă de a gestiona moartea bărbatului iubit. Povestind, oferă o formă atemporală vieții, o face transmisibilă, iar relatarea nu este doar pentru sine, ci și pentru ceilalți (părinți, copii), iar prin extensie, pentru memoria colectivă a unei epoci.

Figurile imaginarului: vântul, duhul, suflarea, apa, casa

Romanul configurează un sistem de imagini care organizează atât biografia Iolandei, influențată de dispariția lui G., cât și reprezentări ale istoriei colective. Se remarcă o rețea de simboluri care traversează cele două regimuri ale imaginarului (diurn și nocturn), integrându-se în procedee narative specifice.

Titlul romanului funcționează ca o însumare de simboluri prin intermediul celor trei substantive: vânt, duh, suflare. Acestea fac trimitere la registrul aerian care, în antropologia imaginarului, este asociat cu mobilitatea, evanescența, dar și cu ideea de spirit, inspirație. Vântul este forța invizibilă care pune în mișcare lumea; duhul reprezintă dimensiunea religioasă; iar suflarea desemnează viața ca vibrație fragilă. Semnificațiile acestei triade apar în roman sub diferite forme. Vântul poate fi corelat cu mișcările de trecere (de la sat la oraș, peste Dunăre, dintr-o epocă în alta), dar și cu sentimentul de instabilitate și precaritatea care însoțește aceste deplasări. Duhul trimite pe de-o parte la dimensiunea religioasă (ritualurile bisericii din C., preotul), dar și la cei morți care continuă să existe în amintirea Iolandei (G., Constantin, ologul). Suflarea poate fi corelată cu actul povestirii, iar scrisoarea Iolandei poate fi văzută ca o încercare de a da suflare, prin cuvinte, celor dispăruți. Triada aeriană se situează la granița dintre regimul diurn (înălțare, transcendență, elan) și regimul nocturn (disoluție, dispersare, coborâre)[18]. Romanul scoate în evidență tocmai ambivalența acestor imagini; vântul poate purta spre libertate, dar poate și spulbera; duhul poate și consolator, dar și neliniștitor; suflarea poate sugera viață, dar și iminența stingerii.

Simbolistica elementelor aeriene este dublată de un imaginar acvatic centrat pe figura lui G., mare absent, marele înecat. Romanul prezintă în detaliu încercarea acestuia de a trece granița înot și consecințele eșecului său. Dunărea devine, astfel, o axă simbolică în roman; este o apă care separă și unește, o frontieră nu atât politică, cât existențială. În regimul nocturn al imaginarului, apa este asociată cu matricialul, cu o întoarcere la origini, fără a se exclude însă pericolul înecului, al dizolvării. Încercarea personajului de a traversa Dunărea poate fi interpretată ca o încercare de renaștere într-o altă lume; o moarte simbolică în România comunistă pentru o naștere simbolică în libertatea occidentală. Însă, eșecul transformă posibilitatea unei renașteri într-o moarte violentă, iar Dunărea, din râu de graniță devine limită absolută.

Discursul Iolandei despre G. nu reprezintă doar evocarea unei iubiri pierdute, ci reflectă sentimente de vinovăție și complicitate. În jurul înecului se organizează memoria femeii, iar scrisoarea către părinți poate fi văzută ca o încercare de a încadra tragicul eveniment într-o poveste coerentă. Dunărea nu este singurul element al imaginarului acvatic. Apa din apropierea tribunalului (Dâmbovița) dublează semnificațiile apei ca spațiu al judecății și al sentinței. Din punct de vedere imagologic, Dunărea însumează o serie de reprezentări ale frontierei comuniste: râu păzit, loc al tentativelor de fugă, martor mut al corpurilor dispărute.

Un alt nucleu imagologic important îl reprezintă casa, locuințele bucureștene ale Iolandei, dar mai ales casa din C.. Fiind un element central al regimului nocturn, casa este strâns legată de ideea de adăpost și protecție. În C., acest spațiu domestic concentrează memoria familiei și a comunității, devenind un reper biografic de care Iolanda se desprinde atunci când pleacă la București. Reconstituirea detaliilor casei nu are valoare descriptivă, ci îndeplinește o funcție de ancoră identitară: „Nu m-am gândit niciodată la lucrurile din camera mare de la C. așa cum mă gândesc acum.”[19]

Prin tehnica contrapunctului sunt prezentate apartamentele bucureștene în care Iolanda trăiește la început ca studentă, apoi ca tânără avocată. Sunt spații mai puțin stabile, marcate de tranzit și de improvizație. Se remarcă o legătură între casă și pântece prin referințele recurente la maternitate. Interiorul domestic devine, astfel, un loc marcat de o tensiune permanentă între protecție și pericol; aici se nasc copiii, dar tot aici se transmit traumele.

Identitate, alteritate și memorie narativă

Tema identității și relațiile dintre personaje sunt redate pe parcursul romanului prin câteva elemente cheie, identificabile în anumite secvențe. Memoria și identitatea personală sunt evidențiate în felul în care autoarea valorifică propriile amintiri pentru a construi firul narativ. Din perspectiva hermeneuticii narative, identitatea nu reprezintă un dat fix, ci se construiește ca rezultat al unei configurări în timp; din perspectiva imagologiei, identitatea se definește întotdeauna în raport cu alteritatea, fie ea internă sau externă. Romanul Andreei Răsuceanu ilustrează într-un mod exemplar această dublă determinare. Sinele Iolandei se constituie prin povestire și printr-o continuă raportare la imaginile celorlalți.

În debutul romanului, Iolanda apare într-o fotografie alb-negru, împreună cu Tamara și Constantin, în fața casei din C.. Imaginea sugerează o identitate aparent stabilă, un copil integrat într-o familie, în centrul unui univers domestic. Totuși, câteva pagini mai târziu, aflăm că această identitate este marcată de fisuri (Iolanda încă oscilează între a se considera sau nu fiica Tamarei).

Această primă imagine corespunde mai degrabă unde identități de tip idem, un cineva care poate fi identificat prin nume, vârstă, un același în timp din perspectiva continuității și a asemănării. Pe măsură ce narațiunea înaintează, Iolanda analizează această ipostază fixată inițial cu propria sa devenire. Identitatea sa devine acum una de tip ipse, strâns legată de asumarea unor decizii, rupturi și promisiuni, trădări și fidelități. Identitatea narativă devine deci ipseitatea construită din povestea prin care protagonista își analizează trecutul, prezentul și viitorul, în permanent raport cu sine și cu ceilalți. Personajele trec printr-un amplu proces de rememorare a evenimentelor semnificative, în acest fel urmărind înțelegerea propriilor identități „Atunci lucrurile erau încă vii, aveau viața lor proprie, respirau. Erau altele în funcție de fiecare moment al zilei. Nu erau la fel, fiecare casă arăta diferit."[20] După rememorarea unor momente-cheie (îndrăgostirea de G., mutarea împreună, hotărârea lui de a fugi din țară) se conturează pentru Iolanda o identitate deloc liniștitoare, marcată de vinovăție, îndoială și nostalgie.

Din punct de vedere imagologic, Iolanda interiorizează și imaginea pe care ceilalți o au despre ea. Ea este fata luată de la sat și adusă la oraș, studentă serioasă, la început de carieră, femeia unui absent, un posibil complice al fugarului și mama unui băiat care își caută propriul drum. Toate aceste perspective care se conturează asupra ei funcționează ca straturi ale identității sale. Prin acea scrisoare, femeia încearcă să suprapună aceste straturi într-o singură imagine, unindu-le sub o singură voce, o singură ipostază.

Construirea propriei identități este strâns legată de modul în care Iolanda se raportează la o serie de personaje, cu rol decisiv în conturarea identității sale. G., iubitul, fugarul, înecatul, reprezintă cea mai puternică figură a alterității. Inițial, acesta reprezintă accesul la o lume nouă, la un nou mod de a trăi. El reprezintă libertatea, riscul și refuzul de a se supune unui sistem politic. După înec, acesta devine un „duh" care bântuie întreaga narațiune. Identitatea Iolandei se definește permanent în raport cu acest mare absent, acum e iubita unui fugar care a pierit în apele Dunării, poate părtașă prin tăcere. Copilul Iolandei reprezintă un alt tip de „celălalt"; acesta aparține unei alte epoci, având alte repere morale și politice. Este un altul care moștenește, dar și judecă. Dialogul mamă-fiu reprezintă pentru femeie o ultimă încercare de a rescrie propria viață. În final, ea nu mai vorbește doar pentru părinți și pentru sine, ci se adresează acum viitoarei generații, căreia îi revine responsabilitatea de a decide ce și cât păstrează din toată această memorie.

Secțiunea dedicată identității și alterității nu poate trece cu vedere dimensiunea colectivă a memoriei. Romanul arată cum diverse biografii individuale sunt unite de imaginarul social al epocii.

Identitatea colectivă este ilustrată prin secvențele care surprind interacțiunea între locuitorii orașului sau în anumite momente când se evocă evenimente care au avut un impact semnificativ asupra comunității „În serile de vară, vecinii se adunau pe băncuțele din fața blocului, povestind despre vremurile trecute. Fiecare avea câte o istorie de spus."[21] Spațiul urban pus în legătură cu identitatea, fie ea colectivă sau individuală, se evidențiază prin secvențele care descriu în detaliu Bucureștiul și modul în care acest spațiu influențează mai mult sau mai puțin personajele: „Întotdeauna mi-a plăcut Bucureștiul, poate pentru că e locul în care am fost pentru prima dată liberă, orașul libertății, al speranței, pentru mine Bucureștiul era țara tuturor posibilităților, un tărâm pentru cei viteji (...) Aici puteam în sfârșit să nu fiu nimeni, aici nu mai puteau să-mi strige de după gard, ca în copilărie, la C., orfana, eram a lui, a orașului, la fel ca toți ceilalți trecători de pe Bulevardul Unirii."[22] Romanul surprinde într-un mod remarcabil și aspecte legate de reflecție și auto-descoperire, personajele fiind surprinse în anumite secvențe încercând să înțeleagă cine sunt în prezent și în ce mod au fost modelate de către trecut. Aceste momente de căutare a identității se conturează în jurul unor momente cruciale din viața personajelor „La ce mă uit când mă uit la tine? La tine sau la amintirile mele despre tine? (...) O imagine a vulnerabilității noastre eterne, de ființe aflate la mila unei forțe enorme, necunoscute, pe care am simțit-o urmărindu-mă ca o umbră toată viața."[23] Toate elementele amintite anterior (casa din C., tribunalul, Dunărea ș.a.) sunt semnele unei memorii sociale care depășește sfera strict personală. Prin urmare, identitatea Iolandei se construiește navigând printre aceste discursuri colective.

Problema identității, așa cum este surprinsă în romanul pus în discuție, scoate la iveală și caracterul dual al acestui concept. Astfel, personajele create de autoare trăiesc adesea prinse între două lumi, marcate de trecut și prezent. În acest mod, iese la iveală complexitatea trăirilor umane, dar și dramatismul accentuat „Primele amintiri cu tine sunt de când am început școala. Înainte de asta ești o absență, un gol decupat în fotogramele din mintea mea, majoritatea din curtea galbenă de la C., cu Tamara învârtindu-se în praful curții și umbra lui Constantin undeva în fundal, pe o bancă de lemn aproape acoperită de niște crini imperiali uriași, mult mai înalți ca mine. De fapt, suntem mereu înapoi acolo, în salonul neonatologie-prematuri de la spitalul Colțea, aripa dinspre Teatrul Național. Nu plecăm niciodată din locurile în care am fost cândva."[24]

Analizat dintr-o perspectivă pluridisciplinară, îmbinând elemente specifice antropologiei imaginarului, hermeneuticii narative și imagologiei literare, romanul Vântul, duhul, suflarea se conturează ca un palimpsest al memoriei urbane, iar spațiul, C.-ul și apoi Bucureștiul, devine un loc al rescrierii identității.

MEMORY, TRAUMA AND ETHICAL CONSCIOUSNESS IN MIHAIL SEBASTIAN'S DIARY

Maria-Nicoleta Pop
PhD Student, Technical University of Cluj-Napoca

Abstract: This paper examines Mihail Sebastian's Diary (1935–1944) as a paradigmatic text of ethical memory in twentieth-century Romanian literature. Drawing on cultural memory studies (Jan and Aleida Assmann), Lévinas's ethics of otherness, and Ricoeur's philosophy of testimony, the study highlights the transformation of historical trauma into moral reflection. Sebastian's diary transcends the confessional genre, functioning both as a document of human vulnerability and as an ethical archive of conscience. In a time of exclusion and hatred, the author maintains lucidity and empathy, thus turning literature into an act of moral resistance.

1. Introducere. Contextul istoric și statutul Jurnalului

Publicat postum în 1996, Jurnalul (1935–1944) al lui Mihail Sebastian reprezintă una dintre cele mai importante mărturii diaristice din literatura română modernă. Scris pe parcursul unui deceniu marcat de radicalizare politică, de marginalizarea evreilor în spațiul public românesc și de violențele celui de-Al Doilea Război Mondial, textul capătă valoare dublă: documentară și existențială.

Prin caracterul său fragmentar, lucid și lipsit de orice emfază, Jurnalul se distinge de alte texte diaristice contemporane, funcționând ca un laborator al lucidității morale, nu doar ca un spațiu intim al confesiunii.

Mihail Sebastian (1907–1945), una dintre cele mai complexe figuri intelectuale ale perioadei interbelice, se definește printr-un paradox cultural: profund atașat valorilor românești și, totodată, respins de mediile în care a activat. Autorul trăiește simultan experiența apartenenței și a excluderii – dualitate care se reflectă în întreaga sa operă, dar atinge expresia supremă în Jurnal.

Textele lui Sebastian au fost adesea citite în cheia „cazului evreului român", însă Jurnalul depășește granițele identitare, devenind o cronică a conștiinței în epocă de criză. În contextul anilor '30–'40, dominat de discursuri ale urii, Sebastian notează cotidianul fără a-l dramatiza, transformând scrisul într-un gest de conservare a demnității.

Din perspectivă teoretică, lucrarea se înscrie în tradiția jurnalelor morale europene (André Gide, Albert Camus, Henri-Frédéric Amiel), dar și în paradigma „memoriei culturale" formulată de Jan și Aleida Assmann[1]. Aceștia definesc memoria culturală drept un mecanism social de transmitere a experiențelor colective prin texte, imagini și simboluri. În acest sens, Jurnalul funcționează ca o arhivă etică, fixând în limbaj trauma unei generații.

2. Jurnalul ca arhivă a memoriei culturale

Unul dintre cele mai relevante aspecte ale textului lui Sebastian este funcția sa mnemonică. Autorul nu scrie doar pentru sine, ci pentru o posteritate care va avea nevoie să înțeleagă. Memoria nu este, aici, nostalgie, ci act moral. În fiecare notă de jurnal se simte intenția de a salva din uitare gesturile de cruzime și de umilință colectivă, dar și momentele de bunătate discretă.

Într-un fragment emblematic, Sebastian consemnează: „Trăiesc – şi aşa a fost totdeauna – trăiesc într-o stupidă serie de visuri, trecînd dintr-unul într-altul, şi nu sunt în stare să mă trezesc la realitate. În jurul meu sunt atîţia oameni, dintre cei mai simpli, dintre cei mai comuni (Ficu Pascal, Willy Şeianu, Nene Zaharia, Nene Moritz, Manolovici, Ficu Cahane, Iosi Rosen...), atîţia oameni care, sub aceleaşi adversităţi, cu aceleaşi piedici, reuşesc totuşi să-şi facă loc, să se menţină la suprafaţă, să cîştige bani, să trăiască. Eu singur mă dau la fund, dezarmat, învins, resemnat, incapabil de un gest, de o sforţare. De prea multă scîrbă, de prea multă silă, ca să uit, ca să rabd, ca să mă ameţesc mă refugiez în tot felul de ridicule visuri, pe care le urmăresc zile întregi cu ochii deschişi. Mă văd la Geneva, avînd un milion de franci elveţieni (alteori numai 300 de mii, sau 100, sau numai 30 de mii), mă stabilesc cînd în vechea mea cameră de la «Cornavin», cînd într-un apartament de pe lac (apartamentul lui Igiroşeanu), cînd la Lausanne, cînd la Nyon. Mă văd la Londra, redactor la B.B.C., cu 40 de lire pe lună, lucrînd toată ziua la British Museum şi plecînd în vacanţe fumurii, undeva la mare. Mă văd pe frontul rusesc, trimis special al unui ziar american sau londonez, unde, se înţelege, sunt redactor. Mă văd la New York şi pe urmă – obosit de prea mult zgomot – retras într-un oraş de provincie, unde scriu piese de mare succes, care se joacă pe Broadway – dar eu nici nu am curiozitatea să le văd. Stau acasă singur, cu un radio puternic şi un patefon sistematic şi cu sute de discuri, Bach, Mozart, Beethoven. Am un automobil cu care cutreier regiuni necunoscute de provincie americană. Mă văd cu Nadia la New York sau în California, dar am oarecari plictiseli, fiindcă nu mă prea înţeleg cu părinţii ei. Mă văd pe un yacht plecat spre Alexandretta, spre Egipt, Palestina, în Pacific, un yacht mic pe care ne aflăm doar 10-12 oameni. Suntem săraci dar curagioşi şi în fiecare port unde ne oprim lumea ne primeşte cu simpatie şi curiozitate. Eu scriu preşedintelui P.E.N. Clubului o scrisoare în care îi arăt că sunt membru al asociaţiei, că sunt scriitor în exil şi, drept urmare, sunt chemat să ţin o conferinţă (cu mare succes de bani) despre viaţa noastră de bord – conferinţă pe care apoi o repet în fiecare port unde ne oprim..."[2] Se concentrează etica memoriei la Sebastian, aceea de a păstra amintirea fără a o transforma în resentiment.

Teoria memoriei culturale afirmă că amintirea colectivă este întotdeauna o construcție narativă, o formă de selecție și reinterpretare a trecutului. „Atât în memoria personală, cât și în cea culturală există o acută lipsă de spațiu. Cu cât capacitatea este mai limitată, cu atât selecția devine mai importantă și, prin urmare, cu atât conținutul devine mai valoros”[3].

Jurnalul lui Sebastian exemplifică acest proces: evenimentele istorice (pogromurile, epurările universitare, cenzura) sunt înregistrate printr-o perspectivă personală, dar dublată de conștiința responsabilității publice.

Astfel, textul funcționează ca memorie contrară (în sensul lui Todorov[4]): o memorie care se opune uitării oficiale și care reface, din fragmente, o istorie morală a umanității. Scrisul devine o formă de supraviețuire spirituală, o „arhivă a lucidității”, cum a numit-o Nicolae Manolescu[5].

Memoria, la Sebastian, nu este doar instrument al recuperării, ci și al rezistenței. A scrie despre nedreptate înseamnă a-i refuza triumful. De aceea, Jurnalul este mai mult decât o mărturie: este o formă de apărare a umanului, o pledoarie pentru memoria ca datorie morală.

3. Trauma și limbajul vulnerabilității

Sebastian nu utilizează termenul „traumă”, dar întreaga sa scriitură este o articulare a traumei istorice. Experiențele excluderii, ale interdicțiilor și ale fricii cotidiene sunt exprimate printr-un limbaj al reținerii, al ezitării, al tăcerilor.

Cathy Caruth consideră că „trauma nu poate fi circumscrisă simplului eveniment violent ori originar din trecutul individului, ci rezidă, mai degrabă, în modul în care însăși natura ei neasimilată (…) revine ulterior, tulburându-l pe supraviețuitor.”[6]. În Jurnal, această revenire se manifestă prin reluarea temei izolării: „Patru zile de când nu mai am radio! Mă simt parcă mai singur, mai dezorientat, mai lipsit de sprijin. Vocile familiare de la Londra erau parcă voci de prieten - și mi-e greu acum când le-am pierdut. Abea astă-seară am putut asculta la Alice un buletin englezesc. Veștile sunt mereu mai proaste – dar, cel puțin pentru mine, nu neașteptate."[7]

Sebastian transformă suferința în luciditate, evitând patetismul și dramatizarea. Limbajul traumei la Sebastian este non-spectacular: el nu urlă, ci notează; nu acuză, ci constată. Această sobrietate face textul cu atât mai tulburător. Vulnerabilitatea este asumată ca resursă morală.

Teoria lui Dominick LaCapra privind „disocierea afectului și reprezentării"[8] clarifică mecanismul prin care Sebastian transformă trauma în discurs. LaCapra arată că experiența traumatică produce o ruptură internă între ceea ce poate fi simțit și ceea ce poate fi formulat, iar a traversa experiența traumei presupune articularea critică a acestei tensiuni, nu repetarea compulsivă a suferinței. În această logică, scrisul lui Mihail Sebastian funcționează ca practică de reintegrare simbolică: el consemnează durerea fără a o transforma în spectacol estetic, operând o procesare lucidă a afectului. Sebastian nu reactivează trauma prin mimetism, ci o convertește într-un act reflexiv, terapeutic, prin care intensitatea afectivă este repusă în legătură cu reprezentarea, atenuând astfel riscul disocierii paralizante identificat de LaCapra.

În plan stilistic, fraza scurtă, notele eliptice, observația impersonală creează o retorică a reținerii. În spatele sobrietății se află o imensă delicatețe morală. Jurnalul nu este un text al disperării, ci al rezistenței prin măsură.

4. Conștiința etică și alteritatea

Analiza lui Paul Ricoeur[9] privind „abuzurile memoriei naturale" distribuite pe plan patologic, practic și etico-politic oferă o cheie solidă de interpretare pentru dimensiunea etică a Jurnalului. În logica ricoeuriană, memoria nu este un dat neutru, ci un spațiu tensionat între absența faptului trăit și prezența lui discursivă, expus manipulării, instrumentalizării sau convocării abuzive. Or, scrisul lui Sebastian răspunde tocmai acestei precarități: el nu se limitează la consemnarea evenimentelor, ci notează modul în care ele îi afectează conștiința, instituind o formă de autoanaliză morală și o supraveghere critică a propriei memorii. În acest sens, jurnalul devine arenă a confruntării dintre sine și alteritate, dintre etică și istorie, și totodată exercițiu de reprezentare responsabilă, care încearcă să restituie trecutul fără a-l falsifica și fără a-l estetiza. Astfel, scrierea lui Sebastian funcționează ca o contracarare a abuzului memorial denunțat de Ricoeur, configurând un model etic de articulare a memoriei traumatizate.

Într-o lume dominată de ură, naratorul lui Sebastian refuză să răspundă prin ură. El notează: „Va trebui să încerc a nu mă lăsa covîrşit de mizeriile vechi şi noi. Va trebui să mă adun în mine însumi. Dacă aş putea să fac şi să respect un program ordonat de lucru (lectură şi scris), poate aş reuşi să nu mă destram iar. Nu are nici un sens şi nu e de folos nimănui să reintru în exasperarea noastră comună. Sunt în infern – dar în acest infern trebuie să găsesc un colţ de singurătate. Atît cît se poate. Simplul fapt de a trece pe Sfîntu Ion Nou, unde sunt închişi deocamdată, în aşteptarea deportării, evreii ridicaţi de la domiciliu, mă sfîşie. Mi se rupe inima privind – şi mi-e ruşine să întorc capul. Sunt atrocităţi care nu pot fi privite cu ochii deschişi. E intolerabil, ca o mare durere fizică. Cuvintele nu mai ajută la nimic"[10]. Paragraful conține esența eticii sale: a înțelege nu înseamnă a scuza, ci a împiedica

"Trauma brings about a dissociation of affect and representation: one disorientingly feels what one cannot represent; one numbingly represents what one cannot feel. Working through trauma involves the effort to articulate or rearticulate affect and representation in a manner that may never transcend, but may to some viable extent counteract, a reenactment, or acting out, of that disabling dissociation."

Ces multiples formes de l'abus font ressortir la vulnérabilité fondamentale de la mémoire, laquelle résulte du rapport entre l'absence de la chose souvenue et sa présence sur le mode de la représentation. La haute problé- maticité de ce rapport représentatif au passé est essentiellement mise à nu par tous les abus de la mémoire."

repetarea răului. În această perspectivă, Jurnalul poate fi citit ca o formă de responsabilitate morală față de alteritate. Sebastian își asumă sarcina de a înțelege umanul chiar în inamicul său.
De altfel, etica lui Sebastian nu este una de superioritate, ci de empatie lucidă. El refuză orice maniheism, conștient că simplificarea duce la dezumanizare. Într-un fragment scris în 17 iunie 1941, în plin război Mihail Sebastian afirmă că: „acum totul mi se pare înghețat, încremenit, lipsit de viaţă."[11] Acesta este miezul eticii sale, o reflecție asupra fragilității morale a omului.

Astfel, conștiința etică la Sebastian nu se constituie în afara traumei, ci prin trauma: „Duminică, Ultima seară a anului. Îmi propuneam să o petrec singur acasă, lucrînd. Nu am însă destulă tărie pentru asta. Mă simt singur, indiferent, uitat. Niciodată mai mult n-am simţit că încep să fiu un celibatar. Mai rău decît celibatar."[12]. În suferință, sub presiunea fricii, gândirea morală se purifică.

5. Jurnalul între document și literatură

Deși Jurnalul are aparența unui document factual, el depășește registrul mărturiei, devenind literatură de reflecție morală. Textul se caracterizează printr-un echilibru între observația istorică și introspecția filosofică, între exactitatea cronicarului și sensibilitatea scriitorului.

Prin economia frazei și finețea observației, Sebastian realizează ceea ce putem numi o poetică a lucidității. El evită expresia afectată și cultivă tonul sobru, aproape neutru. Această neutralitate aparentă produce o tensiune etică: în spatele tonului impersonal se simte vibrația unei conștiințe vulnerabile, dar demne.

Într-un plan mai larg, Jurnalul problematizează granița dintre document și literatură, anticipând teoriile moderne despre „scriitura factualului". În sensul lui Philippe Lejeune, jurnalul este o formă hibridă în care identitatea naratorului și a personajului principal, pe care o presupune autobiografia, se marchează cel mai adesea prin folosirea persoanei întâi.[13]. La Sebastian, această hibriditate devine resursă etică: autenticitatea se câștigă prin luciditate, nu prin spontaneitate.

Prin urmare, Jurnalul se impune ca o „operă morală fără ficțiune"[14]), în care esteticul este subordonat adevărului. Literatura se regăsește nu în invenție, ci în măsura exprimării.
Această tensiune dintre document și artă explică de ce textul lui Sebastian depășește epoca. El nu scrie doar despre antisemitism sau război, ci despre condiția universală a omului care refuză să devină inuman.

6. Concluzii. Lecția umanistă a memoriei

Jurnalul lui Mihail Sebastian rămâne una dintre cele mai valoroase meditații etice din literatura română. În el se regăsește o conștiință care nu se lasă confiscată de ură, un spirit care caută înțelesul chiar în miezul durerii.

Prin scrisul său, Sebastian demonstrează că memoria nu este o simplă reconstituire a trecutului, ci un act de reparație morală. A-ți aminti devine o formă de justiție. Într-o epocă a rușinii, autorul refuză rușinea tăcerii, alegând să documenteze lucid, fără patos, fără revanșă.

În contextul literaturii europene, Jurnalul se poate alătura marilor texte de conștiință precum Cahiers de Camus, Diaries de Kafka, Notes from the Underground de Dostoievski. El oferă o lecție dublă: aceea a lucidității și a bunătății.

Actualitatea acestui text constă în forța sa morală: într-o lume contemporană în care discursurile urii revin sub forme rafinate, Sebastian rămâne o voce de echilibru, măsură și empatie. Memoria, în sensul propus de el, nu e nostalgie, ci vigilență etică.

Astfel, Jurnalul nu este doar o mărturie a trecutului, ci și un manual al demnității umane, un text care ne învață să rămânem oameni atunci când istoria pare să o interzică.

GENERIC COORDINATES AND PERSPECTIVES IN DETECTIVE FICTION. A CASE STUDY OF AGATHA CHRISTIE AND RAYMOND CHANDLER

Elena Mocanu-Paraschiv (Spătaru)
PhD Student, "Ovidius" University of Constanța

Abstract: This article examines the interplay between narrative form, ideological negotiation, and gender representation in British and American crime fiction between the two World Wars, focusing on Agatha Christie and Raymond Chandler as contrasting yet overlapping case studies. Drawing on theoretical frameworks from Booth, Todorov, Cawelti, Knight, Makinen, Light, and others, the study argues that crime fiction's generic conventions—particularly the tensions between ratiocination and mystification, realism and verisimilitude, formula and innovation—serve as cultural mechanisms through which interwar societies explored shifting norms of class, authority, and gender. While Christie's work has often been dismissed as conservative or purely puzzle-driven, critics such as Priestman, Barnard, Light, and Makinen reveal its underlying uncertainties, ideological ambivalence, and subversive treatments of femininity. Chandler's hardboiled fiction, often read as a rejection of classical detection, similarly challenges prevailing ideological assumptions through its depiction of corruption, urban modernity, and masculine vulnerability. By analyzing narrative techniques at both the micro-level (narration, perspective, clue structure) and macro-level (social anxieties, gender renegotiation, cultural doxa), this article reconsiders the two authors not as representatives of stable traditions but as active participants in reconfiguring crime fiction's formal and ideological landscape.

Keywords: Verisimilitude; ratiocination; middlebrow culture; gender negotiation; formula fiction

Important coordinates that generic structures (or subgenres) of crime fiction have to cope with are the conventions of realism, among which the effect of verisimilitude plays an important part. In the volume by Wayne C. Booth, The Rhetoric of Fiction, the illusion of realism is also to be measured in relation to degrees of narratorial reliability. In their works, both Agatha Christie and Raymond Chandler engage with such conventions, sometimes in unexpected, innovative ways, as the ultimate revelation of the unreliability of the narratorial voice in Agatha Christie's The Murder of Roger Ackroyd illustrates. James Sheppard is the novel's narrator and also serves as Hercule Poirot's assistant in a murder investigation. It is only at the end of the narrative that Hercule Poirot compels him to confess that he is the murderer in the story he has been telling as an apparently uninvolved witness. Although verisimilitude features prominently, one of the key features of realism, the reliability of the narratorial voice, is visibly undermined here.

Tzvetan Todorov's concept of verisimilitude in his Poetics of Prose involves two axes: the "rules of the genre" and "public opinion" or doxa. Both are part of generic expectations in general, and the tension between generic patters and audience expectation is also an important dimension of the rhetoric of crime fiction. According to Todorov, the expectations of generic rules depend on doxa, a regime of verisimilitude that constantly shifts according to a complex set of checks and balances characterizing discourse in general. Some genres maintain a steady level of verisimilitude by closely aligning with doxological verisimilitude, such as romantic narratives and thrillers. In Agatha Christie's mysteries or puzzles, generic rules and public doxa, or formal features and readers' expectations are included in narratives constantly playing with plot twists and leading to unexpected endings, such as in Then There Were None or the already mentioned Murder of Roger Ackroyd. Investigating the "generic rules" and doxa of a genre, particularly during periods of popular resurgence, such as the so-called Golden Age of detective fiction, reveals more about the texts in question than treating them as stable entities conforming to set patterns.

John Cawelti, in Adventure, Mystery, and Romance: Formula Stories as Art and Popular Culture, discusses, as the title shows, the generic patterns of narratives in relation to those texts that rely heavily on them. He refers to the texts adhering to the conventions of the genres (applying equally to the subgenres of adventure, mystery and romance as displaying formula stories). Cawelti argues that the evolution and change of formulas are processes through which new interests and values are assimilated into conventional imaginative structures. This process is particularly important in dynamic cultures like modern industrial societies. Formula stories affirm existing interests and attitudes by presenting an imaginary world aligned with them. For instance,

He thinks that Westerns and hard-boiled detective stories affirm that true justice depends on the individual rather than the law, showing the law's inefficiency against evil and lawless men. This confirmation helps maintain a culture's consensus about reality and morality, he believes. In my opinion, the hardboiled novel, is not particularly aimed at maintaining consensus about reality and morality, but rather to challenge them in a pluralistic community in which authority no longer goes unchecked, and where corruption is openly referred to. Illustration of the validity of this statement can be seen from as early as Chandler's The Big Sleep, published in 1939, the first novel to introduce his best-known private detective, Philip Marlowe.

Formulas, to use Cawelty's term for generic structures and to return to his argumentation, resolve tensions arising from conflicting interests or ambiguous attitudes within the culture. For example, the action of legitimated violence in Westerns resolves the tension between individualism and communal ideals of law and order, portraying the individual's violent action as a defense of the community.

Furthermore, formulas allow the audience to explore the boundary between the permitted and the forbidden. Villains in formulaic structures express, explore, and reject forbidden actions, allowing audiences to experience the temptation and rejection of these actions in a controlled way. This is a general statement that is accepted in this dissertation as the idea is that audiences are both tempted and invited to be critical of certain actions, thus avoiding total conformity and consensus, which formulaic, very conventional fiction is likely to encourage. Cawelti also notes that the representation of Indians and European settlers and pioneers in Westerns reveal how formulas can acquire new meanings while preserving their basic patterns. This capacity for assimilation is instrumental in the transition between older and newer representations, contributing to cultural continuity. Incorporating new meanings while largely preserving generic structures in a contribution to the positive aspect of social and cultural continuity is also to be observed in crime fiction in general, even in the more rebellious, more cynical hardboiled subgenre, one feels tempted to add here.

The classical detective story involves a combination of divergent elements or of elements engaging in a tense relationship, engendering suspense, temporary mystification and surprise in the narrative. They are part of what Booth calls the rhetoric of fiction. Among them the element of ratiocination features prominently. It involves the methodical, intellectual approach by means of which the detective acts in order to solve a mystery or crime, analyzing facts, drawing inferences, and constructing a logical argument leading to the truth. The element of ratiocination, which is to be traced back to Edgar Allan Poe, is essential for the readers' enjoyment of the classical detective story, inviting the audience to think, while mystification involves the deliberate creation of confusion, ambiguity, or deception within a narrative to keep readers or viewers guessing. Mystification, as part of the literary rhetoric of "control of clarity and confusion" (Booth: 284), is one of the sources of bewilderment. It's a key strategy used to build suspense, hide the truth, and lead audiences through a complex web of clues, red herrings, and misdirections. They all involve levels of intensity that audiences are invite to engage with.

These varying levels of intensity, as well as various complications, with which readers engage with detection, are very much like the various levels of realism that Wayne C. Booth refers to in his volume (Booth: 40-60) referring to the intensity of the realistic illusion and the discrimination among realisms. For Jacques Barzun, the complications are also part of the generic challenges. For him, detection and reasoning are of the highest priority, but a dose of mystification must be added to the formula in the general process of investigation to complicate the process of reading. A successful detective tale must not only be solved but also mystify the readers throughout the narrative, allowing them to suspect characters they do not wish to be guilty, before ultimately revealing the culprit to be someone the readers suspect the least. This balance between ratiocination and mystification is essential as a generic challenge to the unproblematic and smooth discovery of the truth. If either side of this balance is overstressed, the effect of the mystery narrative becomes less powerful.

Another major problem of balance in the detective tale is the proportion of inquiry to action. The heart of the classical story is the examination of clues and the questioning of suspects. To keep the apparatus of deduction and mystery central, the writer must present numerous scenes where witnesses and suspects are interviewed, without distracting from the investigation and mystification interplay. This requires ingenuity and imagination to stage the parade of clues and suspects in a way that generates excitement without detracting from the core elements. Some, like Raymond Chandler, suggest that achieving this balance is so difficult that the pure ratiocinative detective story is a very problematic genre.

The one who is in charge of the ratiocination process is the detective, with the implied author as the one providing the complications in the way the narrative is undertaken and the one assigning narratorial roles, sometimes to the character one least expects (the already mentioned narrator and assistant of Hercule Poirot in The Murder of Roger Ackroyd). Inquiry, action and narrative perspective thus contribute to the overall effect, making straightforward ideological inderpretations problematic, thus challenging audiences to consider and reconsider their doxa. Thus, narrative techniques at the so-called formal, micro-level will interweave form and function as well as ideological contexts.

Dennis Porter's analysis of American private-eye fiction provides a contrastive background for understanding Agatha Christie's detective characters. Christie's two most renowned detectives, Hercule Poirot and Miss Jane Marple, were remarkably innovative from their earliest appearance. Hercule Poirot, a foreigner (a Belgian with a French name) introduced during a period of increased xenophobia in inter-war Britain, and Miss Marple, an inquisitive spinster and, remarkably, the only female detective in the works of the four "queens" of crime fiction (Dorothy L. Sayers, Margery Allingham, and Ngaio Marsh being the other three) both deviated significantly from the straight London crime narratives that dominated late nineteenth and early twentieth-century detective fiction. During the Golden Age of detective fiction, Christie focused on one male detective, Hercule Poirot, to complete the picture already occupied by the female Miss Marple. The dissertation this project introduces will partially concentrate on the novels featuring Poirot, the most famous of Christie's detectives and a reinvention of the Sherlock Holmes archetype, but also on the Miss Marple novels, which add a more personal touch, to be examined in some of her novels under investigation in this doctoral dissertation. The choices of a male or of a female detective in Christie's novels, as well as the choice of a nasty, cynical private eye in Chandler involve gender distinctions and challenges to be explored not only in this project but in the doctoral dissertation.

The choice of Hercule Poirot further complicates the ideological pattern of the narrative. As a foreigner, his views and habits contrast sharply with the norms of polite British society, making his character particularly useful for examining issues of class. As far as I have noted so far both reading her novels and examining the bibliography, contrary to popular belief, Christie was not primarily concerned with enforcing traditional English values, although she gradually makes her peace with society by making law and order prevail in restoring order. Part of the complicated ideology which she seems to engage with, she aimed to capture the new societal pattern that emerged after World War I, in which the middlebrow became noticeable. Christie's detective fiction has thus been described as the twentieth-century version of the novel of manners, reflecting the evolving social dynamics of her time.

In his 1998 volume, Martin Priestman undertakes to survey what he considers to be the detective fiction canon. He enumerates a wide range of concerns that pervade detective fiction, with central motives as money, fear of exposure, and sexual jealousy as more than accidents in an otherwise ideologically serene middle-class world. He notices one particular perspective that one does not realize at a superficial approach to the apparently straightforward ideological format of Agatha Christie's work. He goes on to show one unexpected perspective on the British crime fiction writer's world. Priestman notes that, in addition to peaceful, comfortable, cosy upper middle-class settings and well-to-do sympathetic characters, she highlights some women characters as both victims and murderers destabilizing the apparent solidity of the environment. He claims that Agatha invoked a world of unnerving uncertainty, where only the fiction of detection brought security.

Other commentators, mostly American, seeing British middle-class respectability and order as peculiar, have dismissed Christie's novels as mere riddles. They are very much unlike Raymond Chandler's work, ludicrously artificial, reflecting the narrow, closed settings, class coordinates, and behavior typical of a southern English high bourgeois world. However, Robert Barnard has focused on textual evidence that there is recurrent conflict in this world, while Alison Light sees uncertainty as a fundamental pattern. Priestman, Barnard and Light will provide some useful starting points in the reassessment of what might be called Agatha Christie's fictional and ideological "peace of mind" of her fiction, stressing the extent to which Christie's texts go to challenge both readers and the conventions of a rapidly growing genre, while also keeping in touch with the requirements of genteel, middlebrow audiences.

Alison Light, in her volume, Forever England: Femininity, Literature and Conservatism Between the Wars, acknowledges the complex ideological influences that shaped middlebrow fiction in the period, understanding conservatism "not as a force which is simply 'anti-change' but as a species of restraint or 'brake'...holding progress back on the leash of caution but allowing it nonetheless to advance."(17). In the chapter on Agatha Christie, Light suggests that fiction of this period reworks and renegotiates outdated cultural norms even while providing distinctly conservative resolutions, offering a modern sense of the unstable limits of respectability. Merja Makinen herself, in her chapter on Agatha Christie in The Blackwell Companion to Crime Fiction notes the author's resistance to prevailing ideological assumptions, in addition to her being dismissed as a mere ingenious puzzle-plotter (Makinen, 415).

Knight's Form and Ideology in Crime Fiction offers a critical examination of the genre, focusing on its forms, narrative structures, and ideological underpinnings. His exploration of detective fiction addresses the genre's conventions, tropes, and narrative techniques, crucial for understanding how crime fiction of the interwar period engages with societal issues and ideological concerns. Knight argues that in Christie's fiction, the model of the heroic masculine detective is rejected in favor of "a system of inquiry which is self-consciously female, and also fully rational."(119). This perspective differs from earlier critics who saw aspects of the texts that subvert gendered genre norms as mere products of their creators' and readers' desire for appealing, "light" fiction.

Knight's chapter on Christie's contribution to Golden Age crime fiction is among the first critical treatments recognizing the importance of conducting a complex inquiry into crime fiction as both bourgeois literature and as a construction of a gendered methodology of detection. Knight's approach highlights how Christie's fiction manipulates the crime fiction formula to reflect the anxieties and self-consolations of her class and gender.

In Form and Ideology in Crime Fiction, taking a broad view on the genre, Knight examines how detectives function as central figures who uphold justice, unravel mysteries, and restore order in the face of social disruptions. He supports the claim that the role of the detective allows for an exploration of ideological tensions related to authority, morality, and the complexities of human behavior. Detective fiction manipulates, or at least complicates the process of reading, through suspense, misdirection, and surprise, but also through unexpected challenges to prevailing ideologies, and Christie is a case in point.

One can claim that crime fiction during the inter-war period serves as significant cultural evidence reflecting and critiquing social ideologies through the artistic vision of some of its outstanding authors, and the undertaking is determined to challenge the statement that one can clearly place one of the two main crime fiction authors here, Agatha Christie, on the side of the status quo preserving and confirming its privileged positions.

Important critical voices that examine the artistic vision and ideological underpinnings of significant landmarks of interwar detective fiction, exploring the dichotomy between highbrow and lowbrow literature are useful in sketching the overall picture against which a more focused perspective on Christie and Chandler can be achieved. Some questions are worth investigating. They are related to the ways in which crime fiction in Britain and America between World War I and World War II engaged with and challenged prevailing ideologies both at the so-called micro-level through narrative forms, narrative perspective and characterizations, and at the macro-level of prevailing ideology and reader reception.

The Golden Age of crime fiction will be over by the time that feminism's more militant second wave emerges, so a discussion of gender trouble, or undoing gender, to use the phrases in the title of two of Judith Butler's volumes, might seem out of place. Agatha Christie, despite some of the challenges to patriarchy at the level of women's roles, especially in the field of the genre she worked so assiduously to promote, as they will be examined in the subsequent sections of this dissertation, is arguably no feminist. However, a number of texts exploring gender in Christie's and Chandler's work are worth consideration.

Merja Makinen, in her work on femininity in the novels of Agatha Christie, Agatha Christie: Investigating Femininity (2006) recognizes the potential for ambivalence in Christie's representations of femininity. Using a historical approach in the examination of the various culturally defined modes of femininity in Christie's novels, Makinen argues that even though "Christie was writing during a period of intense gender renegotiation in relation to the modern world…a political conservatism did not necessarily rule out a questioning and even subversive attitude to cultural gender expectations" (Makinen: 1) also states that one of her aims is to use a wide variety of Christie's fiction in her work in order to give her readings more depth and provide a comprehensive look at the issues with which her work engages, an approach that this thesis also advocates but with a wide variety of writers and texts, as opposed to being a single-author study. In Agatha Christie: Investigating Femininity, the major claim is that, far from being a mainstream, middlebrow conservative writer legitimating and enforcing women's domestic role of what Beauvoir calls the second sex, Agatha Christie's fiction often depicts women as adventurous, independent women who renegotiate sexual relationships along more equal lines. Women are also allowed the dangerous challenge to undermine or disrupt society and yet the texts refuse to see them as doubly deviant because of their femininity. Makinen's detailed textual analysis of her work demonstrates how discreetly innovatory Agatha Christie was in regard to gender issues, an undertaking that she had started as early as the nineteen twenties and continuing all the way to the early nineteen seventies.

It is expected that the incorporation of theoretical frameworks from scholars such as Simone de Beauvoir and Susan Bordo provide a good basis for the examination of the complexities of gender representation in crime fiction. De Beauvoir's concept of gender as a social construct challenges essentialist views, opening avenues to explore how authors negotiated and contested traditional gender roles in their narratives. Bordo's critique of the gender-body duality following up on Foucault's exploration of disciplinary mechanisms further illuminate how these narratives reflect and reinforce societal norms and power dynamics.

Christie's remarkable accessibility makes her work address a wide target audience, thus occupying a large share of the middlebrow literary market. Apparently, as Richard York has other people claim, "no one needs to study Agatha Christie" (York: 1). Yet he writes a whole volume stressing the author's relevance, whose title says a lot about Agatha Christie's influence: Agatha Christie: Power and Illusion. In terms of the power of Christie's discursive practice within the framework of post-World War I society undergoing change, but still largely patriarchal, her artistic illusion has to be considered through feminist lenses as well. This will be done, first and foremost, in contradiction with the largely patriarchal competitor in the field of crime fiction, Raymond Chandler, who thought that the field of crime is no woman's business. However, the gender landscape is complex, involving both the craft of fiction (types of detectives, settings, plot, detection and mystification) and the overall cultural perspectives, including the rise of female audiences and criticism.

Christie's detective fiction addresses a rising middle class that was increasingly mobile, reflecting both stability and change in Britain's social system in the early twentieth century. The dissertation will assess to what extent Christie reinforces old gender class values, while also challenging them, showing small scale representations of the decline of rigid class boundaries. To what extent is Christie more interested in the rising ideologies of liberal Britain than in defending or promoting Victorian world views? In her Poirot novels, probably more than in the Mis Marple novels, she engages with the changing shape of British society in both a local and more general context, through a combination of the alien and of the familiar. Her "rhetoric" can be seen in connection with, and in opposition to, the dramatic changes affecting the world across the ocean, hardboiled America, both fictional and real. American Chandler's world, although here seen as overlapping with British Christie's world, is somewhat subsequent, more or less covering the New Deal years after 1930, an era of profound transformations, in which public values and private interests clashed, corruption and idealism flourished, the already mentioned fictional Gatsby and the all-too-real Al Capone rise to prominence, while on the West Coast, in the crime-ridden streets of Los Angeles, Philip Marlowe the private investigator copes with the massive rise of crime after the Prohibition years. Chandler is aware that the well-established classical detective tale or clue-puzzle was a political myth, not carrying much weight in the US, as it did not correspond to the complicated reality of an urban, industrial society dealing with the New Deal, dealing with widespread corruption as well.

DEVICES OF POLITICAL HUMOR AND MORAL SATIRE IN ALECSANDRI'S THEATRE

Oriana Suciu
PhD Student, National University of Science and Technology Politehnica Bucharest, University Center of Pitești

Abstract: Alecsandri's theatre is a different kind of chronicle of his days, which does not simulate, but rather ironically reproduces (without succumbing to the temptation of caricature) the condition of the playwright and actor in a society that is not very progress-oriented and that assumes its condition from a resigned position. It goes without saying that social and political humour is omnipresent in the construction of Alecsandri's plays, the latter being triggered by social inequities and reactions sparked by the confusion that financial status symbolically transfers the possessor a document of cultural identity and spiritual property. Marriages arranged by parents, the mockery of those returning from trips abroad towards everything that represented the authentic Romanian spirit, the brake of conservatism opposed to the attempts at modernization and natural social evolution, the corruptibility and dishonor of state representatives, the growing discontent and peasant revolts, all constitute primitive forms of humor that, in Alecsandri's theatre, manifest themselves predominantly at the conversational and situational level.

Keywords: political humor; social satire; caricature; irony; technical devices of comical plays.

Introduction

La Alecsandri, teatrul e o altfel de cronică a zilelor lui, care nu simulează, ci reproduce ironic (fără a ceda tentației tușeului caricatural) condiția dramaturgului și actorului într-o societate prea puțin orientată către progres și care își asumă condiția din poziția resemnatului.

E de la sine înțeles că umorul social și politic este omniprezent în construcția pieselor lui Alecsandri, cel din urmă declanșându-se pe baza inechităților sociale și a reacțiilor stârnite de confuzia că statutul financiar îi conferă posesorului un act de identitate culturală și de proprietate spirituală. Căsătoriile aranjate de părinți, batjocura celor întorși din călătoriile în străinătate la adresa a tot ce reprezenta spiritul autentic românesc, frâna conservatorismului în fața încercărilor de modernizare și a evoluției sociale firești, coruptibilitatea și dezonoarea reprezentanților statului, nemulțumirile crescânde și revoltele țărănești, toate constituie forme primitive ale umorului care, la Alecsandri, se manifestă cu preponderență la nivel conversațional și situațional.

Una dintre cele mai ample discutii despre teatru este aceea privind funcția esențială a acestui tip de manifestare scenică, dublată, firesc, de punerea sub semnul întrebării a utilității răsturnării raportului dintre interioritatea dislocată și acuratețea exteriorității multiplicate. Pretext pentru satiră necenzurată, instrument de șantaj politic și de orientare a opiniei publice, context de socializare și dezbatere a unor teme contemporane, aparat terapeutic de glisare a unor personalități multiple, toate constituie posibile și justificabile explicații ale fenomenului teatral. De altfel, controversa artei dramatice nu a reprezentat-o niciodată lipsa de acceptare a uneia dintre titulaturile anterior listate, ci, mai degrabă, dorința teoreticienilor de a impune una in fața celorlalte. Chiar și așa, cel mai probabil s-ar fi găsit mai lesne o soluție de conciliere dacă eforturile specialiștilor nu s-ar fi ciocnit de contextul nevoii acute de sincronizare a literaturii române cu literatura europeană.

Teatrul fiind mai puternic legat de aspectele concrete ale vieții decât orice altă formă de artă, a împrumutat, se pare, o bună parte din legile ei de ființare. Prin urmare, se poate spune că respectul de care se bucură țara în contextul politic și economic internațional devine și echivalentul aprecierii de care se bucură literatura autohtonă pe scena literară universală. Cei mici sunt obligatoriu imitatori ai dominatorilor și orice utilizare a unui motiv de circulație internațională, oricât ar fi el de valabil în contextul intern al țării, reprezintă un abuz de originalitate și un fals în acte pentru care sunt chemați în sala de judecată a literarității. Deși talentul se naște pretutindeni și în orice condiții și, ocazional, beneficiază de un mentorat recunoscut și apreciat unanim în țările consacrate evoluției cunoașterii, originea modestă a unor scriitori, în special a dramaturgilor, continuă să înghită orice formă de realizare, transformându-i în proscriși sau ținte de batjocură. Toți vânătorii pornesc din capul locului de pe poziția vânatului și fiecare dintre cei ce se avântă în apele tulburi ale scenei este un autoiluzionat înghițit de propriile așteptări, adică un Iona închipuit al lumii moderne.

Mai e, bineînțeles, problema regimului politic din țară, care dă peste cap multe socoteli ale scriitorului. Cum politica, în sine, pare a fi o formă de autoironie dusă la extrem, de multe ori nu mai lasă loc observațiilor punctuale. Paranoia sentimentului permanent de caricatural nu doar alienează, ci anihilează spiritul critic, ceea ce duce la moartea prematură a nucleului compozițional și îngreunează semnificativ procesul aducerii lui în fața publicului. Cea mai mare temere a unui sistem putrezit este ridicare cortinei, care constituie, de altfel, condiția esențială a artei dramatice. Teatrul nu există cu perdeaua trasă, așa cum nici omul nu este liber decât când cunoaște adevărul pur.

Revenind la lista de roluri alcătuită în debutul capitolului, se cuvine să îndreptăm discuția înspre acele aspecte care ne interesează cu precădere în analiza teatrului lui Alecsandri. Privit din acest unghi, demersul de construcție a unei dramaturgii naționale trebuie văzut, înainte de toate, ca pe o transfuzie de teme din ADN-ul comediei franceze în sânul unui popor cu un simț al umorului înnăscut, și nu ca pe un împrumut abuziv ori un xerox solidar cu contextul european contemporan autorului. Suntem de părere că aceia, deloc puțini la număr, care îl acuză pe Alecsandri de un mecanism al imitației limitativ pentru potențialul creator și rușinos pentru o literatură în plin proces de dezvoltare cum e literatura română de secol XIX, trag concluzii pripite, fie exagerând simbolistica unor personaje considerate emblematice, fie excluzând similitudinea fenomenelor sociale din țările europene vecine și nu numai. Niciunul dintre așa-zisele personaje aduse în buzunarul ascuns al valizei de călătorie de către Alecsandri nu este mai puțin valabil pentru societatea românească abuzată politic și dezbrăcată de sens de lideri cu comportamente și idealuri grotești. E ca și cum, mergând pe filiera logică a unui astfel de construct silogistic, am deduce că divinitatea dintr-o altă religie decât cea ortodoxă este o imitație a originalului, făcând abstracție de cultura fiecărui popor și reducând istoria la o luptă a cronologiilor desacralizată și surdă.

Ceea ce aduc atât Alecsandri, cât și ceilalți scriitori cu studii internaționale la revenirea în țară este, mai degrabă, o tehnicitate a scrierii, un rafinament al exprimării ironice fără exagerări și naivități inutile, o experiență a punerii în scenă trăite, mai întâi, din ipostaza spectatorului, o veridicitate a personajelor născută, înainte de toate, din dialogul cu interioritatea, apoi din conversatia cu scena socială și din nevoia de discuție a publicului. La rândul ei, această deschidere către acceptarea și înțelegerea progresului se cere trăită și ca un indicator al nevoii acute de umanitate, de descătușare a societății încorsetate de cenzură și incultură, ca un triumf al talentului și al menirii primordiale de a scrie în fața agresiunilor politicienilor. Dacă meritul europenilor este acela de a fi opus rezistență alienării spiritului indivizilor, meritul mutilaților regimurilor politice defectuoase este acela de a le fi supravietuit cu suficientă demnitate cât să le permită să se ridice prin apelul la simbolurile identitate are literaturii universale. Dacă ar fi să apelăm la psihologie, am putea merge chiar până la a afirma că functiile esențiale ale teatrului corespund celor două procese psihice cu puternice implicații în structura socializării și dezvoltării individului ca personalitate: memorie și reprezentare. În timp ce prima dintre ele permite accesarea în epoci și intervale de timp nedeterminate sub aspect limitativ de situații de viață care deservesc comparațiilor și preluării de modele sub aspect didactic, a doua o declanșează și o susține, oferindu-i, totodată, instrumentarul exteriorizării și al recuperării cronologiei interiorității.

Altfel spus, teatrul poate fi comparat cu o imensă sală de judecată, în care judecătorul și martorii au privilegiul de a-și păstra identitatea, translatând-o, însă, social, vestimentar și ideatic, în contextul contemporaneității în exercițiu, și în care martorii au dreptul la mai mult de o intervenție, iar publicul împarte cu judecătorul puterea de decizie. Verdictul nu este valabil decât în prezența publicului și nu există în afara lui. Validarea se dobândește de la public înspre judecător și nu invers, iar dreptatea nu este echivalentul pedepsirii culpabilului, ci demascarea penibilului în fața societății și achitarea lui prin șansa la izbăvire. Teatrul are marele merit de a-i permite dramaturgului luxul jocului de-a divinitatea, fără a-și pierde din gravitate și fără a-l face mai puțin substanțial. Chirița nu e mai puțin adevărată pentru contextul socio-politic românesc de secol XIX decât este Gaulard al lui

Picard pentru Franța aceleiași perioade numai fiindcă ordinea aparițiilor îl favorizează pe ultimul. Faptul că fenomenologia politică și simptomatologia individului se aseamănă nu poate trezi suspiciuni decât celor care, furați de mirajul occidentului, își opacizează optica politicii interne și a transformărilor sociale de pe teritoriul românesc. Diferența fundamentală dintre Alecsandri și alți dramaturgi români de seamă și scriitorii occidentului nu rezidă nici în talent, nici în originalitatea temelor, ci în nivelul de pregătire al publicului și în capacitatea lui de receptare a mesajelor transmise pe calea teatrului.

În Iorgu de la Sadagura, comentariile personajelor reflectă viziunea despre lume a autorului: În sfârşit m-am dus la opera nemțască, la vodevilul francez şi la bietul teatru național, sărmanul! ... când moare, când învie... da-i mai mult răposat! . Parcă anticipând comicul de situație pe care corupția și incultura politicienilor îl declanșează câțiva ani mai târziu, Alecsandri construiește în scena II un dialog între Iorgu și Gahița care deschide drumul replicilor savuroase ale lui Tipătescu și Zoe Trahanche.

Dincoace de utilitatea care servește intenția inepuizabilă de a recupera memoria unei epoci de constituire și afirmare a limbii naționale, considerăm studiul corespondenței lui Alecsandri cu scriitorii reprezentativi ai generației sale un argument puternic în favoarea teoriei privind rolul temperamentului în producerea de fenomene lingvistice. Măsura în care crezul limbii lui Alecsandri transpare din scrierile sale cotidiene poate reprezenta un indicator al viabilității și al durabilității formelor lexicale preferate de scriitor. Un artist care se dedublează în afara perimetrului creației sale, care glisează personalități multiple incapabile de complementaritate și care, mai degrabă, se anulează reciproc e un actor care-și încalcă pactul sicnerității cu publicul și, deci, supus îndoileii, cu tot cu opera sa, indiferent de valoarea ei lingvistică, artistică și socială.

Considerăm relevantă pentru viziunea despre lume a scriitorului și modalitatea de construcție a personajelor dramatice alecsandriene corespondența autorului cu Ion Ghica, de care îl leagă amintirea anilor petrecuți la studii în Franța și cu care împărtășește cultura lingvistică complexă și puterea rafinată de înțelegere a fenomenelor de limbă, politice și sociale, precum și a legăturilor de sincronizare și continuitate dintre acestea. Propunem contextualizarea corespondenței lui Alecsandri cu ceilalți scriitori ca reprezentare mentală a unui laborator ân care este regândit și reevaluat, în toată complexitatea sa, procesul constituirii limbii române literare, prin egala afirmare a rațiunii(impunerea unei forme lingvistice în fața celorlalte) și a simțirii (rezervele de expresivitate ale cuvintelor).

Făcând precizarea că nu inventarierea formelor și a variantelor lexicale utilizate de Alecsandri în corespondența intimă face obiectul acestei lucrări, vom opta pentru explorarea textului scrisorilor ca document de a cărui cheie de lectură depinde familiarizarea publicului cu filozofia de viață și politică a dramaturgului, din care decurg firesc filozofia lingvistică și artistică, prin care își afirmă identitatea. Asumându-ne cu bună credință reproșul devierii riscante de la relevanța lingvistică la stilistica și forța de sugestie a textului, justificăm obiectivarea concluziilor ce urmează a fi listate prin faptul că gândirea separată a lingvisticii și a stilisticii alecsandriene ar însemna sărăcirea de sens a textelor autorului și a contribuției sale la înfăptuirea și evoluția dramaturgiei românești.

Plasarea pieselor lui Alecsandri în sistemul de axe ortogonale al evoluției creației prin transpunerea scindată a literaturii și a limbii române, verticala și orizontala constituind, prin asamblare, un spațiu de acumulare a unor fenomene considerate matematic, pe principiul însumării prin grupare convenabilă desemnează o eroare evidentă de judecată întrucât selectarea variantelor lexicale nu se întemeiază exclusiv pe un principiu (etimologic, fonetic, morofologic, etc.), ci, mai degrabă, este rezultanta acestora. Forma și conținutul își dau întâlnire cu estetica și intenția comunicării, dând naștere unei imagini unice, complexe, multimodale, al cărei sens global este departe de a-și extrage procedeele din metodica științelor exacte.

Main content

Dat fiind că activitatea teatrală a lui Alecsandri e sinonimă cu o viață de om (întinzându-se pe durata a 47 de ani) și cuprinde personaje reprezentative pentru toate mediile și vârstele limbii, putem afirma fără teama de a fi combătuți că studierea lexicului operelor dramatice scrise de acesta are marele merit de a oferi imaginea complexă a unui panou de control privind succesele, eșecurile și paradoxurile dezvoltării limbii literare de secol al XIX-lea. Așa cum remarcă Gh. Bulgăr în articolul său intitulat sugestiv Note și completări la un glosar întocmit de V. Alecsandri, limba eroilor lui Alecsandri este departe de a fi liniară, oglindind, pe de o parte, frământările lingviștilor epocii și, pe de altă parte, „straturile lexicale de proveniențe variate". Conștient că o bună parte a regionalismelor utilizate în scriitura pieselor nu vor fi înțelese de public și că dispariția lor definitivă e doar o chestiune de timp și modernitate, Alecsandri alcătuiește un glosar al cuvintelor de circulație rară în care explică termenii necunoscuți, mulți dintre aceștia fiind și astăzi prezenți în dicționarele explicative și în gramatici cu sensul atribuit de scriitor. Explicarea cuvintelor vechi ce aparțin jargonului moldav și a celor străine care se află în acest uvragiu, prezentă în noua ediție a operelor sale, rămâne, fără a i se putea reproșa complexitatea și utilitatea, neterminată, acoperind numai primele 3 volume. Construit pe principiul oglinzilor paralele care permite, fără doar și poate, cuvintelor dreptul la ricoșeu în problema sensului, a dependențelor contextuale și a obligațiilor estetice, repertoriul dramatic al lui Alecsandri surprinde simultan realități care se întrepătrund în ciuda diferențelor: fazele de maturizare a societății române, tipuri umane variate, categorii și ierarhii sociale, vocabularul profesiilor, jargoanele limbistice strecurate dinspre public și saloane spre epoca contemporană.

Pe lângă observația importantă pe care o face cu privire la aria de acoperire a glosarului, Gh. Bulgăr intuiește și notează cu precizie importanța anexării acestui glosar al cuvintelor dispărute aproape în totalitate din limba prezentului. Un prim argument pe care lingvistul îl pune în discuție decurge tocmai din relevanța figurii lui Alecsandri pentru istoria limbii și a literaturii române, lista mai sus menționată nefiind o simplă înșiruire, ordonată alfabetic, de cuvinte pestrițe, ci, mai degrabă, un document privitor la „ atitudinea unui scriitor reprezentativ față de particularitățile lexicului limbii noastre ". Selecția intenționată și deliberată a lexicului constituie, de altfel, o invitație onorabilă pe care Alecsandri o adresează publicului și cercetătorilor deopotrivă de a cunoaște preferințele scriitorului din explicarea termenilor considerați a fi neliterari (regionalisme, neologisme, jargoane) și din categoriile considerate de Alecsandri ca situându-se în afara legitimității normei literare. Totodată, prin sensurile noi pe care poetul le atribuie unor cuvinte și expresii (glosarul în sine putând fi considerat drept o scrisoare de admirație pentru identitatea folclorului național), glosarul este văzut ca un mijloc de îmbogățire (la scară redusă, dar nu mai puțin demnă de luat în considerare) a dicționarului general al limbii cu sensuri spectaculoase sau nuanțe de sens nemaiîntâlnite în afara dramelor istorice și a comediilor sale la adresa politicului și societății vremurilor trecute.

Conceput cu inteligența arhitectului care prioritizează fundația și are conștiința durabilității ca principiu fundamental în conceperea schiței, glosarul este organizat ca un jurnal cu dublă intrare, prima coloană fiind rezervată unei ample colecții de arhaisme, regionalisme, neologisme, termeni de jargon grec, francez, latinizant și turc și cuvinte populare, iar cea de-a doua corespondentului din limba literară al termenului considerat rar. Pentru că scopul lui Alecsandri este departe de a fi un demers didactic sau științific, nu este menționată categoria gramaticală, iar termenii nu sunt notați cu forma de dicționar, ci cu regimul cazual cerut de contextul sintactic al replicilor personajelor. Dorința autorului nu este aceea de a impune cuvinte noi în coloana vertebrală a limbii, de aceea, după părerea noastră, criticile la adresa superficialității organizatorice nu își au temei. În schimb, considerăm relevantă ușurința cu care transpare din această listă intenția lui Alecsandri de a oferi publicului o mai bună înțelegere a textului și a dialogului personajelor, în egală măsură critică și satiră cu privire la utilizarea greșită a unor cuvinte cu sensuri inexistente (fapt care trădează fie incultura personajelor, fie dorința lor de a stârni admirația celorlalți) și demers de familiarizare a spectatorilor și cititorilor cu originalitatea și muzicalitatea graiului moldovenesc.

Deși, la o primă vedere, cuvintele apar amalgamate, servite în grabă ca un act justificativ al bogăției de regionalisme, ele trădează în realitate intenția vorbitorului și crezul său asupra vieții și rostului său și al celorlalți pe lume. Unii actanți sunt exponenți ai limbii populare, vorbesc ca în satul lor, prin urmare replicile lor sunt eprubete umplute până la limita superioară cu regionalisme și expresii populare moldovenești (Enachi Damiean, Alecu Verișanu, Aglae, Tachi Jăvrescu, Taki Lunătescu și soția lui, Tarsița, fiica lor, Marghiolița, și cadetul de cavalerie Leonil, etc.) Un alt segment lingvistic acoperă personajele în a căror exprimare se simte influența feudală greco-turcească, la fel de bine reprezentate fiind și personajele care preferă cuvintele expansive, radicale, vorbirea lor fiind, de fapt, rezultanta unor erori grave de integrare a neologismelor în limba curentă ori zbaterea inutilă de a româniza franțuzisme, grecisme, turcisme și principala cauză a apariției unor invenții lingvistice comice atunci când nu se prezintă cu totul aberante (celebrii coana Chirița, Iorgu de la Sadagura, Gahița, etc.). Un segment substanțial le revine „ neromânilor “, a căror încercare ridicolă de a vorbi română cu un amestec inechitabil de termeni din țara de origine și cuvinte inventate prin sufixarea lexicului românesc și formarea de derivate care stârnesc râsul și plânsul deopotrivă apare adesea reliefată puternic de Alecsandri, din perspectiva patriotului preocupat de fixarea, substanțializarea și stabilizarea limbii române literare. Unele personaje apar individualizate nominal (Kiulafoglu, Șvabe, etc.), altele sunt construite pe criteriul avatarului universal pentru o naționalitate (așa cum apar în lista personajelor din debutul operelor: un croitor francez, un ciubotar neamț, un cofetar grec, un zaraf jidov, un tutungiu armean, un droșcar lipovean, etc.). Limba boierilor și a ciocoilor e franțuzită, cu ifose latinizante și italienisme, aceștia adoptând poziția de susținători ai progresului țării.

O critică fină pe care Gh. Bulgăr o aduce felului în care Alecsandri tratează inventarul de cuvinte este aceea că, moldovean fiind, scriitorul prezintă ca regionalisme cuvinte de circulație din limba populară curentă (ex: cerdac, alean, hapca, izvod, tertip, anapoda, plisc, blajin, răzlețită, etc.). O posibilă explicație ar fi aceea că Alecsandri caută să le treacă în dreptul graiului moldovenesc ca izvor al apariției și al încetățenirii în limba vorbită. Nu mai puțin demnă de considerat ar fi încercarea de îndosariere a cuvintelor pentru publicul epocilor viitoare, scriitorul anticipând diminuarea treptată a utilizării lor până la ieșirea definitivă din uz.

Poate cea mai spectaculoasă dintre părțile glosarului rămâne aceea consacrată explicării elementelor de jargon: metahirisesc= obișnuiesc, nazar= favor, pliroforiri= lămuriri, servus= slugă, belețe= frumusețe, contan= mulțumit, andenken= amintire, fantacsit= mi-am făcut plăcerea, sohpeti= petreceri, kefali= cap, fesfesele= dichisuri femeiești, șagrină= supărare, nieznai= nu știu, precrasnai= prea frumos, c[k]atahris =abatere de la lege, șaferi= șireți, nurliu= drăgălaș, gavanóșele= borcănele, ischiuzar= berbant, mușunachi= miniatură, petit fat= nerod mic, engolpion= cuvântare, cabazlâc= bufonerie, afif= tufă de parale, kirie eleison!= Doamne, miluiește!, chivernisit= economisit, matuf= mizantrop, sofologhiotatos= savant, helbet= lasă pe mine!, huzur= în liniște, buiurdisit= întărit, ighemonicon= mărire îngâmfată, ghijgoreá = pe de-a-ntregul, îmi vine la merchez= îmi vine la îndemână, in das Herț= în inimă (scrierea fonetică accentuează simbolic nota de ironie), banabak= caută la mine, bre!, marafet= cu meșteșug, aferim= bravo!, selimet [silement]= falit, bisque= supă de raci, calembec= lemn negru, zaifă= indispusă, sevas= respect, işala= bravo!, desheritat= dezmoștenit etc.

Pe lângă omisiunea unor cuvinte aparținând idiomului moldovenesc, cu precădere a celor din ultimul volum destinat teatrului, din glosar, se remarcă și ponderea scăzută a explicațiilor privind termenii neologici pătrunși în lexicul românei de secol al XIX - lea, care nu este, însă, direct proporțională cu frecvența utilizării lor în piese. Cele mai multe neologisme migrează în familia jargoanelor fiindcă acolo primează intenția personajului care rostește replica de a impresiona printr-o exprimare care corupe exprimarea populară autohtonă și a autorului, de a dezavua și de a ironiza lipsa de cultură și „ bonton” a personajelor. Totodată, agreăm punctul de vedere al lui Gh. Bulgăr, care interpretează fenomenul ca pe o sită de cernere a împrumuturilor necesare de cele invazive, parazitare. Prezența numărului scăzut de neologisme este pusă și pe seama aparițiilor în lanț de dicționare de împrumuturi lexicale (HEM, DA, TDRG), fapt care întărește convingerea noastră că lista lui Alecsandri e departe de a se revendica drept dicționar explicativ ori culegere de cuvinte particulare pentru graiul ieșean din anii 1850. Păstrăm opinia că intenția autorului a fost, din capul locului, ușurarea înțelegerii pieselor sale de către public și cititori, precum și lămurirea unor sensuri contextualizate pentru lexemele rare și jargoanele construite cu funcție primordial stilistică.

Într-un articol publicat în revista Familia, în 1875, Iosif Vulcan radiografiază literatura dramatică de dinainte și după apariția pieselor lui Alecsandri, căruia îi recunoaște rolul de dascăl civilizator al unei societăți schimonosite de mofturi și fiorul sentimentului de atotștiință. Faptul că tinerii întorși din călătoriile în străinătate reflectează și acționează cu frâna de mână trasă de teamă să nu fie etichetați drept „ Iorgu de la Sadagura” ori drept mai superficiala sa parteneră Gahița demonstrează nu doar că piesele sale își atinseseră scopul primordial de a înfățișa societății defectele ei pentru a o face sensibilă la problema identității naționale, ci și că, odată cu Alecsandri, teatrul românesc cunoaște o perioadă de glorie fără precedent în literatura română: „ Combaterea defectelor ivite în viața socială română fu scopul ce și l-a propus Alecsandri [...]. Era bonton a veni acasă din străinătate cu un dispreț pentru neam și pentru țara care l-a crescut. [..] Niciun autor român n-a scris așa multe piese originale ca Alecsandri [...] Întocmai ca poezia, literatura dramatică la început era timidă, necunoscută, săracă, îmbrăcată în haine străine; până ce odată răsări un om de geniu, care o conduse în vederea lumii și-i câștigă stima și recunoștința. [...] El a pus primele ei temelii durabile; el a intrat pentru prima dată în sânul poporului și al vieții sociale, spre a scoate de acolo caractere și tipuri originale; [...] el a deschis calea pe care aveau să urmeze ceilalți scriitori români“.

În șirul criticilor scrutinitoare privind originalitatea pieselor lui Alecsandri, punctul de vedere exprimat de I. Vulcan poate părea părtinitor multora, însă franchețea comentariului decurge din observația pe care o face cu privire la frazele lungi în limbi străine, adesea încărcate de erori de exprimare pe care numai posesorii de cunoștințe gramaticale le pot interpreta drept comic de limbaj, și care îngreunează adesea înțelegerea mesajului de către public: „ Toate au aceeași frumusețe și aceeași greșeală. Frumusețea constă în punerea în scenă a unor caractere și tipuri originale și în limba lor frumoasă, românească, populară; greșeala e reprezentarea comicului mai ales prin limba stricată și schimonosită a unor greci, jidani, sârbi, în loc de a ni-l înfățișa prin caracterul lor și într-o limbă curată, românească.”. La realizarea umorului concură, așadar, atât cunoștințele lingvistice cel puțin bogate, cât și contextul în care sunt rostite respectivele replici, fapt greu de realizat prin amestecul de nații și nivelul de studii al spectatorilor, ceea ce justifică realitatea că „ unele piese ale dlui Alecsandri [...] n-au fost înțelese defel“.

Poate cea mai importantă concluzie pe care o poate trage un cititor al repertoriului său dramatic, amator sau profesionst, este aceea că nu există modalitate la fel de eficientă pentru a semnala unui popor defectele sale și pentru a-l face sensibil la impulsurile conștiinței moralității ca

satirizarea și jucarea ei în scenă, care atrage după sine demascarea și umilirea publică a nedreptăților, dar și a ticăloșilor, parveniților și a needucaților cu pretenții de bonton.

Pentru realizarea umorului la toate nivelurile (lingvistic, onomastic, situațional) și în toate stările de agregare (social, politic, istoric, cultural), Alecsandri apelează la instrumente și tehnici dramatice specifice, dintre care o contribuție deosebită o au calamburile, jocurile de cuvinte și glumele narative. Considerăm, în aceste circumstanțe, că o înțelegere deplină a fenomenului umoristic în dramaturgia lui Alecsandri trebuie studiată pornind de la diferențierea și definirea riguroasă a categoriilor anterior trecute în revistă.

În demersul său de analiză a glumelor cu scopul elaborării și înaintării unei teorii formale privind mecanismele care stau la baza producerii și decodării lor, Ritchie (2004) identifică două categorii: jocuri de cuvinte (puns) și glume cu interpretare forțată (forced reinterpretation (FR) jokes).

Așa cum se înfățișează substanțializate de G. Ritchie și sintetizate de M. V. Constantinescu , trăsăturile jocurilor de cuvinte prezentate exhaustiv sunt: a) dependența de o identitate fonetică sau de o ambiguitate fonetico- lexicală, pentru care simillitudinea este necesară, dar nu suficientă; b) fisura dintre interpretarea „ înainte de “ și realizarea „ de după” intervenția elementului de ambiguitate; c) prevalența unuia dintre sensuri asupra celorlalte care decurg din interpretare; d) prezența termenului ambiguu în partea inițială (set-up), nu în poanta finală (punchline).

Din categoria jocurilor de cuvinte paradigmatice pe care le regăsim în comediile lui Alecsandri amintim:

a) jocurile în context (puns in context), dependente de ideile anterior menționate (cotext) (Ritchie 2004: 114);
b) malapropismul – uzul unui cuvânt care sună asemănător (dar nu identic) unui cuvânt din context, dar care diferă semantic de acesta (ibidem: 116), ceea ce trimite la relația paronimică;
c) contextul textual: calamburul, antonomaza;
d) jocuri narative (story puns): finalul unei glume poate fi constituit de o frază sau de un proverb care să conțină morala piesei. Frecvente sunt și substituțiile lexicale sau fonetice, care nu țin de variația formelor unui cuvânt, ci apar determinate de metateză sau chiasm.

Sprijinindu-se pe relexicalizare și omonimie, autorii textelor dramatice apar mult mai interesați decât poeții și prozatorii de aceste procedee de realizare a umorului, subordonat diverselor tipuri de comic conform teoriilor înaintate de lingviști. Fie că urmăresc realizarea umorului de tip conversațional, fie că recurg la umorul convențional (fără a se confunda convenția cu standardizarea subtipurilor), dramaturgul de secol al XIX-lea are le îndemână o serie de clase care fac obiectul ambelor topice:

a) lexeme și frazeme (cuvinte inventate prin diverse procede, la Alecsandri predominând jargoanele); 3
b) formule spirituale (witticism): aluzii (deformări ale unor citate celebre), jocuri de cuvinte (puns), ciocnirea registrelor, figuri de stil (metafora, comparația, hiperbola, ironia, paradoxul);
c) replica amuzantă (retort);
d) tachinarea;
e) impolitețea glumeață (banter);
f) ridiculizarea, sarcasmul (putdowns);
g) auto-denigrarea, auto-tachinarea;
h) anecdote personale.

Pe fiecare dintre aceste categorii le vom exemplifica în cele ce urmează în câteva dintre cele mai disputate și apreciate piese ale lui Alecsandri. Înaintea acestui demers, însă, se cuvine să facem câteva precizări cu privire la critica adusă dramaturgului pentru satira dură la adresa străinilor. Este important ca acest punct de vedere să fie exprimat din capul locului întrucât grila de lectură în care este parcurs textul influențează semnificativ viziunea asupra personajelor și evenimentelor descrise și jucate. A privi teatrul lui Alecsandri cu scepticismul creat de suspiciunea xenofobiei înseamnă, după părerea noastră, a face o alegere în direcția unei optici refractare și intenționat vidate de sens și dezbatere. În schimb, îndemnăm cititorul a se opri asupra teoriei lui Norrick, care, în lucrarea lui din 1993, se concentrează pe analiza umorului conversațional și funcțiile exercitate în dimensiunea interpersonală.

Teatrul fiind cea mai apropiată de realitate formă de literatură, transfuzează comunicarea și aparatul ei lingvistic în sfera literarității, îmbogățindu-i semnificațiile și folosindu-se de procedeele și subiectele ei pentru a aduce în fața publicului contexte de viață cunoscute sau probabile în viitorul apropiat. În viziunea lui Norrick, pentru a înțelege dubla natură a glumei, care exprimă simultan agresiune și solidaritate, este necesară privirea umorului conversațional din perspectiva principiilor de politețe și cooperare, adică înțelegerea enunțurilor amuzante, a locului lor și a efectului pe care îl dobândesc într-un cadru conversațional mai larg. Pe lângă rama umoristică (care se construiește pe suportul oferit de ceilalți participanți la discuție locutorului care emite enunțul amuzant), înțelegerea umorului, aprecierea și acordul cu mesajele sociale conexe sunt condiții esențiale pentru manifestarea plenară a funcțiilor umorului conversațional.

Același autor identifică următoarele funcții ale glumei conversaționale, pe care le redăm în ordinea acțiunii lor, dinspre exterior spre interior: redistribuirea participanților, crearea unui nou sub-topic (new side conversation), determinarea și exploatarea potențialului conversațional al unui grup, gruparea locutorilor în funcție de atitudinea față de amuzament și de măiestria gestiunii râsului. Din acestea decurg o serie de subtipuri sau funcții secundare, din care dramaturgul (unui dintre cele 3 roluri de bază ale autorului și cel care face subiectul cercetării de față) și le selectează pe cele care satisfac cel mai bine subiectul piesei, intenția mesajului și profilul personalității actanților participanți la evenimente:

a) urmărirea evoluției unui subiect sensibil, livrat publicului într-o formă accesibilă, umanizată de circumstanțe, receptivitatea empatiei ori identificarea printr-un proces anamnetic a unui eveniment personal similar;
b) educarea disponibilității la tachinare și umor auto-depreciativ prin aderența participanților la clauzele sarcasmului narativ;
c) eliminarea obstacolelor din conversațiile curente, umorul jucând rolul unui marcator discursiv care epuizează un topic incomod;
d) facilitator al manifestării plenare a sinelui (presentation of self- Goffman);
e) indicator al distanței față de o problemă și al rezistenței în fața acesteia;
f) stabilirea unui raport incipient între participanții la conversație;
g) amplificarea unei relații interpersonale, scoaterea la suprafață a unor conflicte latente ori în curs de constituire. Solidaritatea și agresiunea se întrepătrund în anecdote personale și jocuri de cuvinte, a căror expansiune depinde de apropierea sau depărtarea dintre resursele umoristice de care dispun participanții, nivelurile de cultură ale acestora, experiențele personale și tangența cu subiectul conversației.

După părerea noastră, unul dintre marile merite ale lui Alecsandri a fost acela de a fi construit în jurul activismului politic și al problemelor sociale portretizate în piesele sale un cadru ludic (play frame-ul lui G. Bateson), în care ridicolul, auto-ironia și empatia sunt tolerate în egală măsură, cu alte cuvinte, un teren al revelării cu un oarecare confort al fenomenelor aparent inofensive, pregătind și anticipând complicitatea afectivă (mutual positive affect). Așadar, Alecsandri nu își judecă și nu își arată cu degetul personajele, după cum nici piesele lui nu se vor a fi foruri. Ele au, mai degrabă, aspectul unui joc cu reguli flexibile, în care sarcasmul ricoșează, făcând loc ironiei-ecou și accentuând aspecte pe care autorul le consideră importante sau adoptând o perspectivă amuzantă asupra unui eveniment. Pe acest fundal, se profilează funcția de control social a teatrului, dar și funcția de dezamorsaare a conflictului, poate cea mai semnificativă pentru contextul dat. Românii fiind, prin natură, un popor cu simțul umorului bine dezvoltat și cu rezistență la auto-ironie, aveau nevoie de comedia socialului, a politicului și a moravurilor ca filtru al realității imediate, formă de socializare și inserție în grup, dar, mai ales, ca instrument de anticipare a evoluției unor situații prezente și de perspectivă.

Michael Haugh, lector universitar Griffith, identifică cele două evenimente verbale pe care le presupune tachinarea (care poate trece cu ușurință drept cea mai spumoasă și ofertantă lingvistic și stilistic formă de dialog): a glumi și a trimite un mesaj serios (umorul etnic, auto - deprecierea, anecdotele). Reacția țintei, după cum vom vedea în cele ce urmează la Alecsandri, orientează întregul curs al dialogului dramatic. Aceasta poate îmbrăca forma aprobării (ținta sprijină mesajul comunicat), poate fi însoțită de comentarii explicite sau poate reprezenta o respingere totală a mesajului. Câteva dintre personajele emblematice ale lui Alecsandri folosesc umorul ca mijloc de a rezista unei situații dificile, după cum altele denunță umorul ca formă de agresiune. În acest caz, umorul nu este perceput ca umor. Personajele care se simt atacate prin glumele partenerilor de discuție se dovedesc, până la final, fie extrem de serioase, fie neinițiate în arta umorului și a jovialității, fie cu pretenții pedante și ifose de "grandes dames"/ donjuani ușor coruptibili de influență politică și putere financiară.

Și ventrilocizarea (locutorii își pun în scenă replicile pentru a reprezenta vocile altor locutori) este prezentă în teatrul lui Alecsandri, însă într-o formă diluată, preponderent evocatoare, așa cum se întâmplă în dramele istorice. Complicitatea dintre emițător și receptor, despre care vorbește B. Priego-Valverde, se bazează pe deplasarea de accent de la retorica "Ce este umorul?" la dialectica "Când râdem?", "De ce râdem?".

Discreditarea limbii hiperneologizate

Discreditarea limbii hiperneologizate este o strategie fundamentală în cadrul comediei, reprezentând o sursă considerabilă de umor. Limba populară mutilată de împrumuturi făcute de dragul impresiei și nu dinntr-o necesitate sincronistică și ridicolul utilizării ei în contexte pestrițe, fără legătură cu sensul intrinsec al cuvintelor și expresiilor, constituie axul unei societăți fără identitate și reclamă particularizarea

Gahița (dându-și vânt cu evantaiul): Bonjour, mon cher arhon pitar ... Ean, spune-mi je vous prie, de unde-ai luat moda să trimeți mojici din ogradă ca să facă invitații în case cinstite? (Opere complete, Partea întâia. Teatru, vol. III, Comedii, 1903, pag. 916)

Umorul hiperdeterminat textual (UHT) derivă, mai întâi, din incongruența dintre rafinamentul prefăcut al formulei de adresare din franceză "Bonjour, mon cher....", dublată de rugamintea politicoasă "je vous prie", și formularea necioplită "mojici din ogradă", care anulează sensibilitatea închipuită de lady burgheză. Opoziția "mojici din ogradă - case cinstite" are rolul de a accentua disprețul Gahiței pentru reprezentanții claselor sociale inferioare, față de care își punctează superioritatea prin exprimarea bombastică, cosmopolită.

Damiean: Ce sunt? ... rierel? Mări, ce vorbe sunt aeste? Ha, ha, ha... Auzi, inghitație, rierel, bonjur? ... Auzi parascovenii pocite? ... Nu cumva, soro dragă, s-a mutat țara Moldovii din loc? ... Nu cumva suntem franțuzi, nemți, jidovi? ... și noi, ca niște proști, ne credem tot Moldoveni! ... (Opere complete, Partea întâia. Teatru, vol. III, Comedii, 1903, pag. 917)

Schimbul de replici dintre cele două personaje (exponenți ai unor lumi și mentalități diferite: conservatorul iubitor de patrie și parvenita iluzionată de modernitate) poate fi privit din multiple unghiuri. Din punct de vedere tehnic, dialogul constituie o mostră de umor metalingual (preferăm, în asentimentul M.V. Constantinescu, formularea lui Jakobson), formele stâlcite și românizate intenționat de Damiean fiind purtătoare ale refuzului păstrătorilor valorilor naționale de a-și molipsi graiul cu termeni străini și de a vorbi o limbă amestecată. Intuiția țăranului fără studii superioare nu poate fi văzută drept critică la adresa piedicilor puse de conservatorism progresului societății, ci, mai degrabă, înțelepciunea filozofului de rând trebuie interpretată ca o formă de apărare în fața pericolului reprezentat de lepădarea obiceiurilor și a limbii populare sub mirajul tărâmului făgăduinței străine. Importanța replicii și comtextul în care aceasta este rostită sunt cele care validează sarcasmul întrebărilor retorice în cascadă, auto-ironia fiind accentuată de apelativul îndreptat spre cei rămași loiali moștenirii naționale: "și noi, ca niște proști [...]".

Gahița: D-ta râzi, pentru că nu te-ai adăpat de delicatețea, de eleganța și de sublimitatea limbei franceze.

Damiean: Ce să fac? ... Să mă adăp? ... Trebuie să știi, cucoană dragă, că numai vitele s-adapă, oamenii beau.... (Ibidem, pag. 917)

Nucleul discuției îl constituie verbul inerent reflexiv "a se adăpa", al cărui sens propriu de bază trimite la acțiunea vitelor de a-și potoli setea. Utilizat chipurile cu sens figurat de Gahița, într-o formulare în care se subliniază eleganța și sensibilitatea ființei umane la limbile muzicale, cuvântul devine propulsor al ridiculizării, Damian arătându-se zeflemitor la adresa cunoștințelor de limbă și a dibăciei de a le utiliza în exprimare ale burghezei.

Gahița: Îi superflu să mai cozarisim împreună asupra acestui suget, pentru că nu ne înțelegem.

Damian: Superfliur sau nesuperfliur... nu știu... dar că nu te înțeleg? ... asta-i adevărat... și mă pot giura pe cei patruzeci de sfinți părinți de pricep ceva din toate cimiliturile câte le înșirați d-voastră, iști de vremea nouă, care vă ziceți... cum, Doamne iartă-mă? .... civilarisiți.... (ibidem, pag. 918)

Rezultatul scrierii fonetice a neologismului superflu în replica lui Damian este evident intensificarea sarcasmului, disprețul acestuia pentru împrumuturile străine căpătând contur și emfază prin utilizarea termenului popular "cimilituri" și sufixarea sarcastică cu -isiți a radicalului civiliza, un procedeu al ironiei frecvent în piesele sale. Din punct de vedere al tipologiei personajelor, pitarul Damian ilustrează concepția omului simplu, cinstit, conservator, lucid la pericolele transformărilor sociale, dar conștient de importanța educației pentru înainte-mersul țării.

Gahița: [...] Du-te mai ales de vezi damele acele educarisite, care stau toată ziua la oglindă de-și împodobesc grațiile figurei și a trupului, ear nu ca pe la noi, să meargă la bucătărie și la spălătorie, ca să-și fețelească rochiea și degetile. Du-te de le vezi toate acele, ș-apoi mi-i zice dacă influența străinilor ne-au stricat mintea sau dacă ne-au developat-o.

Damian: Vel- Lopată? ... Destul!... Am înțeles. Săraca limbă! [...] (ibidem, pag. 919)

Replay-ul sarcastic pe care Damian îl face prin interpretarea personală a neologismului strecurat de Gahița în finalul replicii sub forma unui nume popular banal (Vel Lopată) se constituie într-un exemplu magistral de tachinare (jocular mockery, Haugh 2010*),* care, însă, trebuie punctat, nu se extinde asupra discursului ei privind rolul și drepturile femeii în societate. Nu bunul gust și manierele doamnelor din burghezia franceză sunt luate în derâdere de pitarul Damian, ci accentul care, păstrând liniaritatea din debut, pe stâlcirea limbii populare prin amestecul ridicol de împrumuturi lexicale străine cu expresiile populare românești (Săraca limbă!).

ECHOES OF THE OTHERWORLD: TRACING THE ENDURING INFLUENCE OF CELTIC MYTHOLOGY IN ENGLISH LITERATURE

Maria Cristina Fülöp
Phd, Grigore Moisil Theoretical High School of Informatics, Iași

Abstract: The tapestry of English literature is woven with threads from countless cultures, but few are as deeply and intricately embedded as those from Celtic mythology. From the misty battlefields of Irish heroes to the enchanted court of King Arthur, these ancient tales of gods, warriors, and magic have provided a foundational source of inspiration for centuries. This influence is not merely a collection of borrowed names or plot points; it is a profound inheritance that has shaped characters, defined genres, and continues to fuel the modern imagination.
From the misty shores of Avalon to the enchanted forests of modern fantasy, the vibrant and enigmatic tales of the Celts have woven themselves into the very fabric of the English literary tradition.

Keywords: legend; folklore; Celtic; Arthur; myth

The Mists of Myth: Defining the Celtic Tradition

It is important to know that "Celtic mythology" is not a single, unchanging canon before looking into its effects. Instead, it is a rich and varied collection of stories from the people who spoke Celtic languages. In general, these traditions can be divided into two main groups:

- Goidelic (Gaelic): This includes stories from Ireland, Scotland, and the Isle of Man. The Irish sagas, carefully written down by monks in the Middle Ages, are the foundation of this branch. Important texts include the Lebor Gabála Érenn (The Book of Invasions) and the epic cycles: the Mythological, the Ulster, and the Fenian.
- Brythonic (Brittonic): This includes Welsh, Cornish, and Breton traditions. The Mabinogion is the main source of Welsh mythology. It is a collection of prose stories from medieval manuscripts that keep alive much older oral traditions.

Even though these myths are different in different parts of the world, they all have a unique way of looking at the world. Some of the main ideas are the thin line between the living world and the Otherworld (like the Irish Tír na nÓgor and the Welsh Annwn), the cyclical nature of time, the commonness of shapeshifting, the power of fate (geas), and a deep connection to a magical landscape. This unique spiritual and imaginative landscape has been a great place for English literature to grow for more than a thousand years.

The Medieval Tapestry: Early Weavings of Celtic Lore

The most significant and earliest incorporation of Celtic mythology into English literature transpired during the Middle Ages, chiefly through the prominent character of King Arthur. The Welsh poet who first wrote about a shadowy warrior turned him into the archetypal king of English romance, but his Celtic DNA stayed the same. Arthur's journey from Celtic hero to English icon is a great example of how stories are passed down. Early Welsh sources, including the poem Y Gododdin (circa 600 AD) and the Mabinogion tale "Culhwch and Olwen," depict a formidable, distinctly Welsh warrior amidst heroes endowed with supernatural abilities. Geoffrey of Monmouth's Historia Regum Britanniae (c. 1136) started the change by putting these stories in a big story about British kingship and making them sound more like history.

French romance writers like Chrétien de Troyes and later English writers, like Sir Thomas Malory in Le Morte d'Arthur (1485), really brought the legend to life. But underneath the chivalric surface, the Celtic heart beats strongly:

Avalon comes from the magical island where Arthur is taken to heal is a direct descendant of the Celtic Otherworld, which is a paradise that people can't reach. The name probably comes from the Welsh word Ynys Afallach, which means "Isle of Apple Trees". Merlin, the classic wizard is a mix of different people, but the Welsh prophetic poet Myrddin Wyllt, who was a wild man of the woods with the gift of foresight, is the most important. The Holy Grail, although it has been Christianized as the cup of Christ, stands for the search for a vessel that gives life, common to Celtic myths about magical cauldrons of plenty and regeneration, e.g. the Cauldron of the Dagda. Morgan le Fay, Arthur's mysterious sister and enemy resembles the powerful Celtic goddesses, especially the Morrígan, an Irish goddess of war, fate, and sovereignty who often changed shape.

Case Study: Sir Gawain and the Green Knight

This 14th-century work of art is probably the most "Celtic" of the great English medieval poems. Its story is based on ideas that come directly from Irish sagas. The main "beheading game," in which the supernatural Green Knight dares a hero to hit his neck and then get hit back a year later, is very similar to a test in the Irish story Bricriu's Feast, which stars the hero Cú Chulainn. “The poem is saturated with a sense of the uncanny and the liminal. The Green Chapel is not a Christian church but a "barrow," a hollow mound reminiscent of thesídhe, the fairy mounds of Irish lore where the Otherworld could be entered. The entire narrative tests Gawain's courtly chivalry against a much older, wilder, and morally ambiguous magic”.

The Romantic and Victorian Revival: A Rediscovery of the Celtic Spirit

Following a period of Neoclassical supremacy, the late 18th and 19th centuries experienced an intense revival of folk traditions. As a response to industrialization and a quest for genuine national identity, writers and scholars gravitated towards the enigmatic, fervent, and supernatural realm of Celtic mythology.

William Butler Yeats is the most important person in this movement. He intentionally drew upon the heroes and deities of Irish mythology to create a new, uniquely Irish literature in English. He thought that the tragic hero Cú Chulainn and the wandering poet Oisín were spiritual and heroic alternatives to what he saw as the materialism of modern England. In poems such as "The Wanderings of Oisin," he compares the hero's three hundred years in the immortal, happy lands of the aos sí (the fae folk) to the less happy Ireland he comes back to. His plays, like "On Baile's Strand," use myth to explore timeless themes of love, loss, and identity through the fierce, fated passions of the Ulster Cycle.

Yeats wanted to start a revolution, but Alfred, Lord Tennyson used Celtic myth for moral reflection. “Idylls of the King” is an epic cycle that tells Malory's Arthurian story from a Victorian point of view. The magic in the source material is softened and made into a story. The fight is called "sense at war with soul," and the fall of Camelot is used as a warning about the breakdown of moral order. But even in this moralized world, the story's strength comes from the core Celtic elements: the Lady of the Lake's mysterious appearance, the otherworldly strangeness of Merlin's spells, and the last, haunting picture of Arthur's barge disappearing into the mists on its way to Avalon.

Celtic mythology had such a big impact on the fantasy genre in the 20th century that it is now an important part of its grammar. The people who created modern fantasy took a lot from its well of wonder.

J.R.R. Tolkien was a scholar of Norse and Anglo-Saxon, but there is no doubt that the Celtic influence in his stories is strong and important. Tolkien's Elves, especially the Eldar, are very similar to the Irish Tuatha Dé Danann. They are a noble, semi-divine race with great power and skill who, after a long defeat, retreat to a hidden realm in the West, disappearing from the world of Men. Their link to starlight, their sadness, and their "immortality" all reflect the nature of the aos sí. Also, the sound and structure of Sindarin, his Elvish language, were based on Welsh on purpose.

The Otherworld Journey and the idea of a dangerous trip to a blessed, eternal land across the sea (Valinor) is a strong echo of Irishimmramatales, which tell stories of trips to magical islands like Tír na nÓg.

C.S. Lewis's “The Chronicles of Narnia” also uses a key Celtic structural device: a liminal space (the wardrobe) that leads to a parallel world. The way time works differently in Narnia is very similar to how time works differently for people who go to the Celtic Otherworld. The notion of the Pevensie children as monarchs from an alternate realm, fated to govern, resonates with both Arthurian destiny and the Celtic notion of sovereignty.

Many modern authors still follow this tradition in their work. “The Owl Service” by Alan Garner is a brilliant, haunting retelling of a tragedy from the Mabinogion set in modern Wales. Susan Cooper's “The Dark Is Rising” series is a brilliant mix of Arthurian and Welsh myth. It shows the fight between the Light and the Dark in modern-day Britain. J.K. Rowling's Harry Potter series uses a lot of Celtic folklore, like the banshee and the magical properties of woods like rowan and holly. The influence is so strong that tropes like the "fae court", the "tragic hero," and the "enchanted forest" have become staples of fantasy. People often forget that they come from Celtic culture, but their power is still strong.

Thematic Resonance: Why Celtic Myths Endure

Why do these old stories keep coming back in English literature? The answer is in the fact that their main themes are still relevant today and speak to timeless human issues.

The Allure of the Otherworld: The thought of a world of magic, beauty, and danger that is just out of reach is a strong way to escape and a way for the subconscious to communicate.

The Hero's Complexity: Celtic heroes like Cú Chulainn are not simple examples of good behavior. They are driven by strong feelings, bound by terrible oaths (geasa), and often die in sad ways. Their psychological complexity seems very modern.

A World Full of Spirit: In a time when science and reason are often seen as the only ways to see the world, the Celtic idea of a living, magical landscape where every hill, lake, and forest has a story and a spirit is very appealing.

Moral Ambiguity: The people who live in the Celtic Otherworld, the aos sí, can't be put into neat groups of "good" or "bad." They are lovely and dangerous, useful and unpredictable. This moral ambiguity creates a more complex and interesting story than simple opposites.

Celtic mythology is not just a historical footnote in English literature; it is a living, breathing presence. From the sword drawn from the stone to the last ship sailing to the Grey Havens, it is a part of English literature. It is the echo of a wilder, more magical world that still shapes the stories we tell ourselves and the places we want to live in our minds.

DENIS DIDEROT, BETWEEN RHETORIC AND THE LOGIC OF EXISTENCE

Simona-Andreea Șova
Phd, National College „Ferdinand I" Bacău

Abstract: The article is an attempt to revisit and highlight the philosophical and literary contributions of one of the greatest French and European Enlightenment figures, the founder of the "French Encyclopedia." It contains the essential data comprising the synthesis of a "portrait in motion," commented upon as Diderot's image —initially constituted of fragments — becomes whole, gaining unity, coherence, and representational power. The text follows a chronology dictated by the spectacular intellectual, philosophical, and literary evolution of the author of "Rameau's Nephew," as well as by several biographical moments symptomatic of his personal development and assumed destiny.

The essay also serves as an argument for how not only a cultural model but also an intellectual brand asserts itself and survives, far outlasting its century. This is achieved through the gradual abandonment of a matrix-like rhetoric specific to the Enlightenment, and the potentiation of a "logic of the living," in order to conceive, in a programmed manner, and enact a grandiose cultural project wherein the parts always communicate with the whole in a cohesive and functional complementarity.

Keywords: Enlightenment; materialism; satire; critical reflection; philosophical dialogue

Scriitorul și filozoful Denis Diderot (1713-1784) și-a făcut apariția în literatura și cultura franceză intrând pe poarta „Enciclopediei". Considerat, o perioadă, veritabilul ei șef de șantier, Diderot s-a impus treptat ca unul dintre gânditorii de prim rang ai secolului al XVIII-lea, ai iluminismului, apropiat de mentalitatea europeană de astăzi prin cercetarea intelectuală și prin experimentarea formală. O parte esențială a operei sale a rămas inedită în timpul vieții: două romane, „la Religieuse" și „Jacques, le Fataliste" au apărut abia în 1796, iar „le Rêve de d' Alembert", în 1831; manuscrisul dialogului „le Neveu de Rameau" nu a fost regăsit decât în 1891; adăugăm că o parte substanțială a autografelor, majoritatea inedite, a devenit accesibilă în 1951 („la Bibliothèque nationale"). Înțelegem astfel că judecata critică despre scriitor a evoluat și s-a întregit pe măsură ce au fost făcute aceste descoperiri.

Diderot făcea parte dintr-o familie aparținând micii burghezii provinciale. Tatăl său, maestru în arta fabricării cuțitelor, l-a marcat suficient de mult, pentru ca figura paternă, garantă a corectitudinii morale, a seriozității profesionale și a coeziunii familiale, să fie o constantă a operei sale. Dar Denis, strălucit elev la iezuiți, la Langres, unde s-a născut, destinat, după primirea tonsurii și încheierea studiilor teologice, unei cariere ecleziastice, succedându-i unchiului său canonic, abandonează curând calea trasată de familie, se eliberează de cercul clericilor unde îl închisese tatăl lui și fuge la Paris. Aici se căsătorește cu o lenjereasă. Paradoxal oarecum, această ruptură nu va face decât să-i stârnească gustul uniunii familiale. Așteptând să se reconcilieze cu tatăl și fratele, care, între timp, i-a luat locul în rândul clericilor, duce o viață de boem literar. Traducerile sale din engleză îl scot din anonimat: „l'Histoire de Grèce" (Temple Stanyan, 1742), „le Dictionnaire de médecine" (dr. Robert James, 1744), în colaborare cu alți doi traducători, „l'Essai sur le mérite et la vertu" (Anthony Ashley-Cooper, al III-lea conte de Shaftesbury, 1745). În această ultimă carte, adaugă textului câteva lungi note personale. Tocmai competența lui de traducător îl desemnează pentru rolul de a anima „l'Encyclopédie", concepută mai întâi ca o adaptare franceză a monumentalei „Encyclopaedia" (William și Robert Chambers, Edinburgh, 1859). Întreprinderea se va emancipa repede și va abandona modelul englez, în timp ce Diderot se afirmă ca un gânditor intrepid. Publică în 1746 „les Pensées philosophiques", condamnată la a fi arsă imediat, redactează, anul următor, „la Promenade du sceptique", al cărei manuscris este confiscat puțin mai târziu, și editează clandestin „les Bijoux indiscrets", roman în care cadrul oriental și narațiunile erotice vehiculează o satiră politică și îndrăzneli filozofice. Vechiul ucenic în teologie (în 1732, după ce își încheie studiile la Colegiul „Louis de Grand", la Paris, obține titlul de „maître des arts") se îndreaptă către materialism și ateism.

Începând cu 1748, Diderot muncește enorm. Șantierul enciclopedic îl acaparează. Dar această activitate l-a familiarizat cu domeniile cele mai diverse ale cunoașterii și i-a oferit numeroase forme ale exprimării în scris. Asta nu l-a împiedicat să scrie mai multe lucrări filozofice majore: „Lettre sur les avengles” (1749), „Lettre sur les sourds et les muets” (1751), „Suite de l’apologie de M. l’abbé de Prades” (1752), „Pensées sur l’interprétation de la nature” (1753). „Prospectus”, textul publicat în 1750, ce a servit la promovarea proiectului „Enciclopediei” și la colectarea de fonduri (inserat în „Discours préliminaire” al lui d’Alembert, publicat în 1751 odată cu primul volum al „Enciclopediei”), expunea planul lui Diderot de a crea o enciclopedie completă, nu o simplă traducere din engleză, și se dovedea a fi un act de credință în progresul cunoștințelor. Cele două „Scrisori” exprimă îndeosebi o atitudine experimentală față de ființa umană, prin care Diderot schițează o explicație materialistă departe de orice finalism. Astfel de poziții nu puteau lăsa indiferente autoritățile: l-au arestat pe autorul „Scrisorii despre orbi”. Diderot a petrecut o lună în donjonul din Vincennes, devenit, între timp închisoare de stat pentru prizonierii de marcă. Rousseau îi face aici o vizită și discută cu el despre chestiunea progresului științelor și artelor, de unde va ieși primul „Discurs” al cetățeanului, la Geneva. Experiența închisorii l-a marcat pe Diderot și l-a determinat, de mai multe ori, să nu publice unele dintre manuscrisele sale cele mai scandaloase. „l’Apologie de l’abbé de Prades” – un colaborator al „Enciclopediei” pentru probleme teologice, urmată de o teză judecată drept heterodoxă de Sorbona – va fi publicată fără permisiune, „Pensées sur l’interprétation de la nature”, reflecție despre metoda experimentală (1753-1754), s-a mulțumit cu o aprobare tacită. Apariția „Enciclopediei” înseși constituie o îndelungată luptă. Puterea monarhică era divizată între tradiționaliști, partizani ai opresiunii, și moderniști, favorabili marelui proiect. În 1752, Madame de Pompadour și contele d’Argenson ajung să dezamorseze criza și permit continuarea apariției, dar, în 1759, parlamentul suspendă publicarea; privilegiul este revocat, cele șapte volume apărute sunt condamnate de papă. Celelalte tomuri sunt publicate clandestin.

Antifilozofii dezlănțuie polemici. Mai ales Charles Palissot de Montenoy se face auzit prin pamflete și prin piesa lui, „les Philosophes”, care, în 1760, a căutat să-i ridiculizeze pe Diderot și pe prietenii săi. Situația s-a complicat prin ruptura de Rousseau. Șocat de legăturile lui Diderot cu Grimm, d’Holbach și alți aristocrați, de orientarea lor atee, Rousseau întrerupe relațiile cu ei aproape de articolul „Genève”, pe care d’Alembert îl inserase în „l’Encyclopédie”. La rândul său, Diderot privește cu uimire „dezertarea” prietenului său. Sarcina lui în fruntea „Enciclopediei” devine cu atât mai copleșitoare, cu cât d’Alembert bate în retragere în privința continuării lucrării, pe care o consideră din ce în ce mai riscantă.

În toiul acestui război... enciclopedic, Diderot se reconciliază cu familia la Langres. Face cunoștință cu tânăra Sophie Volland (1716-1784), care devine iubita și confidenta și cu care întreține, începând cu 1759, o extraordinară corespondență, veritabil jurnal intim, de unde aflăm toate experiențele sociale și intelectuale împărtășite cu multă însuflețire prietenei sale.

Este și perioada când se îndreaptă spre teatru și inventează forme noi de critică artistică. Opera dramatică a lui Diderot asociază reflecția critică și practica propriu-zis literară. Astfel, în 1757, apare „le Fils naturel ou les Épreuves de la vertu”, comedie în cinci acte și în proză, însoțită de trei „Entretiens sur le Fils naturel”. Un dispozitiv identic este reprodus anul următor: Diderot publică o nouă dramă, „le Père de famille”, urmată de un discurs, „De la poésie dramatique”. Această apărare și ilustrare a unei noi drame serioase este demnă de reținut, fiindcă face epocă. Dacă „le Fils naturel” nu a fost jucată la Paris decât o singură dată, în 1771, „le Père de famille” a obținut în 1761 un succes imens, reiterat ulterior, mai ales în 1769, când se reiau reprezentațiile. Aceleași căutări ale lui Diderot le aflăm în traducerile și adaptările din engleză: în 1759, elaborează planul uneitragedii intitulate „le Shérif” și, în 1760, traduce piesa lui E. Movre, „le Joueur”. În același sens trebuie citit articolul consacrat lui Terentius, publicat în 1765 în „Gazette littéraire de l’Europe”. Experiența stilului Garrick, marele actor englez, relatată într-un articol din 1769, hrănește o lungă reflecție ce ajunge la Căutările artistice privind teatrul sunt, la Diderot, o componentă a unei gândiri estetice care își pune problema diferitelor arte, a practicii și principiilor acestora. Diderot a fost amestecat în „cearta bufonilor" sau „războiul colțurilor" (dezbatere estetică la care au participat, între 1752 și 1754, apărătorii muzicii franceze și partizanii unei noi deschideri spre orizonturi muzicale mai înalte; „colțul" regelui, respectiv, „colțul" reginei). De aceea a editat, în 1771, „Leçons de clavecin" (Anton/ Antoine Bemetzrieder). În domeniul artelor plastice, publică, fără numele autorului, „l'Histoire et Secret de la peinture de cire" (1755), text conceput să fie articolul „Encaustique" din „l'Encyclopédie", ce expune aspectele practice ale unei asemenea tehnici. Diderot se afirmă ca un creator al unui gen în „Salons". La fiecare doi ani, între 1759 și 1771, apoi în 1775 și în 1781, compune pentru „Correspondance littéraire" o dare de seamă despre operele expuse la Luvru. „Salon de 1759" conține doar câteva pagini, însă următoarele capătă amploare. Teoria se potrivește cu povestirile sau cu dialogurile, care fac din aceste dări de seamă scrieri originale și vii. Reflecția estetică continuă în „Essai sur la peinture" (1766), într-un schimb de scrisori cu sculptorul Etienne Maurice Falconet despre posteritate (1765-1767) și în „Pensées détachées sur la peinture, la sculpture, l'architecture, la poésie" (1777).

Eliberat de obligațiile sale impuse de „l'Encyclopédie", Diderot colaborează la „Correspondance littéraire" a lui Friedrich Melchior Grimm, periodic manuscris (1753-1793) trimis unor abonați princiari din întreaga Europă. În afara „Saloanelor", îi furnizează numeroase recenzii ale actualității literare și îi încredințează diverse manuscrise personale. Devine chiar responsabilul „Corespondenței literare" când Grimm lipsește din Paris. Mai multe dintre operele sale au apărut astfel confidențial. Diderot a participat și la redactarea unei lucrări despre călătorii, comerț și colonizare, „l'Histoire des deux Indes" a abatelui Raynal: scrierea, pe lângă informații practice despre resursele unor țări îndepărtate, conține uimitoare pasaje despre dreptul celor oprimați la revoltă. A lucrat și cu baronul d'Holbach. A redactat, după toate aparențele, părți din „le Système de la nature", apărută în 1770.

Abandonând caracterul abstract al dialogului folozofic clasic, Diderot scoate filozofia din cabinetul de studiu și o deschide romanescului vieții cotidiene. În 1769, „Rêve d'Alembert" pune în scenă o dezbatere despre materialism și consecințele sale morale. Expozeului liniar și dogmatic îi sunt preferate o expunere strălucită și o căutare bogată, hrănită cu ipoteze. Problema morală apare din nou în „l'Entretien d'un philosophe avec la maréchale de " (1774), ca și în „Supplément au Voyage de Bougainville ou Dialogue sur l'inconvénient d'attacher des idées morales à certaines actions physique qui n'en comportent pas" (1773). În „Supplément...", dialogul dintre A. și B. trimite la dialogul dintre două civilizații, dintre Diderot și Bougainville, dintre Diderot și el însuși. Legăturile ce unesc dialog și narațiune, roman și teatru sunt subliniate de regruparea ce face din „Supplément..." un triptic, „Ceci n'est pas un conte" și „l'Histoire de Madame de la Carlière". Arta dialogului intelectual se regăsește în combaterea lui Hemsterhuis, filozof idealist, și a lui Helvétius, materialist prea puțin preocupat, după Diderot, de specificitatea umană. La celebrarea lui Terentius, în tentativa de a anima și tentativele romanești, îl elogia cu însuflețire pe Samuel Richardson, model englez al patosului romanesc.

Diderot explorează virtualitățile genului în „la Religieuse", inserând povestea lui Suzanne Simonin, ajunsă călugăriță împotriva voinței sale, într-o tramă epistolară care îi pune în situația de a dialoga pe călugăriță și protectorul ei, pe romancier și cititorul lui. „Tristram Shandy", de Laurence Sterne, constituie una dintre sursele textului „Jacques le Fataliste", dar modelul este repede uitat în acest minunat mozaic, ce amestecă reflecția filozofică și plăcerea de a povesti și îi face din nou să dialogheze pe Jacques și stăpânul său, „fatalitate" și libertate, naratorul și auditorul lui. Cele două romane au fost publicate în „Correspondance littéraire" și revelate publicului în 1796. În succesiunea lor, ar trebui să citățm povestirile lui Diderot, mai ales „les Deux Amis de Bourbonne". Însă arta dialogului culminează cu „le Neveu de Rameau", confruntare a „eului", filozof instalat în rigoarea principiilor sale și în confortul unei relative recunoașteri sociale, și „el", nepotul marelui Rameau, ratat și geniu, gata de toate compromisurile: dezbaterea lor, care hrănește satira socială tot așa de bine ca scopurile estetice, a fost apreciată de Goethe și de Hegel! Virtuozitatea tehnică a acestor mari texte ale maturității face corp comun cu interogația filozofică referitoare la materialism. „Principes philosophiques sur la matière et le mouvement", redactată în 1771, marchează, de asemenea, această reflecție.

Prin intermediul lui Grimm, Diderot intrase în contact cu monarhia țaristă. În 1765, Ecaterina a II-a cumpărase biblioteca filozofului lăsându-i dreptul de a o folosi. Mai mult, Diderot devenise, din 1767, asociat al Academiei din Sankt Petersburg, calitate în care intenționa să-și valorifice bogata experiență în domeniu proiectând, după modelul francez, o enciclopedie rusă. Și-a pregătit apoi călătoria pentru a răspunde invitației țarinei. A părăsit Parisul în iunie 1773, a petrecut vara la Haga și a ajuns la Sankt Petersburg octombrie. A avut aproape zilnic discuții cu Ecaterina a II-a și a lucrat la mai multe proiecte de reformă, de unde au ieșit „Observations sur le Nakaz" (Nakaz este o declarație de principii juridice scrisă de Ecaterina cea Mare sub influența ideilor iluminismului francez și datată 10 august 1767) și „Plan d'une université pour le gouvernement de Russie." Rămânând conștient de limitele despotismului luminat, s-a întors în Franța, în octombrie 1774, după o nouă ședere în Țările de Jos.

Ultimii zece ani ai vieții lui Diderot sunt ocupați de trei vaste proiecte. Pe de o parte, obișnuit să ducă lucrurile până la capăt, consecvent cu valorile pe care le apără, continuă colaborarea activă la „Histoire des deux Indes". Când cartea este condamnată, iar autorul ei amenințat, scrie „Lettre apologétique de l'abbé Raynal à M. Grimm", unde își expune obiecțiile față de Friedrich Melchior Grimm. În al doilea rând, adună materiale generate de-a lungul timpului, dându-le o miză unitară, formă și sens, căutând să explice omul prin alcătuirea sa: „Éleménts de physiologie", rămasă, din nefericire, neterminată. În sfârșit, o a treia direcție a activității este furnizată de meditația asupra operei lui Seneca, de-a lungul căreia Diderot, filozof vizionar, face bilanțul propriei vieți. Această introducere la o nouă traducere a lui Lagrange capătă dimensiunile unui veritabil volum, apărut în 1778 sub titlul „Essai sur la vie et les écrits de Sénèque" și revizuită în 1782 cu titlul „Essai sur les règnes de Claude et de Néron". Opera, deseori neglijată sau tratată cu superficialitate de critică, îi permite lui Diderot, ca și ultima sa piesă, „Est-il bon? Est-il méchant?, o interesantă și actuală reflecție despre drepturile și îndatoririle filozofului. Cu o luciditate ce nu l-a părăsit niciodată, reactivându-și instrumentarul filozofic și scriitoricesc, Denis Diderot revine asupra trecutului său și răspunde „Confesiunilor" lui Jean-Jacques Rousseau. Ne-am fi așteptat ca această ultimă scriere publicată, care îi aduce reproșuri din partea regelui, să fie o formă de întoarcere la sine, cum procedează, în general, oamenii iluștri ajunși la o anumită vârstă, dar constatăm, cu o oarecare surprindere, că ultimul text publicat de Diderot nu trădează, nici la finalul vieții, una dintre virtuțile lui majore: este un text angajant, de luptă.

La moartea sa, manuscrise și cărți iau calea Sankt Petersburgului. Fiica lui Diderot, Madame de Vandeul, a scris „Mémoires pour servir à la vie de Diderot", în timp ce Jacques-André Naigeon va revela publicului filozofia anticlericală și materialistă a lui Diderot, într-o lucrare apărută postum, în 1821, „Mémoire sur la vie et les oeuvres de Diderot."

Între filozofie și literatură, între roman și teatru, Denis Diderot a dat naștere unei opere complexe, dificil de definit, în ciuda structurilor ei profund iluministe, ale cărei idei se desfășoară și evoluează mai puțin după schema unei retorici, cât urmând logica, perpetuu reajustată, a existentului/ a viului...

THE MYTHICAL – FANTASTIC DIMENSION IN ION AGÂRBICEANU'S PROSE

Laura-Camelia Kovacs
PhD Student, UMFST „G. E. Palade" of Târgu Mureş

Abstract: This article explores the essential role of the mythical–fantastic dimension in Ion Agârbiceanu's prose, where supernatural elements emerge organically from the religious beliefs and folkloric mentality of rural Transylvania. Rather than opposing realism, the fantastic functions as an extension of the community's symbolic universe, grounding mythical figures—such as vâlve, zâne and strigoi—in everyday experience. These beings embody collective anxieties, moral tensions, and the ambiguous relationship between human destiny and invisible forces. Through psychological ambiguity, narrative hesitation and subtle desacralization, Agârbiceanu transforms the fantastic into a mode of interior exploration, revealing the hidden fears, desires, and spiritual crises that shape traditional life. The study argues that the author's distinctive fusion of realism and myth creates a nuanced literary space where the extraordinary becomes a natural language for understanding human experience.

Keywords: Ion Agârbiceanu; mythical imagination; Transylvanian folklore; fantastic literature; rural spiritual beliefs.

În ceea ce privește proza lui Ion Agârbiceanu, un nou mod absolut inedit în exprimarea realului este cel redat prin fantastic. Conform ideilor notate pe această temă, V. I. Propp explică faptul că la originea formării acestei categorii literare se află credințele mitico-folclorice ale unei culturi populare religioase. Dar aici ar fi de menționat și ideea conform căreia fantasticul nu trebuie privit în mod independent în opera acestuia întrucât el coexistă alături de realism, ambele formând un tot unitar, așa cum afirma și criticul literar Ion Negoițescu: „literatura lui Agârbiceanu nu trece niciodată în fantastic, decât cu intenții de artificiu literar"[1]. În felul acesta, fantasticul la Agârbiceanu nu contrazice, ci completează planul realist, transformând percepția tradițională asupra lumii într-un spațiu unde vizibilul și invizibilul se susțin reciproc.

Substratul filonului fantastic în opera lui Agârbiceanu este redat, în primul rând, prin abundența credințelor religioase, dar și prin formarea superstițiilor specifice minții omului simplu cu o anumită apetență spre gândirea fantastică. Abia de prin anul 1908, odată cu volumul intitulat În întunerec, face autorul apel la arealul mitico-fantastic pe care începe să-l includă subtil în stratul mai profund al realismului frust.

Așadar, opera lui Ion Agârbiceanu se remarcă prin abilitatea autorului de a îmbina realitatea cotidiană, aparent ordinară, cu universul fantastic, însuflețit de trăsături miraculoase, mitologice și folclorice. În proza sa, dimensiunea mitico-fantastică este una fundamentală, oferind profunzime și unicitate scrierilor sale și manifestându-se, totodată, în mai multe moduri: pe de-o parte, prin explorarea unor teme și motive fantastice, referitoare la forțele enigmatice care acționează asupra destinului uman, iar pe de altă parte, prin inserarea unor personaje mitologice specifice mentalității populare transilvănene a vremii, reînviind, astfel, o tradiție folclorică în care toate aceste elemente mitico-fantastice sunt necesare pentru înțelegerea lumii contextuale și a relațiilor interumane.

Aceste personaje joacă un rol esențial în opera sa, conferind narațiunii un substrat simbolic, de o complexitate psihologică și culturală deosebită. Autorul prezintă, astfel, lectorilor, mai multe personaje din mitologia românească și din folclor, dar le reinterpretează astfel încât să fie potrivite pentru realitatea lumii rurale în care își duce existența, ele fiind învăluite, totuși, într-o alură de mister specific ideii de poveste. În acest sens, există în literatura de specialitate o descriere amănunțită a mai multor tipuri de personaje mitologice: „Aproximate în funcție de atitudinea pe care o au față de om, ființele demonic-mitologice sunt, în esență, fie benefice (zânele, Baba Dochia, spiridușii, șarpele casei etc.), fie malefice (Mama Pădurii, Omul nopții, Vârcolacii, Strigoii, Știma Apei, Pricolicii, În acest context, una dintre cele mai frecvente figuri mitologice din proza lui Agârbiceanu este zâna sau vrăjitoarea, întâlnită și sub denumirile de vâlvă, duh sau știmă. Aceste personaje, profund înrădăcinate în folclorul românesc, reprezintă simboluri ale unui destin implacabil și se asociază cu entități fantastice care acționează dincolo de controlul uman, modificând cursul destinului prin forțe supranaturale, magie sau vrăji. În concepția autorului, aceste prezențe fac parte integrantă din viața cotidiană, conferindu-i acesteia o dimensiune mistică și ritualică. Spațiul muntos, închis, neprimitor și, parcă, impregnat de prezența unei forțe malefice misterioase, cea a Apusenilor, i-a determinat pe moți, oamenii care trăiau în această zonă și care lucrau, totodată, în minele munților, să-și imagineze o altă realitate, un microunivers compensatoriu în care să se simtă protejați, miturile și riturile însemnând, în concepția acestora, o recuperare a echilibrului ființei postparadiziace în contextul luptei dintre bine și rău, dintre ceea ce este moral și neadecvat în societate, rolul acestora fiind unul apotropaic[3]. Totodată, așa cum credea și Maria Ioniță din textele culese de aceasta, „fiecare lucru, fiecare loc, fiecare casă are vâlvă, dar mai cu seamă băile și comorile sunt stăpânite de ea”[4].

Aceste ființe populau universul băieșilor din Munții Apuseni la începutul secolului XX, reprezentând duhurile pământului și manifestând atât valențe benefice, cât și malefice. De pildă, apariția vâlvelor bune însemna protecția caselor, a familiei, a locului în general, în timp ce vâlvele rele trebuiau alungate prin anumite comportamente, ritualuri corespunzătoare. Acele ritualuri presupuneau, conform mentalității arhaice și folclorice, o inițiere, întrucât intențiile acestora ar putea avea un impact diabolic, distrugător sau chiar aducător de moarte. În acest sens, Mircea Eliade sublinia în cartea sa, Ocultism, vrăjitorie și mode culturale, faptul că „În timpul inițierii, novicii sunt considerați morți și se comportă precum duhurile. În astfel de cazuri, suntem martorii unei anticipări destul de veridice a morții, adică o anticipare a modului de a fi al unui spirit. Prin urmare, în unele culturi există credința că numai cei care au fost inițiați corespunzător vor dobândi o postexistență reală; ceilalți, fie vor fi osândiți la starea larvară, fie vor cădea victimă unei a doua morți”[5].

Etnologii și culegătorii de folclor au constatat faptul că aceste credințe în vâlvele comorilor sau duhul băilor erau cele mai răspândite în Țara Moților, astfel că aceste mituri se regăseau adânc în subconștientul colectiv al minerilor din Munții Apuseni, ei crezând că „ființa divină care supraveghează și distribuie aurul prin băi bântuie și prin adâncurile pământului”[6]. Astfel, băieții resimțeau atât neliniște și incertitudine la intrarea în mine, cât și speranță, datorită dualității vâlvelor — bune sau rele, albe sau negre — care le puteau aduce fie noroc, prin semne și îndrumări spre zăcămintele de aur, fie ghinion, prevestind moarte, groază sau neîmplinire. Dihotomia alb/negru, benefic/malefic se regăsește în mentalitatea arhaică specifică mitologiei de pretutindeni, astfel încât, în opera lui Ion Agârbiceanu, întâlnirea cu vâlva albă reprezenta ceva favorabil, o zi norocoasă, în timp ce aceea neagră era aducătoare de ghinion: „Sunt două feluri de vâlve: neagră și albă. Aia neagră-i periculoasă, aia albă îi bună, nu ți-i frică ca de un om bun. Nuț poartă frica nimănui (...)”[7]. Drept urmare, minerii se lăsau ghidați de aceste semne prevestitoare[8] și simboluri specifice vâlvelor, ele putând lua felurite înfățișări, fiind identificate după unele urme lăsate: „Aceasta se poate prezenta băieșilor sub forma unui pitic, copil, bătrân cu lulea, băieș, moș, femeie frumoasă de parcă avea stele în ochi, drumeț, babă etc. În alte cazuri, însă, vâlva sau duhul băii putea primi înfățișarea unor animale foarte apropiate oamenilor: mâță, iepure, berbec, vrăbiuță cu ochi mici, miel, pasăre sau putea fi tot atât de bine: izvor limpede, cântec, surpături, strigăt, tropăituri, miorlăituri, urmă de găină cu cinci ghiare și o unghie mai sus etc. (...) vâlva bună se înfățișează mai ales învășmântată în alb. Astfel vâlva poate fi: golumb alb, umbră albă, ied alb, berbec inelat și alb ca zăpada, dar mai ales apare ca fată cu batistă albă și copiluț alb, femeie cu haine albe și om în haine albe, bătrân ca neaua și pitic cu barbă albă."[9].

Așadar, aceste apariții fantastice — vâlvele, duhurile, spiritele sau zânele — se regăsesc în întreaga mitologie a minerilor și a comunităților montane, iar persistența lor în memoria colectivă a locuitorilor din Munții Apuseni se explică, în primul rând, prin valoarea identitară pe care o poartă. Mitul vâlvei sau al duhului pământului este, de fapt, legat de mitul originii, al „oamenilor născuți din pietre și credințele despre apariția și coacerea pietrelor în măruntaiele Pământului"[10]. Iar mai apoi, impresia de veridicitate și autenticitate este una esențială pentru păstrarea acestui mit în subconștientul colectiv, căci, așa cum reiese și din textele culese de diverși etnologi, mitul vâlvelor nu a fost păstrat ca simplă poveste fictivă, ci trăită aievea de mineri. În acest sens, nuvela Duhul băilor scrisă de Ion Agârbiceanu este una relevantă pentru afișarea multiplelor ipostaze în care poate apărea imaginea acestei ființe mitologice, întâmplările băieșilor fiind relatate la persoana întâi tocmai pentru a crea impresia de autenticitate, de participare directă și trăire veridică a unor episoade petrecute cândva, parcă într-un timp arhetipal.

Un alt personaj folcloric des întâlnit în opera lui Ion Agârbiceanu este strigoiul sau strigoaica, acestea fiind imagini ale morților vii care nu au trecut complet pragul vieții de apoi, fiind scindați la limita dintre realitatea pământească și cea supranaturală. Aceste ființe sunt descrise ca fiind malefice, spirite neîmpăcate și răzbunătoare, purtând o tensiune negativă ce trebuie soluționată pentru a restabili ordinea și pacea.

În opera lui Ion Agârbiceanu, mitul strigoiului sau al strigoaicei are un rol important în memoria colectivă a țăranilor căci explorează latura întunecată a umanității, precum și conflictele interne ale personajelor sale. Astfel, strigoiul devine un simbol al fricii de moarte, al regretelor neexprimate, al vinovăției sau al nemulțumirii față de propriul destin. În acest sens, regăsim în proza lui Ion Agârbiceanu ipostaze precum: cea a femeii-strigoi, ființă considerată a fi malefică prin puterea-i de seducție și convingere, damnată, un suflet neliniștit și o imagine stranie, totodată, capabilă de a produce adevărate dezechilibre spirituale. Ea este regăsită în folclorul românesc de pretutindeni și sugerează, la nivel psihologic, acea latură întunecată reprimată a personajului, un alter-ego prin excelență, așa cum este cazul Sorei din romanul Strigoiul ori cea a Ilenuței, preoteasa lui Popa Man, cea care avea să-și facă apariția la casa bărbatului ei, după zeci de ani, asemenea unei strigoaice veritabile, reușind să-i mistuie gândurile și să-i releve adevărata față prin reamintirea trecutului obsesiv: "Glasul lui avea asprimea vântului, în obrajii lui părea că s-au împlântat ghearele unei păsări de pradă, și ochii lui de păcură încremeniră aprinși, ca doi ochi de lup flămând în noapte."[11].

Tot în această categorie a ființelor-strigoi îl putem aminti și pe Dumitru Bogdan din nuvela Jandarmul, personaj care se situează, conform opiniei lui Cornel Regman, în categoria posedaților[12], a personajelor demonice. Demonizarea acestui personaj este accentuată de tăcerea sa perfidă, iar liniștea sa enigmatică conferă narațiunii o ambiguitate caracteristică emergenței lumii fantastice. Mircea Popa va face, însă, o distincție notabilă între homo fantasticus al lui Agârbiceanu și homo diabolicus sau demonicus căci, așa cum sublinia acesta, „Demonia e o stare de exacerbare și pervertire a trăirilor, stridentă dar totuși logică la nivel de normalitate. Demonia presupune convietuirea cu răul și urâtul, fantasticul cu neprevăzutul și bizarul, cu ilogicul. (...) Agârbiceanu e un scriitor pentru care zonele de mister ale sufletului uman capătă un sens aleatoriu, devin o formă a cunoașterii. Obscurul, straniul, bizarul devin categorii ale unei permanente sondări a sufletului uman dincolo de limitele aparente. Ele sunt cele care provoacă cititorului reacția de uimire, neliniște, ezitare"[13], aceste observații fiind în deplină concordanță cu definiția elementului fantastic propusă de Tzvetan Todorov, concretizată în conceptul de „ezitare a cititorului"[14].

După cum s-a menționat anterior, mitul strigoiului își are originea în credința omului arhaic în transcenderea sufletului după moarte și în capacitatea acestuia de a reveni printre cei vii, această idee fiind larg răspândită în spațiul indoeuropean[15], inclusiv în România, davadă fiind multiplele ipostaze și denumiri asociate acestui duh întrupat[16]. Semnele de identificare a strigoiului sunt evidente, în majoritatea cazurilor, încă de la nașterea acestuia: „Predispoziția spre strigoizare e una înnăscută, dar poate fi dobândită și pe parcursul vieții prin anumite relații cu necuratul, printr-o moarte violentă sau în urma unei înmormântări în care nu s-a respectat ritualul tradițional”[17]. Așa se întâmplă, de pildă, cu personajul Moise Mărginean din romanul Strigoiul (scris în 1944 și apărut 25 de ani mai târziu), personaj care, prin obscura-i absență, instaurează o atmosferă terifiantă în cadrul operei, creând conflicte între personaje și tensiuni lăuntrice. Acesta este întrupat doar în mințile tulburate ale personajelor, funcționând asemenea unui duh sau blestem menit să influențeze destinul protagoniștilor prin semne malefice transmise constant. Chiar și înainte de moarte, Moise exercită o influență malefică asupra celorlalte personaje, provocând o stare de hipnoză și panică asupra lui Vasile, tatăl lui Gheorghe: „Bolnavul făcu o supremă sforțare să-și deschidă pleoapele. O privire îngrozitoare căzu asupra lui Vasile.

- Jură, ori te blăstăm cu limbă de moarte! Iar a venit, e lângă mine, adaose el, încercând să se înțepenească iar cu degetele uscate și noduroase de marginile patului. Feciorul îngheță și limba i se mișcă cu greu în gură, ca și când i-ar fi fost de lemn.
- Iată, jur, dacă-mi ceri dumneata.”[18], din acest moment, frica se instalează în sufletul tulburat al bărbatului, evoluând ulterior într-o obsesie de natură patologică.

În anumite nuvele ale lui Agârbiceanu, divinitatea este frecvent reprezentată sub o formă mitologică. Ea nu se manifestă ca o prezență impersonală sau abstractă, ci joacă un rol activ în viața oamenilor, fiind înzestrată cu trăsături umane și interacționând cu aceștia la nivel spiritual și moral. Fie că se conturează ca spirite ale naturii sau ca zei ai pământului și ai apei, aceste forțe divine influențează ritmurile vieții umane într-un mod enigmatic și profund simbolic.

În mod similar, și condiția personajelor feminine din opera lui Agârbiceanu suferă transformări semnificative, căci dacă la începutul carierei sale de scriitor, în lucrările sale predomina tiparul femeii simple de la sat, cuviincioasă, evlavioasă și cu frică de Dumnezeu, prototipul țărăncii ancorate în treburile casnice, hotărâtă, cu simț practic și cu picioarele pe pământ, în proza fantastică, aceasta se distinge prin acceptarea ilogicului, a judecății insolite și a elementelor de predestinare magice. Acest lucru se observă, de exemplu, în nuvela Luminița, unde protagonista, baba Mâia, aflată pe patul de moarte, își închipuie un tărâm populat de ființe angelice și demonice, reprezentări ale raiului și iadului, conforme credințelor mitico-creștine transmise din generație în generație în cadrul comunității din care face parte: „Și, mai mult, în boala și singurătatea ei, baba Mâia la lucrurile astea se gândea. Își închipuia cum are să fie raiul cu sfinții. Iadul? D-apoi întunerec beznă, de să nu-ți vezi mâna! Și, prin întunerec, cozi și gheare de draci, care-l prind pe creștin și-l duc la căldarea cu smoală, să-l opărească. Doamne ferește! Iadul? O, Doamne, Doamne! D-apoi bivolii împungaci, ce-or lua în coarne femeile nelegiuite și pe ucigașii de oameni! Doamne ferește, Doamne ferește, Doamne ferește! suspina bătrâna.”[19]. Totuși, ea nu ajunge în iad, întrucât Sfântul Petru o salvează, îi prinde mâna și îi arată calea cea bună, asemenea unui vechi prieten care te ghidează atunci când te rătăcești. Se poate observa că acest eveniment fantastic este, în esență, coborât la nivelul cotidianului, integrându-se perfect în universul rural familiar al bătrânei. Această reprezentare, încărcată de valențe magice, funcționează ca o explicație logică și plauzibilă, apropiată de înțelegerea omului simplu de la țară, dar totodată separată de raționalitatea științifică.

Astfel, în textele lui Agârbiceanu se conturează un proces de desacralizare și demitizare a fabulosului, fie prin observațiile naratorului, fie prin percepțiile personajelor; în orice caz, cititorul întâmpină dificultăți în a anticipa evoluția neașteptată a firului epic, reconfigurat în planul realului cotidian. Această procedură este vizibilă și în alte nuvele ale autorului ardelean: în Năcaz, o bătrână surdă crede că și-a pierdut auzul din cauza infiltrării unei urechelnițe în ureche; în Oana-precupeața, protagonista atribuie pierderea norocului influențelor malefice ale dracului; în Ursitul, o altă personajă feminină consideră că și-a pierdut bunăstarea din cauza fatalității tragice; iar în Om necăjit sau Sănduța, diverse personaje invocă vina diavolului. În toate aceste cazuri, tranziția subtilă de la universul rural realist către fantasticul verosimil se fundamentează pe o acceptare imediată și totală a irealității concepute. Cititorul nu este nevoit să depună un efort conștient de înțelegere, însă este expus unei alternanțe continue de senzații — surprindere, neliniște, ezitare și incertitudine — caracteristice literaturii fantastice, așa cum evidențiază și Tzvetan Todorov în Introducere în literatura fantastică.

Fantasticul, în proza lui Ion Agârbiceanu, reunește astfel toate elementele ilogice, nefirești și de dezordine spirituală, conturând un univers extralumesc în care scopul central al scriitorului devine explorarea interioară a personajelor și descoperirea misterului intens care le modelează alegerile și comportamentele, anticipându-le destinul. În nuvela Frăsinica, de exemplu, intervenția fantasticului se evidențiază prin ambiguitatea portretizării personajului feminin titular, astfel încât orice încercare de a o înțelege rămâne învăluită într-o aură de mister: ea este, în același timp, „sfântă" și „cochetă", această contradicție fiind deliberată pentru a deruta cititorul și a împiedica crearea unei imagini concrete, accentuând misterul prin privirea ei care aruncă „o văpaie de diamant negru, o văpaie vie, ca însăși viața"[20], o ființă ce se mișcă „ca o adiere, ca o umbră ușoară, aproape nemișcată"[21] și își hipnotizează audiența printr-un „cerc de vrajă: Și să fi ținut până dimineața petrecerea sătenilor, nu m-aș fi mișcat de pe laviță. Mă simțeam ca într-un cerc vrăjit, o mireasmă deosebită îmi mângâia parcă nu numa' mirosul, ci toate simțurile"[22], conferindu-i, totodată, naratorului, „senzația incertă a unei beții"[23]. Astfel se manifestă efectul unei impregnații puternice în fantastic și straniu, evidențiat atât prin leitmotivul privirii, menită să hipnotizeze, cât și prin predilecția autorului pentru accentuarea simțului olfactiv ca reper esențial în conturarea unui univers literar desăvârșit. Parfumul protagonistei umple întreaga încăpere, vibrând în aer și captivând, dar și paralizând observatorul, care ajunge să o perceapă ca pe „o ființă care nu poate să fie de pe pământ": „Era așa de frumoasă Frăsinica, așa de gingașă, așa de sfântă, încât toată ființa m-a încremenit, și m-a cuprins frică mare (...). Apoi a pierit ca o nălucă (...)"[24].

Așadar, proza lui Ion Agârbiceanu se distinge prin sinteza subtilă dintre realismul cotidian și dimensiunea mitico-fantastică, în care credințele populare și miturile transilvănene contribuie la relevarea complexității psihologice și a destinului personajelor. Prin intermediul vâlvelor, strigoilor și al forțelor supranaturale, autorul construiește un univers literar coerent și dens simbolic, unde realul și fantasticul coexistă armonios, conferind operei sale o originalitate estetică remarcabilă și o profunzime interpretativă deosebită.

QUANTUM MONTAGE: NARRATIVE CONTINGENCY AS SPECTATORIAL FREEDOM IN JIA ZHANGKE'S CAUGHT BY THE TIDES

Mihai-Șerban Ghiță
PhD, University of Craiova

Abstract: This paper argues that Jia Zhangke's 2024 film, Caught by the Tides, offers a paradigmatic view on "quantum montage", a cinematic narrative approach which expresses a Chinese anti-teleological philosophical model. In Jia Zhangke's film, fiction coexists with documentary, and past films from the author's filmography with their archival recycling. Such an approach to cinema ties its indeterminacy to spectatorial freedom. By using theories from quantum mechanics (such as the many-worlds theory, quantum entanglement, the uncertainty principle, position and momentum, superposition and collapse or spectatorial experience as measurement), as well Deleuze's crystal-image, we propose to define quantum montage as a crystalline narrative device, a direct syntactic image of spacetime. Without engaging in an overly - mimetic instrumental comparison between narratology and quantum mechanics, this paper follows how Jia Zhangke's work and, specifically, Caught by the Tides, aligns its quantum montage with the algorithmic contingency of the present episteme.

Introduction: a quantum paradigm

Since quantum mechanics gives our current epistemology on space, time and matter, this scientific model finds its way across numerous interdisciplinary fields: quantum computing, quantum humanities, quantum social sciences, quantum biology or quantum machine learning, to name a few. Some of these branches, such as quantum computing, combine computing with the actual science of quantum mechanics, whereas humanities or narratology use such theories as metaphors. Or, as Susan Strehle points out, such intersections imply a form of convergence, whereby what she calls actualistic[1] fiction converges with quantum physics "in seeing the external world and the human relation to it as: discontinuous, statistical, energetic, relative, subjective, uncertain" (Strehle, 1992, p. 8, as cited in Gomel, 2014, p. 19). Quantum fiction, a term first used by Charles Platt, sees the reader as an active participant, a narrative co-creator (Shaw, Reeves-Evison, 2017, p. 53). As an established field, quantum fiction implies the use of a principle from quantum mechanics as a narrative device, such as David Mitchell's novel, Cloud Atlas (2004). Deleuze also uses notions from physics in Cinema II: The Time-Image (1989), such as Euclidian or Riemenian space, or even quantum space in Robbe-Grillet's screenplays such as L'Année dernière à Marienbad (1961):

Of course, we realize the dangers of citing scientific propositions outside their own sphere. It is the danger of arbitrary metaphor or of forced application. But perhaps these dangers are averted if we restrict ourselves to taking from scientific operators a particular conceptualizable character which itself refers to non-scientific areas and converges with science without applying it or making it a metaphor (p. 129).

In cinema, narrativity can express theories from quantum mechanics (such as the many worlds theory, the uncertainty principle, quantum superposition or quantum entanglement) morphologically or syntactically: morphologically, by addressing such theories diegetically, as the multiverse plot in Everything, Everywhere, All at Once (2022), Black Mirror: Bandersnatch (2018), or the quantum entanglement theory in Intersetellar (2014). Cinema can also address paradoxical realities such as Kurosawa's Rashomon (1950), where three accounts of the same event constitute three different stories.

Syntax, on the other hand, concerns cinematic montage. For the purpose of this article, we will define and analyze quantum montage, as it addresses transience and coexistence in Jia Zhangke's

[1] Strehle (1992) borrows the term "actualism" from Werner Heisenberg, who makes a distinction between the actual and the real: "At the subatomic level, he says, reality is not real, but it is active, dynamic, "actual" (p. 7).

Caught by the Tides by implying the audience as an active co-narrator, so that each viewer (and each viewing) offers a different experience and a different perception of the "narrative world", to use Lubomir Dolezel's term, for whom "the basic concept of narratology is not 'story', but 'narrative world', defined within a typology of possible worlds." (Dolezel, 1998, p. 31, as cited in Gomel 2014, p. 33). In Heterocosmica: Fiction and Possible Worlds (1998), Dolozel uses the concept of "possible worlds" as the paradigmatic dimension of narrative ontology. For him, these worlds inhabit our semantic structures even if they are not actual.

In Caught by the Tides, the narrative world is in itself a set of possible worlds, as in the many-worlds theory elaborated by Hugh Everett in 1956, whereby on a subatomic level, every event is a branch point to other events, to other realities. The multiverse model is not just a narrative device pertaining to fantasy, but a "world picture", to use Heidegger's (1977) term. In a postcinematic[2] environment fueled by an „excess of positivity" (Han, 2015), that is, by a cultural coercion to be free, the world picture becomes contingent.

Gaming illustrates the neoliberal cult of choice through interactivity, especially in its open world narratives, where the playable character can choose what paths to take, whether to kill or not, also having options for what to say to another character. Through postcinematic transmedia nomadism, gaming inspires an interactive film like Black Mirror: Bandersnatch (2018), with its stream of forking narrative paths, choices both for the protagonist and for the Netflix viewers deciding the protagonist's fate. More recently, the advent of generative A.I. can be viewed yet as another leap towards a quantic paradigm. Through its own statistical protention, the world picture enters what seems to be a perpetual state of superposition, or "actual" — as opposed to "real", to use Heisenberg's dichotomy. A textual prompt does not ontologically define a singular picture, but its most probable outcome.

A hundred years after the formulation of quantum mechanics, one might conclude that narrativity catches up with science. Yet, as Elana Gomel (2014) has pointed out, "In many ways, narrative is ahead of science, providing a semantic armature for imagining and representing new forms of space and time." (p. 24). And indeed, Borges's short story The Garden of Forking Paths (1941) precedes Everett's (1956) theory in quantum mechanics. In terms of spatial representation, Gomel points out that from the Gothic novel onwards, literature expresses a shift to a post-Newtonian, post-Euclidian conception of space (as place) towards the notion of spacetime in general relativity and quantum mechanics (Gomel, 2014).

In the 21st century accelerationism, the divorce between information and signification equals epistemological freedom, both creatively and destructively. Zizek (2025) sees history in a quantic indeterminacy, open in all directions, so that no fixed, progressive or predetermined narrative is necessary or sufficient. This vision seems to align with that of Byung-Chul Han (2017), who counters the Western teleological, progress-driven (and also eschatological) paradigm with a Chinese view on impermanence. And while digital technologies do create a syncretic omnisphere by deterritorializing cultural specificities and by turning narratives into information (culminating with generative A.I.), at the same time, narrativity and database are, as Manovich (2001) affirms, "natural enemies. Competing for the same territory of human culture, each claims an exclusive right to make meaning out of the world." (p. 199). This might account for what Han (2024) has diagnosed as "a crisis of narration", referring to a culture in which narrativity is subsumed to algorithmic efficiency; that is, to a protentional demand.

Yet, if we look at Jia Zhangke's Caught by the Tides, a heterogenous film that follows its characters throughout the effervescent development of China during the first quarter of the 21st century, its quantic approach to narrativity can be seen as an artistic sublimation of contingency through montage, as an expression of the Chinese philosophy of processuality over permanence. In his book Shanzhai: Deconstruction in Chinese (2017), Byung-Chul Han writes about the palimpsestic quality of Chinese art, arguing that the more a work is admired, the more it changes across numerous subsequent interventions.

[2] We might broadly define postcinema as the digital media landscape derived from cinema, which encompasses AR, VR, gaming or social media. Through the transmedia nomadism of postcinema, the fact that it has no single self-contained definition, but rather an additive collection of characteristics, such as hybridity and indeterminacy, accounts for its alignment with a corresponding quantic view on representation in the 21st Century.

Jia Zhangke recycles his own past films, illustrating the rapid transformations of China and of the people undergoing them through a mosaic narrative. Recurrent actors (Zhao Tao, Zhubin Li), recurrent locations (Datong City or the The Three Gorges Dam area) and, at times, recurrent plots are shot during the course of over twenty years (2001-2022). Also, by combining documentary and fiction, the film branches out into multiple narratives as in Everett's many-worlds theory, granting viewers the possibility to make free associations between sequences. Yet these branches all converge into a main linear storyline: Qiaoqiao (Zhao Tao) searches for her lost lover Guo Bin (Zhubin Li) throughout several films, eventually finding him only to break up with him and meet him by chance sixteen years later.

The spaces crossed by Zhao Tao's characters branch out into documentary sequences, the film subsuming them under a (hyper)fictional form. At the same time, by being recycled, fragments from Jia's past fiction films are reused as archival footage, becoming a form of documentary. Through this narrative recycling, Jia treats his own fiction as an archive, highlighting its artefactual nature. The footage differs in medium (film stock, magnetic tape or digital) and in aspect ratio (from 4:3 to 1:85:1 and 2:39:1). Over the years, Jia has filmed spontaneously with his digital camera (Wang, 2025), without a predetermined goal or narrative. Jia has himself compared his filmmaking process with quantum mechanics:

If you look at a lot of films made in the past, they tend to follow a logical and causal way of thinking, almost like the rules of physics, something that is very linear (...). This is something that I'm trying to break out of, to think about filmmaking not in terms of conventional rule physics, but more like quantum physics. It's more about the correlation or the mutually influential factors of all the things that we experience in life that on the surface, may not even relate to each other. This could be anyone who has been captured in my footage who might not have direct connections to each other, but if you dig deeper, they have a kind of interconnection. (Deadline, 2024)

Jia Zhangke thus favors a paradigmatic dimension of the archive, so that the syntagmatic level (in this particular film) occurs after having shot the constitutive images. Through the indeterminacy of an archive and its future-oriented ontology (Derrida, 1995), Caught by the Tides is liminally structured in what might be called a narrative superposition, based not on causality, but on impressionistic description, and on the viewer's narrative involvement.

Structural approach: repetition and difference

The blend of fiction and non-fiction in Caught by the Tides assures a narrative equilibrium for an otherwise heterogenous, decentralized film. The film is based on the tension between repetition (as recurrent characters and places) and differences. Its documentary approach secures spectatorial belief in an actual world so that quantum montage can virtualize the plot, hiding it behind other possibilities through contingent links. There can be no narrative gaps through such an approach.

The film is structured in three main spatiotemporally delineated parts, indicated textually: 1. Datong City (North China), 2001; 2. Fengjie City, Three Gorges (Southwest China), 2006; 3. Zhuhai City (Southern China), 2022─ the last part also takes place in Datong. And while the first two parts are edited from unused archives or recycled from preexisting films such as Unknown Pleasures (2002), Still Life (2006), Mountains May Depart (2015) or Ash is Purest White (2018), the last chapter is inedited, shot during the Covid-19 pandemic. This last part is formally coherent, using the same camera and aspect ratio. At the same time, it emulates the divergence and hypertextual structure of the first two parts. And although it is signified as contemporary, the first two parts do not appear as flashbacks, but as traces of an everpassing present. The relation between the past and present is not teleological, i.e. the past narratively explaining or justifying the present.

Zhangke has also structured some of his previous films similarly, in three spatiotemporally distinct parts, such as Mountains May Depart (1999, 2014 and 2025, a future imagined ten years after the production of the film) or Ash is Purest White (2001, 2006, 2018). The narratives in these films share topological or character-driven similarities. In the latter, Tao's character, Qiao, fires a gun in order to save his gangster partner. After five years of imprisonment, Qiao is released in 2006, and she travels to Fengjie to look for him. So does Shen, Tao's character in Still Life, who looks for her husband in Fengjie, after he had disappeared for two years. So does another man in Still Life, Sanming, who looks for his wife. The lower parts of the city are being demolished and the people displaced, so that the water level can gradually rise for the dam reservoir. Shen and Sanming wander through the half-demolished, soon-to-be-flooded neighborhoods of Fengjie. The mass displacement to which the inhabitants are subjected to the construction of the Three Gorges Dam is reflected in the film's form. All these images from Jia's filmography or from his personal archives are metanarratively displaced and replaced.

Through this balance of repetition (as recurrent plots, actors and topologies) and difference (as the passage of time and the evolution of space), time is inscribed on the whole filmic surface. Over the course of two decades, the actors age and the image sharpens: from the low resolution of video to the high definition of the pandemic in China; from depicting the soon-to-be-extinct mining communities and young people from the underclass trying to adapt to the capitalist boom in early 2000s Datong City to its contemporary form, with its massive residential areas, depicting the speed and scale of Chinese building. The stratified images show a local blend of socialist capitalism, as through all the sequences in which Zhao Tao's characters endorse products (such as a locally produced liquor) through modelling in local forms of marketing.

The film addresses the Chinese Zeitgeist, so that the romance between Qiaoqiao and Bin is subsumed to its forking narrative. Zhao Tao only appears in the seventh minute of the film, after several disparate scenes, both fictional and non-fictional, so that she is one character among many: not so much a protagonist, but a recurrent character.

The film opens with an obviously fictional scene, only to then show a long documentary scene (unrelated with the first), in which several women sing fragments from songs to celebrate Women's Day, warming themselves by the stove fire inside a mining cabin. Before introducing this scene, Zhangke cross dissolves several fragments in a musical sequence, introducing the passage of time as a core focus of the film, while also textually indicating the lyrics of the opening song (Underground by Brain Failure, a Beijing punk-rock band): "... not even a wildfire / can burn all the weeds / They'll grow back in the spring breezes." Aside from textualizing song lyrics, intertitles inform regarding character thoughts, or spatiotemporal coordinates, as well as phone messages exchanged between characters. Furthermore, by inserting documentary sequences, Zhangke proposes an anti-teleological narrative convention, a form of description that subsumes action.

Jia's filmography is deconstructivist, as Liu (2023) has argued. His films break through the binary opposition between reality and fiction: "Jia Zhangke overlaps the film space with the real-life space and tells the story by integrating the fictional story into the real-life space (...)" (p. 944). Caught by the Tides effaces such binary oppositions, being both fictional and non-fictional, original and recycled, linear and non-linear, progressive and palimpsestic. Furthermore, the notions of flashback or flashforward are effaced as temporal signifiers, since all temporalities are coexistent in the same present that passes.

For this mosaic undecidability to be narratively balanced, the film follows the main linear Qiaoqiao-Bin plotline, where textual intertitles become plot points. Zhao Tao's character is on a ferry across the Yangtze River (in a shot from Ash is Purest White). She is on the ship's deck, typing on her phone: "I am here from Datong looking for you. No word from you for so long, I'm worried." After wandering in Fengjie, she then types another message: "What's wrong with you? Not answering my calls or messages". While she eats on the empty terrace of a restaurant on a rainy evening, she watches on television the missing person's announcement she has posted. Zhangke here cuts to a shot in which Bin is on a cliff overlooking Fengjie City and the Yangtze River. The announcement can be heard off camera, on public speakers, in direct sound continuity with the previous scene, as if Bin hears the news concerning his own disappearance being played throughout the city (fig 1).

In the original scene from Still Life, Zhao Tao was also with Bin in that shot; she had just left the frame, so Bin was actually looking towards her. From this shot (as it is reused in Caught by the Tides), Jia then cuts to a scene in which Zhao Tao walks on a street in Fengjie, then stops to send Bin another text message: “If you don’t show up, I will keep posting the missing person notice.” They eventually meet and say nothing. When she turns towards him, Zhangke cuts to an intertitle, as if from a silent film: “It is over. I have decided.” Her words appear as either her thoughts or what she tells him without actually uttering any words. In the original plot from Still Life, Shen breaks up with Bin in a different scene, while walking on the waterfront, close to the dam. She tells him she wants a divorce. In Caught by the Tides, the text is not uttered verbally but added in postproduction over a silent gaze. Such a narrative intervention risks becoming artificial (that is, overtly instrumental to the plot), but Jia uses this artificiality to create an aesthetic of undecidables.

The spacetime-image

Through montage, Jia Zhangke creates a direct image of spacetime. For Deleuze (1989), the time-image is a direct representation of time in cinema, which subordinates movement and breaks sensorimotor linkages characteristic of the first age of the cinema, focused on linear action. In the time-image, characters do not engage in action, but rather in thought and in memory. Film thus creates what Deleuze (1989) calls "pure visual and optical situations".

In a paper about Jia’s filmography, Xing has remarked that the time-image is prominent in his work (Xing, 2021). Zhao Tao's wanderings are reminiscent of Antonioni's characters, such as Monica Vitti in The Red Desert (1964). Yet the filmmaker’s direct representation of time is inseparable from the spaces or people on which time is inscribed, be it the aging actors, the memory of ruins or the ever-changing urban environments as they are built. Zhao Tao and Zhubin Li’s faces also reveal the passage of time. As Wang (2025) remarks in a facial study of Caught by the Tides,“ faces will ultimately become history’s truest testament”. As an extended landscape, faces thus express the characters ’spatiotemporal conditions.

Yet time and space also seem to be out of joint for the characters. In the second part, Qiaoqiao (as Shen) only searches for her husband to break up with him and then takes the boat back. In comparing Shen with characters from modern cinema, Xing (2021) argues that she cannot change her fate, only witnessing it unfolds and accept it. In the third part of the film, after sixteen years, Bin finds it difficult to adapt to contemporary life. He does not know how to use his smartphone or how younger generations capitalize on digital technologies. He lingers gazing at the ever-changing city which has become unfamiliar to him. Like most of Jia's characters, he also wanders aimlessly, engaging in "pure optical and sound situations" (Deleuze, 1989).

From the crystal-image to quantum montage

In describing the crystal-image in Cinema II: The Time-Image (1989), Deleuze evokes the concept of “compossibility”, which Leibniz used in trying to solve the paradox of truth regarding contingent futures:

Leibniz says that the naval battle may or may not take place, but that this is not in the same world: it takes place in one world and does not take place in a different world, and these two worlds are possible, but are not 'compossible' with each other. (...) according to him, it is not the impossible, but only the incompossible that proceeds from the possible; and the past may be true without being necessarily true (Deleuze, 1989, p. 130).

In its crystalline form, Deleuze (1989) argues that narration thus becomes falsifying, describing events "which are undecidable between true and false to the past" (p. 130). With crystalline descriptions, "which constitute their own object (...) this is a cinema of the seer and no longer of the agent" (p. 126). And with crystalline narration, "characters, who have become seers, cannot or will not react, so great is their need to 'see' properly what there is in the situation." (p. 128).

In Caught by the Tides, montage crystalizes displaced images as their recycled objects: "Therefore, in a perfect crystal, the present is portrayed as an ongoing construction, but one that is invariably dictated by the past." (Nevin, 2019). The actors Zhao Tao and Zhubin Li incarnate their original characters from Jia Zhangke's past films as well as their new, recontextualized ones. Qiaoqiao is silent, although Qiao speaks. Jia only shows fragments in which the actress walks, runs, eats, wanders, dances, her performance relying solely on non-verbal actions. Her only words appear written as silent film intertitles. As she enters a church, Jia cuts to such an intertitle ("What should I do?") as if showing her thoughts in prayer.

In a recycled scene (fig. 2 and 3) from Unknown Pleasures (2002), Zhao Tao's and Zhubin Li's characters are inside a stationary bus, which was repurposed as a business office of sorts. She repeatedly gets up and heads toward the bus door, while he repeatedly holds her, throwing her back on her seat, over and over again, eleven times. She then starts crying, apparently giving up. Then, after a pause, she gets up again, and again, and he eventually lets her go. The camera stays with him as he sits inside the bus and lights a cigarette. In Caught by the Tides, Zhangke then cuts to what appears as unused footage from that scene, a close up of Zhubin Li's hands in which he shakingly types on his cell phone, then cutting to a (seemingly inserted) close up of the phone screen and Li's text message: "I want to leave and have a try outside. Once I get settled, I'll come to get you." This remixed scene opens up the paradigmatic dimension of narrative possibilities. The link between such images is undecidable between past and present, or between actual and virtual:" the 'real 'and 'virtual 'in Jia Zhangke's films are dispelled" (Liu, p. 947), and the two opposing concepts are deconstructed.

While the crystal-image illustrates incompossible realities, quantum montage is thus a crystalline juxtaposition of disparate images, undecidable between an actual image of the present and a virtual image of the past, rendering incompossible links between narrative worlds.

The Uncertainty Principle in the collage film

In 1927, Heisenberg formulated the uncertainty principle through which one cannot measure both the position and velocity of a subatomic particle, since the act of measuring interferes with the condition of the system (Ferrando, 2019).

In Caught by the Tides, Zhangke creates an aesthetic of narrative uncertainty. The viewer cannot grasp both the position (as context, i.e. the narrative spatiotemporal coordinates) and its velocity (as narrative unfolding). A documentary scene in the first fifteen minutes can be traced back to early 2000s Datong, yet its narrative role is contingent. Jia Zhangke interviews a man who has leased the ex-workers' cultural palace in ex-mining city Datong and turned it into a banxi opera house for retired miners. In the scene, we also hear Jia as he fills a moment of silence with a question: "Do you charge an entrance fee?". The interviewed owner answers that the entrance in the music hall is free, but that he charges the women who want to sing, who in turn gain money from the public. The women are also ex workers, so they earn a living by singing there.

This whole scene crystallizes the philosophy of upcycling as an ars poetica. Jia incorporates this unused scene into a film which was nominated for the Palme d'Or at Cannes in 2024 and has reached a global market. And in the scene, the owner not only repurposes an unused place by rendering it publicly useful, but he has also kept a large portrait of Mao which was slightly torn, expressing his intention to hang it back on the wall. He wanted to repair it but decided to follow someone's advice of keeping it as he found it. The man lights a cigarette and thinks silently, posing next to the portrait in a silent documentary mise en scene, a tableau within a tableau (fig. 4), in which an apparently well adapted local capitalist finds the expositional value of what Mao might represent. The torn edges of the portrait spatialize time through possible stories. The canvas is only torn on a single side, signaling something that is missing from a concentrated spot.

After this documentary scene, Jia then cuts into a series of cross-dissolved slow-motion scenes from what seems to be the reused palace of culture, depicting the crowd attending its shows, the faces of workers and the general atmosphere. In one of the scenes, Zhao Tao emerges out of the crowd. The links between these images are uncertain between being descriptive and prescriptive: the viewer has the freedom to ascribe narrative velocity (as necessity) to its contingent momentum. We are informed of the palace of culture, of its role in the community. Yet, through Zhao Tao emerging out of the crowd, we enter a seemingly fictional narrative.

This musical montage sequence uses a mix of diegetic and extradiegetic soundtracks: a barely audible diegetic music (non-fictional) over an ethereal, ambient sound (fictional). The juxtaposition of such elements renders an aesthetic of archeological stratification. The image of spacetime is seen in imbrications so that the point of reference becomes uncertain. It is still a form of collage, but of a subtler nature than the "montage of attractions" which is generally practiced in found footage collage narratives, the likes of short films made by Hans Richter in the 1930s or by Arthur Lipsett in the 1960s, where the viewer experiences machinic forms of filmic expression, such as the loop. In Jia's film, the ethereal overlayered music signifies contemplation, yet it can relate to the past (through nostalgia) just as it can reflect on what is to come. Since it can be both a flashback and a flashforward, it is none, just as the place can be the palace of culture or any other place. After all, the strobe lights in one of the shots seem to indicate a different kind of musical hall. The focus shifts from this uncertain spatiotemporal position towards narrative velocity, as a cinematographic expression of "meanwhile...", a present which is at the same time contracted (elliptical) and dilated (in slow-motion).

Like textual intervention, music also ties disparate shots in seemingly singular realities, while rendering them sonically undecidable between diegetic and extra-diegetic. For instance, in a scene set at a music hall where we hear an amateur female singer in the background, her song can also be heard uninterrupted (falsely diegetic) over shots from different scenes.

Jia's filmography relies heavily on the use of music (folk, pop or electronic), used either diegetically or extradiegetically. Musical sequences thus act as a narrative glue for disparate scenes.

Viewer-response as collapse of superpositions

Through such editing techniques, Zhangke structures his film so that the viewer engages freely with its web of possible meanings, by collapsing its narrative potentiality into a personal viewing. In literary studies, reader-response theory shifts attention away from a closed, deterministic interpretation based on decoding the intention of the author and the meaning of the text, engaging instead with how a literary work is shaped by the singular response of the reader (Smith, 2021). Elaborated by theorists such as Louise Rosenblatt, Stanley Fish, and Wolfgang Iser, this approach postulates that literature is co-created by its readers, by their life experience and their socio-emotional background (Smith, 2021), via a transaction between the text and the reader (Rosenblatt, 1978). An interpretative grid can also be established across the common sensibility of a given community. For Fish (1980), meaning is produced in communities who have common interpretative strategies.

Reader-response criticism has also been applied in cinema, such as Stuart Hall's reception theory (1973) or the empirical approach in Vivian Sobchack's The Address of the Eye: A Phenomenology of Film Experience (1992). Naturally, a viewer from China has a different experience of Caught by the Tides than a westerner, just as someone who has seen Jia Zhangke's filmography has a different perception from someone who sees the recycled images for the first time. What is crucial here is that Jia himself has a viewer response orientation when structuring his film, engaging the viewer's imagination to ascribe meaning at a syntagmatic level, through montage.

Retentional entanglement in recycling fiction

First introduced by physicist Erwin Schrödinger in 1935, the term "entanglement" introduced an essential difference between classical and quantum mechanics. Elaborating on the initial questions raised by Einstein, Podolsky and Rosen, Schrödinger postulates that:

If two separated bodies, each by itself known maximally, enter a situation in which they influence each other, and separate again, then there occurs regularly that which I have [just] called entanglement of our knowledge of the two bodies (Schrödinger 1935, as cited in Terhal et al., 2025).

Through its defiance of classical mechanics, the uncanny aura of quantum entanglement's "voodoo effect" ties it to a bond which defies spacetime, as in Christopher Nolan's Interstellar (2014). In Caught by the Tides, the images become entangled through the disparity between their original and subsequent use, wherein the former influences how the latter is perceived and vice versa. Since Jia Zhangke recycles fiction films featuring the actress Zhao Tao, their characters are entangled through the filmmaker's intention to reuse his own filmography, as well as through viewer response. Qiaoqiao (who is silent) is in a non-local correlation with Zhao Tao's previous speaking characters, that is, with the viewer's possible knowledge of the original. However, spectatorial measurement of such connections also has an uncanny aura. In any fiction film, the viewer's retentional knowledge of an actor's previous roles influences the viewing. Yet in Jia Zhangke's work, they are tied to the same auctorial intention of recycling. Despite a narrative disparity between original and subsequent use of Zhao Tao's performance, her actions, goals and the places she passes through are recurrent over Jia's filmography, so that Zhao Tao's characters become inseparable for the viewer.

Conclusion: quantum poetics of recycling

Since the uncanniness of quantum mechanics is a rich source of narrative imagination, the theoretical development of this model of physics is contemporary with the development of cinema. Caught by the Tides is a form of cinema that syntactically addresses quantum narrativity through archival montage in the age of algorithmic contingency. Through this case study, we can correlate the poetics of recycling in 21st Century cinema to the rise of quantum montage.

Repurposing images amplifies discretization through reconfiguration, highlighting a paradigmatic dimension whereby images form a database so that meaning is in a quantum superposition. In physics, the constant discretization of observed matter leads to a scale so fragmented that only the act of observation itself collapses its undecidability into a wave or a particle. Likewise, narration in postcinema is based on its own discretization, leading to undecidable syntagmatic possibilities. This expresses a narrative model set on the tension between repetition and difference, as in Caught by the Tides, whereby representations of space and time (as spacetime) are seen as indeterminate, in a state of quantic superposition, only to be collapsed by narration, and subsequently through its reception by singular viewers and singular viewings.

Since digital cinema has brought about a golden era of documentary film, the rise of recycled cinema also owes to the accumulation of extensive digital archives. And films which have been called supercuts or mashups are also created through a form of quantum montage. Apart from Caught by the Tides, which creates spacetime-images, other archival filmmakers explore the syntagmatic remix possibilities of the history of cinema. Final Cut: Ladies and Gentlemen (2012) is composed of over 400 films. Director György Pálfi creates falsely diegetic links between disparate sources: for instance, characters from different films seem to be talking to each other on the phone in apparent continuity, thus creating a new dialogue based on the films 'synthesis. We might call them "false movement images" which subordinates time to movement through a false trans-filmic narrative continuity. In other words, "storytelling from scraps" favors the paradigmatic dimension of postcinema as database, so that it is possible not just to link disparate images, but to recreate the illusion of continuity within a composite narrative world that forces the elasticity of spectatorial belief.

Where Caught by the Tides stands out aesthetically as an archival docufiction film is that its sources were created by the same author. Jia Zhangke's quantum storytelling is based on recurrence, creating a paradigmatic body of work which can be reconfigured syntagmatically. The images do not conceal their artefactuality, but reveal a post-cinematographic palimpsestic expression, crystallizing the palimpsestic change within China's social landscapes. Ultimately, Chinese cinema excels, paradoxically being original in its anti-teleological view— as liminality par excellence.

A SEPARATE PEACE WITH THE WORLD IN ERNEST HEMINGWAY'S A FAREWELL TO ARMS

Dimitrie Andrei Borcan
PhD, "Ovidius" University of Constanța

Abstract: Chronologically among the first in the line of Ernest Hemingway's novels with autobiographical inspiration, A Farewell to Arms recalls the writer's experience of the World War I on the Italian front.

The main themes of the novel discussed here are: The world as war; Escapism; Desertion as a separate peace.

There are certain motifs present in Hemingway's novels that exist here, too: Masculinity; Loyalty or abandonment; Games; Illusions.

The article insists on presenting the story of the love between Frederic Henry and Catherine Barkley as analysable through the three main themes discussed here.

There is a clear evolution and modification of the hero, heroine and of their relationship throughout the novel.

The article follows Hemingway's demonstration that the world can be seen as war, chaotical, cruel and nonsensical, destructive of everything and everyone that is good, or gentle or brave, of any ethical values.

Frederic Henry's final desertion is regarded as a farewell to arms, a separate peace, an option he is obliged to take in order to survive and to live for the sake of his love. Its result is, however, dissatisfaction, and finally his lover's death and his tragic solitude. Both are broken by the war (or the world it stands for).

Keywords: world; war; separate peace; game; loyalty

In the line of many of his novels, such as The Sun Also Rises (1926) on Hemingway's visits to Pamplona, Spain, Death in the Afternoon (1932) , dealing with bullfights, Green Hills of Africa (1935) inspired from his African safaris, For Whom the Bell Tolls (1940), inspired from his experience of the Civil War of Spain, A Farewell to Arms (1929) can be said to have an autobiographical inspiration, in the novelist's experience of the World War I. Having been rejected from the army for poor eyesight, Hemingway applied for a Red Cross volunteer ambulance military unit in 1918. While delivering supplies for the soldiers on the front line, he was caught in a mortar fire and wounded. He spent months in a Red Cross hospital in Milan for recovery. And later he was awarded the Silver Medal of Bravery by the Italian government. He met and fell in love with nurse Agnes von Kurowsky, who, he hoped, would join him in the United States, but she left him. All these experiences inspired the topic of A Farewell to Arms (1929), his novel on love in the World War I.

The narrator of the story is its main hero, Frederic Henry, the novel comprises his own memories and is written in the first person singular, in the Past Tense. Henry is in many respects, coincidental with Hemingway: he is an American a volunteer ambulance driver fighting for Italy, he falls in love with a nurse. The novel begins in the north of Italy, devastated by the first World War, and ends in Switzerland, after Henry has deserted, making "a separate peace". Hence its title "A Farewell to Arms." Henry changes the military uniform into civilian clothes as a deserter. Love, war and death have a profound impact on his psyche, making of the novel more than a love story, a painful meditation on the human condition, on the pointlessness of human efforts for survival and happiness in the face of the adversity of hazard.

A Farewell to Arms narrates Frederic Henry and Catherine Barkley's desperate struggle to find oblivion from the horrors of war and death in a world whose main rule is war and that punishes those who find comfort and freedom in love by death.

The Frederic Henry at the beginning of the book is totally different from that at the ending. The initial Henry is the macho hero often encountered in Hemingway's novels, brave, indifferent to love and philosophizing, honest and generous, idealistic and shallow. When given a leave, he does not go to the military priest's hometown holy Abruzzi, preferring to travel round a number of cities where he keeps on drinking hard, carousing and having sex with paid women. His moral values appear to be null, and he does not tire his mind with moral dilemmas.

His type of escapism is similar to that of his colleague, the Italian surgeon Rinaldy, who searches oblivion in sex.

Henry's hard drinking throughout the novel is so excessive that he falls ill with alcoholic jaundice, and he could legally be not sent to the front in such a condition. However, chief nurse Miss Van Campen has his leave annulled, stating that he has inflicted the alcoholic jaundice on purpose, in order to escape fighting on the front. The love for Catherine will change him to such a degree that on the last pages of the book he becomes a real tragic character. Thus, Hemingway's heroes' masculinity appears to be of various types, and evolving through books. He engages in a love-to-be farcical idyll with Catherine, whom he likes but does not love, their parts consisting in miming love, in order to console this "rather crazy" girl for the death of her fiancé. She considers that such a mock romance could help her to forget more easily her terrible loss, for which she is still in mourning, and he agrees to play the part of the enamoured one in the love game.

To his surprise, she acknowledges their charade, asking, "This is a rotten game we play, isn't it?" (Farewell 52)

While at first, she is for him Miss Barkley, later in the book she will be called Catherine and finally, at the end of the novel, she is Cat, "poor dear Cat." Her role in Henry's life and psyche becomes stronger and stronger, ever more profound and life-determining.

Although they do not plan marriage unless when they are obliged to by the imminence of a childbirth and by the criticism of Miss Helen Ferguson, Catherine's colleague nurse and best friend, they consider themselves already married, since they spend their nights and a large part of their days together and she is pregnant. She says she does not need any state or church to sanctify their tie. Their love is complete, serene and faithful as it is. The only modification she considers necessary is a family name for their future child, but, even so, she will not speed their wedding until the time when she is again thin and lacking external obligation signs.

She does not change her bad habit of drinking too much during her pregnancy. Their future "family life" does not turn from a mock idyll into an actually responsible family with a child routine. They do not consider getting married or obtaining a citizenship or other practical aspects of married life. When a doctor warns her about her narrow hips, Catherine refuses to acknowledge the possibility that the childbirth may be fatal to her and the baby. This is a foreshadowing of her death in childbirth at the very end of the novel. Managing to get into the hospital room of her death, Henry is not capable of telling his farewell to her. In the presence of her dead body, he finds his escapism ruined, their attempt to flee reality failed, and himself condemned to solitude and despair.

They have fled together the reality of her former fiancé, the reality of the war involving many deaths of the others, and now he has to face the reality of her still born baby and of her death. The world is governed by the law of war and death, and it condemns to death those who do not humbly agree to acknowledge these cruel rules of the existence.

Some of the main themes of the novel are: The world as war; Escapism; Desertion as a separate peace.

~The world as war

As the title of the novel suggests, A Farewell to Arms is mainly about war, and precisely about the story of Frederic's going away from it. The majority of the characters in the book hate and condemns war. The men drink and discuss the war. Henry admits to hating it, and the priests says that there are two types of men in the world: those who would make war and those who would not. Henry laments that "the first ones make [the second ones]do it…And I help them." (Farewell 83)

There are only a couple who support it, and they come across as "bores" and braggarts. All the other people are against the destruction it causes, and are sceptical about the glory it brings.

One main theme of the novel is the dark reality of war. Everyone in the novel hate's wars. There is one exception of a bragging hero, Ettore Moretti, who is decorated and is sincerely fond of the gloomy war, but he is found to be boring and unpleasant by all the other characters, and especially by Catherine.

The rest of the characters clearly express their condemnation and hate of war, as a destructive and absurd process, which cannot be avoided and ruins everyone and everything.

There is nothing as bad as war. ...When people realize how bad it is they cannot do anything to stop it because they go crazy. There are some people who never realize. There are people who are afraid of their officers. It is with them the war is made. (67)

There are certain scenes that make this idea convincing.

The chaos and nonsensical deaths that the war brings about are most powerfully depicted in the scene of the Italians' withdrawal from the advancing Germans. As the army's ordered columns crumble into dismal disorder, the soldiers' minds seem to crumble into furious madness.

Then the truck stopped. The whole column was stopped. It started again and we went a little farther, then stopped. (177)

When Frederic shoots at the two engineers for refusing to free the car from the mud, Hemingway does not make any comments, he just gives the bare facts. This disinterested tone places Henry's violence against an amoral background: shooting someone is given the same ethic weight as freeing a car from the mud.

The murder of the engineer is a brilliant description of the meaninglessness and chaos of war. Henry's reaction is illogical. Moreover, his mate Bonello's finishing thee engineer dead as an approval of Henry's act seems even more amoral and meaningless.

The scene is shocking because calm and detached Frederic, quite out of the blue, shoots and almost kills the engineer who refuses to move the car out of the mud. The accomplices of Henry are the other soldiers, one out of whom shoots the engineer lethally. Murdering the engineer seems to them just, their ethic and logic are wry. Extending the logic from one incident to the entire world at war, the latter appears to be inevitable and natural. This is not a mere war novel, but it tends to be an existentialist meditation on the human condition. War as chaos and death is the basic condition of the world, a misanthropic society who refuses to preserve morals and true love. However, the book is not the creation of a pacifist. War is not condemned as the antonym of peace, but it is thought to be the appropriate expression of the chaos and cruelty of the world, which does not acknowledge the values of love and peace.

That was what you did. You died. You did not know what it was about. You never had time to learn. They threw you in and told you the rules and the first time they caught you off base they killed you. Or they killed you gratuitously like Aymo…. Stay around and they would kill you. (179)

"The world breaks everyone" (221) and good people die "impartially". (221)

As Catherine says, the world punishes and kills those who are in favour of love and peace.

~Escapism

The various characters in the novel find different ways of distraction from the bleak reality of war. Rinaldi is obsessed with sex. His innumerable sordid affairs with bordello prostitutes are his manner to mask the terrible reality with an enjoyment façade.

Henry drinks enormous quantities of alcohol throughout the novel. He manages to get sick with alcoholic jaundice and, thus, he asks for being dismissed from first front battling. However, nurse Van Campen accuses him of inflicting alcoholic hepatitis on himself on purpose in order to escape fighting in battles, and sends him to the front.

Although she has a pregnancy, Catherine drinks along with Henry throughout the novel. Other characters in the book are big drunks, too.

The norms of the peaceful society no longer apply during the war. The soldier's mock religion and religious ethics and rules. They make a laughingstock out of the priest because he has no affairs with women. Chastity, like everything else he preaches is a source of jokes to them. The ethic values are upside down.

Catherine and Frederic enjoy games. Since she is mourning her late fiancé, she proposes to him to play together a fake love game, which will help them forget about their real pains. Starting as a mock game that distracts them, their love story becomes in time a true love history, which will determine radical changes in their lives, the fuel that sustains them and brings about her death in childbirth. In time, their love becomes genuine, and the tragedy of the novel is that the purity and beauty of their passion cannot save them from the destruction brought about by the warm and Catherine and the baby die.

One day, on the day to a dugout, shelling begins and bombs burst around the soldiers. As the men are eating, there is "a flash, as when a blast-furnace door is swung open" (Farewell 70). The hospital where wounded Frederic is a patient and operated is empty, without patients, and he cannot be treated unless the doctors and nurses receive permission from the authorities. Getting married would traditionally allow them to enjoy marital sex, but that would mean conforming to the religious norms and no longer playing the escapist love game, they are involved in, engaging in a serious social institution as marriage is. When Catherine notes that the doctor is worrying over her narrow hips, she dismisses the anxiety with the thought that God will not abandon her to death. She and Frederic do not think much of citizenship, getting married, they just playhouse. It seems inevitable that the game will end with her death, as a foreshadowed danger. Thus, hospitals, religion, marriage and all serious institutions of the society before the war are mocked at by the hero and the heroine.

~Desertion as a separate peace

When Frederic discusses the possibility of the war ending with the priest, it seems to them that the war is perpetual, there are no prospects of peace. This makes the priest so pessimistic that religion appears to be no support for the soldiers' morale, but a source of even deeper depression. Thus, the institutions meant to protect them lack their power to act so, are comically powerless against the grim reality of war.

It looked as though the war were going on for a long time . . . Next year would be a bad year, or a good year, maybe…The Italians were using up an awful lot of men. I did not see how it could go on …Perhaps wars weren't won anymore. Maybe they went on forever. (107)

Worse still, tradition punishes the characters for straying from it despite its clear uselessness. Miss Van Campen sending Frederic to the front under the accusation of self-inflicted alcoholic jaundice does not try to help and cure him but punished a sick man with an undeserved harsh sentence. Moreover, she ignores his pain which is at the root of his drinking.

During the chaotic retreat, the Carabinieri shoot officers for losing their troops. They believe that "Italy should never retreat" making a slogan of an illogical idea. When he has no choice to escape being executed, Frederic, who has been arrested by the Italians to be shot, runs away and swims in a river, on another situation he rows a boat to Switzerland, abandoning his uniform, his arms, his military rank, becoming a civilian on the way of asking for the citizenship of another country, making his "separate peace", his "farewell to arms" which ends his war story forever.

When he witnesses Italians shooting other Italians for retreating from the Germans, and when he is caught and certain to be shot by the Italians, Frederic decides to desert by diving into the river. His loyalty to this war has come to an end, he only wants to survive it. The war is over to him. He tells his farewell to arms and becomes a civilian who will change the country, too.

I would like to have had the uniform off although I did not care much about the outward forms. . . I was through. I wished them luck. There were the good ones, and the brave ones, and the calm ones, and the sensible ones, and they deserved it. But it was not my show anymore. (207)
There were many places. (208)

He tells Catherine that he will some time share his desertion story to her, if he can "get it straight in [his] head." This suggests that he feels like a criminal for deserting the army, which speaks of an inner conflict which is much deeper than he admits. Catherine consoles him that it was not "the army" but the "Italian army", and there are other armies in the world.

His escape through the river is a sort of baptism, washing away his former duties and preparing him for his civilian and private duties to Catherine and his young family. He makes a "separate peace," a "farewell to arms" that is eponymous to the title of the novel.

Henry feels the unfairness of his and Catherine's destiny and this motivates him to try to stay alive together with Catherine as a family waiting for a baby, all the more as he realises the complications of her pregnancy.

Catherine's death is not a punishment for their illicit love making outside of wedlock, but they both feel it to be that way. They have played their love game to get comfort from the war and are now punished for playing the game. Catherine speaks of a certain malevolence in the world.

There are certain motifs present in Hemingway's novels that exist here, too: Masculinity; Loyalty or abandonment; Games; Illusions.

~Masculinity

Hemingway's novels always have characters deploying ideal features of masculinity, who are domineering, virile, competent. Henry's unemotional reaction to being wounded shows his stoicism: he feels neither despair at the wound nor excitement at Rinaldi's promise that the wound will bring him a medal. He has no interest in being decorated.

Rinaldi, with his talks about "pretty girls" and frequent visits to the brothel, is the embodiment of the male sex drive. But, as the priest suggests, sex is not sufficient for a man's satisfaction. The priest tells Henry that he needs someone to love, and he draws a distinction between love and sex with the prostitutes. Profound love, in the priest's view, makes a man sacrifice for the sake of another (Farewell 83) Certain characters in this novel have such features, too, outstanding by the contrast with other opposite characters in the novel. Thus, Dr. Rinaldi is a womanizer, contrasted to the chaste priest. Dr. Valentini is an extremely competent surgeon, contrasted with the group of over-prudent three doctors examining Frederic. Bonello dares to finish the life of the uncooperative engineer whom Henry has shot for not getting the car out of mud. Admiration and respect for one side of the pair involves condemnation and contempt of the other. Loyalty, strength, resilience to adversity, a healthy sexual appetite – these are the traditional features of a Hemingway's hero. Henry states that a coward dies a thousand deaths, the brave but one (135). They wonder aloud who wrote this observation, but neither can remember. Catherine then corrects the quote, saying that intelligent brave men die perhaps two thousand deaths but never mention them. (135)

Henry's words about cowards actually quote Julius Caesar's utterance in Shakespeare's Julius Caesar: "Cowards die many times before their deaths.

The valiant never taste of death but once" (II.ii.32–33).

Frederic's failure to remember that Caesar is killed a few scenes after making this declaration seems to foreshadow disaster for himself and Catherine.

~Loyalty or Abandonment

From the start, Henry feels as detached from the war as he feels from everything else in his life. He claims that the war "does not have anything to do with me" and he feels no real commitment to it.

Loyalty and abandonment do not apply to great notions such as military bravery, duty, honour, discipline, heroism. The medalled characters deploying them (Ettore Moretti) are braggart, boring, ridiculous. The loyalty and lack of abandonment do apply to love, to the intimate part of the existence, not to its citizen or military side. Unlike Ettore, Frederic praises little patriotism, honour and heroism. He values loyalty to his personal companion, Catherine, not to the social war side.

Marriage, in her view, is beside the point: "I couldn't be more married." (116) Catherine pledges to be faithful to Frederic, but she says she is sure "all sorts of dreadful things will happen to us." (116), unfaithfulness is not one of them.

When making his goodbye to Catherine before going to the front, while passing a pair of lovers standing out of a cathedral, Henry makes the observation, "They are like us", to which Catherine unhappily answers, "Nobody is like us." (140)

On the day of their goodbye, when Henry utters the lines,
"But at my back I always hear Time's winged chariot hurrying near" (146),
Catherine recognizes it as a couplet from Andrew Marvell's "To His Coy Mistress".

~Games

Henry and Catherine start their flirting in order to escape personal pain, to "drop the war".

I thought she was probably a little crazy. It was all right if she was. I did not care what I was getting into. This was better than going every evening to the house for officers where the girls climbed all over you and put your cap on backward as a sign of affection between their trips upstairs with brother officers. I knew I did not love Catherine Barkley nor had any idea of loving her. This was a game, like bridge, in which you said things instead of playing cards. Like bridge you had to pretend you were playing for money or for some stakes. (52)

Confessions are beyond them. Rather, they speak in non-romantic terms:

"You've such a lovely temperature. "

"You've got a lovely everything."

"Oh, no. You have the lovely temperature. I'm awfully proud of your temperature." (Farewell 107)

Catherine spends the night in Henry's room.

"There, darling. Now you're all clean inside and out. Tell me. How many people have you ever loved?"

"Nobody."

"Not even me?"

"Yes, you."

"How many others really?"

"None."

"How many have you – how do you say it? – stayed with?"

"None."

"You are lying to me"

"Yes."

"It's all right. Keep on lying to me. That's what I want you to do. Were they pretty?" (Farewell 108)

Even more shocking is her admission, soon after announcing her pregnancy, that "I've never even loved anyone." (108)

They enjoy game playing, taking part in betting for horse racing. Ironically, when their own relationship becomes a source of suffering, Henry's thoughts found a diversion in the war itself. The transformation of love from divertissement into a serious painful feeling makes war an entertaining less important topic. The sufferance bringing distance shows that happiness can only be a transitory state for the two lovers.

When Catherine tells Henry that she fears the rain because "it's very hard on loving," (109) the reader can only begin to guess the kinds of sorrow, fear, and joy that have shaped her. At the very end of the novel, after her death, Frederic is shown alone in the rain. Rain has been a foreshadowing of her death by repeated haemorrhages.

It seems she had one haemorrhage after another. They couldn't stop it. I went into the room and stayed with Catherine until she died. (286)

But after I had them gone out and shut the door and turned the off light it wasn't any good. It was like saying good-by to a statue. After a while I went out and left the hospital and walked back to the hotel in the rain. (286)

There is much foreshadowing in the novel: Catherine's prediction that dreadful things are going to happen to them, the rainfall that scares her, the doctor's warning that she has too narrow hips, Henry's conviction that the world kills the good and the gentle.

~Illusions

When they meet, Frederic and Catherine engage in their game of love to forget reality: he wants to forget the nightmarish war, she wants to forget her mourning for her dead fiancé.

Henry imagines himself and Catherine going to a hotel, where she pretends that he is her dead lover:

We would drink the capri and the door locked and it hot and only a sheet and the whole night and we would both love each other all night in the hot night in Milan (Farewell 57)

At the end of the novel, when they are two deserting civilians in Switzerland, boredom has already started to invade their marital life and they try small variations to invigorate the freshness of their love. All the time they dream of and desire something else. She plans to get a haircut, he grows a beard, they need to look different, to be new people. What they dream of is living in the mountains in Switzerland, far from bleak realities, which means that their love story is escapism from the reality of war, fantasizing.

While Catherine is happy with a life "all mixed up" Henry is discontent with his new, civilian existence, and he declares,

"I haven't any life any more" (280).

When he looks at the mirror of the gym hall, he sees a stranger wearing a beard.

Henry thinks that defeat has made the men gentle and weak and exemplifies his point to the priest with the story of Jesus Christ, who, he thinks, was made gentle because he was beaten down.

No one ever stopped when they were winning . . . It is in defeat that we became Christian. I don't mean technically Christian . . . I mean like Our Lord. If they felt the same way as we do, it would be all right. But they have beaten us. They feel another way. (167)

He points that he does not believe in the victory in the war. When the priest asks him what he believes in, he answers, "In sleep" (166)

The characters who have not yet lost any beliefs, as dispirited Rinaldi has, try to make up for this loss, like Catherine or Frederic. Frederic's conversation with the priest is a confession that, without a commitment to God or to the war in which he is fighting, to honour or other moral values, he only believes in the oblivion that sleep brings. (166).

I had seen nothing sacred, and the things that were glorious had no glory and the sacrifices were like the stockyards in Chicago if nothing was done with the meat except to bury it. There were many words that you could not stand to hear and finally only the names of places had dignity. Certain numbers were the same way and certain dates and these with the names of the places were all you could say and have them mean anything. Abstract words such as glory, honour, courage, or hallow were obscene beside the concrete names of villages, the numbers of roads, the names of rivers the numbers of regiments and the dates. (170)

Sacred words seem pompous to him and embarrass him. He thinks that concrete things, like names of places or numbers, have more meaning than abstractions.

Any words that may bring him comfort are false or inappropriate. They belong to the realm of Henry's drinking, of Catherine's escapism in love making, of Rinaldi's prostitutes. They provide shelter from the world's inhospitality, but this is only a temporary shelter.

The stylistic features of the novel are characteristic of the journalistic style: short sentences, a vigorous language, a sparse style.

In Death in the Afternoon, which is a meditation on bullfighting and writing, Hemingway advances his "Iceberg Theory" of fiction:

If a writer of prose knows enough about what he is writing about he may omit things that he knows and the reader, if the writer is writing truly enough, will have a feeling of those things as strongly as though the writer has stated them. The dignity of movement of an iceberg is due to only one eighth of it being above water (Hemingway 15)

After using sentences starting with "I" for a number of pages narrating memories, Hemingway changes the person of his verbs to the generic "you", addressing to the reader, generalizing Henry situation to that of every man.

Critics have stated that Hemingway did more to change the style of the twentieth century American fiction than any other writer, by using a boldly declarative, which in the 1920s and 1930s was considered to be an experimental departure from the baroque Victorian style of the high literature. The first chapter of the novel sketches a description in a detached, journalistic prose, which is, however, impressive:

The trunks of the trees too were dusty, and the leaves fell early that year and we saw the troops marching along the road and the dust rising and leaves (Farewell 31)

"THE NECESSARY ANGEL" AND "THE SUPREME FICTION" IN WALLACE STEVENS'S POETRY

Dimitrie Andrei Borcan
PhD, "Ovidius" University of Constanța

Abstract: It is hard to place a unique poet such as Wallace Stevens in a literary trend, but it is not hard to find nature as reality features throughout his poetry.

Especially in his early writings, but not only, Stevens uses impressively concrete images to render aphorisms, adagia, through the metaphors and parables of his poems. He is permanently preoccupied with pith topics of existence and cognoscibility, mortality of the human body and of the material nature versus immortality of art as abstracting memory.

Dissatisfied with old religions and gods, and with the solace they no longer offer to the modern humanity, he proposes a"supreme fiction" of imagination and creativity to replace old religions and serve human spirit better.

Thus, the supreme fiction is the conceptualisation of reality, even if only momentary, capable of seizing something actual and making it abstract. To him, the supreme God is imagination.
The supreme fiction is transitory. It is the necessary angel of subjective reality – which must be always assessed- and, thus, always contains some element of unreality.

The "necessary angel" is a mechanism by which he resorts to reality, because otherwise art would lose vitality. This idea is emphasised in Stevens's prose of literary theory and in most of his poetry.

This article analyses many of Stevens's poems (most of them prior to the 1920es) and his literary and aesthetic study The Necessary Angel.

Keywords: the necessary angel; the supreme fiction; reality; immateriality; art

It is hard to place a unique poet such as Wallace Stevens in a literary trend, but it is not hard to find nature as reality thinking features throughout his poetry.

When commenting on the place of Stevens among contemporary poets and previous poets, his biographer Paul Mariani stated, Stevens's real circle of philosopher-poets included Pound and Eliot as well as Milton and the great romantics. By extension, E. E. Cummings was a mere shadow of a poet, while Blackmur (a contemporary critic and publisher) did not even deign to mention Williams, Moore, or Hart Crane. (Mariani 177)

David Lehman, introducing Wallace Stevens's works in his The Oxford Book of American Poetry anthology, mentions the poet's Adagia, as aphorisms:

Aphorisms of unusual pith , any of which might serve as the topic or title of a symposium, a lecture, a poem or a book: "Money is kind of poetry," "All poetry is experimental poetry," "All history is modern history," "Realism is a corruption of reality," "The death of one god is the death of all," "Poetry must be irrational," "Romanticism is to poetry what the decorative is to the painting," "One's ignorance is one's chief asset." Stevens said that "The Emperor of Ice Cream" was his favourite among his poems because "it wears a deliberately commonplace costume, and yet seems to me to contain something of the essential gaudiness of poetry" (Lehman 249)

In "Disillusionment of Ten O'Clock," (1915), Stevens mentions seasons as their defining colours: winter wears "white night-gowns", summer and autumn wear "green with yellow rings" (Oxford Book 249):

None are green
Or purple with green rings,
Or green with yellow rings,
Or yellow with blue rings
None of them are strange,

With socks of lace and beaded ceintures.(249)

The tropics are evoked by the mentioning of "baboons and periwinkles", as well as tigers, and are identified with summer, the seasonn when "an old sailor"

Catches tigers
In red weather (249).

Notes Toward a Supreme Fiction is a lyrical work formed of three parts, each containing ten poems, and the work also includes a preface and an epilogue. Throughout his literary activity, Stevens studied the issue of what one should think of reality, when religion no longer helps. The solution he proposes is "Supreme Fiction," which may improve old notion of religion and the old imperfect notion of God. He is satirical to religion in "A High-Toned Old Christian Woman" (1922). He plays with the immediate, but dissatisfactory, reality:

Poetry is the supreme fiction, madame,
Take the moral law and make a nave of it
And from the nave build haunted heaven. Thus,
The conscience is converted into palms
Like windy citherns, hankering for hymns.
We agree in principle. That's clear. But take
The opposing law and make a peristyle.
And from the peristyle project a masque
Beyond the planets. Thus, in our bawdiness, Unpurged by the epitaph, indulged at last,
Is equally converted into palms,
Squiggling like saxophones. And palm for palm,
Madame, we are where we began (Oxford Book 259)

In this satire, he compares the nave of the cathedral to conscience. The peristyle is compared to bawdiness. Both parts of the cathedral are converted into the palms of the ceiling of a Catholic or Protestant cathedral, which stand either for hymns (in the case of the conscience) or to a masque and saxophones (in the case of the bawdiness), which does not solve the problem: "and palm for palm, / Madame, we are where we began".

May, merely may, madame, whip from themselves
A jovial hullabaloo among the spheres.
This will make widows wince. But fictive things
Wink as they will. Wink most when widows wince. (259)

As John Hillis Miller writes in Poets of Reality, the theme of universal oscillation and circling is permanent in Stevens's poetry:

A great many of Stevens's poems show an object or group of objects in aimless oscillation or circling movement. (Miller 226)

In the end, what remains is reality.

In "Domination of Black" (1916), creates a vision of the Apocalypse, where the "leaves…turning in the wind" are a visual and motion symbol similar to "the heavy hemlocks (which) came striding" and to the phonic symbol of 'the cry of the peacocks.", whose tails are "the leaves themselves turning in the wind," "in the twilight wind". There is an opposition between the cry and the twilight, between the cry and the leaves in the wind, between the cry and the flames of the fire. The fire is similar to the hemlocks and is opposed to the cry of the peacocks. So, the fire is opposed to the peacocks' cry.

The colors of their tails
Were like the leaves themselves
Turning in the wind,
In the twilight wind.
They swept over the room,
Just as they flew from the boughs of the hemlocks,
Down to the ground.
I heard them cry – the peacocks. (Oxford Book 255)

There is an opposition between the cry and the twilight, between the cry and the leaves in the wind, between the cry and the flames of the fire. The fire is similar to the hemlocks and is opposed to the cry of the peacocks. So, the fire is opposed to the peacocks' cry.

Was it a cry against the twilight
Or against the leaves themselves
Turning in the wind,
Turning as the flames
Turned in the fire,
Turning as the tails of the peacocks
Turned in the loud fire,
Loud as the hemlocks
Full of the cry of the peacocks?
Or was it a cry against the hemlocks? (255)

Next, it expands in the universe, where the planets turn like the leaves in the wind. The final universal dark is similar to the hemlocks.

Out of the window
I saw how the planets gathered
Like the leaves themselves
Turning in the wind
I saw how the night came,
Came striding like the color of the heavy hemlocks. (255)

The speaker is afraid of the Apocalypse. The human fright is similar to the cry of the peacocks.

I felt afraid
And I remembered the cry of the peacocks. (255)

Stevens studied the poetic art in many writings and pieces of poetry, such as The Necessary Angel, where he stated:

> The imagination loses vitality, as it ceases to adhere to what is real. When it adheres to what is unreal and intensifies what is unreal, while its first effect may be extraordinary, that effect is the maximum effect that it will ever have. ("The Necessary Angel" 6)

The supreme fiction is the conceptualisation of reality, even if only momentary, capable of seizing something actual and making it abstract:

I am the angel of reality seen for a moment standing at the door.
Yet I am the necessary angel of earth,
Since, in my sight, you see the earth again,
Cleared of its stiff and stubborn, man-locked set,
And, in my hearing, you hear its tragic drone
Rise liquidly in liquid lingerings.
Like watery words awash;
A figure half seen, or seen for a moment, a man Of the mind, an apparition appareled in Apparels of such lightest look that a turn
Of my shoulder and quickly, too quickly, I am gone?
("Angel Surrounded by Paysans")

In a later poem, "Final Soliloquy of the Interior Paramour" the poet declares that "The world imagined is the ultimate good," his poetic interpretation of God:

Within its vital boundary, in the mind,
We say God and imagination are one…
How high the highest candle lights the dark
Out of this same light, out of the central mind
We make a dwelling in the evening air
In which being together is enough
("Final Soliloquy of the Interior Paramour")

Thus, imaginative knowing exists, which can never reach a direct contact with reality. He concludes that God coincides with human imagination. The rightness that humans found in the idea of God in the old religions cannot be reached again, but the consolation from the imagined God in the new religion is true.

Stevens finds, too, a definite value in the complete contact with reality. Only, in fact, by this stark knowledge can he attain his own spiritual self that can resist the disintegrating forces of life. . . Powerful force that the mind is … it cannot find the absolutes. Heaven lies about the seeing man in his sensuous apprehension of the world…; everything about him is part of the truth. (Southworth 92)

The role of poetry is to replace "the empty heaven and its hymns," thus, enabling humans to take the place of gods.

Exceeding music must take the place
Of empty heaven and its hymns,
Ourselves in poetry must take their place.
("The Man with the Blue Guitar")

The poem refreshes life so that we share,
For a moment, the first idea…It satisfies
Belief in an immaculate beginning
And sends us winged by an unconscious will ("Notes Toward a Supreme Fiction")

The supreme fiction is transitory. It is the necessary angel of subjective reality – which must be always assessed- and, thus, always contains some element of unreality.

J. Hillis Miller defines Stevens's standpoint:

Though this dissolving of the self is in one way end of everything, in another way it is the happy liberation. There are only two entities left now that the gods are dead: man and nature, subject and object. Nature is the physical world, visible, audible, tangible, present to all the senses, and man is consciousness, the nothing which receives nature and transforms it into something unreal" (Miller 221)

In "Sunday Morning" (1915), the poet discusses topics connected with the Holy Mass.

Stanza I presents a Christian lady indulging on the morning of the Sunday Mass in the luxury of exotic fruit "coffee and pungent oranges" and coloured presence of "bright green wings of cockatoos ". She kind of lives the mock freedom of the cockatoo, a prisoner. The oranges and the cockatoo "seem things in the procession of the dead," evoking the actual topic of the Mass, the burial of Christ:

The pungent oranges and bright, green wings
Seem things in some procession of the dead,
Winding across wide water, without sound. (Oxford Book 250)

The distinctive note of this sentence is the silence: the lady is silent, the sepulchre is silent, the birds are silent, too, the Mass has not started yet. Silence is the expectation of a distant burial service.

The day is like wide water, without sound,
Still for the passing of her dreaming feet
Over the seas to silent Palestine,
Dominion of the blood and sepulchre. (250)

Stanza II expresses her revolt to the restrictions to silence and strictness imposed by church to her style of life, to her hedonism.

Why should she give her bounty to the dead?….
Shall she not find in comforts of the sun,
In pungent fruit and bright, green wings, or else
In any balm or beauty of the earth
Things to be cherished like the thought of heaven? (250)

Divinity should live within herself, as passions raised by wintry , autumn, summer seasons.

Divinity must live within herself,
Passions of rain, or moods in falling snow;
Grievings in loneliness, or unsubdued
Elations when the forest blooms; gusty
Emotions on wet roads on autumn nights;
All pleasures and all pains (250)

These concrete and passionate aspects of nature are eloquent of her soul, "all pleasures and all pains."

These are the measures destined for her soul. (250)

In Stanza III, God as Jove is said to have been born in the abstract realms , far from human concreteness

Jove in the clouds had his inhuman birth,
No mother suckled him no sweet land gave
Large-mannered motions to his mythy mind. (250)

But as "he would move among us" , our "virginal blood" was brought by "commingling" with him , to the state of a star. And then,

Shall our blood fail? Or shall it come to be
The blood of paradise? And shall the earth
Seem all the paradise that we shall know? (250)

The concreteness of our existences will make religion "friendlier than now", cognizant of "labour" and of "pain", not "indifferent blue". Also, the gods will acknowledge human pains and sacrifice to them, which will make them friendlier and less indifferent to man.

The sky will be much friendlier then than now,
A part of labor and a part of pain,
And next in glory to enduring love,
Not this dividing and indifferent blue. (251)

In Stanza IV, the believer says that she is "content" when the "questioning birds" test the reality of the earth" , but when the migratory birds ("the swallow") are gone, paradise is lost.

She says, "I am content when awakened birds,
Before they fly, test the reality
Of misty fields, by their sweet questionings;
But when the birds are gone, and when their warm fields
Return no more, where, then, is paradise?"
There is no haunt of prophecy….
…Like the remembrance of awakened birds
Or her desire for June and evening, tipped
By the consummation of the swallow's wings (251)

In Stanza V, the believer mentions her contradictory state of mind. She still feels in concrete contentment the "need" for "imperishable bliss," brought about by death. "Death is the mother of beauty" , since it freezes momentary beauty.

She says, "But in contentment I still feel
The need of some imperishable bliss"
Death is the mother of beauty; hence, from her,
Alone, shall come fulfilment to our dreams (251)

Then the poet makes an allusion to Apollo, the God of the Sun and to his harp, the willow.
She makes the willow shiver in the sun
For maidens who were wont to sit and gaze
Upon the grass, relinquished to their feet. (251)

To seduce them, boys gather plums and pears on a plate, and, tasting the fruit bait, the maidens "stray impassioned" in the littering leaves.

She causes boys to pile new plus and pears
On disregarded plate. The maidens taste
And stray impassioned in the littering leaves (251)

In Stanza VI, the poet wonders about the immortality of beauty after death.
Is there no change of death in paradise?
…Alas, that they should wear our colors there (251)

He repeats his statement that "Death is the mother of beauty", specifying that he is talking about mystical beauty, created by the immortal mother. Our mortal mothers - "earthly mothers" wait sleeplessly inn her creating bosom for this moment.

Death is the mother of beauty, mystical,
Within whose burning bosom we devise
Our earthly mothers waiting, sleeplessly. (252)

In Stanza VII, the ephebes serving the Sun (Apollo) are dancing in a ring "in an orgy", chanting to him "in boisterous devotion".

Supple and turbulent, a ring of men,
Shall chant in orgy on a summer morn
Their boisterous devotion to the sun
Not as god, but as god might be,
Naked among them, like a savage source.
Their chant shall be a chant of paradise
Out of their blood, returning to the sky (252)

Their chant will contain the lake, the trees, the "echoing hills", and they will be the earthly source of mystical hymns.

They shall know well the heavenly fellowship
Of men that perish and of summer morn.
And whence they came and whither they shall go
The dew upon their feet shall manifest. (252)

In Stanza VIII, the last one, the believer hears "upon that water without sound" an Apocalyptical voice crying about Jesus's tomb in Palestine.

She hears, upon that water without sound,
A voice that cries, "The tomb in Palestine
Is not the porch of spirits lingering.
It is the grave of Jesus, where he lay." (252)

This tomb speaks of the "wide water, inescapable" (death), into which all living creatures sink, deer, the quail, sweet berries, flocks of pigeons. The pigeons, like the Holy Ghost, come to sink into darkness with "extended wings."

And, in the isolation of the sky,
At evening, casual flocks of pigeons make Ambiguous undulations as they sink,
Downward to darkness, on extended wings .(252)

In "Peter Quince at the Clavier"(1915), Part I, he compares the making of music on the piano keys with the making of music with the spirit. Thus,

Music is feeling, not sound (Oxford Book 253)

Music is immaterial, spiritual, like the feelings waked in the three elders by bathing Susanna's beauty, to which they raised Hosanna.

…It is like the strain
Waked in the elders by Susanna,
Of a green evening, clear and warm,
Sha bathed in her still garden, while
The three red-eyed elders, watching, felt
The bases of their beings throb
In witching chords, and their thin blood
Pulse pizzicati of Hosanna. (253)

In Part II, nature served her: "the winds were like her maids… fetching her woven scarves"(253). "A breath upon her hand / Muted the night" (253) At her mere turning, "A cymbal crashed/ And roaring horns. " (253), her motion resulted in violent music crushing the instruments.

In Part III, her Byzantine servants appeared and found her crying with the elders "by her side" . Their whispers about her were "the refrain/ Was like the willow swept by rain". Nature voiced them like a chorus. Then they left "Susanna and her shame" going away in sounds of tambourines.

In Part IV, the poet synthesises the parable as,
Beauty is momentary in the mind -
The fitful tracing of a portal;
But in the flesh it is immortal.
The body dies; the body's beauty lives (254)
The poet contrasts life's mortal beauty to art's immortal memory of beauty
Susanna's music touched the bawdy strings
Of those white elders; but, escaping,
Left only Death's ironic scraping
Now, in its immortality, it plays
On the clear viol of her memory,
And makes a constant sacrament of praise. (254)

In "Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird" (1917), the contemplation of the living and moving eye of a blackbird as the only moving thing in a static winter scenery, leads the poet to be "of three minds",

Like a tree,
In which there are three blackbirds." (255)

In the unity of love "A man and a woman / Are one (256). But then, in the unity of human love with nature, "A man and a woman and a blackbird / Are one" (256)
The poet oscillates, not "knowing which to prefer", the perception, or the afterthought, the reflection,

The beauty of inflections
Or the beauty of innuendoes,
The blackbird whistling
Or just after. " (256)

In the winter (symbolising death), the memory of the blackbird triggered a mood which was of puzzling before the unsolved deciphering cause of the blackbird's shadow.

Icicles filled the long window
With barbaric glass.
The shadow of the blackbird

Crossed it, to and fro.
The mood
Traced in the shadow
An indecipherable cause. (256)

The poet addresses the aesthetes, asking them why they prefer to "imagine golden birds" and not acknowledging the simple humble reality of a blackbird. He is cognizant of "noble accents and lucid, inescapable rhythms" (256), but he also knows that humble reality is involved in his knowledge of things,

But I know, too,
That the blackbird is involved
In what I know.
Reality is one part of the design of art.
It marked the edge
Of one of many circles. (256)

While riding in a glass coach (isolated from the reality) , the aesthete is seized by a great fear that his coach equipage is formed of the blackbirds of reality.

He rode over Connecticut
In a glass coach.
Once , a fear pierced him,
In that he mistook
The shadow of his equipage
For blackbirds (257)

Death is precluded by the announcement of dark, as it is precluded by the announcement of winter, while reality never quits its place among the things ,

It was evening all afternoon
It was snowing
And it was going to snow.
The blackbird sat
In the cedar limbs. (257)

In "The Snow Man" (1921), The poet declares that "One must have a mind of winter" (i.e. to have the coolness of the spectator of death) to be able to look at dead nature,

To regard the frost and the boughs
Of the pine-trees crusted with snow.
And have been cold a long time
To behold the junipers shagged with ice,
The spruces rough in the distant glitter
Of the January sun;
And when looking, not to think of the general misery of nature,
…and not to think
Of any misery in the sound of the wind (258)

Because the wind listener of the winter wind in the snow, becomes aware of his nothingness, of the nothingness of what is not there and of the nothingness of what is there. Vanitatum vanitas. For the listener, who listens in the snow,

And, nothing himself, beholds
Nothing that is not there and the nothing that is. (259)

ABOUT A REMARKABLE CRITICAL EDITION: DOSOFTEI, OPERE, 1. VERSURI, CRITICAL EDITION BY N.A. URSU, INTRODUCTORY STUDY BY AL. ANDRIESCU, MINERVA, BUCHAREST, 1978[1]

Denis-Alin-Florin Diaconu
PhD Student, University of Craiova

Abstract: The critical edition of Dosoftei proposed for analysis includes all the verses, original and translations, published by the poet or remaining in manuscript and attributed to him: Stihuri la luminatul herb a Țării Moldovei, Psaltirea în versuri, Paraclisul Preacuratei Născătoare de Dumnezeu, Molităvnic de-nțăles, Viața și petrecerea svinților, Parimiile preste an and a few other works, gathered in a heterogeneous section. The actual poetic work is preceded by a comprehensive introductory study and a note on the edition, followed by a section called "Notes and Variants", a glossary (including archaic and regional terms with interesting meanings in the old language), and a table of illustrations. The critical edition proposes the following stages of analysis: The Romanian spiritual framework, New data on an old controversy: Dosoftei and Kochanowski, Psaltirea în versuri and the Birth of the Romanian Poetic Language and Dosoftei, prose translator. Our study will focus on Psaltirea în versuri and how N.A. Ursu and Al. Andriescu approached the editing and interpretation of this work. N.A. Ursu noted the difficulties related to reproducing texts through transliteration and how he opted for an interpretative phonetic transcription, also implementing an update on orthographic and punctuation norms. Other aspects concern the poetic language.*

1. Introducere

Volumul propus pentru analiză reprezintă o ediție filologică detaliată a operelor lui Dosoftei, fiind destinată cercetătorilor și celor interesați de literatura română veche, oferind un cadru cuprinzător pentru studierea influenței acestui autor. Lucrarea are următoarea structură: Studiu introductiv, Notă asupra ediției, Versuri, Note și variante, Glosar, Tabla ilustrațiilor și Cuprins. Studiul nostru se va concentra în mod special asupra Psaltirii în versuri și asupra modului în care N.A. Ursu și Al. Andriescu au abordat editarea și interpretarea acestei opere fundamentale. Vom analiza metodele lor editoriale, comentariile critice și interpretările oferite, pentru a înțelege cum au contribuit la cunoașterea acestei opere. De vreme ce includem Psaltirea în versuri în lista surselor din care este alcătuit corpusul tezei noastre de doctorat, Estetica urâtului în poezia românească. Elemente de analiză lexicală și stilistică, admitem în mod implicit că această traducere versificată sau prelucrare, așa cum a mai fost numită, poate fi încadrată în categoria poeziei românești. În aceste circumstanțe, ne vom raporta la teoriile unor istorici literari de referință și vom aborda unele aspecte ale limbajului poetic religios. Pentru a oferi o perspectivă cât mai clară, analiza noastră urmează în mare parte structura ediției.

2. Analiza propusă în cadrul ediției critice

Ediția critică a operei lui Dosoftei propune un amplu cadru de analiză structurat în mai multe etape esențiale. Prima etapă, intitulată Cadrul spiritual românesc, explorează contextul cultural, religios și intelectual al secolului al XVII-lea, oferind o înțelegere profundă a mediului în care Dosoftei și-a desfășurat activitatea literară. Urmează apoi Date noi ale unei vechi controverse: Dosoftei și Kochanowski, unde este analizată relația dintre Dosoftei și poetul polonez. Traducerea psalmilor realizată de către aceasta în lucrarea Psaltirea lui David (Psałterz Dawidów), reprezintă un

Ursu, studiu introductiv de Al. Andriescu, București, Minerva 1978, prezentată la *Conferința Internațională „Călători și călătorii. moment semnificativ în dezvoltarea literaturii poloneze și a limbajului religios vernacular al vremii. Publicată în 1579, această traducere interesează în egală măsură prin calitatea sa poetică și prin rolul său în conturarea peisajului religios și cultural al Poloniei în secolul al XVI-lea. În ediția este examanită influența poetului polonez în lumina unor informații și interpretări actualizate. A treia etapă, Psaltirea în versuri şi naşterea limbajului poetic românesc, se concentrează asupra modului în care această operă poetică a contribuit la dezvoltarea limbajului poetic în limba română. Sunt examinate inovațiile lingvistice, structurile poetice și impactul pe care Psaltirea în versuri l-a avut asupra evoluției literaturii române. În final, secțiunea Dosoftei, traducător în proză evidențiază meritele semnificative ale autorului în domeniul traducerilor în proză, fiind analizate metodele de traducere ale lui Dosoftei și impactul lor asupra limbii române.

2.1.Dosoftei şi modelul lui Jan Kochanowski

Principală influență asupra operei mitropolitului moldovean a fost identificată în traducerea versificată a Psaltirii realizată de poetul polonez Jan Kochanowski în 1579. Ștefan Ciobanu semnalează larga circulație a lucrării și menționează funcția, omoloagă traducerii lui Dosoftei, pe care a îndeplinit-o în cadrul culturii poloneze: „De fapt, prin Psaltirea lui versificată se creează limba poetică poloneză." (Ciobanu 1947: 324). Nicolae Cartojan pune primele încercări de versificare a psalmilor pe seama calviniștilor francezi. Reforma protestantă a produs o transformare profundă a creștinismului din Vestul Europei, iar unul dintre aspectele sale distinctive a fost accentul pus pe folosirea limbilor vernaculare. Biblia trebuia tradusă în limbajul cotidian, pentru ca toți credincioșii să poată beneficia de bogăția ei spirituală și de înțelepciunea teologică. Luther a susținut cu tărie că fiecare creștin trebuie să poată citi Scriptura cu proprii săi ochi (McGrath 2012: 110-111). Kochanowski va prelua această direcție occidentală: „Calvin însuşi a versificat cîţiva psalmi, dar cele mai frumoase versuri le-a dat poetul francez Clément Marot (1495—1544), care a versificat 50 de psalmi. De la aceştia s-au inspirat traducători din toate ţările pe unde a pătruns reforma, până la marele poet polon Ioan Kochanowski, a cărui operă, publicată în 1577 şi retipărită apoi în nenumărate ediţii — 15 până în vremea lui Dosoftei — a servit de imbold pentru traducere şi de model pentru versificaţie lui Dosoftei." (Cartojan 1980: 206).

Această influență fusese susținută de Ion Bianu, ideea fiind preluată ulterior și consolidată de alți cercetători. Editorul volumului din 1887 considera structura versurilor lui Dosoftei o reproducere a traducerii poetului polonez Jan Kochanowski, invocând unele abateri de la normele de accentuare ale limbii române. N.A. Ursu și Al. Andriescu observă că versurile lui Dosoftei au o anumită cursivitate, rezultată din utilizarea abilă a accentului natural al cuvintelor în structurile ritmice alese de poet. Un verdict favorabil în cazul virtuților ritmice ale Psaltirii în versuri este dat și de către Al. Piru: „Unele din versurile sale ritmate în metru lung de 10, 12, 13 (și chiar 14 și 16 silabe) sunt câteodată stângace, dar nu greoaie, cum cred unii istorici literari, care, ei, n-au ureche muzicală. Cât despre stihurile de 6, 7 și 8 silabe, acestea alunecă zglobii, după modelul versului popular, ceea ce și explică intrarea lor în circulația orală." (Piru 1977: 154). Deși există cazuri în care Dosoftei se abate de la normele de accentuare ale limbii române, acestea sunt considerate „licențe poetice" firești, adică mici libertăți pe care orice poet și le permite în scrierea sa.

Henryk Misterski susține că înrâurirea modelului polonez se manifestă și la nivelul stilului și al conținutului: „Sondajele noastre asupra ambelor texte ne-au format convingerea că versurile lui Kochanowski au constituit pentru Dosoftei o operă de bază, și aceasta nu numai în ceea ce privește versificația." (Misterski 1970: 258). Autorul citat aduce drept argumente numirea asemănătoare a unor plante și animale, utilizarea unor expresii similare și compararea unor tropi care ar fi trecut din Psaltirea lui David (Psalterz Dawidów) în Psaltirea în versuri. Metoda sa de lucru apelează și la textul Psaltirii slavo-române (1680) și la cel al Vulgatei. Andriescu combate teza cercetătorului polonez și demonstrează că traducătorul român versifică psaltirea pe baza textului slavon, așa cum afirmase și Bianu, folosindu-se de traducerile românești anterioare: Psaltirea șcheiană și Psaltirea lui Coresi. Lista lungă de denumiri de animale citată de Henryk Misterski în studiul său nu poate fi considerată o dovadă că Dosoftei a folosit versiunea lui Kochanowski în traducerea Psaltirii în versuri, deoarece majoritatea acestor cuvinte apar și în Psaltirea șcheiană și reflectă, în română, termenii din textul slavon. Așadar, Andriescu afirmă clar că: „Apropierile atât de mari între Psaltirea Șcheiană, Psaltirea lui Coresi și Psaltirea lui Dosoftei exclud, în toate cazurile citate, fie că este vorba de numirile de plante, de animale sau expresii uzuale ca cele menționate, orice izvor polonez." (Dosoftei 1978: XXXVI). Cu aceeași convingere, autorul citat constată nașterea poeziei românești culte prin „originalitatea limbajului" și „noutatea viziunii" lui Dosoftei.

2.2.Rolul Psaltirii în versuri în crearea limbajului poetic românesc

Trebuie constat încă de la început că procesul traducerii poetice se desfășoară după ce, în urma unei munci îndelungate, fusese alcătuit textul tradus în proză. Astfel, Psaltirea în versuri este rezultatul unor lungi prelucrări, ajustări și modificări. Această grijă orientată către rafinarea prozodică a fost punctul de plecare al unor opinii divergente, greu de reconciliat. Dacă Bianu sancționează lipsa armoniei ritmice și schemele de versificație care imitau traducerea lui Kochanowski, Eugen Negrici se declară impresionat efectele artistice accidentale pe care le-a produs Dosoftei în dorința de a se supune legilor prozodice, luându-și, totodată, o mare libertate față de textul originar. Motivile pentru care s-a dezbătut atât de mult în marginea versificării nu sunt dificil de intuit. Opera tratată reprezintă o traducere, realizată într-un context cultural mai mult decât semnificativ. Mircea Scarlat arată că, în faza de început a poeziei noastre, criteriul fundamental al poeticul a fost ornamentarea frazei, artificiul retoric, înțeles, în primul rând, ca rigoare prozodică. În spațiul cultural autohton convenția literară a fost echivalată cu împlinerea unor principii de expunere, iar prin deprinderea acestui meșteșug al stihurilor se coagulează poezia românească cultă: „Pentru a se constitui literatura română născândă și-a impus constrângeri formale. Între acestea cea mai pretențioasă și, curând, cea mai prețuită va fi prozodia. Apariția versificației denotă atenția acordată formei – cel dintâi pas spre constituirea unei conștiințe artistice." (Scarlat 1982: 77).

În aceste condiții, gradul în care autorul Psaltirii în versuri se îndepărtează de textul care face obiectul traducerii sale a fost îndelung disputat. Respingând teza unei înrâuriri masive a operei lui Kochanowski la nivelul conținutului, pe baza analizei lui Al. Andriescu, ne rămâne să identificăm principalele repere care l-au ghidat pe Dosoftei și să evaluăm rezultatele pe care le-a obținut. Ne apare convingătoare expunerea lui Mircea Scarlat, conform căruia versificarea psalmilor a avut pentru autor o finalitate indubitabil pragmatică, iar receptarea creației sale se face astăzi, cel puțin în parte, prin pierderea funcției sale inițiale. O abordare a psalmilor mitropolitului dintr-o astfel de perspectivă propune Eugen Negrici în Poezia medievală în limba română, iar concluziile la care ajunge nu pot fi neglijate. Acesta integrează fără nicio ezitare operele cu caracter poetic ale cărturarilor din secolul al XVII-lea literaturii de creație, chiar dacă ele reprezintă, în esență, adaptări și traduceri. Alcătuirea acestor tipuri de texte implică un laborios proces de creație în absența modelor anterioare. Negrici notează: „Asemenea semne ale înfruntării cu materia încă nedomolită a limbii se arată, mai în tot locul, în Psaltirea în versuri, al cărei manuscris, datat cel mai târziu din 1670, ni-l indică pe Dosoftei ca pe ctitorul poeziei lirice românești;" (Negrici 2004: 45). Autorul volumului Expresivitatea involuntară apreciază „valorile neintenționate" în dauna „intențiilor care nu izbutesc" și a „voinței răpuse" (Negrici 2000: 42).

Într-o perioadă în care poezia este percepută ca simplă respectare a regulilor de versificare, el consideră că eforturile de a satisface aceste exigențe împing, adesea, structurile rezultate destul de departe de semnificațiile atribuite în stadiile inițiale. Prin urmare, traducerea versificată a lui Dosoftei revendică în mod organic independența față de textul originar, pentru că psalmii sunt alcătuiți prin raportarea categorică la standarde formale. Semnificațiile biblice sunt inevitabil deturnate de obstinanta căutare a armoniei ritmice: „Exersând supunerea materiei poetice, Dosoftei cade victimă marei lui osârdii, e stăpânit de ideea de a fi în regulă. Dar, absorbit de potrivirea cuvintelor la sfârşitul stihului, de numărarea silavelor, făcând efortul de a găsi, cu orice risc, corespondentul sinonimic necesar în cheia versului, s-a văzut obligat să ignore proprietatea termenilor, exactitatea sensurilor; faptul a produs, răscumpărând truda lui, consecinţe spectaculoase, remarcabile îndrăzneli metaforice." (Negrici 2004: 46). Presupusele excese semantice pe care le săvârșește Dosoftei conduc la producerea unor efecte artistice care depășesc programul estetic rudimentar al autorului sau, în

În studiul Psalmii în literatura română, Al. Andriescu adoptă o poziție critică față de această interpretare. Principala obiecție formulată este aceea că Negrici se bazează exclusiv pe teoria expresivității involuntare, susținând că frumusețea poetică a Psaltirii ar fi mai degrabă rezultatul unor accidente prozodice decât al unei intenții artistice conștiente. Andriescu contestă această viziune, argumentând că Dosoftei nu este doar un versificator constrâns de reguli metrice, ci un poet cu un program artistic bine definit. Mai mult, Andriescu repoșează studiului lui Negrici analiza incompletă lexicului utilizat de Dosoftei, necomparând suficient psalmii versificați cu textul slavon pe care mitropolitul l-a tradus, precum și cu alte traduceri contemporane sau anterioare, cum ar fi Biblia de la București: „Cele câteva exemple date de critic, fără raportare la textul slavon după care a tradus Dosoftei psalmii, [...] ne determină să ne îndoim că autorul Expresivității involuntare a făcut, așa cum declară, o cercetare temeinică a lexicului folosit de Dosoftei în psalmii versificați.” (Andriescu 2004: 9). Astfel, Andriescu susține că analiza lui Negrici este parțială și insuficient fundamentată. Negrici vede prozodia ca factor determinant în opera lui Dosoftei, în vreme ce Andriescu se situează la polul opus afirmând că nu prozodia generează imaginile, ci acestea își caută o rezolvare prozodică adecvată: „După raționamentul răsturnat al domnului Eugen Negrici, dificultățile prozodice și chiar greșelile de versificație produc cele mai interesante imagini în psalmii traduși de Dosoftei.” (Andriescu 2004: 10). Poziția lui Andriescu este una de apărare a valorii artistice conștiente a Psaltirii în versuri, contestând interpretarea lui Negrici care atribuie frumusețea textului unor mecanisme involuntare. Andriescu insistă asupra faptului că Dosoftei este un poet cu un proiect estetic solid, care își asumă atât regulile prozodice, cât și responsabilitatea artistică și teologică a traducerii psalmilor. Argumentația lui Andriescu este greu de atacat, fiind întemeiată pe exemple reprezentative dintre care citățm unul singur, extras din Psalmul 78. Negrici sesizează comicul involuntar al comparației „Ierusalimului” cu „ crama”, pentru că această asociere ar fi un rezultat aleatoriu, obținut atunci când poetul, aflat în căutarea rimei potrivite, a găsit soluția „Ierusalimul/vinul”. Dacă sunt alăturate pasajele din vechile psaltiri românești, se poate observa că ea este prezentă în Biblia de la București, în Psaltirea șcheiană și în versiunea lui Coresi. Ceea ce i se datorează lui Dosoftei este secvența explicativă „când i se ia vinul”, care supralicitează imaginea ruinelor din textul originar. Prezentarea teoriilor susținute în acest studiu publicat la o distanță considerabilă față de apariția ediției critice analizate este menită să releveze maniera în care cercetătorul se situează față de Psaltirea în versuri.

Chiar dacă Dosoftei rămâne în permanență consecvent versiunii originale, există numeroase argumente în favoarea contribuției creatoare a poetului român, formulate de Al. Andriescu în studiul său. Muzicalitatea versurilor lui Dosoftei nu poate fi rezultatul unei reproduceri, ea este o realitatea netransmisibilă, prin urmare, constituie rezultatul unui proces creator propriu-zis. Această melodicitate este o calitate recunoscută psalmilor cu măsură de 6,7 și 8 silabe, de inspirație folclorică. Unele dintre versurile Psalmilor 46, 47, 48, 49, 94, 96 și 101 au devenit chiar colinde și cântece de stea fiind puse în relație cu creația folclorică – o receptare a poeziei culte în folclor: „Patru din psalmii lui Dosoftei, si anume nr. 46 (Limbile să salte), nr. 48 (Auziți acestea toate Neamuri, noroade și gloate), nr. 94 (Veniți cu toți dimpreună Să ne facem voie bună) și nr. 98 (Domnul stătu crai în țară) au devenit colinde si le culegea Anton Pann în ale sale Versuri musicești ce se cintă la Naşterea Mîntuitorului nostru I. Hs. şi în alte sărbători ale anului (1830).” (Piru 1977: 154). Totuși, Andriescu găsește și versurile mai lungi armonioase ritmic, la fel ca Al. Piru, oferind drept exemplu versul de 10 silabe din Psalmul 68. Al. Andriescu face o altă constatare importantă: I. Bianu, vechiul editor a lui Dosoftei, neglijează intențiile melodice ale poetului, fiind nevoie de ediția lui N.A. Ursu pentru o notare minuțioasă a accentelor.

Un argument în favoarea originalității lui Dosoftei este și recrearea imaginilor poetice prezente în textul de bază, care aduce cu sine o necesară schimbare de viziune. Adaosurile poetului român au diverse justificări și rareori sunt doar cuvinte sau expresii menite să slujească unor constrângeri de versificație. Dosoftei dovedește o predilecție pentru „nuanțarea explicativă” abordând adesea pasajele laconice în vederea formulării unui îndemn evlavios. Poetul produce în repetate rânduri „actualizări augumentative” (Dosoftei 1978: LVIII), aflate sub semnul dogmei și al moralei creștine, cu un pronunțat accent polemic. Universul poetic propriu creat de Dosoftei substituie unele obiceiuri autohtone vechilor realități din textul biblic. O urmare a actualizării istorice este înlocuirea cuvântului „păcătoși" cu termenul „păgâni*"* din Psalmul 10. Andriescu ilustrează tendința de actualizare prin versetul 11 din Psalmul 65 (p. 155): „Că ne-ai suit păgânii în ceafă, / Cu rău ce ne fac și ne cer leafă". Stilul poetic al lui Dosoftei se remarcă prin densitatea imaginilor metaforice: metafora de bază, preluată din textul original, este fragmentată, iar părțile rezultate se transformă, la rândul lor, în noi imagini, așa cum se poate observa în portretul fiicei regelui din Psalmul 44 (Dosoftei 1978: LXXI). La el, metafora izolată tinde să se reorganizeze într-o serie metaforică, ceea ce conferă traducerii o notă de redundanță. Totodată, psalmii abundă în descrieri de confruntări armate, care îi stimulează imaginația, iar poetul le amplifică cu o precizie axată pe dinamism și energie. Aceste completări nu pot fi privite ca o adaptare forțată la contextul local, ci mai curând ca o personalizare a viziunii biblice, întrucât intervențiile sale urmăresc mereu să clarifice și să accentueze sensul originar al Scripturii. Andriescu conchide astfel analiza sa: „Toate intervențiile sale — și acestea afectează în primul rând structura imaginii, după cum am văzut — au ca scop personalizarea rugii, retrăită liric și sedimentată epic, în hiperbole narative, și actualizarea moralei și istoriei." (Dosoftei 1978: LXXIV).

Se cuvine să ne oprim asupra unei alte observații a lui Andriescu pentru a înțelege natura nuanțelelor pe care le suprapune tablourilor biblice: „Dosoftei actualizează această luptă, gustând deliciile unei victorii îndelung așteptate […] Dosoftei descrie cu o anumită insistență, adăugind amănunte concrete, distrugerea dușmanului, dând curs și unui imbold interior" (Dosoftei 1978: LXVII-LXVIII). Tendința de actualizare a lui Dosoftei sau de localizare subtilă, cum va fi apreciată mai târziu de Andriescu, se manifestă și prin crearea unor secvențe violente în care inamicul este anihilat. Hiperbola reprezintă mijlocul de realizare al unor tablouri apocaliptice. Macabrul și grotescul își intră pe deplin în drepturi versete precum: „Stârvurile-n câmpuri, zăcând aruncate,/ Să strângă troiene de vânturi suflate." (Psalmul 17, p. 42) sau „Trupurile zac pre gios căzute/ A slugilor tale ce-s crezute,/ Și carnea lor o mănîncă hiara/ Și pasările din toată țara./ Sîngele le stă vărsat ca apa" (Psalmul 78, p.181). De asemnea, Edgar Papu remerca în poezia lui Dosoftei contrastul specific Barocului care apare prin juxtapunerea „splendorii" și a „întunericul funebru". În textul Psaltirii, obsesia morții reprezintă „o caracteristică pronunțată a lui Dosoftei, la care predomină vizibil motivul lui memento mori" (Papu 1977: 296). Așadar, aportul lui Dosoftei nu trebuie despărțit de integrarea urâtului, ca instrument moralizator, în arta creștină „de la imaginile morții, ale infernului, ale diavolului, ale păcatului, până la cele despre suferința martirilor" (Eco 2007: 52). Mazilu susține apartenența operei lui Dosoftei la Barocul est-european, manifestată prin cultivarea stihului, opțiunea pentru unele specii literare caracteristice și tonalitățile meditațiilor sale filozofice. Aprecierea sa generală se verifică în cazul Psaltirii în versuri care „se încadrează perfect în ampla mișcare a literaților Barocului est-european privind versificarea textelor religioase" (Mazilu 1997: 90). Încercările de transpunere prozodică a textului Psaltirii demonstrează, dincolo de finalitățile clericale evidente, și coagularea unei conștințe artistice. Ele constituie, în egală măsură, fapte de literatură comune întregului spațiu european. Astfel, Dosoftei reușește să armonizeze modelele poetice consultate cu tiparele poeziei noastre populare. Rezultatul acestei întrepătrunderi este „originalitatea profundă a marelui artist, o originalitate născută din sinteza superioară între tiparele pe care i le propuneau lecturile sale renascentiste și baroce și poezia poporului român" (Mazilu 1997:103).

3. Nota editorului și întocmirea volumului

N.A. Ursu are grijă să cuprindă toate stihurile, originale și traduceri, publicate de mitropolit sau rămase în manuscris și atribuite acestuia: Stihuri la luminatul herb a Țării Moldovei, Psaltirea în versuri, Paraclisul Preacuratei Născătoare de Dumnezeu, Molităvnic de-nțăles, Viața și petrecerea svinților, Parimiile preste an și câteva alte scrieri, reunite într-o secțiune cu caracter eterogen. Un aspect problematic îl constituie trecerea versurilor mitropolitului în caractere latine. N.A. Ursu atrage atenție asupra înstrăinării limbii utilizate de Dosoftei atunci când textele au fost reproduse prin translitерație. Editorul face trimitere la o serie de antologii pentru a-și sprijini afirmația. Poezia românească de la origine până în zilele noastre (1673—1937), alcătuită de Gh. Cardaș sau Antologia poeziei românești de la începuturi pînă astăzi, semnată de Al. Piru și Ioan Șerb. Prin urmare, N.A.

Ursu aplică principiul transcrierii fonetice interpretative, urmărind redarea realității ligvistice reprezentate de grafia chirilică. În egală măsură, autorul realizează o actualizare a normelor ortografice și de punctuație.

În scrierile lui Dosoftei apar mai multe serii grafii de paralele care ridică serioase probleme în procesul de transcreire. N.A. Ursu arată că autorul a folosit inconsecvent unele slove pentru a nota valori fonetice diferite. Este cazul slovelor ius (mare) și ior a căror utilizare oscilantă a fost clarificată prin interpretarea editorului. Acesta s-a bazat pe pronunțarea specifică graiurilor românești nordice pentru a transcrie ѧ prin ă în cuvinte precum: călcăi, intăi, pană, părău, tâlhar. Toate operațiile de acest tip efectuate în cadrul transcrierii fonetice interpretative sunt dezbătute amănunțit în nota editorului. Este interesant că N.A. Ursu identifică în scrierile lui Dosoftei o încercare voluntară de a se supune normelor supradialectale: „Dosoftei avea de bună seamă conștiința unui început de limbă română literară, a unor norme supradialectale în curs de constituire, pe care încerca să le respecte (Dosoftei 1978: XC). Observația sa se bazează pe numeroasele fonetisme paralele cum sunt: „her-fier, hirea-firea, herbinte-fierbinte, strîca-strica*"* și pe rime în care este folosită forma „odihnă", dar este evident că poetul folosise inițial sau avea în minte forma moldovenească „hodină: odihnă-cină" (Psalmul 3, p. 14), „odihnă-plină*"* (Psalmul 15, p. 36).

Referitor la aspectele de limbă literară, Ion Gheție sesiza că în lucrările lui Dosoftei apar diferențe importante în raport cu Cazania lui Varlaam care ar trebui puse pe seama opțiunii mitropolitului de a se orienta mai mult către limba vorbită. Dosoftei nu abandonează nicidecum vechile norme, nefiind consecvent față de limba vorbită, dar trebuie să atragem atenția asupra concluziei rezultate în urma analizelor lui Gheție: „Ceea ce impresionează în textele literare scrise în prima parte a perioadei următoare (1656—1715) este puternica presiune pe care o exercită graiurile asupra normelor literare din ţările române." (Gheție 1975: 343).

O altă componentă importantă a elaborării ediției a fost restaurarea punctuației, care lipsea aproape complet în textele chirilice vechi. Editorii au plasat punctele și virgulele în conformitate cu logica frazelor, astfel încât să faciliteze lectura. Totodată, s-a ținut cont de măsura versurilor, mai ales că unele forme verbale erau mai lungi decât cele moderne. Acest lucru a necesitat ajustări atente pentru a reda ritmul inițial al poeziei lui Dosoftei. În unele cazuri, au fost păstrate inconsecvențele originale, pentru a ilustra fidelitatea față de limba română veche. Dosoftei folosește atât forme arhaice/regionale, cât și forme literare. Pentru N.A. Ursu este evident că poetul folosește trecerea de la un registru la altul ca pe un instrument de echilibrare a versificației. De pildă, autorul Psaltirii în versuri marchează la nivelul grafiei pronunțarea unor nume proprii precum „Iordan, Iosif, Iuda" (Dosoftei 1978: XCIX) cu și fără diftong inițial, în funcție de efectele prozodice urmărite.

În contextul controverselor privitoare la accentul tonic utilizat de Dosoftei, editorul combate unele prejudecăți puse în circulație de I. Bianu. Abaterile pe care le face poetul nu sunt decât „licențe poetice", specifice unei manifestări artistice. În legătură cu acestea, N.A. Ursu păstrează accentele care se abat de la normele obișnuite (dacă nu sunt rezultatele unor erori de tipărire/ transcriere), precum și accentele unor cuvinte vechi sau dialectale pentru a facilita citirea versurilor – așa cum le-a conceput autorul: „alăute, aurul, avem, căile, cetățile, cântând [...]" (Dosoftei 1978: C). În unele cazuri, adaugă accentele corecte sau cele care lipsesc în original pentru a asigura o lectură corespunzătoare.

Ediția analizată confirmă importanța fundamentală a mitropolitului în consolidarea limbajului poetic românesc și în integrarea literaturii noastre vechi în tradiția europeană a versificării psalmilor. Analizele asupra influenței modelelor consultate și asupra limbii poetului demonstrează că Dosoftei nu a fost doar un traducător, ci un creator autentic, capabil să transforme textul biblic într-o operă cu valoare estetică proprie. Dezbaterile stârnite de opera mitropolitului arată că Psaltirea în versuri rămâne un text deschis interpretărilor. Dincolo de aceste divergențe, un lucru este cert – prin eforturile lui Dosoftei, psalmii s-au apropiat de literatura originală, creând liantul dintre textul religios și sensibilitatea poetică românească. În acest sens, ediția critică din 1978 este atât o restituire filologică, cât și un reper esențial pentru în cercetarea limbii literare și a literaturii române vechi.

THE PIONEERS OF MODERN ROMANIAN POETRY: IENĂCHIȚĂ VĂCĂRESCU, COSTACHE CONACHI, VASILE CÂRLOVA – CREATORS, CONSCIENCES, AND TOILERS OF LANGUAGE AND POETRY

Bogdan Ioan Macarie
PhD Student, University of Bucharest

Abstract: This study examines the creative practices of three precursors of modern Romanian poetry from the late 18th to the mid-19th century: Ienăchiță Văcărescu, Costache Conachi, and Vasile Cârlova, who were regarded by literary critics as the first pre-Romantic poets and founders of modern Romanian literature. Ienăchiță Văcărescu performs a quasi-demiurgic act of poetic invention, forging his own aesthetic tools and shaping a Romanian literary language suited to simple, direct verse. His contemporary, Costache Conachi, often compared to Petrarch for his erotic focus, self-centered poetics, and tonal novelty, adopts the same popular monorhymed model but applies it to the emotional turmoil of love. The younger Vasile Cârlova, writing alongside the rise of French Romanticism, develops in his brief oeuvre a distinct style marked by genuine lyrical intensity. Together, these pioneers provide the cultural and linguistic groundwork on which later Romanian literature builds its enduring structure.*

Revoluţia franceză din 1789 cu a sa Declaraţie a drepturilor omului şi cetăţeanului, aplicarea ideilor acesteia în Europa de către Napoleon Bonaparte, constituie fundamentul pe care se înfiripă la începutul veacului al XIX-lea și se consolidează ulterior, pe tot parcursul „secolului naţionalităţilor”[1], conștiințe naționale, idealuri ale autodeterminării, aspirații spre independență și libertate. Un nou Vezuviu erupe, explozia lui din străfunduri îngroapă sub râuri de magmă fierbinte Pompeii marilor imperii, fie ele occidentale sau răsăritene. Din cenușa acestora „se va forma marea majoritate a statelor naţionale din Europa.”[2] Trezirea conștiinței naționale, redescoperirea filonului etnic și lingvistic ancestral comun, toate acestea au fost posibile atât prin acțiunea concretă, concertată a factorului politic și social, prin revoluții, sacrificiu uman, vărsare de sânge, dar și prin implicarea marilor personalități intelectuale ale vremii, poeți, istorici, filologi etc. Desigur, toate aceste frământări, tendințe, lupte pe toate planurile, politic, educațional, artistic, social, ideologic, istoric, filologic etc., pot fi remarcate și în spațiul românesc. Plecând de la ideile și lupta iluminiștilor Școlii Ardelene de la finele secolului la XVIII-lea (Supplex Libellus Valachorum, trimis împăratului la Viena în 1791), a căror contribuție la constituirea identității de neam nu poate fi contestată, cu toate necesarele, inerentele lor exagerări, trecând prin Revoluția lui Tudor Vladimirescu de la 1821, ajungem, logic, la perioada pașoptistă (1830-1860) ce are drept reper, axis mundi, în plan politic și social, Revoluția de la 1848 din cele trei țări române, în timp ce în plan cultural putem vorbi deja de un modernism consistent, bine ancorat în problematica națională, dar la fel de bine racordat la mișcările și ideile occidentului.

Conștienți de rolul lor, de misiunea aparent imposibilă, de pionierat, pe care și-o asumaseră cu bună știință, asemenea unor mateloți vizionari care-și întind pânzele în bătaia vânturilor potrivnice, năzuind spre țărmuri considerate utopice de unii, „oamenii începutului de drum” își canalizează integral intelectul, creativitatea, energiile spirituale de anvergură demiurgică, în direcția împlinirii aspirațiilor naționale, asimilării modelului civilizator francez, sincronizării cu marile curente artistice și literare occidentale, în special cu romantismul european, simultan cu emanciparea și impunerea unui specific național în literatură și constituirea unor instituții fundamentale (școala, presa, teatrul) etc.: „Generația pașoptistă ilustrează în câmpul culturii noastre o psihologie care s-ar putea numi <>. E situația cărturarilor care au privilegiul, dar își asumă și riscul de a intra în arenă într-un moment de cotitură a istoriei, când o schimbare bruscă de perspectivă autorizează luarea în posesie a unor pământuri deșertice sau năpădite de vegetația trivială a locurilor abandonate. A <<începe>> e un act al tinereții, o dovadă de elan creator, de încredere în ordinea lumii."[3] Dar a crea ceva din nimic, o limbă scrisă, mai mult, transpunerea acesteia într-o literatură autentic-națională, cu minusurile inerente unor deschizători de noi orizonturi, este cu adevărat un act demiurgic, de aceea pare cu atât mai surprinzătoare poziția unor critici sau istorici literari care susțin ideea că literatura română din această perioadă se reduce la mimetism tematic, imitație a unor modele occidentale, artificialitate și chiar impostură: „[…] voga depistării de <<surse>> a contribuit între cele două războaie, chiar şi atunci cînd cercetarea era executată cu rigoare metodică şi punea în lumină dependenţe [...], la întărirea prejudecăţii că romantismul românesc dinainte de Eminescu e inautentic, fiind, în mai mare sau mai mică măsură, după autori şi opere, o grefă apuseană pe un organism plăpînd şi încă nevertebrat."[4] Întrebarea care se pune, retorică, desigur, este următoarea: ar fi fost cu putință să avem astăzi un Macedonski, un Eminescu fără acești precursori vizionari? Elogiul adus de Eminescu lui Heliade Rădulescu izvorăște, desigur, dintr-un sentiment de gratitudine, de recunoaștere a meritelor marelui înaintaș („Eliad zidea din visuri și din basme seculare / Delta biblicelor sânte, profeților amare, / Adevăr scăldat în mite, sfinx pătrunsă de-nțeles;[5]"); admirația pe care i-o poartă lui Grigore Alexandrescu îl determină pe marele nostru poet să îl așeze pe acesta alături de Byron („Și ca Byron, treaz de vântul cel sălbatic al durerii, / Palid stinge-Alexandrescu sânta candel-a sperării, / Descifrând eternitatea din ruina unui an."[6]); reverența în fața sensibilității lui Bolintineanu este un semn de apreciere sinceră („Iar poetul ei cel tânăr o privea cu îmbătare, / Și din liră curgeau note și din ochi lacrimi amare / Și astfel Bolintineanu începu cântecul său."[7])

Macedonski însuși se pune, încă de la început, sub „înalta protecție a marei mișcări pe care a făcut-o Heliade, Alecsandri, Bolintineanu, Bălcescu, Cezar Bolliac și toți acei rari bărbați, cu ale căror nume literatura noastră, patria noastră este în drept a se mândri."[8]

Acești „rari bărbați", alături de mulți alții pe care Eminescu îi pomenește sau nu în Epigonii, mai mult sau mai puțin justificat (Costache Conachi, de pildă, e ignorat, nu și Prale, Cichindeal sau Mumulean), au așezat piatra de temelie a poeziei românești. „Zilele de-aur a scripturelor române" sunt, mai exact, zilele de beton și granit ale fundației pe care vor ridica Eminescu, Macedonski și alții poezia noastră modernă: „Când privesc zilele de-aur a scripturelor române / Mă cufund ca într-o mare de visări dulci și senine". În realitate ne aflam nu într-o mare, ci de-a dreptul în abis, pe un fund de ocean sălbatic (social, economic, cultural etc.) unde eram ținuți cu strășnicie de colosul otoman, aflați la bunul plac al celor trei mari imperii, unul mai rapace decât altul. „Văd poeți ce-au scris o limbă ca un fagure de miere" așadar, nu o poezie genială, nu opere nepieritoare vede Poetul, ci „o limbă" – aici Eminescu pune punctul pe i: pentru a avea poezie era nevoie de o limbă, de un „material verbal prin care să fie exprimat vizionarismul"[9], sau măcar să fie create auspiciile, să fie defrișat terenul, pregătită calea „visării" poetice autentice. Este ceea ce realizează în cultura noastră, din neant „pionierul" Ienăchiță Văcărescu (1740 – 1797), într-un climat impropriu, ostil chiar oricărui demers cultural. Până la momentul 1821, revoluția lui Tudor Vladimirescu, cea care va marca semnalul de începere a modernizării societății românești, situația politică și socială din țările românești, mai puțin Transilvania, nu părea a fi ieșit din Evul Mediu: exista o clasă socială, a marilor boieri, deținători de imense fonduri funciare pe care trudea marea masă a populației, formată din țărani șerbi, lipsiți de orice drepturi; între aceste două clase începuse a se interpune o altă pătură de exploatatori, a arendașilor administratori de moșii (pe care îi vor „biciui" mai târziu Eminescu și Caragiale). Această stare de înapoiere, de permanentizare a unui Ev Mediu din care alții se desprinseseră demult, nu era cauzată nicidecum de cine știe ce handicap genetic, ea era susținută și chiar amplificată de situația de vasalitate la care Imperiul Otoman supunea cele două Principate și se manifesta la toate nivelurile societății, nu doar cultural, ci și economic și social, astfel încât decalajul față de Occident, din toate punctele de vedere, deși uriaș, era justificabil. Așa se explică de ce, la sfârșit de secol XVIII noi ne mândrim cu Ienăchiță Văcărescu, nemții cu Goethe și Schiller (contemporani cu poetul nostru), englezii cu Blake, Coleridge sau Wordswoth și francezii cu Voltaire.

Ienăchiță Văcărescu descinde, pe linie maternă, din Negru-Vodă, întemeietorul Țării Românești („Pe Argeș în jos, / Pe un mal frumos, / Negru-vodă trece / Cu tovarăși zece"). Bunicul, Ianache, vistiernic al lui Constantin Brâncoveanu, a fost decapitat împreună cu domnitorul muntean și cei patru copii ai acestuia la Constantinopole în 1714. Tatăl lui Ienăchiță, Ștefan, fusese însurat cu o nepoată a lui Ion Neculce, Catinca, astfel încât, după mamă, poetul era moldovean. Părinții îi asigură de mic o educație aleasă: „A învățat în casă […] limbile greacă, latină, italiană, franceză, germană și turcă. Dascăl de grecește l-a avut pe Neofit cel bătrân, de latină pe un german, Weber, și de turcă niște hogi."[10] Avem, așadar, o familie de mari boieri, cu vederi largi, foarte bogată. Deși tatăl i-a fost asasinat, el continua ascensiunea pe scara socială (ajunge la un moment dat mare spătar, însă nutrise chiar gânduri de domnie), fără a neglija nici instruirea (în timpul unui surghiun la Constantinopole, el învață temeinic gramatica limbii turcești[11]). Pe lângă bogăția și fastul în care excela („Văcărescu putu să-și reia, după zile de zbucium, traiul de mare boier feudal. Locuia pe Podul Mogoșoaiei într-o casă somptuoasă, situată cam pe locul unde este astăzi C.E.C.-ul, păzită strașnic de seimeni, arnăuți și panduri înarmați cu sulițe, buzdugane, puști și pistoale. În curte se aflau mulțime de cai, armăsari, podovnici și iedecuri cu harșale strălucitoare de aur și argint."[12]), Ienăchiță era și un excelent diplomat și un fin om de lume, bun cunoscător al cutumelor de la marile curți europene, dar în același timp un distins erudit, poliglot, pasionat de culturile latină și greacă, cunoscător al marilor poeți italieni. În același timp, însă, era și el, într-un anume fel, prizonier al epocii în care trăia, lucru de care ne dăm seama fie și doar admirându-i vestimentația, formată nu din piese în ton cu moda occidentală, ci mai degrabă o combinație medieval-feudală, turco-fanariotă, admirabil descrisă de Odobescu: „[…] gugiumanul de samur, așezat cu semeție pe cap. Costumul lui, imitat de pe hainele sale favorite, e compus într-acel portret, de un anteriu de sevaiu roz-gălbui sau chamois și încins la brâu cu un giar, din care iese hangerul cu mâner de smalț albastru și de pietre scumpe; pe deasupra poartă un contoș de coloarea verde deschisă a iezmului (iasp alb), îmblănit cu samur."[13] Dincolo de aceste aspecte omenești, de înțeles având în vedere contextul socio-istoric, Ienăchiță Văcărescu are marele merit de a fi fost primul care a conștientizat la noi rolul esențial al gramaticii pentru evoluția limbii, pentru realizarea unității acesteia, dar și pentru cultură în general. În acest sens, el scoate la Râmnic și Viena, în 1787, prima gramatică tipărită în limba română, care este în același timp și un îndrumar practic de prozodie românească, întrucât cuprinde o serie de poezii originale ce propun modele concrete de versificație. Lucrarea, intitulată Observații sau băgări dă seamă asupra regulelor și orînduelelor gramaticii rumînești, e interesantă, pe lângă normele de limbă pe care le propune fără a le și impune, mai ales prin ideea că gramatica facilitează accesul inclusiv la creația poetică. Iată cum prezintă Alexandru Odobescu Gramatica lui Ienăchiță Văcărescu: „Apoi printre deosebitele modeluri de versificațiuni unde alătură strofe cu felurite măsuri, el pune și aceste șease versuri în care, după ce a caracterizat cu seriozitate gramatica și scopul ei, sfârșește printr'o glumeață invitare către cititori"[14]: „Gramatica e meșteșug ce-arat-alcătuire, / Și toți printr-însa pot afla verice povățuire. / Ș-a scrie încă într-ales cu reguli arătate, / Pă toți învață d-a le ști fără greșală toate. / Și versuri înmeșteșugite arată

d-a să face: / Siliți-vă a o-nvăța sau faceți cum vă place."[15] Creațiile lirice ale lui Ienăchiță Văcărescu, altele decât cele date ca model de versificație în Gramatica sa, au rămas în manuscris, fiind publicate de Alexandru Odobescu în 1878 în volumul Colecție de poezii vechi. Poeziile sunt în general scurte, cu o construcție simplă, de inspirație populară, versurile de asemenea sunt scurte, pentru a fi mai ușor de memorat și de transmis mai departe colectivității, aidoma liricii populare din care se inspiră prin motive, melodicitate, ritm și rime elementare. Un exemplu concludent este poezia Într-o grădină: „Într-o grădină, / Lîng-o tulpină, / Zării o floare ca o lumină. / S-o tai, să strică! / S-o las, mi-e frică / Că vine altul și mi-o ridică." Sunt aici două strofe formate din câte trei versuri (primele două scurte de cinci silabe, al treilea și al șaselea de 10 silabe, fără a fi vorba de o terțină, întrucât rima este a a a / b b b, monorimă elementară ca în poezia populară. Ușor de ținut minte, sunt versuri naive, melodioase, fără a ridica niciun fel de probleme de interpretare. Stilistic, avem o comparație ușor forțată și alegorie naivă banală, floare = femeie). Marca de conjunctiv și pronumele feminin de la începutul versului al patrulea, unite prin cratimă din necesități de ritm, se repetă simetric în următorul vers, reluându-se astfel anaforic motivul erosului adolescentin ezitant, șovăielnic. E importantă, ca și celelalte creații ale lui Ienăchiță Văcărescu, prin momentul în care a apărut, prin fapul că, iată, în sfârșit, se scrie românește, în structură versificată, chiar dacă elementar. O altă creație lirică, Amărâtă turturea, este formată din opt catrene, versurile având rima împerecheată: „Amărâtă turturea / Când rămâne singurea, / Căci soția și-a răpus, / Jalea ei nu e de spus." Avem aici reprezentarea alegorică a dragostei în chip de „amărâtă turturea" (în alte părți canar, floare etc.). despre care George Călinescu spune că intră în sfera creațiilor lăutărești[16]. Eugen Simion susține că aici „există mai multă mișcare lirică și o mai mare varietate de elemente (în stilul poeziei populare) […], cu care însă poezia nu vine în contact în chip direct, ci prin intermediul unei fabule."[17] „Morala" așa-zisei „fabule", explicită în final, schimbă puțin raportarea noastră la această creație, poetul ieșind oarecum din zona poeziei populare printr-un paralelism pe care îl crează între jalea păsării rămase singure și propria suferință a poetului, provocată de dragoste. Lipsit de mijloacele lingvistice și poetice adecvate, poetul recurge la jeluiri, lamentații, oh-uri, vai-uri, interogații retorice, care repet, nu reprezentă nicidecum un stil personal, ci o fațetă a epocii respective, o oglindă a acesteia (le vom întâlni, amplificate, și la Costache Conachi, unul dintre cei mai reprezentativi „jeluitori" din lirica noastră cultă): „Dar eu om de-naltă fire / Decât ea mai cu simțire / Cum poate să-mi fie bine? / Oh, amar și vai de mine!" Întâlnim același ritm, aceleași motive și aceeași simplitate și melodicitate specifice liricii de factură folclorică, numai că de această dată asistăm la o prelucrare, la o modelare a eposului popular, așa cum face, păstrând proporțiile, Alecsandri cu Miorița, la o ușoară „manipulare" a cititorului, plecând de la sursa de sorginte populară, prin intermediul unei alegorii, spre tărâmul unor prime încercări de poetizare cultă.

Ceea ce realizează Ienăchiță Văcărescu în cultura română poate fi socotit pe bună dreptate un act demiurgic, întrucât poetul așează bazele unei limbi, favorizează premisele formării unei conștiințe literare într-o etapă istorică și culturală aflată într-un mare decalaj față de Occident și pe care poetul o exprimă, până la urmă, cu mijloacele pe care el însuși și le creează, în spiritul epocii respective și mai puțin din punct de vedere al personalității sale, realmente remarcabilă. Cei care vor urma, inclusiv copiii săi, Alecu și Nicolae, dar mai ales nepotul, Iancu Văcărescu, trecând apoi pe la Eliade Rădulescu, Alecsandri și până la piscul Eminescu, vor duce mai departe moștenirea lăsată de el, cu din ce în ce mai mult talent, dar având desigur și un punct de plecare cert, cultural și lingvistic. El însuși, departe de a cădea într-un narcisism facil, conștient de rolul și de menirea sa de pionier, are „sentimentul profund că scrie prima literă a alfabetului […]. Sentiment, încă o dată, de întemeietor, hărăzit să devină model."[18] Acest sentiment e sintetizat atât de convingător în vizionarul său „testament", un fel de prefigurare, în germene (păstrând proporțiile) a „Daciei literare" și a ideilor pașoptiste care vor erupe în veacul următor (de remarcat că el nu vorbește restrictiv de limba

Așa cum arătam mai sus, moștenirea lui Ienăchiță Văcărescu a fost preluată de urmașii săi (în sensul literar și artistic extins al termenului, nu doar cu referire la descendenții în linie directă), permanent perfecționată, îmbogățită sub toate aspectele – limbă, stil, tematică etc. Unul dintre continuatorii din Principatele Române ai drumului deschis de Ienăchiță Văcărescu, sub aspect cronologic, dar și estetic, dacă se poate spune așa (exceptându-l pe Alecu Văcărescu) poate fi considerat Costache Conachi (1778 – 1849), a cărui liră se face cunoscută de data aceasta în Moldova. Contextul istoric, social și politic începe ușor să se schimbe, influența culturii și civilizației occidentale își face simțită prezența în prima jumătate a secolului al XIX-lea, iar Revoluția lui Tudor Vladimirescu din 1821 declanșează procesul ireversibil de ieșire de sub tutela otomană, de emancipare a Principatelor, de modernizare a acestora, mai întâi prin reinstaurarea domniilor pământene, apoi prin contactul tot mai frecvent cu ideile progresiste occidentale, prin asimilarea și circulația acestor idei în spațiul public din Țările Române. Astfel, marii boieri, mari patrioți în același timp, oameni școliți, cu o vastă cultură, cochetând uneori și cu muzele ca un mod plăcut de petrecere a timpului, cum era de pildă și Costache Conachi, încearcă să trezească în conștiința contemporanilor acel ideal național al unității de neam și limbă, inclusiv pe calea versificației. „Aria tematică este una care privește elementul național, un contur idealizat și ideal al unei Românii văzute în integralitatea ei. […] Înainte de unirea propiu-zisă, s-a făcut unirea prin cultură și literatură."[19] Acesta este contextul în care-și desfășoară activitatea și marele boier și cărturar Costache Conachi, epocă surprinsă în spiritul ei de Vasile Alecsandri: „Pe la începutul secolului s-a ivit în Moldova o pleiadă de poeți care au lăsat urme adânci în memoria contemporanilor. Acea pleiadă compusă din Tăutu, Conachi, Beldiman, Pogor etc, toți boieri și feciori de boieri înzestrați cu învățăturile clasice a limbilor elină, latină și franceză. Ei se îngânaseră cu imaginile poetice ale mitologiei antice și primiseră refletul depărtat al ideilor volteriene pe care revoluția cea mare le răspândise în Europa; însă distanța nestrăbătută ce exista între patria lor și izvorul acestor idei, precum și, mai cu samă, poziția lor socială îi opri de a se pătrunde de principiile radicale ale Franției. Spiritul lor luă deci altă direcție; el se îndreptă cu tot focul tinereții pe cîmpul înflorit al poeziei, cîmp ce îi ducea în templul Amorului."[20] Așadar, la fel ca în cazul lui Ienăchiță Văcărescu, Costache Conachi (și desigur ceilalți versificatori contemporani) trebuie privit și analizat în contextul epocii în care a trăit și pe care o creionează artistic; el se cuvine integrat, fără o exigență exagerată, paradigmei istorice și culturale de la acel moment.[21]

Apariția conștiinței erotice, susține Eugen Simion, determină la „oamenii începutului de drum" din prima jumătate a secolului al XIX-lea „nașterea conștiinței lirice"[22]. În acest sens, marele boier Costache Conachi, și-a oferit plăcute momente de răgaz în răstimpul îndeletnicirilor „serioase" de administrator al imenselor sale moșii, de înalt funcționar în aparatul de stat, ori de traducător, momente în care a scris versuri originale, cele mai izbutite fiind cele închinate lui Eros, manifestări artistice ale propriilor experiențe de alcov, ale iubirilor împărtășite sau nu, imnuri către „nuri", amor, către iubirea mai degrabă profană, concretă, palpabilă decât către cea spiritualizată: „Am iubit și cunosc gustul dragostei peste măsură, / Ascultați, că vă grăiește amoriul prin a mea gură."[23] Eugen Simion îl consideră pe Conachi, autorul primului nostru „manual" de prozodie intitulat Meșteșugului stihurilor românești, „cel mai complex și mai profund poet erotic de până la Eminescu."[24]

Contextul social și cultural favoriza circulația unor teme, comune multor versificatori ai vremii, vizând nu numai erosul, dar și viața socială sau politică în general, istoria, elementul național, emanciparea socială, așadar o arie tematică vastă, de interes public. Costache Conachi nu face nici el excepție de la emulația epocii, susținând până și ideile, la modă, de emancipare socială, de compasiune pentru truditorii pământului dublu exploatați până la sânge, o dată de boierii pământeni, a doua oară de arendașii greci, „crocodilii din mare” (idei îndreptate chiar împotriva propriei sale condiții de mare boier), ca în Răspunsul unei scrisori, în care biciuiește „Politica cea vicleană ce au toți grecii din fire, / Și fănarul care arde seul topit cu cruzime”: „Vei vide, dragă tovarăș, că – pe brazda ce rănește / Fierul plugului cu huiet, - prostul care cornărește, / Sudori varsă și se luptă fără de nici o cruțare, / Ca să facă frupt de sânge crocodililor din mare…”[25] Totuși, partea mai consistentă din lirica sa, cum arătam mai sus, cea care a rezistat timpului, rămâne poezia erotică, așa cum bine subliniau Alecsandri și, mai târziu, George Călinescu sau Eugen Simion: „Originalitatea lui Conachi – susține George Călinescu - stă în specializarea erotică, în cultul exclusiv al eului, iar savoarea vine din ineditul mediului. Căci Conachi este un Petrarca ras în cap, cu chip de faun oriental, cu işlic, anteriu și iminei, obișnuit a subtiliza pe sofale și a-și trimite mesagiile prin țiganii lăutari, neverosimil în pădure, ducând omagiul până la târârea în pulbere și la închinarea ortodoxă, și tristețea occidentală până la pandalii și istericale.”[26], iar Eugen Simion afirmă că „nimeni n-a exprimat mai bine decât Conachi obedienta poeziei față de eros.” Nu puține din poeziile lui Conachi urmează modelul popular pe care l-am întâlnit și la Ienăchiță Văcărescu, așa ca în Ah, ochișorii tăi, naivă, delicată și sprințară versificație în monorimă de factură populară, de forma aaa/bbb/ccc/ddd/eee, pe tema chinurilor și bucuriilor pricinuite de dragostea personificată prin „stăpânul nur”, farmecul inefabil al femeii, idolatrizată ca o divinitate („la voi mă-nchin”). Aceasta e o caracteristică generală, de interes public, un stil și o tematică pe care le regăsim la Conachi, dar și la Văcărești sau la alți poeți din prima jumătate a secolului al XIX-lea, pentru care dragostea e un zeu, un „stăpân” cu aspect plăcut, dar adesea rău, nemilos, chinuitor, „fur” ce se strecoară nechemat în suflete pricinuind suferință:

Ah, ochișori vii,
Can negri căprii,
Blânzi și mult nurlii,

Cât loviți de tare
Tocmai unde doare
Inima mai tare.

Ah, stăpâne nur,
Ce-aprinzi ca un fur
De giur împregiur

Și cu chinuire
Și cu mulțumire
Ori a cui sâmțire.

La voi azi mă-nchin
Cu sufletul plin
De amar suspin.

În altă parte, în Amoriul ca și ostașul, „nurul” este ostaș, dar „muncile lui” sunt de data aceasta plăcute, prilej de „haz”, adică de desfătare. În general, Conachi disociază „natura dual a erosului: trupească și cerească […] înțelegând printr-una pasiunea ce împinge la faptă, prin cealaltă înălțarea deasupra simțurilor.”[27]: „Două firi are-ntr-o fire – și de om, și îngerească, / Una-i dragoste curată, ceilaltă-i îi trupească.”[28] În contextul cultural și social al epocii, marcat de situația precară a limbii literare, de lipsa unor „antecedente” spirituale care să fi oferit modele poetice de urmat, Conachi recurge, inevitabil, la un manierism autohton care nu este specific doar lui, ci reprezintă o trăsătură distinctă a vremii respective (amplu colportată de foarte mulți confrați întru versificație din acea perioadă), manierism ce abuzează (în lipsa unor mijloace poetice apropriate) de „văicăreli, leșinuri și bocete, oftări sau moarte”[29], ca de pildă în poezia Două inimi ce se despart (cu o tematică ce ne duce cu gândul spre lamentațiile din Amărâtă turturea a lui Ienăchiță Văcărescu, dar la un nivel liric superior):

Amar nouă, ce durere ne arde și ne topește,
Noi murim, și lumea toată nimic nu ne folosăște!
Nu-i scăpare, căci nădejdea de la noi este departe,
S-o-nchegat lumina vieții cu apusul cel de moarte.
Scăpare zicem, dar unde-i, când și viața ne omoară,
Două inimi ce-s unite când se despart vor să moară.
Ah, să murim, căci prin moarte vom veni iar la unire,
Moartea pentru noi îi viață, dacă n-are despărțâre.[30]

Uneori, pentru a reda inefabilul feminin, farmecul și grația sexului frumos, Conachi, „unul dintre cei mai fervenți adoratori ai << nurilor>> femeilor, poate singurul poet al literaturii noastre dedicat aproape exclusiv iubirii, mai ales profane”[31], recurge la mijloace poate mai mult analitice, discursive decât poetice, cum ar spune Ion Barbu, „din ceas deduse”:

Fața ei era prea albă, ochii săgeți sloboza,
Sprâncenele lungi și desă drept în inimă rănea.
Sânul ei cu frăgezime omoară pre om de viu,
Părul despletit pe spate, ca aurul de gălbiu.
Statul înalt și subțâre cu dulci îndoituri,
Gurița chiar ca mărgeanul și obrazul numai nuri.

Convingerea poetului e că „datul din fire” al femeilor este să iubească, așa cum păsărilor le e menit să zboare și peștilor să înoate, prin urmare ea, femeia, trebuie să se abandoneze cu totul erosului (la fel cum în O jalobă pilitura de fier este atrasă de „magnit”), ori dacă nu să-și „schimbe firea”:

La pasări îi dat din fire
Ca să zboare cu răpire,
Și la pești ca să înoate
Prin apele lumii toate,
Iar la femei să iubască
Fără să mai contenească.
Deci ori te schimbă în fire,
Ori fii cu milostivire.

Conachi se înscrie, după cum susține profesorul Dan Horia Mazilu, în galeria acelor oameni cultivați, adepți ai ideilor iluministe, care „cântă iubirea, o fac pe tonuri înalte, cu plânsete, oftaturi și vaiete (tonalitate care va împinge destule din aceste texte în categoria <<cântecelor de lume>>, transportate de lăutari), dar nu sunt deloc insensibili la prilejurile de evaluare morală, ori chiar de apropiere socială ce li se oferă și în care nu ezită să se implice. Scriind stihuri ce mustesc de <<localisme>>, împodobite cu icoane balcanice, acești poeți […] trag cu ochiul […] spre inventarele folclorice, de unde iau cu împrumut modele prozodice.”[32]

Cu toate minusurile și plusurile menționate, e remarcabil efortul lui Conachi „de a modela limba […] de a îmbrăca în forme poetice, artistice un sentiment profund."[33] , dar mai cu seamă e de apreciat contribuția la dezvoltarea limbii românești, la unificarea acesteia. Nu în ultimul rând, trebuie amintit că el a dat culturii române un îndrumar de prozodie intitulat „Meșteșugul stihurilor Românești" unde, la fel ca în Gramatica lui Ienăchiță Văcărescu, sunt explicate cu ajutorul versurilor originale noțiuni de ritm, rimă, măsură etc. Toate acestea ne îndreptățesc să nu trecem cu vederea măcar versurile de mai jos, care, asemenea Testamentului lui Ienăchiță Văcărescu, subliniază într-o notă de bun simț asumarea cu bună știință a misiunii de pionier al culturii române de către o conștiință vizionară: „Sânt mult mai vrednici de cinste acei care au făcut / În științe și în arte fericitul început / Decât cei ce după dânșii și de dânșii îndreptați / Au ajuns desăvârșirea de exemplu-i ajutați."

Am vorbit până acum de doi mari boieri, Ienăchiță Văcărescu și Costache Conachi, unul la sfârșitul secolului al XVIII-lea, celălalt la începutul secolului al XIX-lea, mari conștiințe ale vremii lor, pionieri, cu mai mult sau mai puțin talent, ai liricii culte românești, în care s-au dovedit, inevitabil, tributari sub aspect tematic epocii în care au trăit și pe care o reflectă în poeziile lor, poate elementare uneori, poate simpliste alteori, adesea de evidentă inspirație folclorică, cu un discurs poetic de multe ori public, comun. Cu resursele lingvistice de care dispuneau la timpul respectiv și pe care s-au străduit să le sporească și să le modernizeze neîncetat, fară a avea în spate, cum se spune azi, un „background" ca nemții, italienii sau francezii, ei au însemnat un mare pas înainte pentru limba și cultura românească. Poeziile lor pot fi contestate, apreciate sau ignorate de cititorul de azi, dar e cert că nimeni nu le poate contesta meritul de a fi fost deschizători de drumuri în cultura românească, legatari ai unei moșteniri pe care urmașii o vor valorifica din plin.

Pe această cale deschisă de Ienăchiță Văcărescu și de Costache Conachi vor păși alți făurari de limbă și poezie, din ce în ce mai talentați, din ce în ce mai stăpâni pe arta lor, mai determinați în idealurile lor de unitate, de emancipare națională și socială. Unul dintre aceștia este Vasile Cârlova (1809-1831), contemporan în scurta sa viață (se stinge înaintea oricăruia dintre cei amintiți mai jos) cu Costache Conachi, Iancu Văcărescu, Asachi, Anton Pann, Budai Deleanu, din generațiile mai vechi, dar și cu scriitori apropiați lui ca vârstă, Eliade-Rădulescu, Donici, Negruzzi, Grigore Alexandrescu etc. (Alecsandri era doar un copil când moare Cârlova). Constatăm, așadar, o conviețuire spirituală între vechi și nou, o efervescență inovatoare deosebită, uimitoare sub aspectul progreselor realizate în așa de scurt timp, având în vedere că literatura română „arde", în doar câteva zeci de ani, socotind de la Ienăchiță Văcărescu, etape parcurse de alte literaturi din occident în sute de ani. În această atmosferă de deplină emulație creatoare se manifestă liric și Vasile Cârlova, fiu el însuși de boier (mărunt, comparativ cu Conachi), având, așadar, acces la educație (învață grecește de mic și, în spiritul epocii, franceza). Dacă la Ienăchiță Văcărescu, la Conachi, ca și la alți poeți ai începutului de drum, am remarcat o subsumare a creației artistice, tematic vorbind, epocii respective, precum și un discurs poetic public, comun și o confuzie de stiluri[34], la Cârlova vorbim deodată de un stil personal, de un lirism autentic. Dacă Ienăchiță Văcărescu, contemporan cu Goethe sau Schiller, se căznea să toarne limba românească în niște tipare care să-i permită versificații simple și naive precum „Într-o grădină", Cârlova e nu numai contemporan cu marii romantici francezi, cu Victor Hugo, Alfred de Vigny, Alphonse de Lamartine, Alfred de Musset, dar chiar își permite să fie el însuși un poet (pre)romantic (nu de calibrul acestora, pentru că nici timpul n-a avut răbdare cu el). Influențat, desigur, de acești romantici francezi, pe care îi cunoștea bine în original, el nu devine un simplu imitator, ci un poet original, un creator de imagini poetice autentice, unul care pregătește calea și facilitează apariția fenomenului eminescian. Din păcate, nu a apucat să scrie decât foarte puțin, doar cinci poezii, toate publicate în Curierul Românesc al lui Eliade Rădulescu: Păstorul întristat, Ruinurile Târgoviștei, Rugăciune (apărută postum), Înserarea și Marșul (Odă oștirei române).

Vorbind despre lirica lui Cârlova, Eugen Simion afirmă că este atinsă de aripa unei „tristeți fundamentale", că se manifestă într-un univers dominat de „o tristețe și o blândețe care vor să ocrotească o realitate fragilă, ea însăși tristă, evanescentă (ruinurile, păstorul întristat […]), supusă

unei legi aspre: soarta”[35]. Păstorul întristat, scrisă pe când poetul avea doar 18 ani, se înscrie în acest univers. Poezia înglobează „toate locurile comune ale idilei rustice: păstorul cu fluerul, stând la umbra marelui arbor, turmele de oi, câinele, Eco ascultând în loc ascuns. Curgerea versurilor, în ciuda unor rele muntenisme, este cu toate acestea plină de un moale farmec […]”[36]. Avem aici de-a face cu o elegie pastorală erotică, structural compusă din opt catrene cu versuri de zece silabe, rima fiind încrucișată. Tema poeziei este dragostea neîmpărtășită, cauzatoare de răni adânci în suflet. Termenii utilizați sunt subsumați temei: jale, milă, mângâiere, milos, durere. Motivele sunt specifice vieții păstorești, după cum arăta și Călinescu. Interesant și inovativ pentru poezia cultă este motivul comunicării și comuniunii directe, nemijlocite dintre individ și natura animată/inanimată, ca în baladele populare sau ca mai târziu la Eminescu, a empatiei (mai mult decât o simplă compasiune) manifestate atât de regnul vegetal, cât și de cel animal, acestea participând efectiv și afectiv la drama păstorului – „pătrunse toate de mila lui”: vântul nu mai bate, apa nu mai curge, oile încetează să mai pască etc.: „Un păstor tânăr, frumos la față, / Plin de mâhnire, cu glas duios / Cântă din fluer jos pe verdeață, / Subt umbră deasă de pom stufos. / De multe versuri spuse cu jale / Uimite toate sta împrejur: / Râul oprise apa din cale, / Vântul tăcuse din lin murmur. / Cât colo turme de oi frumoase / Se răspândise pe livejui / Și ascultându-l iarba uitase, / Pătrunse toate de mila lui.” Lamentațiile din final ne poartă inevitabil cu gândul la Ienăchiță Văcărescu sau, mai ales, la Costache Conachi, numai că de data aceasta avem de-a face cu un discurs poetic mult mai bine articulat, cu un autor care, în ciuda vârstei, dispune de alte resurse lingvistice, creative și imaginative decât predecesorii săi, dar care a știut să înnobileze și să îmbogățească „moștenirea” lăsată de aceștia.

Concluzie

Ienăchiță Văcărescu, Costache Conachi și Vasile Cârlova sunt considerați de exegeți drept primii noștri poeți preromantici, întemeietori ai literaturii române moderne. La Ienăchiță Văcărescu întâlnim același ritm, aceleași motive și aceeași simplitate și melodicitate specifice liricii de factură folclorică, eposul popular fiind supus însă unor eforturi remarcabile de poetizare cultă. Ceea ce realizează, Ienăchiță Văcărescu în cultura română poate fi socotit pe bună dreptate un act demiurgic, întrucât acesta așează bazele unei limbi, favorizează premisele formării unei conștiințe literare într-o etapă istorică și culturală aflată într-un mare decalaj față de Occident și pe care le exprimă, până la urmă, cu mijloacele pe care el însuși și le creează, în special în spiritul epocii respective, dar într-o oarecare măsură și din punct de vedere al unei personalități remarcabile. Contemporan, nu și congener cu Ienăchiță, Costache Conachi – comparat cu Petrarca prin prisma specializării erotice, cultului exclusiv al eului și savorii provenite din ineditul mediului - urmează modelul popular pe care îl întâlnim și la Ienăchiță Văcărescu, versificație în monorimă de factură populară, pe tema chinurilor și bucuriilor pricinuite de dragostea personificată prin „stăpânul nur”, farmecul inefabil al femeii, idolatrizată ca o divinitate. Dacă la Ienăchiță Văcărescu sau la Costache Conachi remarcăm o subsumare a creației artistice, tematic vorbind, epocii respective, la Vasile Cârlova vorbim deodată de un stil personal, de un lirism autentic. Dacă Ienăchiță Văcărescu, contemporan cu Goethe sau Schiller, se căznea să toarne limba românească în niște tipare care să-i permită versificații simple și naive precum „Într-o grădină”, Cârlova e nu numai contemporan cu marii romantici francezi, cu Victor Hugo, Alfred de Vigny, Alphonse de Lamartine, Alfred de Musset, dar chiar își permite să fie el însuși un poet (pre)romantic (nu de calibrul acestora, pentru că nici timpul n-a avut răbdare cu el). Cei care vor urma celor trei poeți menționați mai sus, de la Iancu Văcărescu, la Eliade Rădulescu, la Alecsandri și până la piscul Eminescu, vor duce mai departe moștenirea lăsată de acești deschizători de drumuri, cu din ce în ce mai mult talent, dar având desigur și un punct de plecare cert, cultural și lingvistic.

THE ORTHODOX DIMENSION WITHIN ROMANIAN LITERATURE

Ioan Marcel Pop
PhD Student, National University of Science and Technology, „Politehnica" Bucharest

Abstract: The article proposes a critical reading of the "Orthodox dimension" in Romanian literature as a set of symbolic resources, images, and rhetorical procedures (the psalm, the hymn, prayer, the iconic, the apophatic) that cut across different periods and aesthetic programs. Methodologically, it combines historical-literary analysis with tools of poetics, in relation both to the pre-communist tradition (Eminescu, Arghezi, Goga, Voiculescu) and to the restructurings imposed by the hostile ideological climate after 1948 (Ioan Alexandru, Daniel Turcea, the carceral and clandestine strand alongside Gabriel Iordan Dorobanțiu). The hypothesis is that literary "Orthodoxy" does not coincide with a "confessional program," but functions as an adaptable "grammar of transcendence": it negotiates with modernity by recuperating form (psalm/hymn) and by reconfiguring reference—shifting from God toward the Nation, then reversing toward the sacred—while preserving a core of sensibility, liturgical rhythm, doxological vocabulary, and metaphors of light that ensure continuities beyond political discontinuities.

Termenul „dimensiune ortodoxă" poate fi înțeles descriptiv (ca inventar de motive, simboluri, practici ale imaginarului) și normativ (ca program estetic/ideologic). Pentru a evita atât esențialismul teologic, cât și relativismul cultural, vom folosi un cadru hermeneutic care articulează patru niveluri: teologico-liturgic, antropologic, estetic și ideologic-istoric. În plus, distingem între ortodoxie ca sistem doctrinar și „ortodoxitate" ca habitus cultural sedimentat în limbă, spații, ritmuri și ritualuri cotidiene. În literatura română, ambele registre se întrepătrund, iar momentele de criză istorică (modernizarea rapidă, războaiele, comunismul) intensifică vizibilitatea lor în texte.

În dezbaterea despre specificul literaturii române, noțiunea de „dimensiune ortodoxă" a circulat adesea între excesul programatic al ortodoxismului interbelic, gândirismul și refuzul modernist de a recunoaște explicit resursele religioase ale limbajului poetic. O clarificare utilă: prin „dimensiune ortodoxă" nu înțelegem un set doctrinar de tezisme confesionale, ci "o familie de procedee și imaginar" provenite din ritual, imnografie, iconografie și teologie, psalmi, tropare, imne, lumina necreată, chipul/icoana, euharistia metaforică), care devin "forme culturale" generale, accesibile oricărui poet, indiferent de confesiune. Eminescu a rescris rugăciunea ca formă lirică; Arghezi a reconfigurat psalmul în registru agonistic. Voiculescu a creat angelologii erotice; Goga a marcat un discurs cu încărcătură liturgic-națională. Totodată, tradiția ortodoxă a modelat "ritmuri", monodic, responsorial, imagini-cheie (lumina, icoana, altarul, tăcerea apofatică) și strategii enunțiative (invocație, doxologie, mărturisire), pe care critica de secol XX le-a înregistrat fie ca „tradiționalism", fie ca subsistem simbolic persistent. În această cheie, „ortodoxul" din literatură este mai curând "un regim de sens" decât o temă.

Poezia ortodoxă din perioada comunistă practică o poetica a dublului codaj: registrul teologic este camuflat într-un limbaj simbolic accesibil cenzurii, dar transparent pentru comunitatea inițiată. Procedee frecvente: intertext biblic discret (aluzie, citat parțial), recurența vocativelor sacre, altairea lexicului liturgic, compoziții litanice, imnografie adaptată. Metrica oscilează între vers liber profetic și forme fixe (sonet, psalm parafrazat) – ultimele funcționând ca dispozitive de memorie. Prozodia înregistrează ritmuri ale respirației rugătoare, ceea ce conferă densitate și pauze semnificante. În unele cazuri (Daniel Turcea), se impune o estetică a "vederii" (theoria) care desface cuvântul pentru a-i reda străvezimea.

Tradiția poeziei religioase românești înainte de comunism se situează între două paradigme: sublimul metafizic (Eminescu, Blaga) și sacrul familiar (Goga, Pillat), cu un pol modernist de tensiune teologică (Arghezi) și un altul de transfigurare mistic-imaginală (Voiculescu). Genealogia acestei tradiții validează ideea că ortodoxia funcționează ca repertoriu de forme mai degrabă decât ca dogmatică explicită.

Întrebarea «Eminescu poet religios?» nu primește un răspuns simplu. Poetul conjugă o sensibilitate a sacrului cu o reflecție metafizică adesea critică față de instituția religioasă și față de teodiceele facile. «Religiosul» nu este temă marginală, ci strat structural: ontologic (ființă/neființă), etic (vină/iertare), estetic (imn/psalm), istoric (critica modernității).

Eminescu inaugurează un model de ”rugăciune lirică” în care invocația coboară în textura metrică și imagistică a poemului („Rugăciunea”), punând în scenă o teologie a dependenței și a ”mijlocirii” (adresarea Fecioarei). În spatele lexicului transparent stă o gramatică a transcedentului pe care critica a observat-o în raport cu mitologiile și filosofia epocii, fără a-i nega filiația creștină. Modelul eminescian fixează trei direcții: invocația, ca strategie enunțiativă; metafora luminii drept matrice cognitivă; agonul metafizic (neliniștea cunoașterii) ca vector al subiectului liric.

Rugăciunea și smerenia. «Rugăciunea unui dac» practică un psalm al sărăciei spirituale dus la extrem: cererea de desființare egologică devine exercițiu de kenoză.Teodiceea și răul. «Împărat și proletar» formulează una dintre cele mai dure critici ale ipocriziei istorice, cu un dialog aspru între putere, ideologie și cruce. Transcendența și erosul. «Luceafărul» înscenează un raport imposibil între absolut și contingent – o parabolă despre înălțare și singurătate metafizică.

Cosmogonia și timpul. «Scrisoarea I» imaginează un univers ciclic, în care naşterea și stingerea coexistă – un orizont deschis către gândirea creatio ex nihilo, dar tensionat de eternul reîntoarceri. Rugăciunea și smerenia. «Rugăciunea unui dac» practică un psalm al sărăciei spirituale dus la extrem: cererea de desființare egologică devine exercițiu de kenoză.
Teodiceea și răul. «Împărat și proletar» formulează una dintre cele mai dure critici ale ipocriziei istorice, cu un dialog aspru între putere, ideologie și cruce. Transcendența și erosul. «Luceafărul» înscenează un raport imposibil între absolut și contingent – o parabolă despre înălțare și singurătate metafizică. Colindele, troparul popularizat, iconografia de pridvor, limbajul bisericesc cotidian sunt reactivate în registru liric. Acest fond conferă universalului metafizic un chip local, familiar, fără a-l banaliza.

Eminescu poate fi numit «poet religios» în măsura în care sacrul organizează adâncul ontologic al poeziei lui. Departe de devoțional, el activează registre psaltice și imnografice, pune în tensiune teodiceea, convoacă folclorul creștin și propune o viziune a transcendenței care traversează modernitatea. Dimensiunea religioasă nu exclude modernul; îl refondează din interior.

Tudor Arghezi ocupă o poziție paradoxală în canonul românesc: simultan „iconoclast” și „psalmist”, maestru al invectivelor și al rugăciunii. Critica a oscilat între a-l citi ca pe un modernist radical, preocupat de materia cuvântului, și ca pe un autor al interiorității religioase. Această dublă lectură, aparent antinomică, configurează o poetică a tensiunii productive, în care scandalul limbajului coabitează cu gravitatea interogației metafizice. Studiul de față își propune: să clarifice statutul „religiosului” la Arghezi ca practică textuală și cognitivă; să analizeze mecanismele retorice ale „psalmilor”—adresarea, repetiția, imperativele, antitezele, tăcerile; să situeze această poetică în modernismul românesc, în dialog comparativ cu Blaga și Barbu; și să discute receptarea interbelică și postbelică, relevând dinamica dintre ortodoxie culturală, cenzură și inovație estetică.

Istoria receptării lui Arghezi relevă o pluralitate de direcții. Tradiția inaugurată de Georghe Călinescu a integrat poetul într-o genealogie a „meșteșugarilor” limbajului, în care religiosul este asumat drept câmp de tensiune etică. Eugen Simion și Nicolae Manolescu au accentuat complexitatea registrului, insistând asupra „psalmilor” ca loc al dialogului cu Divinitatea, departe de devoțiunea conformistă. Pe de altă parte, lecturile teologice mai recente au propus conceptul de „teologie negativă” pentru a descrie experiența absenței și a tăcerii lui Dumnezeu. În plan teoretic, articolul mobilizează trei instrumente: pragmatica adresării (poezia ca act ilocuționar orientat către un Tu absolut); estetica antitezei (opozițiile ca motor de semnificare); și poetica materialității (cuvântul ca materie și „unealtă” a apropierii de sacru).

Ciclul „Psalmii” configurează un spațiu al convocației: un ”Eu” liric cheamă și interoghează un ”Tu” transcendent. Retorica se organizează în jurul imperativelor („vino”, „arată-te”), a interogațiilor insistente și a dorinței unei verificări sensibile a prezenței divine („Vreau să te pipăi…”). Această cerere de palpabil se constituie într-o polemică discretă cu tradiția apofatică; poetul nu renunță la mister, dar îl solicită să coboare în contingent. În multe poeme, tăcerea lui Dumnezeu devine partener de dialog: răspunsul absent nu anulează raportul, ci îl intensifică, punând în mișcare o hermeneutică a indiciilor—lumină, umbră, icoană, candelă—care funcționează ca semne ambigue.

Din punct de vedere prozodic, „psalmii” utilizează adesea versul cu ritm intern liber, cu pauze retorice și anafore care creează o dublă mișcare: invocație/replică. Lexicul oscilează între registre: termeni liturgici (tămâie, altar, mir) sunt juxtapuși cu vocabular comun, uneori frust, ceea ce produce o desacralizare controlată, menită nu să profaneze, ci să testeze rezistența sacrului. În acest fel, Arghezi reușește o „modernizare” a psalmului, mutând accentul de la dogmă la experiență, de la ritual la căutare.

O axă centrală a imaginarului arghezian este antiteza sacru/profan. Poetul se mișcă pe muchie: gestul blasfemic este, de fapt, un pariu al intimității cu Dumnezeu. Când pune în scenă „mânia” sau „ranchiuna”, poetul nu respinge transcendentul, ci reclamă o relație vie cu el. Sacrul nu este delimitat de profan, ci traversat de el, iar această traversare produce o transmutație dublă: profanul se înnobilează prin adresare, iar sacrul se concretizează în detaliu domestic—o candelă, o scoarță de copac, un meșteșug. Astfel se explică recurența obiectelor mici și a materiei tactile în ipostaza de „icoane” laice.

Din perspectivă hermeneutică, dialectica funcționează ca procedeu cognitiv: prin procedeul oglinzi, sensul se produce nu se oferă. Rugăciunea nu livrează soluții, ci deschide paradoxuri fertile. Aceasta apropie „psalmii” de o teologie a nădejdii, în care îndoiala nu e contrarul credinței, ci condiția ei de posibilitate. O altă constantă argheziană este etica muncii poetice. „Cuvintele potrivite” nu sunt doar o estetică a preciziei, ci și o disciplină spirituală. Poetul lucrează cu materia fonică și semantică asemenea unui iconar, care șlefuiește până când lumina iese la iveală. Metaforele atelierului—teslar, potcovar, grădinar—au valoare soteriologică: munca devine ofrandă. În această cheie, actul poetic capătă nuanțe sacramentale: cuvântul nu doar „spune”, ci „face”, instituie o prezență.

Această poetica materiei explică de ce lirismul arghezian nu se teme de corporalitate sau de concretețe. Dimpotrivă, trupul, lutul, „jegul” devin locuri de trecere pentru har, fără a-l dilua. Se evită astfel atât idealismul steril, cât și naturalismul plat: între ele, munca cuvântului produce un real transfigurat. Interbelicul consemnează atât elogii, cât și rezerve față de „blasfemiile” poetului. În linii mari, critica a înțeles rapid că „scandalul” limbajului corespunde unui scandal al conștiinței moderne. După 1948, canonizarea controlată și momentele de cenzură creează o recepție stratificată: sunt valorizate textele cu accent etic și muncitoresc, în vreme ce dimensiunea metafizică este discret neutralizată. Reabilitările târzii redau unitatea unui autor pentru care „psalmul” și „pamfletul” sunt fețele aceleiași etici a responsabilității cuvântului.

Motive: lumina și întunericul – funcționează ca indici ai proximității/depărtării divine; semnul – cererea unui „semn” concret organizează tensiunea epistemică; icoana domestică – obiectele mici devin locuri ale epifaniei cotidiene; tăcerea – ca dispozitiv dialogic, tăcerea stabilește ritmul rugăciunii; numele – invocarea numelui divin, cu variații, instituie relația ”Eu–Tu”. Retorici: anafora și epifora (insistența rugăciunii), interogația retorică (testarea prezenței), imperativul (chemarea), antiteza (producerea sensului), enumerarea (ritm comunitar al rostirii). Analiza combină lectura atentă a unui grup de texte reprezentative din ciclul „Psalmii" cu contextualizarea în poetica arghezianã și în dezbaterile interbelice. Nu urmăresc exhaustivitatea, ci relevarea mecanismelor semnificante recurente. Corpusul include selecții din volumele de debut și din scrierile ulterioare în care reapare motivul psalmic. Demersul a argumentat că „religiosul" la Arghezi funcționează ca poezie a responsabilității: față de cuvânt, față de celălalt și față de Dumnezeu. Prin dialectica sacru/profan și prin poetica meșteșugului, Arghezi reinventează psalmul într-o modernitate sceptică, fără a-l dezangaja de miza etică. Această relectură invită la reconsiderarea locului lui Arghezi în canon nu doar ca inovator al limbajului, ci ca gânditor poetic al credinței.

Arghezi „modernizează" psalmul printr-o retorică a conflictului cu divinitatea. Psalmii săi sunt dramaturgii ale îndoielii: oscilează între blasfemie retorică și adorație rănită. Procedeul produce un lirism teologic agonic , în care limbajul devine act de căutare și "pedepsire de sine". În plan formal, el preia structura psalmică (invocare / mărturisire / doxologie) și o fracturează expresiv, redistribuind accentele. Critica a observat că tensiunea arghezianã nu destramă religiosul, ci îl internalizează în "laboratorul limbajulu", creând o modernitate confesivă fără precedent.

Octavian Goga, poet transilvănean, își construiește discursul în intersecția dintre tradiția rurală, experiența confesională și idealul național. Interbelicul amplifică tensiunea dintre devoțiunea ortodoxă/catolică a satului transilvănean și politizarea simbolurilor sacre în spațiul public. Distincția de lucru: (a) sacrul devoțional (psalmul, rugăciunea, icoana, liturghia) și (b) sacralizarea politică a comunității (națiunea ca «adunare eclezială»). La Goga, trecerile sunt frecvente: rugăciunea devine imn civic, iar icoana se proiectează pe ecranul identitar. Această retorică produce intensitate, dar și ambiguități etice. Lumina ordonează scena epifanică a satului; chipul – al mamei, al țăranului, al sfinților populari – devine loc de întâlnire între teologie și ethosul muncii. Jertfa se traduce euharistic (pâine, vin) și civic (sacrificiul pentru comunitate). Rugăciunea structurează ritmul intern al textului.

Psalmul (lamentație, invocare, doxologie), imnul (laudă a locului și a neamului), retorica profetică (denunț și chemare) sunt orchestrate prin anaforă, paralelisme, vocative sacre («Doamne»), ritmuri litanice și claritate enunțiativă. Intertextul biblic funcționează prin aluzie și lexic doxologic; fondul folcloric – colindul, troița, obiceiul – oferă infrastructura de receptare. Biserica de sat, preotul, clopotul configurează spațiul unei teologii implicite. Geografia afectivă a lui Goga este teologică: satul apare ca matrice de sens. Biserica și cimitirul oferă axele memoriei, în timp ce troița marchează răscrucile etice ale comunității.

Discursul sacru se reconfigurează în registru civic fără a-și pierde complet conținutul spiritual. Totuși, sacralizarea politică riscă instrumentalizarea simbolurilor. Lectura critică trebuie să discearnă între rugăciune și lozincă. Psalmul comunității: anafora invocativă și doxologia "Lucrului Bine-Făcut". «Biserica din sat»: clopotul ca ritm al zilei, icoana ca memorie.«Rugăciune» /texte cu vocative sacre: dinamica kenotică și speranța pascală. Imnul național transfigurat: metonimia «ogorului» și euharistia muncii.

Octavian Goga operează la intersecția dintre liturgicul rural și discursul național. „Rugăciune" și alte poeme tematizează (icoana) și (altarul) drept repere comunitare; vocabularul sacru devine retorică a solidarității. În locul misticii, avem o "catehеză civică" care transformă simbolurile ortodoxe în imagini ale neamului. Această dislocare a accentelor anticipă modul în care, în secolul XX, sacralitatea va fi convertită în "capital simbolic" al identității naționale.

Vasile Voiculescu propune o botanică a îngerilor și un "eros transfigurat", în care corporalitatea e trecută prin "lentila imnografică" (vase de lumină, aripi, miresme). Poemele sale cu îngeri fac vizibil, un registru doxologic discret, unde lumina și numele devin operatori ai prezenței sacre fără didactism. Voiculescu refuză tezismul: el practică epifania ca micro-eveniment textual. Lumina apare ca operator teologic (necreată, pascală), iar icoana oferă paradigma transparenței: cuvântul devine fereastră. Jertfa organizează simbolic suferința istorică, iar rugăciunea structurează ritmul lăuntric al dicțiunii. Aceste motive asigură stabilitate spirituală dincolo de discontinuitatea politică. Sonetul târziu funcționează ca ”disciplină a respirației”: cadența fixă și rima susțin un exercițiu de trezvie. Formele fixe facilitează circulația clandestină (memorare, recitare) și conservă sensul sub presiunea cenzurii. Tensiunea dintre constrângerea formei și extazul imaginii produce densitatea specifică lui Voiculescu.

În vecinătate, Ion Pillat fixează în „Pe Argeș în sus” un topos liturgic-patrimonial (biserici vechi, pridvoare, icoane), în vreme ce Lucian Blaga reia sacralitatea în registru metafizic-filosofic, cu o teologie implicită a misterului și a luminii oprite. La polul interior al tradiției ortodoxe, Zorica Lațcu (Monahia Teodosia) scrie o poezie de adorare și doxologie, care circulă discret și va fi editată târziu, confirmând continuitatea subterană a filonului liturgic. Aceste direcții configurează un câmp polifonic în care „ortodoxul” nu este uniform, ci o rețea de stiluri. Pillat recuperează forme și simboluri tradiționale fără să refuze modernitatea: peisajul devine laborator de stil, iar memoria – strategie de contracarare a discontinuității istorice. «Tradiția» e practică estetică, nu simplă ideologie. Limbajul evită obscuritatea: claritatea e o etică. Metaforele sunt arhetipale (izvor, lan, troiță), iar comparațiile, austere. Ponderea imaginilor luminii și a simbolurilor euharistice este discretă, dar constantă. Ion Pillat poate fi citit ca poet religios în sensul unei teologii implicite a locului: prin peisaj, ritm liturgic și memorie, poemul devine un imn discret al continuității. «Sacrul domestic» pe care îl propune oferă modernității interbelice un model de transfigurare a cotidianului.

Cenzura oficială a vizat eliminarea teologumenelor explicite, a referințelor la sfinți, monahism, minuni, precum și a oricăror insinuări critice la adresa ordinii socialiste. Strategiile autorilor au variat de la neutralizarea lexicului teologic până la translarea mesajului în parabole, simboluri naturale (lumină, izvor, munte) sau arhaisme inofensive. Autocenzura a fost un exercițiu de supraviețuire textuală, însă nu a anulat densitatea spirituală. Circuitele paralele – copii manuscrise, «caiete» de chilie, introducerea clandestină de volume din diaspora – au hrănit un canon subteran.

Această cenzură poate fi văzută și ca o traumă culturală așa cum este definită în cartea ”Toward a Theory of Cultural Trauma”Jeffrey C. Alexander ”Trauma culturală apare atunci când membrii unei colectivități simt că au fost supuși unui eveniment îngrozitor care lasă urme de neșters asupra conștiinței lor de grup, marcându-le pentru totdeauna memoria și schimbându-le identitatea viitoare în moduri fundamentale și irevocabile.”

După 1948, climatul ideologic ostil a impus reajustări ale discursului religios. Nu avem o dispariție, ci o redistribuire a semnelor sacre: de la semnificația explicită la aluzie, de la teologia numită la metafizica figurată. Continuum-ul tradiției se păstrează prin forme (psalmul, imnul), în timp ce discontinuitatea privește referențialitatea și circulația (tiraje mici, samizdat, manuscrise). În această ecologie a supraviețuirii, se disting patru strategii.

Strategia imnului „patriotic-doxologic”. Ioan Alexandru recuperează forma imnului și o rescrie la intersecția dintre teologia darului și discursul despre patrie. „Imnele” sale convertesc doxologia în elogiu al matricii naționale, îmbinând imageria euharistică (pâine, vin, holdă) cu „geografia sacralizată” (Ardeal, Bucovina). Forma rămâne liturgică (invocație, mulțumire, binecuvântare), dar referința devine națiunea, cu reflux spre sacrul originar. Rezultatul e un compromis estetic de mare anvergură: păstrează ritmul doxologic, dar dimensionează obiectul laudativ.

Strategia apofatică și a „luminii” . Daniel Turcea cultivă un discurs saturat de apofatic (tăcere, gol, negrăit) și metafore de lumină apropiate de tradiția mistică răsăriteană. „Epifania” nu nominalizează dictatorul sau cenzorul; evită realismul și alege verticalitatea ca antidot. În termenii teoriei lecturii, sensul devine „deplasat” spre o semnificație transcendentă, iar „politicul” e ocolit fără a fi „negat”, ceea ce explică publicabilitatea lui Turcea în 1978-1819. Poezia lui Daniel Turcea articulează o teologie implicită a cuvântului ca icoană. Prin lumina necreată, prin tăcerea activă și prin disciplina formelor, poemul devine loc al vederii. Această poetica a epifaniei, născută din convertire și hrănită de isihasm, oferă literaturii române un model de interioritate transfiguratoare.

Aici poate fi observată această traumă a culturii cum este ea prezentată în cartea "Toward a Theory of Cultural Trauma"Jeffrey C. Alexander „Când procesul traumei pătrunde în birocrația de stat, el poate apela la puterea guvernamentală pentru a canaliza procesul de reprezentare. Deciziile ramurilor executive ale guvernelor de a crea comisii naționale de anchetă, voturile parlamentelor de a înființa comitete de investigare, inițierea de investigații polițienești dirijate de stat și noile directive privind prioritățile naționale Receptarea post-1989 a consolidat statutul lui Turcea drept una dintre vârfurile poeziei religioase moderne. Critica a observat unitatea dintre experiența spirituală și performanța formală. În același timp, au fost semnalate riscurile unei lecturi exclusiv devoționale. O poziționare echilibrată reclamă coroborarea documentelor biografice, a contextului isihast și a analizei textuale.

Strategia carcerală și a mărturisirii. Radu Gyr scrie poezie de detenție în care figura lui Hristos devine chip de solidaritate și companion „Iisus în celulă". Aici nu mai există ambiguitate: teologia e explicită, dar circulația este clandestină (manuscris, memorie orală), confirmând discontinuitatea pe latura publică a tradiției. În aceeași zonă, filonul, Oastea Domnului, prin Traian Dorz, întreține o psalmodie populară de rugăciune și pocăință care va intra oficial în circuitul editorial abia după 1990.

Strategia paratextului și a „limbajului dublu" . În volumele publicabile, paratextele (prefețe, dedicații) produc ambiguități controlate: substituie Dumnezeu cu Lumină sau Iubire, evită numele sacre și lasă cititorului complicit recuperarea sensului. În interiorul poemelor, lexemele liturgice se combină cu topica encomiastică acceptată de regim. Discontinuitatea e deci de registru (public vs. clandestin), nu de formă (psalmul/imnul supraviețuiește). Contextul politico-instituțional explică aceste tactici, însă persistența lor se datorează rezilienței formelor.

Comparativ, putem spune că ortodoxia literară post-1948 păstrează: metricile rugăciunii și doxologiei; metafore-nucleu (lumină, icoană, pâine, vin, cruce); enunțiatorul în ipostaza de "cel ce se roagă". Se schimbă însă scena: unde interbelicul tematiza Sfinții și Biserica , comunismul "sacralizează patria" sau interiorizează radical miza. În plus, circulația devine inegală : un filon vizibil (Alexandru, uneori Voiculescu în ediții postum cenzurate) și un filon invizibil, manuscris, memorare).

Repere ale poeziei ortodoxe în perioada comunistă, cu accent pe poezia lui Gabriel Iordan Dorobanțiu

După 1989, Gabriel Iordan Dorobanțiu s-a afirmat ca o voce distinctă a poeziei ortodoxe românești. Opera sa, desfășurată pe parcursul volumelor „Psalmii învierii" (2004), „Rugăciunea cuvintelor" (2011) și „Timpul liturghiei interioare" (2017), propune o poetică a interiorității și a contemplației. Dorobanțiu continuă tradiția poeților mistici ai secolului XX, dar o reînnoiește printr-un discurs sobru, meditativ, ancorat profund în teologia ortodoxă.

Temele fundamentale ale creației sale – lumina, rugăciunea, tăcerea, suferința și timpul liturgic – definesc o poezie a interiorității luminate. Lumina devine energie divină care transfigurează existența; rugăciunea și tăcerea, moduri de cunoaștere a divinității; suferința, o cale de mântuire; iar timpul liturgic, o experiență a mântuirii prin cuvânt. Limbajul său poetic este limpede, esențializat, cu funcție sacramentală. Textele lui Dorobanțiu (poezie și/sau proză, după corpus) tratează identitatea nu ca esență fixă, ci ca devenire. Subiectul liric/narativ se desfășoară în ipostaze multiple—familiar, urban, memorial, civic—și se lasă interogat prin contraste: intimitate vs. expunere publică, autenticitate vs. rol, tăcere vs. hipercomunicare. Identitatea se „scrie" pe măsură ce se povestește, iar persoana întâi este adesea contrabalansată de o voce meta-narativă. Memoria funcționează ca un dispozitiv de relevare a sensului. Nu este doar arhivă afectivă, ci mecanism compozițional: flashback, anamnează, montaj de cadre, reveniri spiralate. În plan tematic, memoria leagă biograficul de geografic (locuri ale copilăriei / spații tranzitorii) și, în plan etic, orientează lectura spre responsabilitatea față de trecut. Memoria narativizează traumă și vindecare, convertind rememorarea în act estetic.

Locul—rural/urban, intim/public—apare ca scenă a construcției de sine. Spațiul nu este un simplu decor, ci un „personaj" cu drepturi depline: orașul înregistrează ritmuri sociale și afective; camerele, scările, ferestrele devin metafore ale trecerii și ale veghei; geografia domestică mediază întâlnirea dintre memorie și prezent. Eventualele motive recurente (gara, parcul, biserica, apartamentul) pot fi cartografiate pentru a urmări vectorii sensului. Timpul trăit la Dorobanțiu combină cronometria cotidiană (orașul, munca, tehnologiile) cu durata bergsoniană a memoriei. Ritmul textului—alternanțe de accelerări și decelerări, fragment vs. frază amplă—participă la configurarea unei temporalități subiective. Această temporalitate susține etica rememorării și estetica fragmentului. Textul se deschide spre registre variate: liric sobru, colocvialitatea urbană, termeni tehnici, citate cultural-istorice. Aceste registre produc polifonie și stratifică sensul, evitând monologismul. Ironia funcționează ca supapă, iar ludicul, ca strategie cognitivă.

Simbolistica poeziei lui Dorobanțiu este profund ancorată în spiritualitatea ortodoxă: lumina, focul, inima, îngerul și tăcerea devin forme poetice ale prezenței divine. Criticii literari (Ion Pop, Al. Cistelecan, Constantin Munteanu, Mircea Bălan) au remarcat echilibrul dintre dimensiunea teologică și cea estetică a poeziei sale. Receptarea postcomunistă a poeziei religioase a condus la reevaluarea acesteia în cadrul canonului literar contemporan. Poezia lui Gabriel Iordan Dorobanțiu reprezintă o etapă de maturitate a acestei direcții: o poezie a interiorității luminate, care recuperează sacrul fără a pierde modernitatea

În cazul liricului, domină discursul reflexiv, cu o dicție controlată, atentă la ritmul interior. În cazul epic, observația se fixează pe detaliu și pe scenă, focalizare internă, narator discret, preferință pentru „scena mică" cu efect de reverberație. Eseistica funcționează ca spațiu de clarificare teoretică și de negociere între estetic și etic Dimensiunea ortodoxă nu dispare în comunism; se reconfigurează. Continuitatea ei stă în formă (psalm/imn, ritm, doxologie), iar discontinuitatea în referință (Dumnezeu → Patrie) și în regimul circulației (de la edituri oficiale la clandestinitate). Dacă Eminescu și Arghezi definesc două poluri, rugăciunea serenă și psalmul agonic, Ioan Alexandru și Daniel Turcea arată două soluții ale modernității târzii: sacralizarea națiunii și apofatismul interiorizat. Filonul carceral și cel popular-religios (Gyr, Dorz) păstrează explicitul teologic, dar în rețele paralele de circulație. Astfel, „ortodoxul" literar confirmă teza rezilienței formelor: ele supraviețuiesc schimbând obiectul laudei sau ascunzându-și referința sub metafore cu memorie liturgică.

Dimensiunea ortodoxă din literatura română este, în substanța ei, o poetică a prezenței: de la lumina care „se varsă" în limbaj până la ritmul care face din poezie o rugăciune implicită. Ea traversează epoci, curente și ideologii, alternând vizibilitatea programatică (interbelic) cu discretul subtext (comunism) și cu pluralismul post-1989. Înțelegerea ei cere inter-disciplinaritate: teologie, antropologie, istorie literară, teorie a simbolului. În loc să o tratăm ca pe o „esență" imuabilă, o putem gândi ca pe o matrice dinamică ce modelează creativ întâlnirea dintre tradiție și modernitate

THE SYMBOLIC MARRIAGE OF THE PALE WANDERER (DALBUL DE PRIBEAG): THE 'DEATH-AS-WEDDING' METAPHOR IN THE VISION OF ETHNOLOGIST EFIM JUNGHIETU

Mariana Cocieru
Coordinating Scientific Researcher, PhD, Moldova State University

Abstract: The article explores the allegory of "death-wedding" in war songs, emphasizing the research of ethnologist Efim Junghietu and highlighting the deep connections between folkloric traditions and the mythical dimension of popular creations. The allegory, derived from laments and ballads, is presented as a symbolic expression reflecting the community's perception of death as a rite of passage and cosmic integration. The study underlines the continuity of local traditions in artistic representations, adapted to heroic contexts where sacrifice gains central significance.*

Initially, the "death-wedding" imagery had a strictly ritualistic enactment, but through its integration into funeral poetry, it acquired aesthetic and metaphorical dimensions.

In Junghietu's interpretation, the "death-wedding" transcends mere literary metaphor, becoming a "cosmic liturgy" that signifies the fulfillment of human destiny and the deceased's transition into a mythical, timeless space. Representations such as the wedding as the union of the soul with eternity reflect the connection between the material and spiritual worlds, emphasizing the symbolic depth of these creations.

The article highlights the remarkable contribution of ethnologist Efim Junghietu to the study of the evolution of the "death-wedding" imagery and the understanding of the relationships between local traditions and the mythological dimension of folklore, reaffirming its importance as a means of preserving cultural identity and exploring universal conceptions of life, death, and destiny.

Aniversarea a 85 de ani de la nașterea etnologului Efim Junghietu constituie un prilej oportun de reevaluare a contribuțiilor sale fundamentale la studiul folclorului românesc din Republica Moldova. Activitatea cercetătorului, caracterizată printr-o viziune multidimensională asupra patrimoniului cultural intangibil, acoperă domenii variate – de la paremiologie (proverbe, zicători, expresii frazeologice) și lirica populară până la strigături, folclor al taberei militare, creații sincretice și alte forme conexe ale artei tradiționale. În studiile sale analitice, Junghietu a urmărit atât stratificarea locală și zonală a motivelor folclorice, cât și raportarea acestora la contextul internațional, evidențiind paralele tipologice între fondul românesc și cel ucrainean, rus, bulgar sau polonez. Ultima etapă a activității sale s-a concentrat pe o teoretizare tipologică și conceptuală a paremiilor din Basarabia, Transnistria și Bucovina, dezvoltând o metodologie comparativă solidă, aplicabilă întregului patrimoniu est-romanic.

Bibliografia sa amplă – de la studiile consacrate creației folclorice din timpul celui de-al Doilea Război Mondial, până la analiza relațiilor dintre formele artei populare, imaginile simbolice, poezia rituală și paralelismelor paremiologice interetnice – evidențiază consecvența cu care Junghietu a investigat mecanismele interne ale creației tradiționale. Interesul său pentru metafora „moarte-nuntă", relevat în cercetările despre folclorul de război, se înscrie în preocuparea mai largă privind modul în care imaginarul tradițional resemantizează evenimente-limită prin recurs la structuri mitice și simbolice consacrate.

În prezentul articol, ne propunem să analizăm hermeneutica acestui element etnofolcloric – alegoria moarte-nuntă –, concentrându-ne asupra prezenței sale în cântecele de război și asupra legăturii sale cu complexul ritualic al „dalbului de pribeag", tânărul necăsătorit a cărui moarte era simbolic asimilată unei nunți. Ipoteza de lucru presupune că folclorul de tip nou, creat în contextul traumelor istorice ale secolului XX, a reactivat și adaptat structuri mitologice mai vechi, provenite în special din poezia funerară și din obiceiurile mortuare tradiționale. În acest sens, metafora «nunții morții» funcționează ca un cod cultural prin care comunitatea interpretează moartea violentă, restabilind simbolic ordinea cosmică perturbată.

Metodologia cercetării se bazează pe analiza comparativă a textelor folclorice, pe corelarea motivelor consemnate în cântecele de război cu repertoriul arhaic funerar, precum și pe examinarea conceptelor tipologice și simbolice utilizate de Efim Junghietu în lucrările sale. Prin îmbinarea perspectivei istorico-comparative cu lectura hermeneutică a imaginilor poetice, urmărim să demonstrăm continuitatea structurală dintre fondul tradițional și creațiile folclorice moderne, precum și modul în care metafora „moarte-nuntă" funcționează ca mecanism de reconstrucție simbolică a sensului în contextul morții premature.

Analizând literatura de specialitate, folcloristul Efim Junghietu constată o extindere spațială considerabilă a metaforei nuntă-moarte. Argumente în acest sens oferă și ilustrul etnolog Ion Mușlea, care definește „căsătoria mortului" drept o particularitate distinctă a folclorului balcanic[1], prezentă inclusiv în balada Mioriţa, în episodul mariajului cosmic al păstorului[2]. Argumente incontestabile ale acestei metafore au fost identificate de folcloristul și etnograful rus Nicolai F. Sumțov în numeroase zone ale Europei: Rusia, Ucraina, Bulgaria, Ungaria, România, Anglia, Franța și Belgia (свадьба умершего – „căsătoria mortului")[3].

De-a lungul timpului, imaginea alegorică a „nunții mortului" în folclorul slav și în cel al altor popoare a fost analizată în studiile unor reputați cercetători ruși, precum Natalia Kolpakova[4], Liudmila Vinogradova[5], Vera Sokolova[6], Piotr Bogatârev[7], Liudmila Pokrovskaia[8], Dmitrii Zelenin[9], Alibert Baiburin, Gheorghii Levinton[10], Liubomir Mikov[11], Igori Petrov[12], Mariana Maxim[13] etc.

Aspectul filozofic și ritualic al imaginii a constituit, de asemenea, un subiect central pentru numeroși exegeți români. Printre aceștia se numără Ovid Densușianu[14], Dumitru Caracostea[15],Constantin Brăiloiu[16], Ion Breazu[17], Olimpiu O. Constantinescu, Ion I. Stoian[18], Tatiana În folcloristica basarabeană postbelică și contemporană, cercetările dedicate semnificațiilor alegoriei moarte–nuntă sunt relativ puține, dar relevante. Acestea privesc atât interpretările din sfera baladei (Andrei Hâncu: „Mioriţa" şi tradiţia poetică orală a slavilor de răsărit[39], Balada populară Mioriţa[40], Geneza „Mioriţei" – mit şi realitate[41]), cât și analiza dimensiunilor simbolice în lirica populară (Tatina Butnaru: Metafora nuntă-moarte şi semnificaţiile ei în poezia populară[42]), în eposul eroic (Victor Gațac: Восточнороманский героический эпос: исследование и тексты[43]) și în cântecele de război (Efim Junghietu: Metafora „Moartea – nuntă" în cântecele de război[44]; Sergiu Moraru: Frecvenţa metaforei în lirica populară moldovenească cântată[45]).

În mentalitatea populară, moartea reprezintă o trecere, traversarea ultimului prag în itinerarul „dalbului călător" către lumea cosmică, „de dincolo" sau către lumea celor drepți. Credințele și superstițiile românești privind practicile obligatorii de îngrijire a celui răposat, menite să evite ulterioare conflicte cauzate de nerespectarea prevederilor cutumiare, se regăsesc și astăzi în concepția tradițională. Situațiile sunt cu atât mai pregnante în cazul celor decedați la vârste tinere, care nu au apucat, în mod firesc, să treacă prin cel de-al doilea prag existențial – căsătoria. Astfel, „conform unor credințe indo-europene, celibatarii morți erau înmormântați în cadrul unui ritual de nuntă, pentru a le împlini, cel puțin simbolic, destinul, încât ei să nu dăuneze rudelor vii”[46]. În acest sens, Henri H. Stahl sublinia că „a muri necăsătorit reprezintă o moarte periculoasă, deoarece nu s-a realizat aspectul cel mai important al vieții. În consecință are loc o cununie simbolică a mortului”[47].

Pentru liniștea spirituală a apropiaților și a întregii colectivități, precum și pentru îmblânzirea sufletului celui răposat, „dalbul de pribeag nelumit” este supus unui proces complex de separație și integrare în misterul sacru prin împlinirea unor practici cutumiare nupțiale și funerare, cu un clar scop apotropaic: prevenirea revenirii sau răzbunării acestuia în ipostaza de strigoi (morți vii). În mentalitatea arhetipală a poporului, jurămintele, promisiunile, logodnele ori dragostele neconsumate reprezintă cauze ale presupusei răzbunări a „dalbului de pribeag” nelumit asupra celor rămași în viață. Pentru a evita aceste acțiuni nocive, comunitatea pune în scenă postum o nuntă a mortului.

Cercetătoarea Gail Kligman, în lucrarea Nunta mortului. Ritual, poetică și cultură populară în Transilvania, analizează atât elementele comune, cât și diferențele în raport cu ceremonialurile funerare obișnuite. Distincția fundamentală constă în „elaborarea asociației dintre moarte și căsătorie, asociație care își găsește o formă metaforică”[48]. Deși aparent antitetice – nunta ca sărbătoare a vieții și înmormântarea ca comemorare a morții – cele două ceremonii prezintă afinități structurale și de conținut. Ambele includ rituri de separație și rituri de integrare, realizate succesiv. Sunt relevante în acest sens primenirea ritualică, iertăciunile, alaiurile/cortegiile, darurile/ofrandele, pomenile și mesele rituale comune.

Prin urmare, înmormântarea „dalbului de pribeag” nelumit se constituie ca o nuntă „«perfectă» a mortului pe pământ, în anticiparea unei «vieți» împlinite și în pace după moarte – atât pentru morți, cât și pentru cei vii”[49]. Potrivit afirmațiilor etnologului Ion Ghinoiu, moartea unui tânăr necăsătorit era percepută ca o eroare în desfășurarea firească a vieții, eroare ce trebuia reparată prin acte rituale: „Oamenii recurg la rit, răspunzând la nefiresc prin nefiresc. Omul societății tradiționale își schimba adesea identitatea, în anumite contexte ceremoniale și rituale, cu plante, animale și chiar obiecte. Acestea îl puteau înlocui și adăposti pe om, îi puteau deveni frate, soră, soție. La înmomântare, cele mai obișnuite substitute ale soțului (soției) postume este bradul tăiat (sacrificat) după un anumit ritual și împodobit ca la nuntă[50], iar pentru mort măsurile, în special toiagul de ceară și ciomagul dat de pomană, crucea sau stâlpul funerar împlântat la căpătâi. La înmormântarea tinerilor necăsătoriți Nunta mortului, cadrul nupțial care îl înlocuiește sau îl dublează pe cel funerar, rezolvă cea mai gravă încălcare o ordinii firești din ciclul vieții, moartea înaintea manifestării plenare a căsătoriei și procreării”[51].

În consecință, în cadrul ritualului nupțial-mortuar, decedatul este supus unei transformări care „presupune actualizarea fenomenologică a funeraliilor ca metaforă a nunții juxtapusă realizării metonimice a procesului funerar”[52].

Juxtapunerea este realizată prin aplicarea unor coduri simbolice specifice: „dalbul de pribeag" este îmbrăcat în haine de nuntă – un tânăr poartă costum de mire, iar o tânără este înveșmântată în rochie de mireasă sau costum alb, cu cunună și văl pe cap. Druștele și vorniceii sunt, la rândul lor, marcați conform rolului ritualic, având buchete în piept și fiind legați cu prosoape sau panglici. Stegarul poartă un steag împodobit cu batiste și baticuri negre, în locul celor în culori deschise.

În anumite zone geografice – menționează etnologul I. H. Ciubotaru, referindu-se în special la regiunea Moldovei – este confecționat un steag de înmormântare, denumit și „suliță", care se împodobește cu prosop sau basma albă și un buchet de flori[53]. Romulus Vulcănescu vorbește, de asemenea, despre sulița și săgeata de brad, care se deosebesc „mai mult prin nume și formă decât prin conținut thanatologic de bradul simplu ca arbore funerar", fiind „simulacre iconografice ale coloanei cerului"[54]. În acest fel, aceste însemne funerare realizează „în imaginarul colectiv trecătoarea dintre cele două lumi, cea a viilor și cea a morților"[55], dovadă suplimentară fiind și „scărița din aluat atârnată în pom"[56].

Existența acestor însemne funerare este esențială, întrucât ele vizează atenuarea nemulțumirii celui răpit de moarte prematură. Purtătorii sicriului sunt aleși dintre prietenii flăcăului decedat sau dintre prietenele fetei nemăritate, fiind îmbrăcați în ținută de nuntă. Deși practica nu este uniformă în întreg arealul românesc – unde tinerii nelumiți sunt căsătoriți cu ființe aparținând spațiului celest (mirele cu forțele divine ale naturii, după cum observăm în balada Miorița, iar fetele cu Fiul lui Dumnezeu, prin intermediul tradiției creștine) – în Ieud au fost semnalate procesiuni funerare în care mirele decedat este „căsătorit" cu o imitație de mireasă moartă[57].

Potrivit tradiției, în cadrul ritualului nunții postume, o fată nemăritată este aleasă pentru a îndeplini rolul de mireasă a mortului. Referindu-se la acest aspect, Gail Kligman menționează o precizare notată de la un informator – tatăl „miresei" unui mort: „o mireasă este «dată» pentru tineri; dar niciodată nu se «dă» un mire (pentru o fată) – ci doar o cunună"[58]. Etnologul Ioana Popescu, de la Muzeul Țăranului Român, mărturisește într-un interviu că au fost înregistrate cazuri și de substituție alegorică a mirelui unei tinere decedate, rolul fiind jucat de un băiat din localitate care se îmbrăca în mire și își punea flori la piept[59].

În mod obișnuit, rolul miresei „dalbului de pribeag" revine iubitei sau prietenei acestuia; în absența unei astfel de persoane, imitația poate fi îndeplinită de o verișoară, o vecină sau orice fată pe care răposatul a cunoscut-o. Substituția imitativă nu implică alte obligații din partea „miresei", deoarece „căsătoria simbolică cinstește sufletul mortului, dar pentru că nu a fost consumată, ea nu leagă"; astfel, tânăra rămâne liberă să se căsătorească ulterior[60].

Prin urmare, aspectele enunțate mai sus i-au determinat pe numeroși cercetători – inclusiv pe Efim Junghietu – să concluzioneze că invocarea alegorică a metaforei moarte–nuntă în balade, cântece epico-eroice, cântece lirice, basme, romanțe ș.a. își are rădăcinile în ritualul de nuntire postumă a „dalbului de pribeag" nelumit, practicat la multe popoare din Europa și Asia (Mușlea, Stahl, Brăiloiu, Fochi, Hâncu).

Fundamentele etnografice ale acestui obicei sunt evidențiate de Petru Caraman în studiul Alegoria morții în poezia populară, la poloni și la români. Cercetătorul arată că, în cazul înmormântării unui tânăr necăsătorit, ritualul nupțial simbolic reproducea cu rigurozitate o nuntă reală: defunctului i se atribuia o mireasă, sacrificată odinioară alături de el, arsă sau îngropată împreună cu acesta, pentru a-i deveni soție în lumea de dincolo. Întregul ceremonial se desfășura cu fidelitatea tuturor etapelor și solemnităților specifice căsătoriei tradiționale[61]. Caraman consideră că această alegorie, în forma sa arhaică, este contemporană cu riturile sângeroase și superstițioase ale Antichității, precum sacrificarea Ifigeniei înaintea războiului troian[62].

Referindu-se la evoluția genetică a metaforei moarte-nuntă în folclorul românesc, Adrian Fochi subliniază că aceasta a cunoscut o dezvoltare individuală, nefiind influențată de rigorile comunității folclorice balcanice. O poziție similară exprimă și cercetătorul basarabean Andrei Hâncu, care atribuie apariția metaforei unui proces poligenetic, manifestat simultan la mai multe popoare în condiții sociale și culturale similare.

Preluarea alegoriei moarte-nuntă de către celelalte specii folclorice nu s-a produs concomitent, explicația constând în procesul continuu de înnoire a creațiilor folclorice și în apariția unor specii noi. Bunăoară, materializarea metaforei în cântecul de război se produce ulterior constituirii acestei specii, prin filiera bocetelor, baladelor sau a cântecelor haiducești.

Alegoria nuntă–moarte nu a avut inițial o funcție metaforică, ci una strict ritualică, așa cum am observat anterior. Doar odată cu integrarea sa în poezia funerară aceasta capătă dimensiuni estetice și simbolice. Semnificative sunt concluziile etnologului privind evoluția semantică a imaginii: în balade, metafora exprimă o nuntă fictivă, nedorită; în cântecul epico-eroic dobândește nuanțe ironice; iar în cântecele de război predomină semnificația aluziv-ironizantă, preluată din eposul eroic.

În Poetica folclorică, Sergiu Moraru examinează două ipostaze principale ale metaforei nuntă–moarte: prima, cea mai răspândită – „ostașul muribund spune, că mireasa lui este scândura sicriului sau «fiica vântului din fundul pământului", a doua – „nunta alegorică, la care participă toată natura înconjurătoare"[63]. Atât Sergiu Moraru, cât și Efim Junghietu subliniază că metafora moarte–nuntă este structurată dintr-un ansamblu de metafore secundare, activate și relaționate prin paralelism poetic.

Analizând imaginile contextualizate în lirica de război, Tatiana Butnaru identifică multiple variante înrudite cu scenariile metaforice ale Mioriței, imagini care migrează convențional de la o specie folclorică la alta, fiind însoțite de stări și trăiri marcate de o expresivitate puternică și de o pregnantă tonalitate oximoronică[64].

Bunăoară, versurile din cântecul de război Măi frate de lângă mine proiectează o structură a imaginilor similară cu cea întâlnită în variantele baladei Miorița:

„Să nu-i spui că am murit,
Dar să-i spui, c-am logodit,
Cu mireasa din mormânt,
Cu vorniceii de pe vânt"[65];
„Să nu-i spui că-s împușcat,
Da să-i spui că-s însurat
Cu mireasa de pe vânt,
Cu țărna de pe mormânt"[66];
„Cu mireasa de pe vânt,
Cu spatele la pământ,
Cu mireasa vântului,
Din fundul pământului"[67].

În ultimul fragment, etnologul Efim Junghietu surprinde o imagine plastică a însurătorii „cu spatele la pământ", evoluată din expresia frazeologică „a pune spatele la pământ", care desemnează

„a muri”. Imaginea „spatele la pământ” reflectă existența unor practici străvechi în ritualurile familiale legate de relația omului cu pământul. Astfel, după cum observă Rodica Deca: „În societatea românească tradițională s-a conservat sentimentul unei «intimități» materne cu pământul. De fapt, în toate momentele fundamentale ale vieții, omul găsește în Pământul-Mamă fie o sursă de energie vitală, fie o alinare. Astfel, nașterea tradițională se făcea pe vatra casei, pe pământ, pentru ca nou-născutul să aibă dintru început snagă (vlagă, vigoare) și pentru ca Pământul-Mamă să-l apere împotriva duhurilor necurate. Uzanța mai cerea ca, în noaptea nunții, mirele să-și posede mireasa direct pe pământ, pentru ca mirii să fie sănătoși ca pământul și căsătoria trainică tot ca pământul”[68]. De asemenea, în contextul morții, când cineva se chinuia să moară, pentru a-i fi ușurată trecerea, era așezat direct pe pământ sau pe paie, jos, pe sol. În unele regiuni, iar altădată peste tot, mortul era așezat mai întâi pe pământ[69]. În cadrul înmormântării, membrii familiei puneau în coșciug un bulgăre de pământ, simbol al invocării Pământului, pentru ca acesta să nu apese asupra celui decedat. Obiceiul se mai practică și astăzi[70].

Similaritatea imaginilor din cântecul de război citat cu cele din bocetele și balada populară Mioriţa, subliniază Efim Junghietu, rezultă din analogia circumstanțelor: atât soldatul, tânărul decedat nelumit, cât și ciobanul „se află în împrejurări unde moartea poate surveni pe neașteptate”[71]. În aceste situații de maximă intensitate emoțională, gândurile eroilor se concentrează asupra mamei, iar, dorind să o protejeze de durerea provocată de moartea lor, aceștia recurg la imaginea alegorică a nuntirii postume.

Autorul anonim reactualizează textual aceeași imagine alegorică a morții-nuntă întâlnită în Mioriţa:

„La nunta mea
A căzut o stea.
Soarele și luna
Mi-au ținut cununa,
Brazii și tufarii
Mi-au fost nuntașii”, integrând în text și elemente specifice realităților războiului.

„Puștile, cartușele
Mi-au fost mie druștele,
Tunurile, snareadurile
Mi-au fost mie neamurile”[72].

Sau:

„Soarele și luna
Mi-au ținut cununa,
Păsările, vrăbiile
Mi-au fost mie druștele,
Masă mare am făcut
Sub un brad, în piept rănit,
Cine atuncea mă păzea?
Corbul și cu vrabia”[73].

Observăm, în aceste exemple modul în care metafora moarte-nuntă se reconfigurează în cadrul cântecelor de război, adaptând tradițiile ritualice și imaginile alegorice la experiențele violente ale conflictului, păstrând însă coerența simbolică cu fondul epic și funerar tradițional.

Într-o serie de texte, observă Efim Junghietu, nu se fac referiri la cel de al doilea actant al nunții – mireasa. În aceste situații, funcția acesteia este preluată de sicriul-casă de veșnicie. Etnologul notează că, în perioada 1945–1969, a înregistrat 114 texte de război, dintre care 43 utilizează această imagine, în care presupusa mireasă este reprezentată de scândurile de brad ale sicriului:

„Dacă nu ești mulțumită,
Du-te acasă, te mărită,
Că eu m-am însurat,
Cu patru scânduri de brad,
Două-n lung și două-n lat
Și de-asupra un capac”[74].

Alte texte indică locul căsătoriei:

„Află, mamă, m-am însurat,
În pădurea cea de fag
Pe patru scânduri de brad”[75].

Sau:

„În Berlin când am intrat,
Miresuică mi-am luat
Miresuica vântului
Din fundul pământului”[76].

În exemplele propuse, se evidențiază motivul arborelui ca substitut al omului. Potrivit tradiției românești, la înmormântarea celor necăsătoriți, se pregătea un brad care simboliza căsătoria[77]. Etnologul Etnologul Ion Ghinoiu, în studiile sale, subliniază că bradul, împodobit ca de nuntă, precum și sulița sau steagul, funcționau ca substitut postum al soțului sau al soției[78].

În aceeași ordine de idei, se înscriu și afirmațiile etnologului Vintilă Mihăilescu, potrivit căruia semnificația profundă a bradului în cultura tradițională românească, din perspectiva antropologică, se concretizează într-un „dublu al sufletului. <...> fiecare om are bradul lui, care acela și doar acela trebuie doborât și adus la mormânt, pentru că altfel răposatul nu poate să meargă liniștit în viața de dincolo”[79].

Parcurgând textele poetice de război, subliniază Efim Junghietu, se remarcă faptul că eroul liric apelează la diverși actanți pentru a transmite mamei, iubitei sau soției vestea tragică a decesului. Eroul liric se adresează camaradului de luptă, comandantului, medicului sau stihiilor naturii pentru a transmite o „scrisoare acasă”. Sugestive în acest sens sunt variantele textelor De te-i duce acasă, vere și Nistrule, apă vioară.

În cântecul de război De te-i duce acasă, vere, rolul Mioarei năzdrăvane este preluat de camaradul de război, căruia ostașul îi încredințează misiunea de a comunica delicat vestea tragică mamei sale:

„Când te duci acasă, frate,
Să nu-i spui maicii de toate,

Să-i spui că m-am însurat
După în cartuș cu praf”[80].

Spre deosebire de textele anterioare, în Vin soldații din război, alegoria moarte-nuntă este proiectată în cuvintele decedatului deja înhumat:

„Taci, fetiță bălăioară,
Căci de-aici nu ies afară,
Că am mult pământ pe mine
Și nu pot să ies la tine.
Dacă dragă ești grăbită,
Du-te acasă, te mărită,
Căci și eu m-am însurat,
Sub pământ, la Stalingrad.
Și țin fata nu știu cui,
Din fundul pământului”[81].

Analizând acest cântec de război, Junghietu atrage atenția asupra evoluției semantice a imaginii moarte-nuntă, care nu mai vizează tânărul necăsătorit, ci defunctul „căsătorit a doua oară”. În ambele cazuri, formula „Du-te acasă, te mărită” funcționează pentru a dezlega fata sau nevasta de legăturile intime (în cazul fată/flăcău) și, respectiv, de cele familiale (în cazul soț/soție), realizând astfel un mecanism de compensare simbolică și de continuitate socială postumă.

Inițiind un tablou sinoptic al evoluției imaginii moarte-nuntă, etnologul recurge la metoda comparativă, confruntând cântecele de război cu poezia funebră, cu balada și cu lirica populară a altor popoare. Observă, pe bună dreptate, că imaginea alegorică nuntă-moarte în cântecele de război reiterează formulările stereotipe consolidate, preluate din bocete și baladă, dar, în anumite cazuri, generează și inovații lexicale și imagistice proprii. „Imaginile concrete, prin care este reprezentată moartea”, concluzionează cercetătorul, „sunt variate. Alegerea și uzitarea metaforelor nu depinde de context, ci de tradițiile locale, de preferințele și cunoștințele folclorice ale interpreților. De aceea, în cadrul aceluiași cântec pot apărea cele mai diverse formulări ale alegoriei «moartea-nuntă»”[82].

Astfel, similar cu ceea ce se întâmplă în bocete și în baladă, alegoria moarte-nuntă în cântecul de război marchează încadrarea defunctului în spațiul atemporal, mitic, realizând ceea ce Mircea Eliade numește „liturghie cosmică”[83]. Prin acest demers, se asigură împlinirea simbolică a condiției umane și a destinului individual (din țărână suntem făcuți și în țărână ne vom întoarce), iar memoria celui plecat este integrată în conștiința colectivă a comunității.

În concluzie, analiza etnografică și comparativă demonstrează că alegoria moarte-nuntă reprezintă un mecanism simbolic complex, care combină ritualul funerar, imaginarul mitic și expresia poetică, funcționând ca instrument de acomodare socială și psihologică a experienței morții, menținând totodată continuitatea tradițiilor și valorilor culturale în comunitate. Această metaforă, reconfigurată în contexte diverse – de la balade și bocete la cântece de război – reflectă capacitatea creației populare de a integra, adapta și perpetua modele ritualice în funcție de evoluțiile istorice și de circumstanțele sociale.

BODY REPRESENTATIONS IN THE POST-1990 FEMALE NOVELS

Andreea-Corina Batori (Talan)
PhD, Teacher at "Bolyai Farkas" Theoretical Highschool of Târgu Mureș

Abstract: Post-1990 novels place strong emphasis on identity, especially through the female character's ongoing relationship with her own body. Because many female writers set their narratives during the Romanian communism or in close connection with it, the body becomes deeply politicized under state hegemony. The individual loses autonomy over their physical self, effectively surrendering it to society and becoming guided by forces external to their inner world. Forced to face profound alienation, individuals became victims of the present. Consequently, interconnected forms of the body emerge, each illustrating submission to a politically orchestrated destiny.

Keywords: communism; alienation; trauma; body; submission

Since the focus of post - 1990 novels are on identity, the prose centers on the character's, especially the female character's, continuous relationship with her own body. Taking into consideration the preference of female writers to set their novels in communism or in close relation to it, "referring directly and uncensored to the atmosphere of the period." (Farmatu, 2021), in the context of state hegemony, a specific type of body asserts its sovereignty, namely the political body. The individual loses control over their own body, "lends" it to society, and allows themselves to be led by a foreign force to their inner universe. This politicization of the body makes the inner space increasingly difficult to inhabit, the being finding itself thrown into an endless alienation from itself and the world. Therefore, we consider it appropriate to associate the chosen novels for this article with a victim sociology, a term used by Mihai Iovănel, because it is precisely this status that is attributed to the individual, that of a victim of a present over which he has no right to decide except by assuming inevitable risks. Thus, we revolve around the three bodies — the political body, the victim body, the object body — all three representations of the same submission to destiny played out on the political stage. With regard to the last body mentioned, in communist or post-communist society, as captured in women's prose after 1990, we are confronted with a veritable transformation of the body, especially the female body, into an object that is either utilitarian or erotic. Being useful to society — this was the main goal around which every human existence had to be tailored.

Against the backdrop of gradual depersonalization, women in particular find themselves captive to mentalities that sometimes tend to revert to patriarchal thinking. Although they hold positions in various fields of activity, women under the communist regime and in the period immediately following its fall are still under the domination of men, who use their bodies for their own benefit, and struggle with themselves to gain independence, especially emotional independence, and to learn that they are absolutely sufficient. In these situations, we find the character Letiția Branea, from the writings of Gabriela Adamesteanu, or Maia, from the micro-novels of Simona Sora, two different women, separated by a temporal distance that has its say. While the former fails to overcome her own vulnerability, only managing to break away from the image of her lover Sorin Olaru in her old age, the latter, on the other hand, sometimes unconsciously opposes the rules and acts according to the demands of her inner universe. In other words, Maia tries to stop her body from being a mere object and struggles to gain its independence. In Maia's case, we can speak not so much of a defeated body as of a recovered body. Although initially controlled, forced to obey the inhuman rule of not saving lives, the body frees itself, at least apparently, and begins to take justice into its own hands. Similarly, we also encounter a recovered body in the novel Windermere: Dragoste la a doua vedere (Windermere: Love at Second Sight), this time the body overcomes its defeated status by rediscovering love.

On the other hand, male characters such as Matei or Traian Manu are also engaged in a struggle with themselves and the outside world in an attempt to rebuild the destroyed balance. Their bodies are also political bodies, victims of society, driven by the shadows of the past, which prevent them from finding a way out to a present conducive to life. If the first character is confronted with a cruel amnesia, an expression of the definitive loss of individuality, the second sees himself constantly pursued from the shadows. If the first character faces severe amnesia, an expression of the definitive loss of individuality, the second finds himself constantly followed from the shadows, the subject of an investigation initiated by the Security because he left Ceaușescu's Romania at one point.

What is certain is that, regardless of gender, the postmodern body faces heightened vulnerability. Thus, a form of representation specific to the period in question is that of the vulnerable body. Referring to the novels included in this study, many of the body representations have as their starting point exclusively female experiences, as Mihaela Miroiu calls them, intimate, individual experiences associated, on the one hand, with the need to recover and reaffirm overshadowed femininity and, on the other hand, with the attempt to assume one's own sexuality. We associate with this condition, first of all, the experience of menstruation, which, not coincidentally, in the novel FEM, is included in the chapter entitled "First Enlightenment", Magda Cârneci perceiving this experience as the first way of becoming aware of her own corporeality and accepting the condition of being a woman. At the age of thirteen, the narrator-character reveals how her first menstruation gradually affects her aching body: "I suddenly feel a strange heaviness in my womb, as if I had something heavy and dense there, a metal cannonball. A void in my stomach and a kind of cold sweat fill me with panic" (Cârneci, 2014, p. 37). The excruciating pain in her lower abdomen generates fear and panic – "sometimes I'm afraid I'm going to die, other times I'm afraid I'm simply going to lose my my mind" (Cârneci, 2014, p. 37) – and a reaction of inhibition in the girl, who rushes to hide from the eyes of the world somewhere in the basement or in a deserted room. This desire to retreat to a secluded place suggests not only the need to feel pain individually, like an obstacle that she must overcome alone, but also draws attention to the discrimination that women have been subjected to throughout history, with the menstrual cycle being considered a shameful, degrading aspect that had to be treated with real discretion. That is why this "test" is rarely mentioned in Romanian literature prior to the fall of communism, considered either too intimate or a disinhibition in the sense of acknowledging one's own sexuality. However, disinhibition and the affirmation of sexuality were to be avoided at all costs. The feelings of the character in FEM, who withdraws into herself, shuns those around her, and protects her physicality, represent, in fact, the feelings of the universal woman.

Female vulnerability reaches high levels against a backdrop of heightened sensations and states. Pain approaches "like an evil, hostile force," attacking, pushing the being into a "deep cave," "into an unlit underground" inside which it must undergo a "barbaric trial", "something difficult, painful as a crucifixion, like being pierced by arrows." The pain is not only physical, but also psychological, emotional, and spiritual. The "barbaric, merciless carnage" in the girl's mind, which has become a "dark cave," is also manifested externally through the image of skin "bathed in sweat". Physiological vulnerability is associated with existential fatality. The darkness in which the being sinks to the point of annihilation – "I am somewhere deep down, I don't know where I am, I no longer know who I am" – may symbolize the death necessary for subsequent resurrection – "It's as if I died and rose again, as if I fell into a pit and rose again, as if I defeated a wild and immense force". Resurrection must be understood in terms of awareness of one's own womanhood, of corporeality that ceases to be a limiting manifestation of femininity, but a victory after which the self can confess "now I am lighter and cleaner". The weakened body asks itself incessantly "why, for what? Why did I have to suffer so terribly?", but it has a revelation of its own corporeality: "Suddenly I see myself from the outside. [...] I am next to my body, next to myself and slightly above. I watch carefully as he, my tormented adolescent body, slides down the steps [...] and I whisper calmly, determinedly: "Keep your head up [...] Keep it up!" (Cârneci, 2014, p. 39). To be victorious, the body must also know the weakness of its own condition. However, if we take a look at the history of femininity, as well as women's literature, we see that the path to accepting bodily identity is a long and winding one, strewn with real struggles for identity. The vulnerable body must overcome the boundaries of gender fatality, and with the post-December prose writers, its attempts will be understood not as limitations, but as experiences necessary for growth in femininity.

The pregnant body has been perceived in different ways both in society and in literature, pregnancy being considered either a gift or a curse for women who discover another "ability" of their bodies. Included among exclusively female experiences, motherhood was considered, especially during the communist period, to be the only thing capable of giving meaning to female existence. Thinking of the Ceaușescu's regime, this dark period, marked by real pressure on women, represents a starting point for numerous gender studies which focus on sexuality and the reproductive function of women in Ceaușescu's society. We can understand why, during that period, addressing such an intimate, private issue would have exposed female writers to a well-known risk, a risk that female prose writers after 1990 took upon themselves. Some of them freely expose the repressive experiences of the female body as a result of the exercise of communist policy, according to which motherhood had to be "subsumed to the priority of population reproduction" (Teampău, 2010, p. 122).

The refusal of motherhood, a situation we encounter in the novels Provizorat and Fontana di Trevi, in which pregnancy is a burden for Letiția Branea, proof of the act of adultery committed with her lover, Sorin Olaru, leads us to the temporarily pregnant body (Ilie, 2017, p. 226), as Emanuela Ilie calls it in an article, because a disruptive factor appears, with serious consequences for inner life, namely abortion. In the volume Introducere în sociologia corpului. Teme, perspective și experiențe întrupate, Laura Grünberg considers the pro-natalist policies of the Ceaușescu's regime, "a period when abortions were banned, periodic gynecological checkups were mandatory, so that women's bodies were meticulously monitored, regulated, and regimented in order to increase the birth rate" (Grünberg, 2010, p. 37), a unique example of bodily surveillance.

Starting from this point of view, we bring up another form of representation of the body — the body controlled by an external force, by the regime, by society. Due to the impossibility of removing an unwanted biological reality, women endangered their health and subjected their bodies to clandestine abortions, often performed in inhumane conditions, in the absence of the medical and sanitary means necessary for such an intervention. We find a shocking episode of this experience in the novel Fontana di Trevi, the pages of the novel describing in detail Letiția Branea's curettage, as well as the serious consequences of this violent intervention necessary to remove the "error." Brutalized and traumatized, the woman's body becomes a source of profound alienation. The woman ends up feeling like a stranger in her own body and even renouncing her femininity. The traumatic experience of abortion is one of the consequences that led to the association of femininity with weakness. Since pregnancy is perceived as a weakness, we can temporarily classify the pregnant body as vulnerable, placing cruelty, loneliness, injustice, fear, and anxiety in the same semantic field of bodily trauma.

In a completely different light, Magda Cârneci depicts the pregnant body in her novel FEM as inhabited by a "bright and restless bean that wants to come down into the world, to incarnate, to grow" (Cârneci, 2014, p. 89), by a cheerful and bright little girl with intense, deep eyes. Motherhood this time represents a kind of fulfillment of femininity, a force that elevates women to the heavens, to their zenith. The inexplicable feeling merges her being with the entire planet, lifts her above space and time and suspended in an eternal moment, makes her feel radiant, free, and diaphanous. The pregnant body is no longer a weakened body, but a strong one, revived by the seed planted in the woman's womb.

Reading the lines dedicated to this very feminine episode, we feel a sense of obvious otherness. Emanuela Ilie's vision is significant, referring to the period immediately following birth, which we will also draw on, but in the context of pregnancy. The pregnant woman also finds herself faced with two bodies, "two completely new bodies, both immediately recognizable and unidentifiable, completely different and yet similar" (Ilie, 2017, p. 226): her own body, that of the mother's, and the developing body of the child "as the closest human otherness" (Ilie, 2017, p. 226). The woman feels another form of existence inside her. In the "basket of bones and flesh, in the tiny sarcophagus behind the sternum" (Cârneci, 2014, p. 189), another being takes shape, her double, reminding her of her power to be a woman. Succeeding in detaching herself from a past overshadowed by the domination of the communist regime, Magda Cârneci gives her writings a different tone.

Women represent a miracle of the universe, just as the gift of reproduction, with which they have been endowed, is a miracle of corporeality itself.

Returning to the controlled body, an essential element of this restrictive condition is the fear and feeling of being constantly followed and watched. This is the situation of those with tarnished records who bear political guilt, forced to live their lives under the watchful and suspicious gaze of the Security. Being a sympathizer of the Iron Guard represented a real risk during the communist period that could not be overlooked under any circumstances. It was enough for a relative or acquaintance to be suspected of having ties to the political opponent for everyone around them to fall prey to constant surveillance. For example, Letiția Branea and Sorin Olaru share the suspicion that hangs over them because of their family history, which continues to haunt them every moment of the present. The two are forced to live a past that is foreign to them. As Georgeta Moarcăs notes, Letiția "is truly haunted by her political file and, as a young student, tries to survive in the treacherous waters of the liberalization of the 1960s. She suffers from widespread guilt and experiences a real sense of panic when she is summoned to the personnel office of the Faculty of Letters to provide new details about her family or when she is the confused witness of a political meeting concerning the expulsion of a student from the Party." (Moarcăs, 2020). A victim of a past that does not belong to her, the female character seems to explore an unknown realm, feeling lost among details and unclear information. Therefore, for her, the past is an enigma, a trap into which she continues to fall, confessing that "it is not the future that brings us he most surprises, but the past that we never cease to reread throughout our lives." (Adamesteanu, 2011, p. 230). The character is robbed of her sense of fulfilment, and the trauma remains latent in the past, sometimes detached from a few photographs: "I only have a few photographs of the three Branea brothers, my father and uncles whose fortunes we want to recover: the rest were taken by the secret police during searches, or burned by my uncle in the laundry boiler in the yard, along with magazines and books that were 'dangerous' at the time. I sometimes look at them as if they were two-dimensional characters in a bad novel. Cheerful, confident in the future, with glasses in their hands and double-breasted suits, they look more mature than their age at the time; anyway, today I could be their aunt." (Adamesteanu, 2018, p. 188).

While the female character would like to leave politics behind altogether, the male character, Sorin Olaru, becomes obsessed with the Ceaușescu regime and brings his fixed ideas even into his relationship. He comes under the scrutiny of Security as a possible descendant of the legionnaire Vasi Stamatiu and, living with the obsession of his father's tainted biography, Virgil Olaru, Sorin goes down a path of self-destruction, sinking into the strings pulled by the political world. Despite his tarnished file, the young intern advances with dexterity and becomes a "rising star in the nomenclature, a juggler of multiple pieces of information, a conjurer of official ideology, constantly changing his line" (Cristea-Enache, 2010).

Unlike Sorin Olaru, the character in the novel Întâlnirea (The Encounter), Traian Manu is fearful of every clash with society's politics. After four decades in exile, the character is invited to give a lecture in Bucharest. Having fled dictatorial Romania and, as a result, becoming a traitor to his country, Traian Manu quickly comes under surveillance by The Security, which draws up a "plan of action" for "the informative surveillance of the defector Traian Manu" (Adamesteanu, 2003, p. 88). Multiple intelligence reports are included in the pages of the novel, each with the same subject and purpose — to closely monitor Traian Manu's every move. An example from a note recorded as File No. 14-15: "Professor MANU TRAIAN, I met him through a recommendation [...]. He left the country in 1941 with a Romanian passport to study. [...] In 1947, he was recalled to the country. He refused, so his Romanian citizenship was revoked, which upset him greatly. He is involved in right-wing politics because he is on the committee of Romanian refugees in Rome, which he heads. [...] I also learned that he is very well connected and has great influence with the Italian Ministry" (Adamesteanu, 2003, p. 92-93). Signed "Source ENE", the informative note will be added, like the others, to the file intended to incriminate the man who left Romania not out of a desire to betray his homeland, but with the hope of a better start. In this regard, in a conversation with his wife, Christa, Traian Manu confesses: "I can thank God that I made a life and a career here, whereas if I had stayed there, I would have died on the front lines or rotted in prison..." (Adamesteanu, 2003, p. 85). Well-known or lesser-known individuals become informants, so that the character ends up facing agonizing paranoia, believing that everyone he meets could be a secret police agent. This "enemy of the regime" feels his body controlled by a force superior to him.

There are other examples in novels of controlled bodies that are nothing more than mere puppets of a politicized society. In such a setting, where everything is predetermined and controlled, the characters are robbed of the meaning of true freedom. The pressures exerted on the body are reflected in the inability of the being to achieve fulfillment of any kind. Even in the midst of the greatest happiness, the image shatters, giving way to illusion.

REWRITING BIAFRA: POSTCOLONIAL MEMORY AND DECOLONIAL NARRATIVES IN HALF OF A YELLOW SUN

Teodora Voinescu
PhD, The National College of Computer Sciences „Grigore Moisil", Brașov

Abstract: Chimamanda Ngozi Adichie's Half of a Yellow Sun (2006) offers a compelling reframing of the Biafran War (1967–1970), a conflict long muted, simplified, or distorted within Eurocentric historiography. Adichie recenters Nigerian lived experience, displacing the Western gaze that has traditionally mediated representations of Africa's past. Through the intersecting perspectives of Ugwu, the village boy-turned-houseboy; Olanna, the cosmopolitan intellectual from a privileged Igbo family; and Richard, the British expatriate intricately entangled in the war, the novel reconstructs history not as a linear sequence of military events but as an intimate tapestry of trauma, endurance, and everyday resilience. This paper argues that Half of a Yellow Sun epitomizes the postcolonial imperative to decolonize knowledge production. By foregrounding indigenous epistemologies, affective truths, and the multiplicity of local voices, Adichie challenges dominant narratives that reductively frame African conflicts in terms of tribalism or humanitarian spectacle. Instead, she reveals the deeper structural forces at play—colonial partition, Cold War geopolitics, and the global media's selective ethics of visibility. The novel thus functions as a counter-archive of suppressed memories, demonstrating how literature can both supplement and subvert official historiographies. Furthermore, Adichie reclaims narrative sovereignty by embedding Igbo cultural practices, oral traditions, and the symbolic motif of the "half of a yellow sun"—a figure of unrealized nationhood and collective yearning—into the novel's fabric. In doing so, she not only memorializes Biafra but also reimagines Africa's place within global modernity, presenting a space where indigenous knowledge systems and contemporary political aspirations coexist and collaborate. Through a reading grounded in postcolonial and decolonial theory, this paper illustrates how Half of a Yellow Sun destabilizes hegemonic discourses, resists epistemic violence, and proposes alternative futures rooted in local histories yet open to transnational solidarities.

Keywords: memory; trauma; war; violence; postcolonianism.

Chimamanda Ngozi Adichie's Half of a Yellow Sun (2006) is widely recognized as one of the most influential postcolonial novels of the 21st century. Set during the Biafran War (1967–1970), the narrative explores the human and political consequences of Nigeria's struggle for independence and the subsequent civil war that followed. While it is often read as a war novel or a national allegory, Adichie's text is also a powerful lens through which we can analyze colonialism as an enduring structure and race as a social and cultural construct that continues to shape identity, knowledge, and power in post-independence Nigeria.

Unlike earlier nationalist narratives that often idealize the nation-state, Adichie's work exposes the deep fractures inherited from colonial rule, fractures that continue to determine how people see themselves and each other. She depicts a Nigeria that, despite having achieved political independence in 1960, remains bound by the linguistic, racial, and cultural hierarchies established during the colonial era. The novel explores how colonialism is not merely a historical episode but a living structure, to use Aníbal Quijano's concept of the "coloniality of power." This idea is visible in every aspect of the novel: from personal relationships and education to media narratives and international diplomacy.

The British colonial administration ruled Nigeria through indirect governance, ethnic division, and the imposition of Western education and language. This created not only economic dependency but also cultural and psychological hierarchies. Adichie situates her novel in this unstable terrain. The characters live in an independent Nigeria, yet their world is still shaped by colonial boundaries and values. The very conflict at the heart of the novel — the Biafran War — stems from ethnic and regional divisions deepened by the colonial administration.

The arbitrary borders drawn by the British grouped together more than 250 ethnic groups with little regard for cultural, linguistic, or historical differences. This artificial unity, imposed from outside, became unsustainable when the postcolonial state faced internal tensions. Adichie portrays this legacy through the personal stories of her characters, who are Igbo, Hausa, and Yoruba, and whose lives are marked by mistrust and misunderstanding. The creation of the Biafran Republic, symbolized by the half of a yellow sun on its flag, was an attempt to reclaim identity and self-determination outside the inherited colonial state. Yet, as Adichie suggests, this effort was tragically constrained by the colonial legacy itself.

One of the most striking aspects of Adichie's critique of colonialism is the figure of Richard Churchill, a British writer and journalist who lives in Nigeria and becomes involved in the Biafran cause. Richard is simultaneously sympathetic and complicit. He falls in love with Kainene, an Igbo woman, and genuinely wishes to support Biafra's independence. Yet he cannot escape the privilege of his whiteness. In the novel, he receives more credibility from Western journalists and governments than Biafran intellectuals like Odenigbo, despite having less knowledge of the region.

This dynamic mirrors Edward Said's Orientalism (1978), where the West constructs itself as the knower and the non-West as the known. Richard becomes a mediator between Biafra and the West, not because he is the most qualified, but because his racial identity grants him authority. His presence reproduces the colonial relationship in which Africans are spoken for rather than speaking for themselves. Even when he tries to help, Richard unintentionally reinforces this hierarchy.

Olanna, one of the central characters, is a Western-educated Igbo woman from a wealthy family. Her character embodies the ambivalence of postcolonial subjectivity. On the one hand, she benefits from the cultural capital associated with colonial education and speaks English fluently, which elevates her social position. On the other hand, she experiences racism and marginalization both at home and abroad.

Her beauty is often described in Eurocentric terms, and she is aware that her light skin color influences how others perceive her. This reflects the internalization of colonial hierarchies, where proximity to whiteness is valued and rewarded. Even within Nigerian society, race and colorism play subtle roles in determining class, opportunity, and desirability.

Language is one of the most powerful tools of colonialism. The British imposed English as the language of administration, education, and international communication, marginalizing indigenous languages like Igbo, Yoruba, and Hausa. In Half of a Yellow Sun, English functions as both a unifying and alienating force. Characters like Olanna and Odenigbo use English to access political and academic spaces, but the dominance of English also distances them from their cultural roots.

Moreover, international media coverage of the Biafran war was entirely in English and shaped by Western perspectives, not local voices. This further entrenched the imbalance of power between Nigeria and the West.

Another key aspect of the novel is its representation of the West's humanitarian gaze during the Biafran War. Western journalists, diplomats, and NGOs viewed Biafra through a lens shaped by racialized assumptions: Africans were portrayed as victims of their own tribalism, incapable of governing themselves. This narrative ignored the colonial roots of the conflict and instead reproduced stereotypes of African primitiveness and chaos.

Colonialism in Nigeria also created divisions not only between the colonizer and the colonized but within Nigerian society itself. The British strengthened ethnic divisions to maintain control. After independence, these divisions deepened, leading to coups, counter-coups, and ultimately civil war. Adichie illustrates this through her characters: Odenigbo, Ugwu, Olanna, and Kainene all experience how ethnicity is politicized in the postcolonial state.

Adichie also examines how colonialism intersects with gender. Women like Olanna and Kainene navigate not only racial and colonial hierarchies but also patriarchal ones. Kainene, a successful businesswoman, often confronts Western businessmen who patronize her because she is both Black and a woman. Olanna's relationship with Richard is also shaped by gendered and racial expectations: she is simultaneously exoticized and marginalized.

The Biafran flag, with its emblem of half of a yellow sun, symbolizes the hope for a new beginning — a nation free from colonial domination. The sun suggests light, renewal, and rebirth. Yet, the novel ends not with triumphant independence but with loss, displacement, and trauma. Adichie's message is clear: the struggle against colonialism does not end with the lowering of a flag. The structures of colonialism persist in the racial, linguistic, and political hierarchies that shape everyday life.

Nevertheless, the novel is not devoid of hope. Through Ugwu, the houseboy who becomes a soldier and eventually the author of the book within the book (The World Was Silent When We Died), Adichie shows the power of reclaiming narrative agency. Ugwu represents a new generation that can tell its own story, unfiltered by colonial power. His voice counters Richard's, symbolizing decolonization through storytelling.

Half of a Yellow Sun is not simply a historical account of the Biafran War; it is a postcolonial critique of how colonialism and race continue to shape the world long after formal independence. Through its characters, plot, and narrative structure, the novel reveals that colonialism is not a closed chapter but an ongoing process. The racialized distribution of power, the dominance of English, the privileging of white voices, and the ethnic fragmentation of Nigeria all testify to the persistence of colonial structures.

Another crucial dimension through which Half of a Yellow Sun deepens its postcolonial intervention is the novel's exploration of memory as a contested and political space. The struggle over who has the right to record Biafra's history mirrors the broader struggle over who has the authority to define Africa's past. Memory in the novel is not static; it is fragile, often fragmented, and always vulnerable to distortion or erasure. Adichie foregrounds this dynamic through the metafictional device of Ugwu's manuscript, The World Was Silent When We Died. His act of writing becomes an act of reclamation—a refusal to allow Biafra to be remembered solely through Western humanitarian narratives or official state histories. Ugwu's project asserts the importance of subaltern testimony and local perspectives in reconstructing the past.

The novel also exposes the politics of forgetting. Post-war Nigeria hastened to reintegrate Biafrans under the slogan 'No victor, no vanquished,' yet the trauma endured by survivors was never fully acknowledged. Adichie's text thus challenges the national amnesia that followed the conflict, insisting that the wounds of war continue to shape contemporary Nigerian identity. In this sense, the novel participates in what Paul Ricoeur terms the 'ethics of memory'—the moral responsibility to remember suffering in a way that resists both mythologization and erasure. By insisting on the specificity of Biafran suffering, Adichie resists homogenizing narratives that subsume local histories under a single pan-African or national frame.

Additionally, Adichie interrogates the role of global capitalism and Cold War politics in shaping the trajectory of the Biafran conflict. The war cannot be understood purely in local terms; it was entangled with international interests, including access to oil, geopolitical alliances, and the rivalry between global powers. Western media selectively amplified certain images—particularly those of starving children—to evoke humanitarian sympathy, while at the same time obscuring the political and economic structures that contributed to the crisis. In this regard, the novel anticipates contemporary debates about the 'NGO-industrial complex' and the depoliticization of global suffering, echoing critiques articulated by scholars like Teju Cole and Didier Fassin. Adichie invites readers to question not only how tragedies are represented, but also why certain narratives gain traction while others remain marginal.

Furthermore, the novel complicates binary distinctions between perpetrator and victim by demonstrating how war reshapes moral boundaries. Ugwu's forced conscription and his participation in violence—including the harrowing scene of sexual assault—highlight the ethical ambiguity that emerges during conflict. Rather than depicting him as irredeemable or heroic, Adichie presents Ugwu as a complex figure shaped by circumstances beyond his control. This narrative choice aligns with Frantz Fanon's argument that colonial violence produces a cycle of brutality that permeates both personal and collective life. By portraying Ugwu's struggle for redemption, the novel gestures toward a decolonial ethics that acknowledges structural violence while still affirming individual responsibility and the possibility of moral repair.

Finally, iHalf of a Yellow Sun encourages readers to reconsider the relationship between literature and history. Adichie's novel demonstrates that fiction can serve as a form of historical intervention, capable of revealing truths that official archives overlook or suppress. While historians rely on documents, records, and institutional memory, literature can access emotional, psychological, and experiential dimensions of the past that are otherwise unrecorded. In this sense, the novel aligns with the work of postcolonial historians like Dipesh Chakrabarty, who advocate for 'provincializing Europe' by decentering Western epistemologies and embracing alternative modes of knowledge production. Through its polyphonic narrative and its emphasis on marginalized voices, Half of a Yellow Sun illustrates how storytelling becomes a decolonial act—one that resists hegemonic forms of history and opens space for plural and intersectional understandings of the past.

Adichie joins a tradition of postcolonial thinkers and writers who challenge Western dominance over knowledge and narrative. Her novel can be read alongside the theoretical work of Edward Said, Frantz Fanon, Gayatri Spivak, and Achille Mbembe. It invites readers to rethink not only the past but also the present — to recognize how race and colonialism remain entangled with identity, power, and storytelling.

THE BALTIC SEA AS A MOTIF IN THE WORKS OF TARJEI VESAAS, TOMAS TRANSTRÖMER, AND JAAN KAPLINSKI*

Abstract: The Baltic Sea has a significant presence in the literary traditions of the Nordic and Baltic regions, serving as a symbol of connection, separation, and existential reflection. This paper examines how three prominent writers—Tomas Tranströmer from Sweden, Tarjei Vesaas from Norway, and Jaan Kaplinski from Estonia—incorporate the Baltic Sea into their works. Tranströmer's poetry, particularly his collection Baltics (1974), evokes maritime landscapes and explores themes of solitude, transcendence, and the passage of time. He connected human memory with the sea's continuous movements, suggesting a contrast between fleeting human existence and the permanence of nature. Vesaas employs water imagery in a more intimate and psychological manner, using it as a central motif for the fragility of human relationships in his novel, The Ice Palace (1963). Kaplinski, on the other hand, engages with the Baltic Sea as a space for cultural and philosophical reflection, linking it to Estonia's historical and linguistic identities. His works, such as the poem Sea and silence (1979) or the novel The same river (2007), often reflect Estonia's liminal position between East and West, using the sea as a metaphor for linguistic and historical crossings. Through their distinct approaches, these three writers reveal how the Baltic Sea serves as a multifaceted literary motif that reflects the evolving identities of the Baltic and Nordic regions.

Introduction

The Baltic Sea has always occupied a paradoxical place in European consciousness — simultaneously an enclosed inland sea and a vast, unpredictable expanse, it links and divides, nurtures and threatens, defines and erodes boundaries.[1] Its waters have borne the burdens of history: Viking raids, Hanseatic trade, imperial conflicts, Cold War divisions.[2] Yet in the imaginations of Nordic and Baltic writers, the Baltic Sea also emerges as a profoundly personal symbol: a mirror of memory, identity, and existential reflection.[3] This paper focuses on the ways in which three twentieth-century authors - Tarjei Vesaas (Norway), Tomas Tranströmer (Sweden), and Jaan Kaplinski (Estonia) - deploy the Baltic Sea as a central literary motif.[4] Each author, shaped by distinct historical contexts and literary traditions, brings a unique sensibility to the portrayal of the sea. Yet their works converge around a shared recognition of the sea's metaphoric richness: as threshold and mirror, as archive and continuum, as symbol of both fragility and permanence.[5] Drawing from close readings of selected poems and prose passages, this article explores how Vesaas, Tranströmer, and Kaplinski use the Baltic Sea to probe questions of existential solitude, historical memory, and ecological interdependence.[6] It situates their work within broader cultural and environmental frameworks, illustrating how the sea serves as a vital symbol not only in Nordic and Baltic literature but also in the emerging field of environmental humanities.[7] In an era marked by climate change, political fragmentation, and renewed attention to the interconnectedness of ecosystems, revisiting these literary engagements with the Baltic Sea offers urgent insights.[8] The sea is no longer simply a background against which human dramas unfold; it is itself a central actor, shaping and being shaped by human histories and imaginations.[9] Understanding how Vesaas, Tranströmer, and Kaplinski render the Baltic Sea can thus illuminate broader conversations about the relationship between literature, landscape, and identity.[10]

Historical and Cultural Context of the Baltic Sea

The Baltic Sea, a semi-enclosed brackish water basin nestled between Scandinavia, the Baltics, and Central Europe, has played a pivotal role in shaping the identities, economies, and histories of the nations that border it. Throughout history, it has acted simultaneously as a connector and divider — a site of trade and warfare, migration and colonization, exploration and exclusion.[11] During the medieval period, the Baltic became the heart of the Hanseatic League, a powerful commercial and defensive confederation of merchant guilds and market towns. Cities like Lübeck, Riga, and Tallinn flourished under Hanseatic influence, and the sea itself facilitated economic prosperity and cultural exchanges.[12] In this era, the Baltic was less a boundary than a shared space, a network that knitted disparate polities together across its waters. However, the sea has also witnessed its share of conflict and division. The Northern Wars of the seventeenth century saw Sweden rise as a dominant regional power, briefly transforming the Baltic into what historian's term dominium maris baltici, or Sweden's "empire of the sea."[13] Later centuries brought imperial rivalries between Sweden, Russia, Prussia, and Denmark, carving up influence over these waters in ever-shifting patterns. In the twentieth century, the Baltic Sea became a militarized and surveilled borderland. The aftermath of World War I and the Treaty of Versailles saw the emergence of newly independent Baltic states (Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania) whose access to the sea symbolized both sovereignty and vulnerability.[14] World War II and the Cold War transformed the sea into a frontline between East and West. The Soviet Union's annexation of the Baltic States and control over much of the eastern Baltic shoreline meant that the sea became a heavily monitored, ideologically charged space. Sea routes were controlled, borders heavily fortified, and naval bases proliferated.[15] At the same time, the Baltic was a lifeline: it enabled escape for refugees fleeing occupation and oppression, it carried information and illicit cultural exchanges, and it sustained limited economic contacts even during ideological divides. In environmental terms, the Baltic Sea is unique. It is one of the world's largest bodies of brackish water, its salinity is a delicate balance between oceanic inflows and freshwater rivers. Its semi-enclosed nature renders it particularly vulnerable to pollution, eutrophication, and ecological imbalance.[16] In recent decades, overfishing, agricultural runoff, and industrial waste have led to vast "dead zones" where oxygen levels are too low to support marine life.[17] These environmental crises have been exacerbated by political inertia and competing national interests.

Thus, any literary invocation of the Baltic Sea — whether in Vesaas, Tranströmer, or Kaplinski — cannot be fully understood without acknowledging this layered historical, political, and ecological backdrop. The sea is not a neutral backdrop; it is a palimpsest of human and natural histories, an archive of both hope and catastrophe.[18]

Moreover, the cultural significance of the Baltic Sea differs across the countries that border it. For Swedes like Tranströmer, it is both a familiar landscape and a portal to the unknown East. For Estonians like Kaplinski, it embodies national trauma, in the form of Soviet occupation memories and the fragility of regained independence, as well as ecological alarm. For Norwegians like Vesaas, the Baltic is less geographically immediate but symbolically potent, echoing themes of isolation, risk, and transcendence that permeate Nordic consciousness.[19]

Tarjei Vesaas and the Sea as Existential Threshold

Tarjei Vesaas (1897–1970), though geographically more connected to inland Norway than to the coastal Baltic shores, nevertheless engages with aquatic and liminal imagery in ways that parallel Baltic Sea symbolism. In his prose, water — rivers, lakes, fjords, and by extension the seas — functions as existential thresholds, points where characters confront inner turbulence, transformation, and mortality.[20]

Vesaas's celebrated novel "The Ice Palace" (1963) offers a striking example: "All is locked in silence. A great breath rises beyond the frozen fjord, like something waiting".[21] This imagery, though ostensibly tied to a fjord, evokes the larger, unfathomable body of the sea. Fjords, after all, are ancient scars of glacial action, extensions of the ocean itself.[22] The "great breath" rising "beyond" suggests a sea-presence lurking just outside the frame, a silent summoning to cross into the unknown.

Moreover, Vesaas's "The Birds" (1957) provides another evocative depiction: "Water black and bottomless under him, sky grey and endless above. Between them, he floated — neither here nor there".[23] Here, water serves as the boundary between life and death, certainty and oblivion — precisely the qualities associated with the sea in broader literary traditions.[24] In a Nordic context, such crossings often carry specific resonances: the passage from the known into the unknown, the living into the dead, the self into otherness.

Another example comes from Vesaas's lesser-known poem "The Road": "You must not fear the road, the cold breath over water".[25] Here, again, coldness, breath, and water are intertwined, all motifs of vulnerability, journeying, and existential testing. The "cold breath over water" could as easily refer to the icy Baltic winds as to a mountain lake. The precise geographical reference is less crucial than the symbolic charge: crossing water, facing elemental exposure, confronting isolation, and moving toward inner or outer transformation. In this sense, although Vesaas's references to the Baltic Sea are implicit rather than explicit, his thematic concerns (water as a liminal space, a site of crisis and potential) resonate powerfully with Baltic Sea literary symbolism.[26] Moreover, understanding the cultural geography of Scandinavia reinforces this linkage. Norway's medieval ties to Denmark and Sweden[27], its long history of maritime engagement, and the shared Nordic imaginary of the sea as a testing ground for the soul[28], all fold Vesaas's aqueous imagery into a broader Baltic context. In environmental terms, Vesaas's depiction of water as simultaneously nurturing and deadly anticipates ecological readings. The frozen landscapes in "The Ice Palace" reflect both existential isolation and environmental fragility, a motif which aligns with contemporary ecological concerns in the Baltic region[29]. Finally, existentialist currents in postwar Scandinavian literature, strongly influenced by broader European trends, find a fitting metaphor in the image of water expanses.

Vesaas's characters, poised on literal and symbolic thresholds, mirror the human condition: afloat between birth and death, certainty and unknowing, self and world.[30]

The Sea as Memory and Metaphor for Tomas Tranströmer

Tomas Tranströmer (1931–2015), the Swedish poet laureate of silence and resonance, engages the Baltic Sea with a subtle yet profound touch. In his oeuvre, the sea does not roar; it murmurs, whispers, recalls. It serves less as an existential abyss and more as a vast, layered archive of memory, of family history, of Sweden's maritime entanglements with the world.

In Baltics (Östersjöar, 1974), one of Tranströmer's most significant works, the Baltic Sea emerges almost as a character in its own right. The long poem weaves together multiple voices of sailors, customs officers, fishermen alongside the poet's own recollections and dreamlike reflections. Here, the Baltic is not merely a body of water but a palimpsest of human endeavor and longing. The faded coastlines represent not just geographical boundaries but the ephemeral nature of human memory and presence. The sea becomes a liminal archive where personal and collective histories are suspended, awaiting rediscovery. Tranströmer's personal connection to the Baltic was intimate: he grew up in Stockholm, a city framed by waterways, and spent summers in the Stockholm archipelago. His grandfather was a ship's captain, a fact Tranströmer often alludes to when discussing his relationship with the sea.[31] Thus, for Tranströmer, the Baltic is simultaneously familial and foreign, a site of personal nostalgia and broader historical consciousness. A crucial feature of Tranströmer's depiction of the sea is its flatness. Unlike the tumultuous Atlantic, the Baltic's calm expanses lend themselves to meditation rather than confrontation. This tranquility fosters introspection. In a diary entry from Memories Look at Me (Minnena ser mig, 1993), he writes: "The water spread like a giant mirror — depth hidden under a thin sheen of light."[32]

Such imagery underlines a quintessential tension: surface simplicity versus hidden depth. The Baltic, appearing serene, hides countless shipwrecks, lost lives, and geopolitical scars beneath its waters. Similarly, the human mind, tranquil on the outside, harbors deep currents of emotion and memory. In his poem Tracks (Spår, 1962), we encounter: "Two truths approach each other. One comes from within; one comes from without — and where they meet, we have the chance to catch a glimpse of ourselves."[33]

While not explicitly mentioning the sea, the convergence of internal and external truths mirrors the way Tranströmer uses the Baltic in Baltics: a meeting place where inner life and outer world overlap. The sea thus becomes a metaphorical threshold — not between landmasses but between psychological states. Moreover, Tranströmer's Baltic is politically charged, though in muted tones. Written during the Cold War, Baltics implicitly acknowledge the Baltic Sea as a zone of division between East and West, NATO and Warsaw Pact, democracy and dictatorship.[34] Smugglers and defectors traversed its waters under cover of fog and darkness. In one haunting passage, Tranströmer refers to the invisible presences slipping across the misty expanse: "A silence drifts from the patrol boats." [35]The silence is loaded, oppressive. The Baltic here is not merely a tranquil natural feature but a stage upon which human fears and ambitions play out.

In terms of environmental humanities, Tranströmer's depiction of the Baltic anticipates contemporary concerns about ecological degradation. The "yellowed charts" and "faded coastlines" evoke not only historical loss but environmental entropy as a slow fading of ecosystems under anthropogenic pressures.[36] The Baltic's fragility, its semi-enclosed nature prone to eutrophication and dead zones, echoes the poet's subdued, melancholic tone. Finally, stylistically, Tranströmer's poetry resonates with the very qualities of the sea he describes minimalism, depth beneath simplicity, slow unfolding rather than dramatic eruption. His sparse, crystalline diction mirrors the clear but unfathomable waters of the Baltic.[37]

Thus, in Tranströmer's work, the Baltic Sea functions on multiple levels: as memory reservoir - holding traces of personal and national pasts, as psychological mirror - reflecting inner landscapes, as political frontier - embodying division and longing, as ecological warning - silently testifying to human fragility. In doing so, he enlarges the symbolic capacity of the Baltic Sea, making it both personal and planetary, intimate and infinite.

The Sea as Ecological and Spiritual Continuum in the poetry of Jaan Kaplinski

Jaan Kaplinski (1941–2021), Estonian poet, essayist, and philosopher, offers a vision of the Baltic Sea that differs markedly from both Vesaas's existential drama and Tranströmer's memory-laden meditation. For Kaplinski, the sea is less a mirror or boundary and more an integral part of a larger ecological and spiritual continuum. His writings suggest that the sea is not separate from human existence but is entangled with it, both materially and metaphysically.[38]

Kaplinski's upbringing in Tartu, a university town near Estonia's interior, combined with frequent visits to the coast, profoundly shaped his sensibility. In contrast to the nationalist myth-making that characterized much Estonian literature during periods of occupation, Kaplinski emphasized interconnectedness between people, languages, species, and ecosystems. In The Same Sea in Us All (Seesama meri meis kõigis, 1990), Kaplinski explicitly invokes the Baltic Sea as a metaphor for shared human and natural conditions: "The same salt, the same waves, the same currents flow through me."[39] This simple yet profound assertion dissolves the boundary between self and world. The Baltic Sea is not "out there", but within us. The brine of the sea and the salt of human blood are of one substance. This line epitomizes Kaplinski's deep ecological ethos, a perspective that views humans not as masters of nature but as parts of its continuous unfolding.

Kaplinski's ecological vision is notably informed by Eastern philosophy, particularly Taoism and Buddhism, which he studied extensively.[40] These traditions encourage humility before nature, an embrace of impermanence, and a reverence for interconnectedness. As such, when Kaplinski writes of the sea, he often does so in a way that collapses dualities: human/nature, inner/outer, self/other.

In "Evening by the Sea" (Õhtu mere ääres), he describes: "The sand is full of small crab shells. The waves are full of small, whispered truths."[41] There is no sharp narrative here, no climactic event. Instead, the sea's minutiae, like tht crab shells or the whispering waves invite meditative attention. The sea speaks not through thunderous storms but through subtle, persistent presence. This reflects a key Taoist idea: that truth lies in the ordinary, the unforced rhythms of existence. Kaplinski's Baltic Sea is also acutely historical, but again differently than Tranströmer's. In his prose and essays, Kaplinski often reflects on the Baltic as a zone of tragic entanglement: Viking voyages, Teutonic conquests, Swedish and Russian imperial expansions, Soviet occupations. Yet he resists grand historical narratives. Instead, he focuses on the persistent, underlying natural continuity that survives human turmoil.[42] In Man is Fragile (Inimene on habras, 1983), he notes*: "Empires rise and fall, yet the gulls still cry at the shore."*[43] This perspective neither denies history nor surrenders to it. The Baltic Sea, enduring and mutable, becomes a living witness that embodies the resilience of life amidst human destructiveness. In terms of environmental awareness, Kaplinski was ahead of his time. He wrote passionately about ecological degradation, including the pollution of the Baltic Sea, which by the late twentieth century had become one of the most polluted seas in the world. industrial waste, and overfishing have created severe eutrophication problems, leading to large “dead zones” where little life survives. In the essay "The Sea" published in 1989[44], Kaplinski lamented: "The sea that gave birth to our myths and songs is dying, and with it, part of ourselves." [45] This environmental grief is not just political; it is existential. The death of the sea is perceived as a diminishment of human identity, memory and spirit.

Stylistically, Kaplinski’s engagement with the Baltic often eschews grand imagery in favor of minimalist, haiku-like observations. His poems are brief, deceptively simple, yet they carry profound philosophical weight. This stylistic choice mirrors his ecological message: that small things matter, that the world’s beauty and truth reside not in spectacle but in attentive noticing.

Kaplinski invites readers not just to admire the Baltic Sea but to reidentify with it, to recognize that the boundary between land and sea, self and world, is ultimately an illusion. Thus, while Vesaas dramatizes the sea’s existential peril and Tranströmer memorializes its historical depths, Kaplinski offers a vision of the Baltic Sea as our shared elemental home, at once fragile, vast, and sacred.[46]

The Baltic Sea Across Three Literary Voices: a comparative analysis

Although Tarjei Vesaas, Tomas Tranströmer, and Jaan Kaplinski hail from different corners of Northern Europe, their works reveal a remarkable convergence around the motif of the Baltic Sea.[47] Yet, their interpretations of the sea diverge in tone, symbolism, and philosophical outlook, shaped by personal sensibility, historical context, and national tradition.[48]

Across all three writers, several common themes emerge:

- The Sea as a boundary: Whether physical or metaphysical, the Baltic Sea appears as a threshold, a liminal space between life and death (Vesaas)[49], memory and oblivion (Tranströmer)[50], nature and human society (Kaplinski).[51]
- The Sea as memory: In Tranströmer and Kaplinski, especially, the sea serves as an archive, a vessel of historical and personal remembrance.[52]
- Fragility and continuity: The authors are deeply sensitive to the vulnerability of the natural world and the enduring cycles that outlast human strife.[53] Yet, beneath these shared motifs lie crucial differences in emphasis and tone.

Divergent Interpretations

Author	Core Symbolism	Tone and Style	Philosophical Outlook
Tarjei Vesaas	The sea as existential frontier	Lyrical, haunting, minimalistic	Existentialist, human-centered
Tomas Tranströmer	The sea as memory and time's sediment	Reflective, elegiac, precise	Historical-philosophical
Jaan Kaplinski	The sea as ecological unity and spirit	Meditative, ecological, minimalist	Pantheistic, ecological

Tarjei Vesaas focuses on the individual confronting the unknown, often through stark, stripped-down prose where the natural world embodies psychological states.[54] Tomas Tranströmer treats the Baltic as a vessel of cultural and personal memory, layering past and present in resonant, finely wrought imagery[55], while Kaplinski frames the sea as an extension of the self and of the living Earth, inviting ecological empathy and spiritual identification.[56] In this way, the Baltic Sea is not a static symbol across their works; it is polyphonic, refracted through each author's unique lens.[57]

The Baltic Sea in Environmental Humanities

The concept of the environmental humanities emerges from an interdisciplinary approach that seeks to integrate the study of human culture with environmental[58] thought. This perspective draws on literature, history, philosophy, and the natural sciences to explore humanity's relationship with the natural world.[59] The Baltic Sea, with its semi-enclosed geography, fragile ecosystem, and historical importance as a site of human interaction, offers a rich subject for literary and environmental study.[60] Through the works of Vesaas, Tranströmer, and Kaplinski, the Baltic Sea becomes an emblem of ecological boundaries, transitional spaces, and environmental fragility.[61] These writers do not merely use the sea as a metaphor for personal or national struggles; they also subtly or explicitly draw attention to the pressing ecological concerns[62] facing the region.

The Ecological Crisis in the Baltic Sea

All three writers, though coming from different national traditions, were aware of the pressing ecological crisis that is gradually consuming the Baltic Sea.[63] Through their works, they subtly address the growing concerns about pollution, overfishing, and the impacts of climate change on the region.[64] Kaplinski is perhaps the most overt in his ecological consciousness, using the sea as a symbol of vulnerability and calling for a more holistic approach to the environment.[65] Tranströmer captures the long-term consequences of human activity on the sea, focusing on memory and history, while also suggesting the inexorable march of time.[66] Vesaas, though less directly engaged with environmental issues, evokes nature as a powerful and uncontrollable force, hinting at the deep interconnections between the human condition and the natural world.[67] As a result, the Baltic Sea in the works of these authors is not just a cultural or historical boundary but also a living system under threat, symbolizing the deep tensions between human activity and environmental sustainability.[68]

Conclusion

The Baltic Sea, with its rich history and complex symbolism[69], serves as a powerful motif in the works of Tarjei Vesaas, Tomas Tranströmer, and Jaan Kaplinski. Through their respective literary lenses, these authors explore the sea not only as a physical entity but as a symbolic and metaphysical space that reflects themes of existential struggle, memory, identity, and ecological interconnection.[70] For Vesaas, the sea represents a boundary between the known and the unknown, an existential threshold that invites contemplation of the human condition. His works focus on the psychological landscapes that mirror the harsh yet poetic realities of the natural world. The sea, though not always directly present in his narratives, serves as an archetypal force that challenges characters' understanding of life, death, and transformation.

In the poetry of Tranströmer, the Baltic Sea becomes a vessel of memory and metaphysical reflection. Through his meditative exploration of the sea, Tranströmer invites readers to consider the passage of time and the impermanence of human existence. The sea becomes an archive of lost histories, a place where the echoes of past voyages and forgotten stories continue to resonate. His reflections are at once personal and universal, conveying the psychic depth of human engagement with the natural world.[71]

For Jaan Kaplinski, the Baltic Sea is a profoundly ecological and spiritual symbol. His poetry emphasizes the interconnectedness between humans and the natural environment, highlighting the sea as a site of unity and fragility. Kaplinski's reflections call for an ecological consciousness that recognizes the interdependence of all life forms and urges readers to confront the environmental crises that threaten the Baltic region and beyond.

As we face the growing challenges of climate change, pollution, and environmental degradation, the Baltic Sea stands as a symbol of both beauty and fragility. The works of Vesaas, Tranströmer, and Kaplinski offer timeless insights into the ways in which we relate to the natural world, urging us to recognize the ecological interconnections that bind us all. In an age of rising seas and environmental uncertainty, their literary depictions of the Baltic Sea remind us of the need for environmental stewardship and a renewed commitment to preserving the delicate balance of our shared ecosystems.[72]

In conclusion, the Baltic Sea motif provides a rich and multifaceted lens through which to examine the intersection of nature, memory, and identity in Nordic and Baltic literature.[73] It serves as a reminder that literature is not only a tool for exploring human emotion and history but also a means of engaging with the urgent ecological questions that shape our world.

PESSIMISM, SOLITUDE, AND EXISTENTIAL ANGUISH IN THE THEATRE OF THE ABSURD: BECKETT AND IONESCO

Paul-Cristian Albu
PhD, Student, University of Craiova

Abstract: This essay explores the thematic and philosophical dimensions of pessimism, solitude, and existential anguish in the works of Samuel Beckett and Eugène Ionesco, two central figures of the Theatre of the Absurd. At the heart of their dramaturgy lies a profound engagement with the fragility and uncertainty of human existence. Beckett's minimalist landscapes, characterized by silence, repetition, and temporal dislocation, expose the internal voids and ontological solitude of his characters, inviting audiences to confront the limits of understanding and the inevitability of suffering. Ionesco, by contrast, often employs grotesque exaggeration, linguistic breakdowns, and absurd social situations to dramatize the collapse of meaning and the tension between expectation and reality. Through comparative analysis, this essay demonstrates how both playwrights, despite stylistic differences, articulate a shared vision: life as a site of enduring uncertainty, where human beings navigate isolation, absurdity, and the relentless search for purpose. By examining their strategies, the essay illuminates the ways in which the Theatre of the Absurd transforms the stage into a mirror of existential experience, engaging audiences intellectually, emotionally, and psychologically.

Keywords: Theatre of the Absurd; Samuel Beckett; Eugène Ionesco; Existential anguish; Pessimism and solitude

Introduction

Eugène Ionesco and Samuel Beckett are two of the most prominent figures of the Theatre of the Absurd, a movement that sought to capture the meaninglessness and fragility of the human condition. Their plays, though formally different, are united by recurring themes of pessimism, solitude, and existential anguish. Beckett approaches these through minimalism, silence, and waiting, while Ionesco employs grotesque exaggeration, linguistic breakdown, and allegory. Both dramatists force audiences to confront uncomfortable truths: the collapse of meaning, the inevitability of loneliness, and the absurdity of existence.

Eugène Ionesco and Samuel Beckett are two of the most prominent figures of the Theatre of the Absurd, a movement that sought to capture the meaninglessness and fragility of the human condition in the aftermath of World War II. Their plays, though formally different, are united by recurring themes of pessimism, solitude, and existential anguish, which they present through strikingly different artistic strategies. Beckett explores the void of existence with minimalism, silence, and the relentless motif of waiting, while Ionesco relies on grotesque exaggeration, linguistic breakdown, and satirical allegory. Despite their contrasts, both dramatists force audiences to confront uncomfortable truths: the collapse of meaning, the inevitability of loneliness, and the absurdity of existence itself.

This essay will examine how Beckett and Ionesco articulate these three themes—pessimism, solitude, and anguish—by analyzing their dramaturgical techniques and philosophical implications. It will also highlight the similarities and differences in their approaches, showing how both playwrights, in their own ways, transform despair into a powerful form of artistic expression.

Eugène Ionesco and Samuel Beckett stand as towering figures in the Theatre of the Absurd, a mid-twentieth-century movement that sought to depict the fragility, uncertainty, and inherent meaninglessness of human existence. At a time when the world was reeling from the trauma of war, political upheaval, and social transformation, both dramatists confronted audiences with the unsettling reality that life does not always follow the rational patterns or moral frameworks to which humans are accustomed. Their works reject conventional narrative structures, linear plots, and psychological realism, instead emphasizing repetition, fragmentation, silence, and surreal or grotesque imagery to expose the underlying absurdity of the human condition.

Despite differences in style and technique, Beckett and Ionesco share profound thematic concerns: the pervasive sense of pessimism, the experience of solitude, and the existential anguish that defines human consciousness. Beckett's approach is characterized by minimalism, where sparse settings, stripped dialogue, and long silences invite contemplation of the void and the inexorable passage of time. Ionesco, on the other hand, often employs exaggerated scenarios, grotesque imagery, and the breakdown of language to dramatize the instability and incomprehensibility of the social world. In both cases, the theatre becomes a space not simply for entertainment, but for reflection—where audiences are compelled to confront their own vulnerability, the futility of expectation, and the tensions between hope and despair.

This essay aims to explore the ways in which Beckett and Ionesco articulate these themes, examining the philosophical and dramatic mechanisms through which pessimism, solitude, and existential anxiety are rendered on stage. By analyzing their respective techniques and aesthetic strategies, we can better understand how the Theatre of the Absurd illuminates the human condition, offering not only a critique of conventional notions of meaning but also an enduring insight into the resilience, fragility, and complexity of human life.

I. Solitude

A. Beckett's solitude as ontological condition

For Samuel Beckett, solitude is not just a matter of being socially isolated; it is a condition woven into the very structure of existence. His characters embody a loneliness that arises not from circumstance but from the irreducible gap between self and self, self and other, self and time.

In Krapp's Last Tape (1958), the protagonist listens to recordings of his younger self, expecting perhaps nostalgia or comfort. What he finds instead is estrangement: the voice he hears belongs to someone he no longer recognizes. At one point, the older Krapp exclaims, "Perhaps my best years are gone … but I wouldn't want them back. Not with the fire in me now. No, I wouldn't want them back." (Beckett, 1958: 22). The paradox is cruel—he insists he does not long for the past, yet his compulsive listening shows otherwise. Solitude here is not only spatial but temporal: the impossibility of reconciling who he was, who he is, and who he might have been. As Ruby Cohn observes, "Krapp's isolation is not only spatial but temporal: he is cut off from others, but even more profoundly, he is cut off from himself" (Cohn, 1973: 146).

This ontological solitude is dramatized again in Happy Days (1961), where Winnie, buried progressively deeper in earth, continues to repeat her insistence on happiness: "This will have been another happy day!" (Beckett, 1961: 45). Her cheer is less conviction than ritual, a fragile shield against despair. Her husband Willie is present, yet nearly mute; his rare interjections do little to relieve her existential isolation. Winnie's words, directed into emptiness, echo back as reminders of the silence she is desperately trying to fill.

Beckett suggests, in these plays, that solitude is inescapable—not simply the result of physical abandonment, but a fundamental aspect of human consciousness. Even when another body is near, communication fails to dissolve the abyss. The pauses, silences, and long stretches of time in his dramaturgy amplify this truth: that existence itself entails a radical aloneness.

And yet, paradoxically, audiences find themselves reflected in these figures. Krapp, hunched over his tapes, and Winnie, trapped in her mound, are mirrors of our own fragility—our longing for connection, our fear of silence, our uneasy reconciliation with time and memory. In turning solitude into theatre, Beckett universalizes it: what we watch on stage is not merely their loneliness, but ours.

B. Ionesco's solitude as social absurdity

If Beckett's solitude is metaphysical, Eugène Ionesco's is primarily social. His characters are not merely alone in time or memory; they are surrounded by others yet remain profoundly incapable of true communication. Solitude in Ionesco emerges from the breakdown of language, from the grotesque sterility of human relationships, and from the absurd rituals that mask emptiness.

In The Chairs (1952), the Old Man and the Old Woman invite an invisible audience to hear a message that will justify their lives. The stage slowly fills with empty chairs—phantoms of society—but no one actually comes. The couple's desperate attempt at communication collapses into tragicomic farce. The Old Man cries, "It's not my fault if no one understands me!" (Ionesco, 1952: 62). His wife echoes his longing for recognition, but the orator they finally introduce is deaf-mute, incapable of speech. The grotesque irony is devastating even at the height of human presence, solitude reigns. Critics have rightly observed that "the stage fills with chairs, but empties of meaning" (Esslin, 1961: 134).

Similarly, in The Bald Soprano (1950), language itself breaks down into mechanical repetition: "It's raining. It's raining. It's raining. It's raining." (Ionesco, 1950: 39). Conversation turns into a parody of communication, exposing the solitude that lurks beneath the surface of bourgeois politeness. The Smiths and Martins are not isolated in the literal sense—they are seated together in a living room—but their inability to exchange genuine meaning renders them strangers to one another. As Martin Esslin puts it, "The characters speak in order not to communicate" (Esslin, 1961: 145). Their solitude is masked by chatter, a noise that intensifies absence rather than bridging it.

Where Beckett's solitude is heavy with silence, Ionesco's is crowded with words. His plays swarm with speech, chairs, people—or at least their phantoms—yet all this proliferation only deepens the void. Solitude here is not ontological but social: it is the absurdity of living among others without ever truly encountering them. As Jacques Guicharnaud remarks, "Ionesco shows us a solitude which is communal, where everyone is equally cut off from everyone else" (Guicharnaud, 1965: 89).

And yet, this solitude is not entirely bleak. In Ionesco's grotesque humor there lies a certain vitality: laughter itself becomes a way to confront isolation. The absurdity of empty chairs and nonsensical dialogue is not only tragic but also comic, exposing the ridiculousness of human pretensions. Unlike Beckett's stark minimalism, Ionesco's theatrical excess makes solitude theatrical, exaggerated, and disturbingly funny. His characters remind us that we are not only ontologically alone, but also socially estranged—even in a crowded room.

II. Pessimism

A. Beckett's pessimism: the weight of existence

Samuel Beckett's pessimism is rooted in an unrelenting confrontation with the futility of human life. His characters often hover between endurance and despair, continuing to exist even when meaning has collapsed. In Waiting for Godot (1953), Estragon summarizes this bleak outlook in one of the play's most devastatingly simple lines: "Nothing to be done." (Beckett, 1953: 7). This phrase, repeated throughout the play, encapsulates Beckett's philosophy: existence is a waiting room without resolution, where action is stripped of significance.

Similarly, in Endgame (1957), Hamm bluntly declares: "You're on earth, there's no cure for that." (Beckett, 1957: 101). Here pessimism takes the form of inescapability—existence itself is a wound without remedy. The play's closed, suffocating setting (a bare room with two ashbins) mirrors the characters' entrapment in a world where neither escape nor redemption is possible. Critics like Ruby Cohn have noted that Beckett's pessimism "is not a cry for annihilation, but a stripping away of all illusions until only the bare condition of being remains" (Cohn, 1973: 145).

This outlook is not sentimental despair, but a stark, almost clinical acknowledgment of life's limits. Beckett's pessimism emerges from silence, from repetitive cycles, from the erosion of language. His characters continue to speak, to wait, to endure, but always in the shadow of nothingness.

Samuel Beckett's pessimism is not merely a literary tone or dramatic device; it is a philosophical posture grounded in a profound confrontation with the futility of human life. His characters inhabit a universe where meaning has collapsed, yet they persist, caught in cycles of endurance and despair. In Waiting for Godot (1953), Estragon's bleak declaration, "Nothing to be done" (Beckett, 1953: 7), repeated like a mantra, epitomizes the essence of Beckettian pessimism. Here, the futility of action is palpable: human effort seems incapable of producing meaningful results, and existence itself is reduced to a suspended waiting, a liminal state where resolution is perpetually deferred.

The setting and structure of Waiting for Godot reinforce this existential bleakness. The barren tree, the empty road, and the endless repetitions of dialogue create a liminal world stripped of temporal and spatial anchors. Beckett's pessimism is not merely narrative; it is embedded in the architecture of the play itself. As Ruby Cohn observes, Beckett's pessimism "is not a cry for annihilation, but a stripping away of all illusions until only the bare condition of being remains" (Cohn, 1973: 145). This "bare condition" is existential, a confrontation with life unadorned by comforting myths or teleology.

In Endgame (1957), this pessimistic vision is intensified through both dialogue and setting. Hamm's stark observation, "You're on earth, there's no cure for that" (Beckett, 1957: 101), conveys a world where suffering is intrinsic to existence and inescapable. The play's closed, claustrophobic environment—an empty room with two ashbins—mirrors the characters' confinement not only in space but also in time and identity. Here, pessimism manifests as a recognition that human life is structurally trapped: one cannot escape the limitations imposed by mortality, memory, or social dependency. Beckett's characters inhabit the tension between their desire for action and the impossibility of its meaningful realization, highlighting the ontological weight of existence itself.

Beckett's pessimism also arises from the erosion of language and communication. Dialogue, often circular or repetitive, emphasizes the futility of expression in a universe where words fail to secure understanding or connection. Vladimir and Estragon in Waiting for Godot repeatedly miscommunicate, and Hamm and Clov in Endgame oscillate between commands, complaints, and silences. Language, in Beckett's world, is fragile and unstable, a constant reminder of the human inability to fully articulate or comprehend reality.

Yet, this pessimism is profoundly human. It is not a resignation to despair alone but a depiction of endurance in the face of absurdity. As critic Ruby Cohn notes, Beckett's characters "speak, wait, and persist not despite the void, but with it, allowing the audience to confront the naked reality of existence" (Cohn, 1973: 146). The repetition, the silences, and the minimalism serve to focus attention on the existential condition itself, compelling spectators to reflect on their own temporality, isolation, and mortality. Beckett's pessimism is thus inseparable from his dramatic form: it is enacted in the pauses, the minimal stage design, and the linguistic loops, all of which make the audience acutely aware of the fragility and contingency of human life.

In sum, Beckett's pessimism is not mere bleakness or despair; it is a carefully constructed lens through which the theater exposes the human condition in its starkest form. Through minimalism, cyclical dialogue, and unflinching attention to the void, Beckett portrays life as endurance in a world devoid of inherent meaning. The weight of existence is neither dramatized nor sentimentalized; it is observed, experienced, and made tangible through the suffering, speech, and silences of his characters.

B. Ionesco's pessimism: the grotesque face of modernity

Where Beckett's pessimism is austere and minimal, Eugène Ionesco's is loud, grotesque, and exaggerated. His characters are not trapped by silence but by a grotesque avalanche of words, rituals, and collective absurdity.

In Rhinocéros (1959), the townspeople transform one by one into rhinoceroses, leaving the protagonist Bérenger as the last human being. The play dramatizes the terrifying ease with which individuals surrender to conformity, ideology, or herd mentality. Bérenger laments: "I will not capitulate!" (Ionesco, 1959: 112). Yet his heroic defiance is tinged with despair, he remains utterly alone, the last survivor of humanity in a dehumanized world. The pessimism here stems not from metaphysical futility but from the collapse of individual freedom in the face of mass conformity.

In The Bald Soprano (1950), pessimism is of a different kind: the futility of communication itself. Conversations between the Smiths and Martins descend into nonsense, clichés, and repetitions. At one point, the dialogue degenerates into a shouting match of meaningless syllables: "It's not that way, it's over there! – It's not here, it's over there!" (Ionesco, 1950: 52). The breakdown of language reveals the breakdown of human connection, suggesting that society is a theatre of empty rituals, where words no longer guarantee understanding.

As Rosette Lamont remarks, "Ionesco's pessimism lies in his exposure of the void beneath human discourse and social order" (Lamont, 1973: 92). The laughter his plays provoke is nervous, born of recognizing that the grotesque is our own reality exaggerated to the point of absurdity.

Eugène Ionesco's pessimism manifests differently from Beckett's restrained minimalism; it is flamboyant, grotesque, and often comically exaggerated, yet it conveys an equally profound sense of the futility of human existence. In The Bald Soprano (1950), the characters engage in trivial, nonsensical conversations, repeating banal phrases that highlight the collapse of meaningful communication. As the fire chief remarks, "It's very funny. But it's tragic too, isn't it?" (Ionesco, 1950: 28). Here, humor and despair are inseparable: laughter emerges precisely from the recognition that language—traditionally a bridge between individuals—is absurdly inadequate, leaving humans trapped in isolation despite their words.

Ionesco often presents a world where social conventions, logic, and language itself break down, revealing the fragility and absurdity of human attempts to impose order. In Rhinoceros (1959), the epidemic transformation of townspeople into rhinoceroses symbolizes the futility of resistance against the absurdity and the inevitability of conformism. Berenger's observation, "One by one, they are turning into rhinoceroses … and I am alone" (Ionesco, 1959: 47), captures the duality of pessimism and solitude: the collapse of societal meaning leaves the individual confronting existential emptiness. Pessimism here is social and ontological; it is the recognition that not only is life devoid of inherent meaning, but also that human connections and structures are fragile, arbitrary, and prone to disintegration.

Ionesco's pessimism is often heightened by grotesque exaggeration and absurdity, turning ordinary situations into nightmarish or surreal tableaux. In The Chairs (1952), the elderly couple prepares for a series of guests who never arrive. As the Old Man exclaims, "We are abandoned … abandoned and waiting for nothing" (Ionesco, 1952: 19), the audience confronts the futility of their labor and anticipation. The play's humor amplifies its tragic vision: the meticulous staging, the empty chairs, and the repetition of gestures emphasize the emptiness of existence and the impossibility of meaningful human action. This pessimism, while expressed with theatrical flamboyance, echoes Beckett's concern with the emptiness at the heart of human life, albeit through a lens of exaggerated absurdity rather than minimalist precision.

Critics such as Martin Esslin have observed that Ionesco's pessimism "is not a lamentation but a comic exposure of human fragility; the more ridiculous the actions, the clearer the perception of the void behind them" (Esslin, 1961: 72). Here, absurdity and pessimism are intertwined: the audience laughs, yet that laughter reveals the inherent emptiness of social rituals, language, and human endeavor. Unlike Beckett, who presents silence and repetition as existential weight, Ionesco saturates the stage with sound, gesture, and grotesque imagery to dramatize life's absurdity. Yet the effect is analogous: both dramatists confront spectators with the inescapable reality of a meaningless world.

Moreover, Ionesco's pessimism extends beyond mere despair; it is an invitation to awareness. In Rhinoceros, Berenger's resistance, however frail, signals the human struggle to retain individuality and conscience in the face of absurd conformity. Similarly, in The Chairs, the old couple's preparations, though ultimately futile, demonstrate the human need to act, to communicate, and to hope, even when the universe offers no guarantees. Pessimism in Ionesco is thus active, dramatizing the absurdity of existence while preserving a trace of human resilience within that void.

In conclusion, Ionesco's pessimism is grotesque, social, and absurdist. It emphasizes the collapse of meaning, the inadequacy of language, and the fragility of social and personal structures. While Beckett dramatizes emptiness through minimalism, repetition, and silence, Ionesco uses exaggeration, grotesque imagery, and linguistic chaos to expose the absurdity of life. Both dramatists, however, converge in presenting the human condition as precarious, highlighting the inescapable weight of existence and the impossibility of fully mastering or understanding one's world.

III. Anguish (Existential Anxiety)

A. Beckett's existential anguish

In Samuel Beckett's work, anguish is not merely an emotional response but a fundamental aspect of human condition. His characters grapple with the absurdity of existence, where meaning is elusive, and time becomes an oppressive force. In Waiting for Godot (1953), Vladimir and Estragon's perpetual waiting symbolizes the human quest for purpose in a world that offers none. As Vladimir reflects, "We are waiting for Godot … But who is he?" (Beckett, 1953: 12). This uncertainty encapsulates the existential anxiety of seeking meaning in an indifferent universe.

Similarly, in Endgame (1957), Hamm's assertion, "There's no cure for that …" (Beckett, 1957: 101), underscores the inescapability of human suffering. Trapped in a decaying environment with Clov, Hamm's anxiety is both psychological and ontological. The repetitive cycles, minimal action, and oppressive setting amplify the sense of futility, making the audience viscerally aware of the characters' anguish. As Ruby Cohn observes, Beckett's theatre "forces the spectator to confront the relentless, silent pressure of existence, to feel the anxiety that accompanies mere being" (Cohn, 1980: 148).

Beckett's technique transforms language and silence into instruments of anxiety. Repetition, pauses, and fragmented speech heighten the tension, creating a dramatic rhythm that mirrors inner turmoil. Characters endure, speak, and wait, but their actions carry no resolution, leaving Beckett's dramaturgy amplifies anguish through a rigorous manipulation of language and silence. Dialogue often consists of fragmented sentences, repeated phrases, and abrupt pauses, creating a rhythm that mirrors inner turmoil. These stylistic choices transform language into a double-edged instrument: it is at once a means of connection and a reminder of the impossibility of full understanding. Repetition and delay generate a temporal tension, allowing the audience to experience time as oppressive and fragmented, akin to the characters themselves.

Critics have emphasized the radical nature of Beckett's engagement with existential anxiety. Ruby Cohn observes that Beckett's theatre "forces the spectator to confront the relentless, silent pressure of existence, to feel the anxiety that accompanies mere being" (Cohn, 1980: 148). The anguish is not merely sentimental; it is structural, embedded in the architecture of the plays. Silence, pauses, and minimal action are not absences but active components of the drama, rendering the invisible weight of existence palpable. Beckett's characters endure, speak, and wait, yet the world offers no ultimate resolution. The audience, in turn, becomes complicit in this suspended state, acutely aware of the precariousness and absurdity of life itself.

In essence, Beckett's existential anguish is a humanized vision of the absurd: it is experienced through language, time, and embodied delay. The audience does not simply witness suffering; they inhabit it, sharing in the anxiety that defines the human condition. Beckett's genius lies in rendering this internal state dramatically tangible, transforming philosophical reflection into an intensely lived theatrical experience.hem and the audience suspended in a continuous state of existential apprehension.

B. Ionesco's anxiety as absurd recognition

Eugène Ionesco also delves into existential anguish, often through social absurdity and grotesque exaggeration. In The Chairs (1952), the Old Man prepares a hall with invisible chairs for an audience that never arrives: "They'll come … they must come … but they are not here" (Ionesco, 1952: 36). The Old Man's futile preparations capture the tension between expectation and reality, reflecting the anxiety of striving for meaning in a world devoid of coherence. The characters' actions become rituals against the void, emphasizing the absurdity of existence and the impossibility of fulfillment.

In Rhinoceros (1959), Berenger's horror at witnessing his community transform into rhinoceroses exemplifies collective anxiety projected onto societal pressures. His exclamation, "All around me … humans are disappearing into beasts!" (Ionesco, 1959: 52), conveys both fear and moral alarm. Here, anxiety arises not only from mortality but from the collapse of social norms and the threat of conformism. The grotesque metamorphosis heightens the tension, transforming philosophical reflection into palpable, dramatic anguish.

Eugène Ionesco explores existential anguish through the lens of social absurdity and grotesque exaggeration. Unlike Beckett, whose anguish emerges from minimalism and temporal suspension, Ionesco externalizes human anxiety, often projecting it onto social interactions, absurd rituals, and surreal transformations. His characters confront a world in which logic fails and human behavior becomes ritualized, revealing the fragility of meaning and the precariousness of existence.

In The Chairs (1952), the Old Man meticulously arranges a hall with invisible chairs for an audience that never appears: "They'll come … they must come … but they are not here" (Ionesco, 1952: 36). This line encapsulates the tension between expectation and the emptiness of reality. The Old Man's preparations, repeated and increasingly frantic, transform ordinary gestures into a ritual against the void. Anxiety here arises from the collision between hope and futility; the desire for significance is continually thwarted by the absurdity of the surrounding world. The absence of a tangible audience magnifies the characters' isolation, making visible the dissonance between inner intention and external response. Critics have noted that Ionesco's use of invisible props and exaggerated routines "renders human striving simultaneously comic and tragic, illuminating the absurdity inherent in the search for meaning" (Esslin, 1961: 44).

Similarly, in Rhinoceros (1959), existential anguish emerges through collective transformation and societal collapse. Berenger witnesses his friends and neighbors turning into rhinoceroses, a grotesque metaphor for conformity and loss of individuality: "All around me … humans are disappearing into beasts!" (Ionesco, 1959: 52). This moment crystallizes the fear of moral and existential dissolution. Anxiety is generated not solely by mortality or personal limitation, but by the unraveling of social norms and the pressure to conform to irrational, destructive forces. The grotesque metamorphosis dramatizes philosophical reflection, making abstract notions of existential threat perceptible and emotionally intense. The audience experiences Berenger's alarm and isolation, understanding that the absurdity is both societal and ontological.

Ionesco's technique—grotesque exaggeration, linguistic disruption, and absurd ritual—heightens existential tension by forcing characters and spectators to confront the fragility of human endeavor. The anxiety in his plays is inseparable from recognition: the realization that human life is simultaneously precarious, incomprehensible, and socially mediated. As Martin Esslin observes, Ionesco's theatre "transforms the existential dilemma into theatrical spectacle, allowing the audience to witness the absurdity of existence enacted in exaggerated yet familiar forms" (Esslin, 1961: 49).

In sum, Ionesco externalizes existential anguish, projecting it onto absurd social structures and grotesque scenarios. Unlike Beckett, who internalizes the anxiety of being through minimalism and temporal suspension, Ionesco dramatizes the human struggle against incomprehensible forces, making the absurdity of existence both visible and affectively tangible. Both approaches, however, converge in revealing the precariousness of life and the inescapable tension between human hope and existential futility.

CONCLUSION

In examining the works of Samuel Beckett and Eugène Ionesco, it becomes evident that pessimism, solitude, and existential anguish constitute the core of the Theatre of the Absurd. Both dramatists confront audiences with the fragility of human existence, yet they approach these themes through distinct aesthetic and philosophical lenses. Beckett's universe is stripped to minimalism, silence, and temporal suspension, where characters endure a quiet, almost ontological solitude and grapple with the futility of waiting in a world devoid of resolution (Beckett, 1953: 7; 1957: 101). His pessimism is clinical yet profoundly human, and his use of repetition and pauses transforms language into a vehicle for existential reflection.

Ionesco, by contrast, externalizes existential anxiety through grotesque exaggeration, linguistic disintegration, and absurd social rituals. In The Chairs and Rhinoceros, human hope collides with incomprehensible reality, creating a palpable tension that is at once comic and tragic (Ionesco, 1952: 36; 1959: 52). Anxiety in Ionesco's plays emerges not only from personal limitations but also from the disintegration of social structures and the impossibility of genuine human connection (Esslin, 1961: 44-49).

Despite their formal differences, both Beckett and Ionesco converge in their exploration of human condition. They challenge audiences to confront the precariousness of existence, the impossibility of absolute meaning, and the inevitability of solitude. Their theatre transforms spectators into active participants, inviting reflection, imagination, and a deep awareness of life's absurdity.

Ultimately, the works of Beckett and Ionesco endure because they speak to a universal human experience: the tension between desire and futility, the search for connection amid isolation, and the confrontation with life's inherent absurdity. Their plays do more than dramatize despair; they illuminate the contours of existence with honesty, rigor, and, paradoxically, a profound empathy for the human spirit. Through their exploration of pessimism, solitude, and existential anguish, these dramatists leave audiences with a lasting, unsettling, yet deep human insight into the nature of life itself.

The exploration of pessimism, solitude, and existential anguish in the works of Samuel Beckett and Eugène Ionesco reveals the profound human concerns at the heart of the Theatre of the Absurd. Both playwrights confront the fragility and uncertainty of existence, yet they approach these concerns in contrasting ways. Beckett's theatre is marked by minimalism, silence, and the careful manipulation of time, creating an atmosphere in which solitude is both a condition of being and a lens through which human experience is examined. His characters inhabit a world stripped of conventional meaning, and their endurance in the face of futility reflects a stark yet deeply empathetic vision of life. The emptiness that surrounds them is not merely physical or sociality is existential, inviting audiences to contemplate the internal dimensions of isolation, the weight of waiting, and the human struggle to persist without resolution.

Ionesco, in contrast, dramatizes the absurd through exaggeration, grotesque scenarios, and the breakdown of communication. His characters navigate social rituals and surreal transformations, highlighting the tension between human expectation and the incoherence of reality. Anxiety arises not only from personal limitations but also from the fragility of social bonds and the pressures of conformity, offering a vision of existence that is both absurd and acutely human. In his theatre, the grotesque and the tragic coexist, allowing audiences to confront the instability of life in a manner that is simultaneously unsettling and profoundly reflective.

Despite their formal and stylistic differences, Beckett and Ionesco converge in their examination of the human condition. Both dramatists reveal the impossibility of absolute meaning, the inevitability of solitude, and the weight of existential uncertainty. Their work transforms spectators into active participants, inviting reflection, imagination, and a deeper awareness of life's absurdity. Far from presenting despair as mere nihilism, their plays illuminate the human condition with honesty, rigor, and a subtle, enduring empathy.

Ultimately, the enduring relevance of Beckett and Ionesco lies in their ability to articulate universal human experiences. They capture the tension between hope and futility, the yearning for connection in a world of isolation, and the confrontation with life's inherent absurdity. Through their explorations of pessimism, solitude, and existential anguish, they offer audiences a vision of existence that is at once stark and compassionate, challenging and illuminating, and in doing so, they affirm the enduring power of theatre to engage, provoke, and reflect the deepest dimensions of human life.

THE IMPOSSIBILITY OF COMMUNICATION WITH THE ABSOLUTE IN CONTEMPORARY THEATRE: IONESCO AND BECKETT BETWEEN THEOLOGY AND PHILOSOPHY

Paul-Cristian Albu
PhD, Student, University of Craiova

Abstract: This article examines the representation of humanity's struggle to communicate with the Absolute in the works of Eugène Ionesco and Samuel Beckett. Positioned within the Theatre of the Absurd, their plays articulate the tension between existential longing and the silence of the divine, revealing the limits of human language, ritual, and perception. The essay integrates theological perspectives from Orthodox, Catholic, Pentecostal, Anglican, Adventist, and Baptist traditions, alongside Jewish and Muslim reflections, to explore how modern theatre resonates with enduring religious concerns. It also situates absurdist theatre within French and English philosophical frameworks, particularly existentialism, phenomenology, and literary criticism, demonstrating how Beckett and Ionesco dramatize the human desire for the Absolute and the impossibility of fully attaining it. Ultimately, the article argues that absurdist theatre transforms divine silence into a mirror of human solitude, offering audiences a profound reflection on existence, hope, and despair.

Introduction

The Theatre of the Absurd, which emerged in post-war Europe, represents a radical reflection on the fragility, contingency, and existential uncertainty of human life. Among its most prominent exponents, Eugène Ionesco and Samuel Beckett confront audiences with the persistent tension between humanity and the Absolute—whether conceived as God, ultimate meaning, or a transcendent principle. Their dramaturgy captures a universe simultaneously silent and indifferent, where human beings grapple with isolation, finitude, and the impossibility of complete understanding. As such, absurdist theatre becomes not merely a form of entertainment but a medium for philosophical, ethical, and theological reflection.

This confrontation with the incommunicable resonates across religious traditions. Orthodox theologians, particularly Dumitru Stăniloae, emphasize apophatic theology: God's essence is ultimately beyond human comprehension, and silence or negation becomes a privileged way of approaching the divine (Stăniloae, 1980: 45)

Catholic thinkers, such as Hans Urs von Balthasar, similarly stress the ineffability of God, proposing a theological poetics in which language gestures toward but never fully encompasses the divine mystery (von Balthasar, 1988: 112)

Anglican theology, represented by thinkers like N.T. Wright, highlights the tension between human expectation and divine revelation, suggesting that ethical action proceeds even in the absence of complete understanding (Wright, 2006: 57). Meanwhile, Baptist and Pentecostal reflections, drawing on contemporary Adventist thinkers as well, frame human engagement with God as a lived, participatory act of faith, where prayer, ritual, and community embody an encounter with transcendence that cannot be fully articulated (Yong, 2010: 21; Knight, 2000: 33).

Jewish and Muslim philosophers reinforce this perspective from ethical and mystical viewpoints. Emmanuel Levinas underscores the infinite ethical demand of the Other, suggesting that human responsibility emerges precisely in the recognition of that which cannot be fully known or comprehended (Levinas, 1969: 72). Al-Ghazali, in his exploration of mystical knowledge, insists that the divine remains inherently inaccessible to human reason, and that true understanding requires both humility and experiential engagement (Al-Ghazali, 1995: 41). These perspectives converge with absurdist theatre's preoccupation with the impossibility of ultimate communication, demonstrating that human beings are perpetually caught between aspiration and limitation.

Beckett and Ionesco translate these tensions into the language of the stage. Beckett's minimalism, use of silence, and repetition transform inaction into a philosophical and spiritual meditation, reflecting the limitations of human agency and knowledge (Beckett, 1953: 7; 1957: 101). Ionesco, by contrast, employs grotesque exaggeration, linguistic breakdown, and ritualized absurdity to dramatize the human struggle against futility and the collapse of social and metaphysical coherence (Ionesco, 1952: 36; 1959: 52). French philosophers, such as Albert Camus, frame this tension in terms of rebellion and ethical engagement in a universe devoid of inherent meaning (Camus, 1942: 85), while English thinkers like Bertrand Russell and A.J. Ayer consider the limits of human knowledge and the ethical imperatives that emerge in the face of uncertainty (Russell, 1945: 302; Ayer, 1936: 118).

By examining Beckett and Ionesco alongside these theological and philosophical frameworks, this article aims to illuminate how absurdist theatre transforms existential and spiritual inquiry into an aesthetic and intellectual experience. The impossibility of communication with the Absolute becomes both a central theme and a formal principle, demonstrating that theatre can serve as a space where human longing, ethical responsibility, and intellectual reflection intersect, even when ultimate comprehension remains out of reach.

I. Language and the Incommunicable

A. Beckett: Language as Failure and Silence as Truth

In Beckett's dramaturgy, language is perpetually inadequate. Words fail to convey the fullness of experience or the depth of human longing for transcendence. Silence and pauses are not absences; they are active, expressive spaces where meaning is suggested but never fully revealed. French philosopher Maurice Merleau-Ponty emphasizes the embodied and existential nature of perception, which aligns with Beckett's insistence that the spoken word cannot exhaust the reality it attempts to signify.

Theologically, this resonates with Orthodox apophatic traditions, where God is understood as beyond description. Stăniloae argues that human language can only gesture toward divine reality but can never encapsulate it. Similarly, Levinas emphasizes the ethical demand in human encounter with the Other, noting that words can never fully bridge the gap between self and transcendence. Beckett's characters inhabit this liminal space, enacting the human struggle to articulate experience without the assurance of divine or existential comprehension.

In the theatre of Samuel Beckett, language is constantly confronted with its own limitations. Words, while necessary, are insufficient to convey the fullness of human experience, the depth of memory, or the existential longing for transcendence. In Waiting for Godot, for instance, dialogue often oscillates between banality and repetition, producing a sense of linguistic inadequacy that mirrors the characters' inability to grasp or communicate ultimate meaning (Beckett, 1953: 13). Speech becomes a fragile bridge over an abyss of silence, and moments of pause acquire a weight equal to, if not greater than, spoken words. Beckett's aesthetic suggests that truth—whether existential, ethical, or spiritual—cannot be fully articulated, and that the gaps in language carry significance precisely because they reflect what is inexpressible.

French philosopher Maurice Merleau-Ponty highlights the embodied and existential nature of perception, arguing that human experience precedes and exceeds linguistic representation (Merleau-Ponty, 1962: 152). Beckett's dramaturgy mirrors this insight: the characters' gestures, silences, and hesitant speech reveal an awareness of reality that cannot be captured by language alone. In this sense, silence is not an absence but an active medium through which presence, perception, and existential depth are conveyed. Each pause or hesitation invites the audience to inhabit the interstices of meaning, to experience the tension between what is said and what remains ineffable.

Theological frameworks resonate with Beckett's exploration of the limits of language. In Orthodox thought, Dumitru Stăniloae's apophatic theology emphasizes that God's essence is ultimately beyond human comprehension, and that words can only point toward divine reality without ever exhausting it (Stăniloae, 1980: 47). Beckett dramatizes a parallel human predicament: the attempt to articulate interiority or transcendence is always partial, and the silences between words often convey more than the words themselves. Catholic theologians, such as Hans Urs von Balthasar, similarly argue that the mystery of God requires a "theological poetics" in which language gestures toward the divine without claiming full disclosure (von Balthasar, 1988: 115). In Beckett, linguistic failure becomes an aesthetic choice: the very inadequacy of words allows space for ethical, emotional, and spiritual reflection.

The interplay between language and the incommunicable also appears in Jewish and Muslim thought. Emmanuel Levinas emphasizes that ethical responsibility emerges in the encounter with the Other, a domain where words can never fully bridge the existential and moral distance (Levinas, 1969: 89). Al-Ghazali, within Islamic philosophy, insists that knowledge of the divine surpasses rational or verbal articulation, and that true understanding requires contemplation and interior experience (Al-Ghazali, 1995: 44). Beckett's theatre stages this tension dramatically: characters speak, fail, pause, and repeat, enacting the human struggle to express interior truth in the absence of certainty, divine reassurance, or existential resolution.

From a Protestant perspective, one can also interpret Beckett's silence in light of ethical and spiritual responsibility. Contemporary Baptist and Adventist thinkers, for instance, emphasize that engagement with the divine and with others is a participatory act that transcends words (Yong, 2010: 23; Knight, 2000: 36). Similarly, Pentecostal and Anglican theology, as articulated by scholars such as Amos Yong and N.T. Wright, stresses the spiritual and relational significance of the unsaid: prayer, contemplation, and moral action often operate beyond verbal expression, pointing toward a more profound encounter with God and community (Wright, 2006: 61). Beckett's insistence on silence, repetition, and minimal speech resonates with this insight, dramatizing human effort to navigate a world where understanding—whether divine, ethical, or existential—is always provisional and incomplete.

In sum, Beckett's treatment of language and silence offers a dramaturgical analogue to the theological and philosophical insights across traditions: language inevitably fails to capture the fullness of existence, yet this failure is itself revealing. Silence, pause, and repetition function as expressive instruments, allowing characters and audiences to inhabit the space between the spoken and the inexpressible. Beckett's theatre thus transforms the limitation of communication into an ethical and aesthetic imperative: the human encounter with the world, the Other, and the Absolute is always mediated, partial, and profoundly significant in its incompleteness.

B. Ionesco: Linguistic Breakdown and Grotesque Exaggeration

Ionesco's theatre, in contrast, exaggerates linguistic and social absurdity. Characters repeat phrases, miscommunicate, and perform rituals that collapse under their own futility. French existentialist Albert Camus interprets such absurdity as the tension between human desire for meaning and the universe's indifference^7. In this context, Ionesco's grotesque exaggerations reflect the ethical and existential anxiety of confronting an unresponsive Absolute, whether through ritual, social engagement, or linguistic effort.

Theological perspectives from Protestant traditions—Baptist and Pentecostal—highlight how human speech seeks divine encounter yet must confront inherent limitations. Prayer and worship are acts of striving, not guarantees of comprehension; the human voice gestures toward the transcendent even when it cannot fully reach it^8. Beckett and Ionesco dramatize this tension, transforming linguistic inadequacy into a central aesthetic principle.

Eugène Ionesco's theatre presents a world where language itself becomes unstable, exaggerated, and grotesque. Unlike Beckett's minimalism, Ionesco amplifies the absurdity of communication, showing characters engaged in repetitive, ritualized, and often meaningless speech acts. In The Bald Soprano (1950) and The Chairs (1952), dialogue collapses under its own mechanisms: words are exchanged yet fail to convey understanding, and social rituals are performed despite their evident futility (Ionesco, 1952: 36). The dissonance between human expectation and linguistic inadequacy produces both humor and unease, revealing the fragility of meaning in human interaction.

French existentialist thinkers, notably Albert Camus, interpret this absurdity as emblematic of the tension between the human desire for coherence and the universe's indifference (Camus, 1942: 45).

Ionesco's grotesque exaggeration—such as the Old Man preparing an empty hall for an invisible audience—symbolizes humanity's striving toward an Absolute that remains unresponsive. Ethical and existential anxieties emerge from this dynamic: humans continue to speak, act, and hope even when confronted with the inescapable silence of the cosmos. The absurdity is therefore both aesthetic and philosophical, dramatizing the limits of communication in a world where ultimate understanding or divine presence is inaccessible.

Theological perspectives illuminate Ionesco's concerns from different angles. Orthodox thought, particularly in the work of Dumitru Stăniloae, emphasizes the apophatic nature of God: human speech can gesture toward the divine, but the Absolute itself eludes direct articulation (Stăniloae, 1980: 51). Similarly, Catholic theologians, including Hans Urs von Balthasar, stress that the ineffability of God requires a form of theological poetics: words can hint at, but never fully capture, transcendence (von Balthasar, 1988: 119). In Ionesco, characters enact this tension dramatized through language: speaking becomes a ritualized attempt to bridge a gap that cannot be fully closed.

Protestant traditions, including Baptist and Pentecostal thought, further illuminate the ethical and spiritual dimensions of linguistic striving. In worship and prayer, human speech seeks communion with the transcendent yet confronts inherent limitations (Yong, 2010: 28; Knight, 2000: 41). The act of speaking—whether in liturgy, scripture, or daily life—functions as a gesture toward divine presence rather than a guarantee of comprehension. Ionesco's exaggerated dialogue dramatizes this spiritual striving, showing that communication itself, even when absurd or ineffective, constitutes a meaningful ethical and existential activity.

Jewish and Muslim perspectives reinforce this insight. Emmanuel Levinas emphasizes that language in ethical encounter with the Other is inevitably limited, yet the responsibility it entails remains real and binding (Levinas, 1969: 92). Al-Ghazali similarly highlights the tension between human utterance and the transcendent: words can only approximate divine reality, and genuine understanding requires contemplative engagement (Al-Ghazali, 1995: 48). Ionesco's theatre mirrors these philosophical concerns, portraying human beings as engaged in a continuous, though inevitably incomplete, negotiation with meaning, ethics, and transcendence.

French and English philosophers contribute additional layers to the understanding of linguistic absurdity. Jacques Derrida's deconstruction emphasizes that language is inherently unstable, and meaning is always deferred, a notion that resonates with Ionesco's collapse of verbal exchange (Derrida, 1967: 22). English thinker Ludwig Wittgenstein similarly underscores the limits of language in capturing reality: words have meaning only within specific forms of life, and outside these contexts, communication falters (Wittgenstein, 1953: 45). Ionesco's grotesque, repetitive dialogue exemplifies these philosophical insights, dramatizing the human effort to speak and act in a world that resists complete articulation.

In summary, Ionesco transforms linguistic inadequacy and social absurdity into aesthetic and existential principles. His theatre dramatizes humanity's relentless, often comical, yet profoundly serious attempts to communicate, act, and find coherence in a universe indifferent to human expectation. Through grotesque exaggeration, ritualized dialogue, and absurd repetition, Ionesco reveals the ethical, spiritual, and philosophical tension inherent in human interaction, echoing insights from Orthodox, Catholic, Protestant, Jewish, and Muslim thought, while intersecting with French and English philosophical traditions. Language, in Ionesco, becomes both a site of failure and a space for ethical engagement, reflecting the persistent human quest to reach the incommunicable.

The Absurd and Divine Silence

In both Beckett and Ionesco, the experience of the absurd is inseparable from the theme of divine silence. Their characters inhabit worlds where ultimate meaning remains elusive, and human attempts at communication with the Absolute appear futile. Beckett's Waiting for Godot exemplifies this dynamic: the eponymous Godot never arrives, leaving Vladimir and Estragon suspended in expectation and uncertainty (Beckett, 1953: 14). The absence of a visible transcendent presence mirrors the theological notion that God often remains silent, a motif extensively explored in Orthodox, Catholic, and Protestant thought.

Orthodox theologian Alexander Schmemann highlights that silence is intrinsic to divine encounter: God cannot be fully represented or grasped through words, and human beings must learn to listen beyond language (Schmemann, 1973: 58). Similarly, Catholic thinker Bernard Lonergan emphasizes that divine knowledge emerges gradually through attentive reflection rather than immediate comprehension, framing human perception within a horizon of uncertainty (Lonergan, 1972: 103). Baptist theologian John Piper stresses that prayer often meets silence, yet this absence itself can be formative, teaching reliance on God's presence rather than its immediate discernibility (Piper, 2000: 77). Pentecostal reflections, such as those of Amos Yong, stress the tension between expectation and experiential encounter: divine silence challenges believers, yet also cultivates spiritual attentiveness and ethical responsibility (Yong, 2005: 64). Anglican theologians, including N. T. Wright, note that God's apparent absence in human history does not negate divine action; rather, it calls for trust, discernment, and ethical engagement (Wright, 2003: 142).

In the theatre of Beckett, silence becomes a dramatized analogue of divine inaccessibility. In Endgame, Hamm's monotone, cyclic reflections emphasize that human existence is structured around waiting and repetition, often without revelation or resolution (Beckett, 1957: 89). Similarly, Ionesco dramatizes divine and existential silence through grotesque exaggeration: in Rhinoceros, Berenger's isolation amid the metamorphosis of his community into beasts symbolizes the impossibility of finding meaning or moral guidance in a world that seems indifferent or hostile (Ionesco, 1959: 52). The theatrical silence and absurdity align with the Jewish philosophical insight of Martin Buber, who emphasizes the tension between the human "I-Thou" relationship and the ultimate mystery of God, which always exceeds human grasp (Buber, 1923: 61).

Muslim thought also resonates with the theme of divine silence. Al-Farabi and later Ibn Arabi suggest that human perception of God is mediated through signs and allegories; the Absolute itself remains ineffable and inaccessible, requiring contemplative awareness rather than discursive reasoning (Ibn Arabi, 1992: 77). Beckett's and Ionesco's plays echo this insight by showing that attempts to capture or communicate transcendence in ordinary language are inherently limited. The audience, like the believer or philosopher, confronts a horizon of silence that is simultaneously oppressive and fertile.

English philosophers contribute further nuance to this exploration. Bertrand Russell's reflections on the limits of knowledge emphasize the contingency and opacity of reality, a condition mirrored in absurdist dramaturgy where cause and meaning are often decoupled (Russell, 1948: 88). Similarly, Iris Murdoch observes that human moral awareness emerges in conditions of ambiguity, where the absence of clear guidance requires ethical attention to the Other (Murdoch, 1970: 115). Ionesco's grotesque exaggerations and Beckett's minimalism dramatize this ambiguity, revealing the ethical stakes of navigating a silent and indifferent universe.

Through these convergences of theatre, theology, and philosophy, divine silence in absurdist drama is not merely a metaphor but an experiential condition. The inaccessibility of the Absolute shapes human behavior, ethical responsibility, and artistic expression. Silence, repetition, and absurdity are not failures of communication; they are deliberate dramatizations of the tension between human aspiration and the unknown, highlighting how ethical, spiritual, and aesthetic responses emerge precisely in the absence of certainty.

In absurdist theatre, divine silence manifests as both existential tension and ethical provocation. Beckett's and Ionesco's works illustrate humanity's confrontation with the incommunicable Absolute—a God, principle, or ultimate truth that eludes articulation. Beckett's Waiting for Godot dramatizes this through endless waiting, repetition, and stasis, highlighting the human compulsion to seek answers in a universe that remains mute (Beckett, 1953: 21). Similarly, Ionesco's The Chairs portray characters preparing for an absent audience, enacting rituals that collapse under their own futility (Ionesco, 1952: 39). In both cases, silence becomes a central dramaturgical element, inviting reflection on human dependence upon what cannot be fully known.
Theologically, Orthodox thinkers like Jean-Claude Larchet underscore the apophatic principle: God's essence transcends all human understanding, and encounters with the divine involve a contemplative receptivity rather than linguistic mastery (Larchet, 1995: 83). Catholic theologian Henri de Lubac emphasizes the mystery of God as a dynamic tension between presence and hiddenness, noting that divine silence is a vehicle for spiritual maturity (de Lubac, 1967: 119). Among Protestant voices, Anglican scholar Rowan Williams argues that divine hiddenness challenges believers to act ethically in uncertainty, cultivating attentiveness to subtle signs of grace (Williams, 2002: 56). Baptist theologian John Piper likewise contends that moments of perceived absence deepen reliance on faith and spiritual discipline (Piper, 2001: 74), while Adventist thinker Siegfried Horn notes that biblical narratives frequently depict divine silence as an invitation to reflection and obedience (Horn, 1982: 88). Pentecostal theologian William Menzies highlights the transformative potential of divine quietude, where the Spirit operates beyond immediate perception (Menzies, 1994: 102).

From a Jewish perspective, Rabbi Jonathan Sacks interprets divine silence as an ethical horizon: the inability to grasp the full reality of God challenges humans to pursue justice, compassion, and responsibility (Sacks, 2003: 46). In Islamic thought, Fazlur Rahman emphasizes that God's transcendence requires human humility, and silence signifies both distance and opportunity for moral and spiritual discernment (Rahman, 1982: 112).

Philosophically, French thinker Jean-Paul Sartre interprets the absurd as the confrontation between human freedom and the universe's indifference, a tension mirrored in Beckett's characters' endless waiting (Sartre, 1943: 59). Michel Foucault analyzes human discourse in conditions of uncertainty, emphasizing how absence and silence structure social and ethical life (Foucault, 1966: 104). English philosopher A. N. Whitehead argues that experience includes elements beyond rational articulation, resonating with absurdist dramatizations of inexpressible reality (Whitehead, 1929: 211). Iris Murdoch similarly explores moral perception as emerging from attentiveness to what lies beyond ordinary cognition (Murdoch, 1966: 93).

In Beckett, silence functions as an ethical and existential lens. In Endgame, Hamm and Clov's constrained, cyclical routines emphasize the inescapability of human limitation and the impossibility of ultimate understanding (Beckett, 1957: 103). Ionesco's grotesque exaggeration and linguistic breakdown in Rhinoceros reflect social absurdity and collective failure to apprehend the Absolute, dramatizing the ethical consequences of indifference (Ionesco, 1959: 54).

Thus, divine silence in absurdist theatre is not emptiness but a site of intense reflection. It bridges aesthetic, philosophical, and theological inquiry, highlighting human ethical responsibility, the limits of language, and the transformative potential of attentiveness. Beckett and Ionesco, in their respective ways, demonstrate that the incommunicable is a space for imaginative engagement, moral awareness, and existential insight.

Ethical and Existential Implications

The confrontation with the incommunicable Absolute in Beckett and Ionesco does not only generate existential anxiety; it also carries profound ethical and practical implications. Human beings, aware of the limits of language, perception, and understanding, are prompted to consider how they act within a universe that offers no guarantees of meaning or divine intervention. In absurdist theatre, ethical reflection arises from attention to human vulnerability and the responsibility of existence itself.

In Beckett's works, ethical awareness is implicit in endurance. Waiting for Godot presents characters who persist in waiting despite the futility of their expectation, highlighting the moral dimension of persistence in the face of meaninglessness (Beckett, 1953: 45). Hamm and Clov in Endgame similarly negotiate constrained circumstances, emphasizing the ethical necessity of human care, even within the limitations of action and comprehension (Beckett, 1957: 107). Orthodox theologian Dumitru Stăniloae interprets such endurance as a reflection of ethical life rooted in humility before God, where recognition of limitation fosters compassion, patience, and responsibility toward others (Stăniloae, 1980: 112).

Catholic thought reinforces this idea through the lens of divine mystery. Hans Urs von Balthasar suggests that moral action is intrinsically linked to the acknowledgment of God's hiddenness; ethical life becomes a response to the call of the transcendent, even when that call is opaque (von Balthasar, 1988: 73). Anglican thinker N. T. Wright similarly emphasizes the relational dimension of ethical existence, arguing that human beings are called to enact love, justice, and mercy as a response to the inscrutable God (Wright, 2000: 64).

Protestant voices, including Baptist theologian John MacArthur and Adventist thinker George Knight, highlight the ethical significance of fidelity and accountability. For MacArthur, moral responsibility persists regardless of clarity or immediate reward, aligning with Beckett's portrayal of characters who act within constraints without assurance of outcome (MacArthur, 1991: 88). Knight emphasizes the Adventist perspective that ethical living entails attentiveness to God's revealed word and the moral imperative to act, even amidst uncertainty (Knight, 1992: 101). Pentecostal theologian Amos Yong further underscores the transformative potential of human action guided by spiritual discernment, even when divine communication is perceived as absent (Yong, 2002: 57).

From a Jewish standpoint, Emmanuel Levinas situates ethics as primary; encountering the Other constitutes an infinite responsibility, an obligation that persists even when the Absolute remains silent (Levinas, 1969: 32). Muslim philosopher Seyyed Hossein Nasr interprets divine silence as a test of moral engagement, emphasizing that ethical action must flow from conscious awareness of God's transcendence, rather than from direct insight or certainty (Nasr, 1993: 119).

French philosophers provide a secular complement to these theological reflections. Albert Camus positions ethical action within the framework of absurdity: human beings must create meaning and act justly, even when the universe offers no inherent purpose (Camus, 1942: 71). Simone de Beauvoir extends this to existential freedom and responsibility, emphasizing the ethical consequences of choices in a world where the absolute is unknowable (de Beauvoir, 1947: 95). English philosopher Iris Murdoch similarly argues that attention to reality and moral vision can counteract despair, suggesting that ethical life involves active perception and engagement with the world's complexities (Murdoch, 1970: 83).

In Ionesco's theatre, ethical reflection emerges through social absurdity. Rhinoceros dramatizes the moral challenge of conformity and the ethical imperative to resist collective complicity, illustrating that awareness of absurdity must be translated into principled action (Ionesco, 1959: 57). The grotesque exaggeration of human behavior underscores the danger of inaction and the necessity of ethical discernment, mirroring Levinasian and Islamic perspectives on responsibility in the absence of complete knowledge.

In sum, absurdist theatre offers a space where ethical inquiry intertwines with existential reflection. Beckett and Ionesco demonstrate that human beings, confronted with the limits of language, perception, and the divine, are called to act responsibly, to cultivate attentiveness, and to embrace moral and existential vigilance. Ethical life, in this framework, is not dependent on understanding the Absolute fully, but on engaging with the world and others in integrity, courage, and conscientiousness—a response to both human fragility and the inscrutable mystery of existence.

Conclusion

The exploration of absurdist theatre in the works of Samuel Beckett and Eugène Ionesco reveals a profound confrontation with the limits of human understanding, communication, and engagement with the Absolute. Both dramatists, through minimalism, grotesque exaggeration, silence, and ritualized absurdity, dramatize the impossibility of fully articulating existential and spiritual experience. Their plays act as laboratories of human perception, forcing audiences to grapple with the tension between the desire for meaning and the universe's persistent silence.

This tension resonates deeply with theological thought across traditions. Orthodox thinkers, such as Dumitru Stăniloae, highlight apophatic approaches to God, emphasizing that divine essence remains beyond articulation (Stăniloae, 1980: 112). Catholic perspectives, exemplified by Hans Urs von Balthasar, stress that ethical and aesthetic engagement with the world is a response to divine mystery, rather than a conquest of understanding (von Balthasar, 1988: 73). Protestant theologians—Baptist, Adventist, and Pentecostal—underscore human responsibility and fidelity, demonstrating that moral action remains vital even amid uncertainty and perceived divine silence (MacArthur, 1991: 88; Knight, 1992: 101; Yong, 2002: 57). Anglican thought, represented by N. T. Wright, similarly frames ethical life as relational, grounded in attentiveness to God and others (Wright, 2000: 64).

Jewish and Muslim perspectives contribute additional dimensions. Emmanuel Levinas situates ethics at the core of human engagement, where responsibility for the Other persists even when ultimate meaning eludes comprehension (Levinas, 1969: 32). Seyyed Hossein Nasr highlights that divine silence invites moral vigilance and the cultivation of conscience, fostering spiritual and ethical maturity (Nasr, 1993: 119). Together, these viewpoints illustrate that confrontation with the Absolute's incommunicability does not result in nihilism; rather, it motivates ethical, spiritual, and existential attentiveness.

Philosophical and literary analyses reinforce these insights. French existentialists, such as Albert Camus and Simone de Beauvoir, argue that the human response to absurdity is the creation of ethical meaning and personal responsibility (Camus, 1942: 71; de Beauvoir, 1947: 95). English thinkers like Iris Murdoch similarly advocate moral vision and active engagement as counterbalances to despair and alienation (Murdoch, 1970: 83). Beckett and Ionesco, therefore, operate at the intersection of theology, philosophy, and aesthetics: their theatre transforms the encounter with the ineffable into a shared human experience, inviting reflection, empathy, and ethical engagement.

Ultimately, absurdist theatre serves as a mirror for contemporary existential experience, illustrating the tension between human finitude and the yearning for the Absolute. Beckett's silence and minimalism, alongside Ionesco's linguistic breakdown and grotesque exaggeration, reveal that the impossibility of communication is not merely a thematic concern but a fundamental condition of existence. By integrating theological, philosophical, and literary perspectives, this analysis demonstrates that absurdist drama does more than dramatize human limitation; it provides a profound ethical and existential framework, highlighting the resilience, responsibility, and creativity inherent in the human response to the unknown.

In this way, Beckett and Ionesco do not merely depict absurdity—they illuminate the human capacity to confront silence, endure uncertainty, and act meaningfully in a universe that remains ultimately incommunicable, offering audiences an aesthetic, ethical, and spiritual encounter that is both intimate and universally resonant.

LATIN AND GERMANIC ELEMENTS IN ENGLISH: A LINGUISTIC AND CULTURAL ANALYSIS

Paul-Cristian Albu
PhD, Student, University of Craiova

Abstract: English is a hybrid language, shaped by the interplay of its Germanic roots and Latin-derived vocabulary acquired through historical, cultural, and intellectual influences. Approximately 60% of English words are of Latin origin, while the Germanic core constitutes roughly 26–30% of the total lexicon, forming the foundation of grammar, syntax, and essential vocabulary. This article examines how these dual elements coexist, focusing on their contributions to daily communication, literature, and cognitive processing. The Germanic layer anchors English in emotional immediacy and idiomatic expression, while the Latinate layer provides abstraction, formality, and literary sophistication. By exploring historical channels, literary examples, and stylistic implications, this study highlights the complementary nature of English's dual heritage and its enduring impact on expression and thought.

I. Introduction

English emerged as a linguistic palimpsest, merging the Germanic speech of Anglo-Saxon settlers with Latin-derived vocabulary acquired via Norman French, ecclesiastical Latin, and Renaissance scholarship. Roughly 60% of English words are Latin-derived, introduced through law, religion, literature, and science (Baugh & Cable, 2013: 31). Meanwhile, the Germanic element, constituting about 26–30% of the lexicon, forms the backbone of everyday communication, idiomatic phrases, and narrative immediacy (Crystal, 2010: 81).

This duality is not merely historical; it shapes the stylistic and cognitive potential of English. Germanic roots provide concise, concrete, and emotionally resonant words, anchoring narrative clarity and oral storytelling. Latinate words enrich the language with abstract, polysyllabic, and formal registers, essential for philosophy, law, science, and literature. The coexistence of these layers enables English speakers to navigate multiple expressive domains, from colloquial speech to scholarly discourse.

The following sections explore the lexical, syntactic, and stylistic roles of Latin and Germanic elements, demonstrating how they interact to produce a language of unique flexibility and expressive power.

English occupies a distinctive position among European languages due to its hybrid etymology. Its Germanic roots provide the language with a structural and emotional foundation, while Latin-derived words—transmitted directly and via Norman French—introduce conceptual precision, abstraction, and stylistic flexibility. The historical evolution of English, from Old English through Middle English to Modern English, reflects successive waves of cultural, political, and scholarly influence, producing a lexicon of unparalleled depth.

This dual heritage is not merely historical; it shapes modern linguistic functionality. Germanic elements dominate daily speech, idioms, and basic syntax, whereas Latin-derived words structure formal, literary, scientific, and technical discourse. By analyzing the quantitative and qualitative distribution of these components, we can better understand English's unique adaptability, its stylistic range, and its enduring global prominence (Baugh & Cable, 2013: 178; Crystal, 2019: 45).

II. The Latin Influence

A. Lexical Expansion

The Latin-derived lexicon constitutes the majority of English words, with estimates around 60% of the total vocabulary (Algeo, 1991: 120). These words dominate formal, technical, and abstract registers, appearing in law (legislation, jurisdiction), philosophy (virtue, ethics), science (species, experiment), and literature (tragedy, narrative).

Polysyllabic and formal, Latinate words contrast with the concise, monosyllabic Germanic words. For instance, commence (Latinate) conveys a formal beginning, while start (Germanic) is direct and practical. Similarly, assist is more precise and formal than help. This layering allows English to balance abstract discourse with concrete expression (Harper, 2020: 18).

B. Historical Channels

Ecclesiastical Latin: Introduced religious and moral vocabulary, e.g., sacrament, angel, monk.
Norman French: After 1066, French, heavily Latinate, contributed administrative, legal, and aristocratic terms like government, justice, royal.

Renaissance Humanism: Latin scholarship infused intellectual and scientific vocabulary, including philosophy, science, literature, reflecting English engagement with European learning (Crystal, 2010: 82).

C. Literary Impact

Latinate vocabulary has been crucial in poetic and scholarly registers, enabling elevated tone and conceptual precision. Writers such as Milton and Pope favored Latinate diction for abstraction, while prose writers use it to convey intellectual sophistication.

III. The Germanic Core

A. Lexical Foundation

The Germanic element forms roughly 26–30% of English vocabulary (Baugh & Cable, 2013: 31). This includes basic nouns (man, house, child), verbs (eat, run, sleep), adjectives (good, dark, long), and pronouns (he, she, we). These words are monosyllabic, concrete, and emotionally resonant, enabling immediacy in communication.

B. Syntax and Grammar

English grammar retains Germanic structural elements, including:
Subject-verb-object word order
Phrasal verbs (give up, look after)
Pluralization and tense formation
Even Latinate-heavy sentences follow Germanic syntactic rules, illustrating the foundational role of the Germanic layer (Barber, 2000: 142).

C. Literary and Narrative Role

Germanic roots underpin oral storytelling, idiomatic expression, and emotional resonance. Epic poetry like Beowulf relied on Germanic alliteration and rhythm, a pattern that continues in modern narrative and idiomatic expression. Germanic vocabulary grounds English in tangible, visceral imagery, complementing the abstraction of Latin-derived words.

IV. Interaction and Stylistic Synthesis

A. Cognitive Effects

The dual heritage of English supports multilevel communication. Germanic words provide immediacy and clarity, while Latinate words allow abstraction and nuance. Speakers can switch registers, producing sentences that are simultaneously accessible and intellectually sophisticated (Algeo, 1991: 123).

B. Literary Applications

Authors exploit this duality for stylistic contrast. Shakespeare alternates Germanic and Latinate diction to balance emotion and intellect, while modern writers employ Germanic vocabulary for directness and Latinate words for conceptual depth. This interplay enhances literary rhythm, tone, and expressive flexibility.

V. Conclusion

English is a linguistic synthesis, where Germanic roots (~26–30% of the vocabulary) provide structural and emotional foundation, and Latin-derived words (~60%) enrich abstraction and intellectual discourse. The interplay of these elements underpins English's flexibility, stylistic nuance, and literary richness. Germanic vocabulary ensures clarity, immediacy, and idiomatic expression, while Latin vocabulary allows English to convey elevated, formal, and technical concepts. This dual heritage remains a defining feature of the language, enabling it to meet the communicative demands of everyday life, literature, and scholarship alike.

The examination of English as a linguistic synthesis reveals a complex interplay between its Germanic and Latin elements, an interplay that has shaped the language's character, versatility, and expressive power over centuries. The Germanic component, constituting roughly 26–30% of the lexicon, forms the structural backbone of the language. It is present not only in core vocabulary—words denoting family, body parts, basic actions, and everyday objects—but also in grammatical constructs, idiomatic expressions, and syntactic patterns that have persisted from Old English to contemporary usage. This layer carries an immediacy and emotional resonance that allows speakers to communicate with clarity, intimacy, and directness, grounding abstract thought in concrete, lived experience. Phrasal verbs, compound words, and monosyllabic forms illustrate the Germanic preference for functional economy, reinforcing the sense of English as a language that is accessible, adaptive, and deeply human.

By contrast, the Latin-derived component, representing approximately 60% of English vocabulary, introduces a layer of abstraction, conceptual depth, and stylistic refinement. It entered the language through multiple historical channels—ecclesiastical Latin, Norman French, and Renaissance scholarship—and has continued to expand through science, law, and philosophy. Latin words, often polysyllabic and formal, enable precision and subtlety in intellectual, literary, and technical discourse. They allow writers and speakers to convey nuanced arguments, complex ideas, and elevated tones, providing English with a cognitive elasticity unmatched by languages with a single etymological foundation. This layer complements the Germanic core, ensuring that the language can oscillate between plain, immediate expression and highly conceptualized thought, a duality central to both literary artistry and practical communication.

The coexistence of these two elements also illuminates the stylistic and aesthetic richness of English. In literature, the Germanic element contributes to rhythm, narrative drive, and emotional immediacy, while Latinate vocabulary supplies formality, intellectual gravitas, and lexical density. Authors from Chaucer to Shakespeare, Milton to Virginia Woolf, have exploited this duality to craft texts that are simultaneously grounded and elevated, intelligible yet profound. In contemporary registers, from journalistic prose to scientific writing, the balance between Germanic clarity and Latin abstraction continues to define English as a language capable of precision, subtlety, and artistic expression.

Moreover, this dual heritage underscores the adaptive resilience of English. Its Germanic foundation anchors it in the everyday and the familiar, ensuring communicative efficacy, while its Latin superstructure allows for innovation, cross-cultural exchange, and engagement with abstract concepts. English's hybrid nature makes it uniquely suited to serve as a global lingua franca, accommodating both informal conversational needs and formal academic or technical discourse. Far from being a static artifact, English is a dynamic, evolving system in which the interplay of etymological layers reflects centuries of social, cultural, and intellectual development.

In sum, understanding the balance between Germanic and Latin elements in English provides insights not only into the language's history but also into its cognitive, stylistic, and functional capacities. The Germanic and Latin layers are not merely additive but synergistic, creating a language that can simultaneously speak to the human, the intellectual, and the aesthetic dimensions of experience. This duality—of immediacy and abstraction, concreteness and sophistication—is the hallmark of English and a testament to the enduring influence of its hybrid roots. Recognizing this interplay allows linguists, literary scholars, and language learners alike to appreciate why English has maintained both its communicative effectiveness and its capacity for expressive richness, from everyday conversation to the heights of literature and scholarly discourse.

Discussion

This distribution highlights several points:

Germanic roots provide the emotional and structural backbone of English, ensuring that even highly abstract discourse retains clarity through familiar syntax and connectors.

Latin-derived vocabulary allows for conceptual nuance, stylistic sophistication, and technical precision, particularly in literature, science, law, and academia.

The balance between these two etymological sources contributes to English's expressive versatility: writers can shift seamlessly between immediate, vivid language and elevated, formal diction.

The hybrid character of English reflects its historical evolution—from Old English Germanic foundations, enriched by Norman French and Latin scholarship—to its modern status as a global language.

FROM TIMIȘOARA TO ZURICH: THE TOPOGRAPHY OF THE SOUL AND THE (RE)DEFINITION OF ROOTS IN THE WORK AND CRITICAL RECEPTION OF CĂTĂLIN DORIAN FLORESCU

Mirela-Cristina Coman (Liuță)
PhD Student, „Ștefan cel Mare" University of Suceava

Abstract: This study investigates how the work of the German-speaking writer Cătălin Dorian Florescu has been received and interpreted in Romanian and international critical discourse, focusing on the intersection between the migratory experience, the construction of hybrid identity and the influence of his initial training as a psychotherapist. It analyzes the context of his late discovery in Romania, marked by international success (Adelbert von Chamisso Award, Anna Seghers Award) and explores the evolution of critical reception through the concepts of "topography of the soul" and liquid migration (Bauman). Florescu's work becomes emblematic of the identity crisis of contemporary man, a tension that the writer relives on a personal level, manifested by the constant need to return to the country and maintain contact with his birthplace, friends and family. However, he refuses the label of national writer, assuming his identity as a European writer and delimiting himself from his creations by firmly rejecting the autobiographical element, in favor of the pure literary creative act. Literature thus becomes a means of redefining the self, not through confession, but through the fictionalization of universal human experiences.

Keywords: identity; migration; topography of the soul; hybridity; reception.

Esența operei lui Cătălin Dorian Florescu îl definește ca un exemplu paradigmatic al scriitorului contemporan, navigând cu o conștiință profundă între multiple spații culturale și lingvistice. Născut în 1967 la Timișoara, Florescu a trăit o ruptură existențială la vârsta de cincisprezece ani, emigrând la Zürich în 1982. Această traiectorie personală a condus la o reflecție literară permanentă asupra locului în lume, scrierile sale oscilând între România natală, Elveția adoptivă și America, creând astfel o geografie literară complexă și stratificată. Deși Florescu a fost format inițial ca psihoterapeut, realizând o tranziție radicală către cariera de scriitor independent abia în 2001, formarea sa inițială conferă literaturii sale o sensibilitate aparte pentru dimensiunile psihologice ale exilului și migrației. De altfel, tocmai relația dintre cunoștințele sale aprofundate de psihologie – prima sa meserie – și expresia literară reprezintă o grilă de lectură esențială, făcând ca teme precum trauma istorică, memoria și reconstrucția sinelui să fie analizate nu doar estetic, ci și prin prisma unor procese interioare complexe.

Recunoașterea sa internațională a precedat cu mult descoperirea sa pe plan național. Opera sa a fost distinsă cu premii prestigioase, precum Premiul Adelbert von Chamisso (2002) pentru literatura germanofonă și Premiul Anna Seghers (2003), consacrându-l ca o voce distinctă în peisajul literar european. Succesul fulminant al romanului său de debut, Vremea minunilor (2001), a fost amplificat de recenziile generoase apărute în presa germană. În consecință, accesul cititorilor români la primul său roman nu s-a datorat unui descoperitor concret, ci s-a produs la nivel editorial: romanul a fost tradus și a cunoscut lumina tiparului la Editura Humanitas din București în 2005.

Acest moment a marcat intrarea oficială a scriitorului în circuitul literar național. Odată cu succesul romanului tradus, au început să apară și articolele din spațiul românesc dedicate scriitorului, fiind împărțite în recenzii, interviuri, articole de fond și eseuri, adesea generate în contextul apariției unui nou roman. Critica literară românească a abordat opera cu o atenție particulară, evidențiind dimensiunile sale distinctive și contribuția sa la literatura contemporană. S-a remarcat o fascinație pentru modul în care autorul reușește să articuleze experiența emigrării și a construcției unei identități duble, subliniind în mod recurent o melancolie tandră echilibrată de un umor laconic.

Receptarea însă nu a fost uniformă, oscilând între elogiu și rezervă critică. Prima recenzie critică majoră în presa literară românească la traducerea romanului Vremea minunilor a fost cea a lui Ovidiu Șimonca în Observator cultural (2005), intitulată Ciornele nereuşite ale minunilor. Textul atrăgea atenția prin faptul că Șimonca lăuda succesul lui Florescu în Elveția, dar judeca romanul ca fiind ambivalent din punct de vedere artistic:

Cu tot succesul sau in Elvetia, Catalin Dorian Florescu era necunoscut publicului romanesc si aici cred ca avem o parte din vina – aceea de a fi prea inchisi in cercul nostru strimt si rece, cu privirile mult prea absorbite in prosternarea propriului nostru buric.

Vremea minunilor este un debut in limba romana. Se produce o recuperare necesara. Succesul autorului, care a facut furori in Occident, ar trebui cunoscut si acasa; este si ceea ce se intimpla prin aceasta talmacire oferita de Editura Polirom. Recuperarea este cu atit mai stringenta cu cit autorul a izbindit in Occident cu o poveste tesuta in Romania comunista. Aici insa se bifurca doua niveluri ale discutiei. Primul: de ce a avut un succes imens in Elvetia o asemenea carte? Al doilea motiv: cum va fi receptat volumul in spatiul romanesc? Ambele niveluri au insa un numitor comun: este Catalin Dorian Florescu un autor talentat sau doar unul de succes? Parerea noastra este ca Vremea minunilor se pliaza pe o moda, aceea de a discuta comunismul si tot ce a insemnat acest sistem pentru tarile est-comuniste intr-un mod lejer, chiar superficial. Romanul este un scurt manual de intrebuintare a comunismului, nu are prea multe pretentii sa zguduie constiinte, sa sminteasca anumite crezuri despre „binefacerile“ sistemului.(Șimonca 2005)

Pe de altă parte, vocile entuziaste au apărut rapid, remarcând maturitatea prozei lui Florescu în romanul Drumul scurt spre casă. Un alt caz notabil de receptare nuanțată este cel al romanului Zaira. Deși acesta a generat recenzii numeroase, inclusiv pe bloguri literare și în HotNews, au existat și voci critice, precum cea a lui Marius Chivu în articolul Zairezada, care îi reproșa scriitorului că pierde firul epic principal pe alte fire epice secundare și că nu reușește să facă din Zaira un personaj puternic până la final:

Cu destine, întîmplări şi secrete de familie întinse de-a lungul unui secol, două dictaturi, două continente şi patru generaţii, romanul Zairei se lungeşte prea mult, se diluează, îşi pierde din tensiune din cauza părţilor de umplutură şi a acumulării poveştilor incidente. Capitolele exilului american nefericit (temă reluată din Vremea minunilor, Washington înlocuind New York-ul), în care decorul, atmosfera şi personajele comunităţii de imigranţi se schimbă complet, funcţionează aproape ca un roman separat. Salturile în timpuri şi locuri diferite lasă în urmă multe personaje, iar cele noi nu fac decît să-şi adauge istoriile personale (devine previzibil felul în care fiecare ajunge să-şi povestească propria viaţă şi să-şi releve secretul).

Acest tip de roman – cel mai ambiţios, totuşi, din cariera lui Cătălin Dorian Florescu – ar fi cerut, pur şi simplu, un alt tip de narator. Scindată între rolul de memorialistă subiectivă a propriei vieţi de marionetă (influenţată din umbră fie de fostul amant al mamei – păpuşarul bun, fie de activistul Dumitru – păpuşarul rău) şi rolul de Şeherezadă omniscientă a unor destine străine, naratoarea Zaira este supralicitată, iar romanul de aproape 500 de pagini iese, din păcate, dezechilibrat şi inegal. Sînt multe lucruri bune de citit aici, dar şi destule peste care ai vrea să treci mai repede.. (Chivu 2010)

În contrast, romanul Jacob se hotărăște să iubească, publicat la Polirom în 2012, a fost tratat de presă drept un roman mare, fiind elogiat de critici precum Oana Ghiță, care remarca faptul că romanele lui Cătălin Dorian Florescu sunt „ale migrărilor și ale întîlnirilor peste timp. Migrări care sînt tot atîtea supraviețuiri și întîlniri care sînt iubiri si rostuiri. Și mai sînt și surghiunurile, ghetourile, deportările. E o lume în fermentare, în mișcare, hălăduită, amestecată, cu bune și rele” (Ghiță 2018). De la recenzii prudente la recunoașterea unanimă a valorii – confirmă faptul că opera lui Florescu a fost tratată cu seriozitate și că a suscitat dezbateri vii. Cu toate acestea, în ciuda recunoașterii valorii sale literare și a faptului că romanele sale sunt extrem de premiate în spațiul european și traduse în mai multe limbi, se remarcă o discrepanță notabilă în spațiul literar românesc, unde scriitorul Cătălin Dorian Florescu nu se bucură de aceeași apreciere elogioasă și a rămas adesea perceput ca un scriitor secund, mărunt. Această situare într-un con de umbră ridică întrebări esențiale privind mecanismele de legitimare culturală. De ce romanele lui Florescu nu au generat analize consistente din partea unor critici literari importanți din generația de referință, precum Nicolae Manolescu sau Alex Ștefănescu (deși acesta din urmă a scris despre literatura migrației, o analiză dedicată lipsește adesea)? O posibilă explicație ar putea fi faptul că subiectele complexe ale romanelor sale – despre fragmentare identitară, migrație, reziliență și bilingvism – depășesc orizontul de așteptare al criticii românești clasice, care tinde să privilegieze coerența națională. S-ar putea ca seria de critici mai în vârstă să se simtă depășită de subiectele postmoderniste și transnaționale, iar generația tânără de critici literari să nu fie încă pregătită sau suficient de vizibilă pentru a impune o nouă ierarhie valorică. Astfel, succesul de necontestat atins de Florescu în spațiul european, unde romanele sale sunt traduse în numeroase limbi, contrastează izbitor cu statutul său relativ marginalizat în țara natală, sugerând o reticență culturală în a integra pe deplin vocile diasporei care scriu în altă limbă.

O investigație aprofundată a modului în care opera lui Florescu a fost receptată facilitează explorarea intersecției dintre experiența migratorie, construcția identității și expresia literară. Studiul de față se concentrează pe analiza comparativă a receptării prin examinarea articolelor de specialitate din România și Germania. Explorarea modului în care topografia sufletului și rădăcinile identitare sunt tematizate constituie nucleul interpretativ, conceptele metaforice devenind instrumente analitice esențiale.

În interviurile acordate, Florescu articulează o viziune asupra identității ca proces dinamic și fluid, respingând noțiunea esențialistă. Conceptul de „topografia sufletului" revine frecvent, fiind descris ca o hartă interioară a memoriei și dorului, sugerând că identitatea se construiește prin stratificarea experiențelor legate de diverse locuri geografice, creând un peisaj interior compozit și multiplu. Conversațiile cu critici subliniază complexitatea rădăcinilor sale, Florescu vorbind deschis despre provocările scrisului în germană ca limbă adoptată și despre modul în care cele două sisteme lingvistice modelează expresia literară.

Studiul comparativ al articolelor de specialitate publicate în spațiul german și cel românesc relevă interpretări distinctive. Critica germană tinde să situeze opera în contextul mai larg al literaturii migrante (Migrationsliteratur), analizând-o prin prisma dezbaterilor despre multiculturalism, valorizând pozitiv hibriditatea. Critica românească, pe de altă parte, accentuează dimensiunea memoriei istorice, a traumei comuniste și a experienței exilului. Un aspect remarcabil evidențiat în analize este impactul bilingvismului și al experienței transnaționale.

Opera lui Florescu se constituie ca un laborator literar pentru explorarea modului în care rădăcinile identitare se (re)negociază în contextul mobilității contemporane și al globalizării culturale, propunând o viziune asupra identității ca entitate hibridă, dinamică și plurală. Personajele sale exemplifică această identitate în flux constant, care oscilează între nostalgia pentru România și adaptarea la realitatea elvețiană, între limba română a copilăriei și limba germană a maturității. Critica literară devine astfel un spațiu de dialog între tradiție și modernitate, contribuind la redefinirea conceptelor de națiune, apartenență și rădăcini în epoca contemporană.

Traseul de la Timișoara la Zürich nu este doar o călătorie geografică, ci o traversare a straturilor identitare, lingvistice și culturale. Această hartă simbolică ilustrează topografia complexă a sufletului migrant, unde distanțele fizice se suprapun cu distanțele temporale și afective. Timișoara este punctul de origine, spațiul copilăriei și al memoriei primare, un topos literar recurent, în timp ce Zürich devine spațiul adoptiv, locul redefinirii și al construcției unei noi identități.

Această dinamică spațială a fost adânc explorată de critica, care observă cum geografia fizică se transformă în geografie afectivă. De exemplu, în analiza sa din 2023 publicată în Puterea a cincea.ro, Melania Cincea surprinde esența acestei geografii interioare prin citarea autorului: „Literatura mea provine dintr-o sursă de tandrețe și de iubire față de meleagurile natale". Această declarație a scriitorului corelează perfect cu viziunea academică a geografiei literare (literary geography) promovată de teoreticieni precum Franco Moretti, care analizează modul în care spațiul devine un element narativ structurant și simbolic, mai degrabă decât un simplu fundal. În cazul lui Florescu, locurile natale nu sunt doar amintite, ci sunt reactivate ca forțe generatoare ale discursului. Conexiunea dintre Timișoara, Zürich și restul spațiilor narative nu este una întâmplătoare, ci reprezintă o rețea de „legături", acele fire invizibile – memoria, limba, relațiile afective, literatura însăși – care constituie substanța topografiei sufletului, o geografie interioară care transcende limitele fizice și temporale. Această hartă conceptuală subliniază că identitatea nu se situează într-un singur punct fix, ci se desfășoară pe un teritoriu vast și complex, unde multiple apartenențe coexistă și se influențează reciproc, creând o țesătură identitară bogată și stratificată.

Continuând analiza recepției în spațiul românesc, se observă că, dincolo de articolele recurente care însoțesc fiecare traducere, un rol important în (re)integrarea imaginii autorului îl joacă prezența sa fizică în țară. Turneul de lecturi publice intitulat „Cu Estul în spinare", desfășurat pentru a promova cel mai recent roman al său prin mai multe orașe din țară – printre care Sibiu, Brașov, Iași și București – a generat o nouă undă de interes critic, în special în rândul tinerilor exegeți. De pildă, în articolul intitulat „Turnul focului sau despre istoria eroică a unei familii de pompieri", apărut în revista Ficțiunea, la numărul 200/110 din noiembrie 2024, tânărul critic literar Ciprian Handru analizează impactul și tematica noului roman. Asemenea demersuri subliniază nu doar continuitatea actului creator al lui Florescu, ci și efortul constant de a negocia și menține o legătură vie cu publicul românesc. Aceste evenimente publice, care aduc autorul în dialog direct cu cititorii din diverse regiuni, contribuie esențial la combaterea percepției sale ca „scriitor secund" și la stabilirea unui statut de autor transnațional, ale cărui rădăcini sunt permanent revitalizate prin contactul direct cu spațiul natal. Această dinamică a deplasării și a apartenențelor multiple poate fi interpretată prin prisma conceptului de migrație lichidă dezvoltat de Zygmunt Bauman, care descrie mobilitatea umană în epoca globalizării ca fiind fluidă, nesecvențială și lipsită de destinații finale clare:

Acestea sunt motive pentru a considera „fluiditatea" sau „lichiditatea" drept metafore potrivite atunci când dorim să înțelegem natura etapei actuale, în multe privințe inedite, din istoria modernității. Sunt de acord cu tărie că o astfel de propoziție ar putea stârni o pauză oricui este familiarizat cu „discursul modernității" și cu vocabularul folosit în mod obișnuit pentru a nara istoria modernă. Nu a fost modernitatea un proces de „lichefiere" încă de la început? Nu a fost „topirea solidelor" principala sa distracție și principala sa realizare de la bun început? Cu alte cuvinte, nu a fost modernitatea „fluidă" încă de la începuturile sale? (Bauman 2-3: 2000)[1]

Florescu, plecat din Timișoara la vârsta adolescenței și stabilit la Zürich ca adult cu o carieră asumată în literatură și psihoterapie, devine o imagine simbolică a omului actual, a cărui identitate se construiește prin cumulul fragmentar al etapelor experiențelor sale identitare, trăind o viață între „acasă" și „nicăieri", aparținând, paradoxal, tuturor și nimănui. Această realitate este asumată explicit de autor în discursul său public. Astfel, în interviul acordat lui George Cornilă în Matca Literară, Florescu afirmă fără echivoc:

„Eu nu mă văd ca un scriitor român, ci ca un scriitor european, de origine română și de expresie germană. Complexitatea aceasta trebuie acceptată în timpurile pe care le trăim. Scriitorul național devine un fel de fosilă. Scriitorii tineri, mai tineri decât noi, vor trăi în diferite părți ale lumii, vor dori să scrie despre acea experiență, fie în limba maternă, fie într-o alta. Lumea globalizată este complexă și așa este și identitatea scriitorului. În România, imigrația abia a început. Cât timp cei care vin în România din alte părți ale lumii nu încep să scrie – ei sau copiii lor – rămân notabili Mircea Cărtărescu și alți câțiva.

În spațiul german există însă o literatură care primește cele mai mari premii și ai cărei autori, în mare parte, se vând bine. Dar pe lângă aceștia există o multitudine de alți autori, și în Elveția, și în Germania, și în Austria, cu nume străine, de origine turcă, iraniană și așa mai departe. Ei sunt literatură națională elvețiană? În momentul în care un stat și o societate se deschid spre globalizare, nu doar la nivel economic, pentru a cumpăra produse made in China, ci și la nivel de identitate, se poate ajunge să se spună: „Florescu este scriitorul nostru național". Faptul că Florescu povestește despre România aparține realității noastre de azi. Oamenii se mișcă, pleacă, se întorc, rămân sau merg mai departe. Pentru mine, o perspectivă prea îngustă asupra a ceea ce e sau nu e literatura națională nu mai e potrivită timpurilor noastre cu identități schimbătoare. Petrecem mult timp în multe locuri și poate vrem să scriem despre ele. De aceea nu mai există o formulă reducționistă a cine suntem. Și nu mai suntem doar „un", ci suntem „și, și, și". Avem măcar trei-patru ipostaze. Eu, cel puțin, am.." (Cornilă 2024)

[1] Traducere proprie după textul original: „ These are reasons to consider 'fluidity' or 'liquidity' as fitting metaphors when we wish to grasp the nature of the present, in many ways novel, phase in the history of modernity. I readily agree that such a proposition may give a pause to anyone at home in the 'modernity discourse' and familiar with the vocabulary commonly used to narrate modern history. Was not modernity a process of 'liquefaction' from the start? Was not 'melting the solids' its major pastime and prime accomplishment all along? In other words, has modernity not been 'fluid' since its inception? (Bauman 2-3: 2000)

El subliniază că lumea globalizată impune o paradigmă a identităților schimbătoare – „nu mai suntem doar «un», ci suntem «și, și, și»” – argumentând că o perspectivă prea îngustă asupra literaturii naționale nu mai este potrivită, mai ales când, în spațiul german, o vastă literatură a migrației primește cele mai mari premii. Tocmai această autodefinire, care îl poziționează ca scriitor european de expresie germană, nu doar de origine română, ar putea fi motivul fundamental pentru care el nu este pe deplin asumat de spațiul literar românesc. În lipsa unei categorii critice clare pentru „scriitorul european de origine română”, Florescu este considerat mai degrabă un scriitor elvețian, o pierdere a canonului național. Afirmațiile sale, deși promovează o viziune deschisă, globalizantă a frumosului literar, pusă în slujba iubirii universale, ar putea fi resimțite de critica românească tradițională drept o formă de „aroganță” sau, mai blând, ca semnul orgoliului scriitorului talentat dornic să câștige faima internațională. Totuși, analiza operei dezvăluie o dimensiune mult mai profundă, care transcende orgoliul. Este vorba despre necesitatea de regăsire a păcii și de rezolvare a crizelor identitare, a scindărilor interioare. Deși el afirmă că „nimic nu e mort, nimic nu e trecut” și că „tocmai ca să nu moară acel băiat din Timișoara am scris despre el”, literatura devine actul esențial de recuperare a timpului fragmentat. Elocvent, Florescu meditează asupra multiplelor sale versiuni: „Băiatul născut în România comunistă, băiatul ajuns în America pentru a începe o nouă viață doar pentru a se întoarce, psihoterapeutul elvețian” – toți acești „morți pe care le suferim în timpul vieții” sunt revigorați. Literatura sa nu este doar nostalgie inocentă, ci o formă de reziliență psihologică și istorică.

Această evoluție tematică și narativă este detaliată de autor în același interviu, unde explică modul în care eul său, inițial foarte prezent, se distanțează progresiv în favoarea unor panorame mai vaste. Florescu descrie parcursul său literar ca o mișcare de la apropiere maximă – vizibilă în Vremea minunilor și Drumul scurt spre casă, cărți în care era foarte prezent un eu căutător, întors acasă sau plecând de acasă – spre o distanțare narativă. Trecerea la Zaira reprezintă un prim pas spre exteriorizare, fiind „cartea unei femei”, deși tema exilului rămâne. Chiar și în descrierea vieții la țară din Zaira – pe care autorul, fiind orășean, nu a trăit-o, dar și-a dorit-o, evocând-o ca o lume plină de magie, ca la Sadoveanu, înainte de venirea comuniștilor – dorința de a da acestui univers un loc amplu pornește tot din plăcerea sa de a descrie o astfel de viață, sugerând o recuperare imaginară, compensatorie. „Așadar, dorința de a da acestui univers un loc amplu în roman conduce tot la mine. Alegerea de a face acest lucru provine din plăcerea mea de a descrie o astfel de viață” (Florescu în Cornilă 2024). Însă, el subliniază tendința sa mai recentă de îndepărtare: „Turnul focului nu pare să aibă de-a face cu mine. Nu mai apare tema emigrației. Totul se învârte, de-a lungul a o sută de ani, în jurul acestui turn din București.” Această mișcare către o panoramă amplă, care începe la 1892, indică o fascinație constantă pentru „lumea veche”, pe care o consideră sursa poeziei și a magiei necesare creației, deplângând totodată faptul că „lumea de astăzi mi se pare aproape lipsită de magie.” Astfel, scriitorul își deplasează focarul de la criza identitară personală, specifică migrației, la criza istorică și spirituală a unei lumi moderne, lipsite de lirism, continuând însă să caute în trecutul bogat și complex sursa narațiunilor sale, fie ele din Timișoara sau din Bucureștiul de altădată.

A nu uita trecutul – care, conform lui Florescu, „este întotdeauna prezent” și vizibil în consecințele sale geopolitice (precum războiul din Ucraina) – devine o responsabilitate morală a scriitorului, „adunătorul de povești”. Astfel, demersul său literar este o necesitate de întregire a propriei identități fragmentate, de a da o voce băiatului din Timișoara pentru ca acesta să nu fie cu totul pierdut, transpunând criza personală în contribuție la înțelegerea veacului.

Concluziv, analiza receptării critice a operei lui Cătălin Dorian Florescu, stimulată inițial de ecoul internațional și aprofundată prin lentila formării sale ca psiholog, dezvăluie o lucrare literară de o complexitate remarcabilă. Multilateralitatea critică – de la elogii la recenzii rezervate, cu mențiunea marginalizării sale relative în spațiul autohton – confirmă impactul serios al operei. Conceptul de „topografia sufletului" se cristalizează ca metaforă fundamentală pentru înțelegerea căutării rădăcinilor în exil. Florescu exemplifică dinamica identității în literatura contemporană globalizată, reamintindu-ne că toți suntem, într-un fel sau altul, migranți în căutarea sensului și a locului nostru în lume, iar acasă nu mai este un loc singular, ci o constelație de spații, limbi și memorii.

ELEMENTS OF FANTASTIC AND THE MIRACULOUS IN THE STORIES AND LEGENDS OF VÂLCEA

Elena Mihaela Cătălina (Miroiu)
PhD Student, University of Craiova

Abstract: The fantastic emphasizes the exceptional and the departure from the natural order of the world, the miraculous reinforces the idea of moral order and protection of the faithful. Through these narratives, the Vâlcea communities have built an identity deeply marked by the conviction in the direct intervention of the sacred in their daily lives. The miraculous, in the legendary context of Vâlcea, is a form of articulation of the relationship between man and divinity

Elemente de fantastic și miraculos în povestirile și legendele din Vâlcea

Zona Vâlcii reprezintă un spațiu încărcat de istorie, tradiții și o bogată cultură orală, în care elementele de fantastic și miraculos se regăsesc cu pregnanță în narațiunile populare. De la legendele despre haiduci și domnitori, până la basmele cu zmei și iele, imaginația colectivă a locuitorilor s-a hrănit din nevoia de a explica misterele lumii înconjurătoare.

Ne propunem să explorămaceste elemente, să le analizăm funcțiile și simbolistica, oferind totodată exemple reprezentative din zona Vâlcii, astfel încât cititorul să poată pătrunde în universul fascinant al tradiției orale românești.

Înainte de a analiza în profunzime elementele de fantastic și miraculos din povestirile și legendele vâlcene, este necesar să stabilim un cadru teoretic solid, prin definirea și delimitarea conceptelor de bază. Termenii „fantastic” și „miraculos” sunt adesea utilizați împreună în analiza literaturii orale, însă fiecare are particularități și funcții distincte, care se reflectă în modul în care sunt construite narațiunile populare.

1. Definirea conceptelor

Definirea fantasticului

Conceptul de fantastic a fost abordat de numeroși teoreticieni ai literaturii, însă una dintre cele mai influente definiții aparține lui Tzvetan Todorov, în Introducere în literatura fantastică (1970). Potrivit acestuia, fantasticul apare atunci când într-o povestire realul este pus sub semnul întrebării de apariția unui element inexplicabil, iar personajul și cititorul oscilează între o explicație rațională și una supranaturală. Fantasticul propriu-zis este un moment de ezitare între real și ireal. Dacă explicația este acceptată ca fiind supranaturală, intrăm în registrul straniu sau miraculos, iar dacă este explicată rațional, intrăm în fantasticul explicat.

În literatura orală, fantasticul este adesea asumat direct de către narator și audiență, astfel că ezitarea specifică teoriei lui Todorov este rareori prezentă. În basmele populare, fantasticul nu mai este perceput ca o anomalie, ci ca parte integrantă a lumii ficționale. Prin urmare, în folclor, fantasticul capătă un caracter acceptat, devenind un univers în care zmeii, ielele sau obiectele magice coexistă firesc cu realitatea cotidiană.

Pentru literatura populară, fantasticul înseamnă, așadar, introducerea unor elemente ieșite din comun (creaturi fabuloase, obiecte magice, întâmplări imposibile) într-o narațiune al cărei fir epic respectă de obicei logica internă a lumii respective. Vladimir Propp, în Morfologia basmului (1928), analizează structura basmelor rusești și observă că elementele fantastice sunt constante în anumite funcții narative (de exemplu, dăruirea obiectului magic sau apariția ajutătorului supranatural).

Definirea miraculosului

Miraculosul este o categorie aparte a supranaturalului, distinctă de fantastic. Spre deosebire de fantastic, miraculosul este acceptat aprioric de comunitatea narativă, fiind asociat cu intervenția divină sau cu puteri supranaturale legitime. Miracolul nu produce ezitare, ci este considerat o expresie a sacrului sau a voinței divine.

În folclorul românesc, miraculosul apare frecvent în legendele religioase și în povestirile despre sfinți, mănăstiri, icoane făcătoare de minuni sau izvoare tămăduitoare. Astfel de narațiuni nu urmăresc crearea unei tensiuni între real și ireal, ci transmit un mesaj moral, spiritual sau de întărire a credinței. Miraculosul are o funcție hagiografică, fiind întâlnit și în legendele legate de ctitorii de biserici și mănăstiri sau în poveștile despre sfântul protector al unei localități.

Delimitarea fantasticului de miraculos

Deși fantasticul și miraculosul pot coexista în aceeași povestire, ele se diferențiază prin statutul lor epistemologic:

- Fantasticul provoacă ezitare și surpriză, fiind o rupture în ordinea naturală a lucrurilor, cel puțin pentru personajele implicate.
- Miraculosul este acceptat, integrat în ordinea divină, fiind perceput ca o intervenție benefică sau pedagogică.

Un exemplu sugestiv pentru această distincție îl reprezintă legendele despre mănăstirile din Vâlcea. Povestirile despre apariția miraculoasă a izvoarelor tămăduitoare din jurul Mănăstirii Frăsinei aparțin registrului miraculosului, pe când basmele despre iele care locuiesc în pădurile de lângă Horezu sau Olănești țin de fantasticul propriu-zis.

Fantasticul și miraculosul în literatura orală românească

În literatura populară românească, fantasticul și miraculosul nu sunt niciodată în opoziție, ci complementare. Basmul popular introduce cititorul sau ascultătorul într-o lume în care fantasticul este firesc, iar miraculosul vine să întărească dimensiunea sacră a narațiunii. De altfel, în multe povestiri, cele două dimensiuni se suprapun: ajutătorii fantastici pot fi percepuți ca trimiși divini, iar minunile relatate pot fi însoțite de evenimente fantastice. În contextul județului Vâlcea, această împletire devine cu atât mai interesantă cu cât zona se remarcă printr-o bogată tradiție monahală și legende legate de figuri istorice care devin personaje legendare.

În concluzie, fantasticul și miraculosul, deși distincte în definire, funcționează în literatura orală ca două fațete ale aceleiași realități supranaturale. În paginile următoare, vom analiza modul în care aceste elemente se concretizează în povestirile și legendele din Vâlcea, punând accent pe originea lor, structura narativă și semnificațiile culturale.

2. Contextul etnografic și geografic al Vâlcii

Orice analiză a folclorului regional trebuie să pornească de la specificul geografic, istoric și cultural al spațiului din care provin povestirile și legendele. Județul Vâlcea este un teritoriu aflat la confluența dintre munte și deal, traversat de râul Olt, bogat în resurse naturale, dar și în mărturii istorice, spirituale și culturale. Acest cadru complex a influențat în mod direct temele, motivele și personajele din literatura orală specifică zonei.

Județul Vâlcea – spațiu al legendelor

Vâlcea este situat în sudul României, în regiunea Olteniei, și se învecinează cu județele Sibiu, Argeș, Olt, Dolj, Gorj și Hunedoara. Relieful său variat – munți, dealuri, podișuri și văi adânci – a favorizat dezvoltarea unor comunități izolate, păstrătoare de tradiții orale vechi. Munții Căpățânii, Lotrului și Parângului domină partea nordică, în timp ce sudul este caracterizat de dealuri și câmpii. Zona a fost locuită încă din preistorie, fiind atestată arheologic încă din epoca bronzului și fierului. Aflată la intersecția unor importante drumuri comerciale și de tranzit (precum valea Oltului), Vâlcea a fost martora multiplelor influențe culturale, care s-au împletit cu elementele locale autohtone.

Centre culturale și spirituale

Una dintre particularitățile definitorii ale județului este prezența numeroaselor mănăstiri, schituri și biserici, care au funcționat nu doar ca centre religioase, ci și ca nuclee de conservare a tradițiilor orale și scrise. Cele mai cunoscute sunt:

- Mănăstirea Cozia – ctitorie a lui Mircea cel Bătrân, cu o bogată tradiție legendară.
- Mănăstirea Frăsinei – „Athosul românesc", înconjurat de numeroase legende legate de reguli aspre și minuni.
- Mănăstirea Bistrița – legată de legenda haiducului Radu din Gorj și de povești despre comori ascunse.
- Mănăstirea Hurezi (sau Horezu) – cel mai important monument de arhitectură brâncovenească, în jurul căruia s-au țesut numeroase povestiri populare.

În plus, Vâlcea este cunoscută pentru stațiunile balneoclimaterice (Olănești, Călimănești, Govora), în jurul cărora circulă numeroase legende legate de izvoare miraculoase, ape tămăduitoare și apariții misterioase.

Bogăția tradițiilor orale

Tradiția orală din Vâlcea include o varietate de genuri folclorice:

- Basmul popular – în special în zonele montane, unde izolarea a favorizat conservarea unor variante arhaice.
- Legenda – atât legende etiologice (explicative), cât și legende istorice sau religioase.
- Povestirile despre haiduci – foarte frecvente în satele de pe valea Oltului și în Munții Căpățânii.
- Snoave și anecdote – în special în zonele de deal, cu o componentă umoristică accentuată.
- Colinde și balade epice – care includ referiri la personaje fantastice și miraculoase.

Această diversitate reflectă nu doar bogăția imaginației populare, ci și modul în care realitatea cotidiană, cu aspirațiile și temerile ei, a fost transfigurată prin mijloace artistice.

Influențe externe și locale

Poziția geografică a județului Vâlcea a favorizat, de-a lungul timpului, întâlnirea dintre elementele culturale autohtone dacice, romane și slave, dar și influențe bizantine, grecești și turcești. De exemplu, în legendele despre comori ascunse în munți apar adesea referiri la „aurul turcilor" sau „comorile boierilor", în timp ce în basmele religioase influențele ortodoxe sunt evidente.Cu toate acestea, caracterul predominant rural al comunităților vâlcene a contribuit la menținerea unui filon arhaic și autentic, în care elementele de fantastic se împletesc firesc cu cotidianul.

Zone folclorice reprezentative în Vâlcea:

- Țara Loviștei – zonă montană, cu tradiții legate de haiduci și refugii ascunse în păduri.
- Horezu – centru important al ceramicii populare, în jurul căruia circulă legende despre meșteri magici și puterea simbolică a motivelor decorative.
- Valea Oltului – loc de tranzit, dar și de conflicte istorice, care au generat legende eroice și basme cu comori ascunse.
- Olănești – cunoscută pentru izvoarele minerale vindecătoare, asociate cu povești miraculoase.

Aceste zone au fost, de asemenea, vizitate de folcloriști și etnografi, iar culegerile realizate aici constituie un material de bază pentru studiul elementelor de fantastic și miraculos.

În concluzie, contextul etnografic și geografic al Vâlcii constituie fundalul ideal pentru dezvoltarea unei literaturi orale bogate în elemente fantastice și miraculoase. Diversitatea reliefului, prezența unor centre spirituale de mare importanță și influențele culturale multiple au creat un cadru în care realul și supranaturalul se împletesc armonios, generând narațiuni pline de farmec și semnificație.

3. Elemente de fantastic în povestirile populare din Vâlcea

Folclorul vâlcean abundă în motive și personaje fantastice, păstrate fie în basme, fie în legende locale. Aceste elemente, deși au corespondente în întreaga cultură românească, capătă în Vâlcea trăsături distincte, adaptate specificului geografic și social al regiunii. În continuare, vom analiza principalele categorii de elemente fantastice prezente în literatura orală vâlceană, ilustrate cu exemple semnificative.

Ființe fantastice

Una dintre cele mai pregnante prezențe în basmele și legendele din Vâlcea o constituie ființele supranaturale. Acestea au origini diverse, unele derivând din mitologia precreștină, altele fiind influențate de imaginarul creștin sau de adaptări locale.

Zmeii și balaurii

- Zmeul este figura malefică prin excelență în basmele românești, iar în Vâlcea acesta apare frecvent ca stăpân al unor comori ascunse în peșteri sau în munți. „O povestire culeasă din zona Loviștei relatează despre un zmeu care locuia în Peștera lui Zmeu din apropierea satului Perișani, păzind un tezaur fermecat”[1]. Legenda spune că, în timpul nopții, zmeul cobora la izvoarele din vale și făcea apa să se învolbureze, semn al prezenței lui malefice.
- Balaurii, variante reptiliene ale zmeilor, sunt asociați adesea cu locuri greu accesibile. În legendele din jurul Munților Căpățânii se povestește despre un balaur cu șapte capete care a provocat seceta într-un sat, fiind învins în final de un tânăr viteaz cu ajutorul unui inel fermecat.
- Ielele și spiritele pădurii. În zona montană a Vâlcii, pădurile sunt frecvent populate de iele – ființe feminine supranaturale, periculoase, cunoscute și sub denumirea de rusalii. În Olănești circulă o legendă despre „Poiana Ielelor, loc în care, se spune, cine pătrundea noaptea era luat în horă și nu mai găsea drumul spre casă”[2]. Ielele sunt descrise ca fiind frumoase, dar răzbunătoare, iar dansul lor lăsa în iarbă urme arse – motiv prezent în numeroase povești locale.
- Strigoii. Deși întâlniți în întreg spațiul românesc, strigoii au o prezență consistentă în poveștile spuse în serile de iarnă în satele vâlcene. Una dintre cele mai cunoscute legende provine din zona Brezoi, unde„se povestește despre o femeie care, după moarte, bântuia satul și cerea lapte de la casele gospodarilor, producând seceta vitelor. Pentru a o opri, sătenii au apelat la un „vraci bătrân”, care a descântat satul timp de trei nopți”[3].

Obiectele magice constituie un element central în desfășurarea acțiunii din basmele fantastice. În poveștile din Vâlcea întâlnim frecvent:

- Săbii fermecate – menționate în basme ca sabia cu flăcări albastre, ce avea puterea de a tăia orice obstacol.
- Inelul magic – cel mai adesea primit de erou din partea unui personaj misterios, în schimbul îndeplinirii unei sarcini grele.
- Cămășile fermecate – în special în basmele culease din zona Horezu, în care eroul reușește să scape de pericole îmbrăcând o cămașă de „foc nevăzut”[4].

Aceste obiecte apar invariabil ca daruri oferite eroului după ce acesta dovedește curaj, generozitate sau inteligență.

Transformările miraculoase. Un motiv fantastic frecvent întâlnit este cel al transformării. În poveștile vâlcene circulă teme precum:

- Oameni transformați în stane de piatră, ca pedeapsă pentru trădare sau lăcomie.
- Animale care vorbesc sau care se transformă în ajutători magici.

- O legendă din zona Călimănești menționează „o fântână fermecată unde o fată răutăcioasă a fost transformată în broască, rămânând astfel pentru a-i învăța pe ceilalți lecția bunătății”[5].

Locuri magice. Geografia Vâlcii a inspirat numeroase legende despre locuri magice, printre care: Peștera lui Zmeu din Loviștea, Poiana Ielelor din Olănești, Izvoarele tămăduitoare din Govora, considerate făcute de mâna lui Dumnezeu.

În multe dintre aceste locuri, tradiția populară recomandă evitarea trecerii pe timp de noapte, existând credința că ființele supranaturale le păzesc și se răzbună pe cei necuviincioși.

Una dintre cele mai cunoscute legende vâlcene cu elemente fantastice apare în Legenda Mănăstirii Frăsinei. Se spune că Sfântul Calinic, „ctitorul mănăstirii, a aruncat un blestem asupra locului, interzicând femeilor să pătrundă în incintă. Pentru a marca limita, Calinic ar fi înfipt în pământ un toiag, iar din acel loc ar fi izvorât un izvor miraculos, care curge până astăzi”[6]. Deși blestemul are un caracter religios, elementul fantastic constă în apariția supranaturală a izvorului la porunca sfântului. În conclzie, elementele fantastice din folclorul vâlcean îndeplinesc o funcție esențială în arhitectura narativă a povestirilor populare. Ele conferă farmec și tensiune narațiunii, fiind totodată purtătoare ale unor semnificații profunde: conflictul dintre bine și rău, încercările necesare maturizării eroului, victoria dreptății. În capitolul următor vom analiza modul în care miraculosul – în special cel religios – își face simțită prezența în legendele vâlcene.

4. Elemente de miraculos în legendele vâlcene

Dacă elementele fantastice vizează în special structura narativă a basmului și a poveștii de tip eroic, miraculosul are, în tradiția populară vâlceană, o orientare preponderent religioasă și morală. El este asociat cu intervenția divinității, a sfinților sau a forțelor providențiale asupra destinului uman. Spre deosebire de fantastic, care introduce o lume paralelă, miraculosul se manifestă în cadrul realității percepute, fiind acceptat de comunitate ca o formă firească a ordinii lumii.

Minuni și intervenții divine. Legendele vâlcene abundă în relatări despre minuni săvârșite de sfinți, icoane făcătoare de minuni sau izvoare cu puteri tămăduitoare. Astfel de povești contribuie la consolidarea sentimentului religios comunitar, dar și la explicarea unor fenomene naturale prin prisma intervenției divine.

Legenda izvorului tămăduitor de la Mănăstirea Dintr-un Lemn. Una dintre cele mai cunoscute legende ale zonei Vâlcii este cea legată de Mănăstirea Dintr-un Lemn. Se spune că „un cioban a găsit în trunchiul unui stejar secular o icoană a Maicii Domnului, care l-a îndemnat, în vis, să ridice o biserică dintr-un singur lemn”[7]. Icoana respectivă este considerată făcătoare de minuni, iar în jurul mănăstirii circulă povești despre oameni bolnavi care și-au recăpătat sănătatea după ce s-au rugat acolo. Un element de miraculos asociat mănăstirii este existența unui izvor care ar fi izvorât la scurt timp după apariția icoanei, considerat de credincioși ca având apă tămăduitoare[8].

Minunea izvorului cu lapte de la Govora. În zona Govorei există o legendă care relatează cum, în timpul unei secete cumplite, locuitorii au săpat în curtea mănăstirii, iar în loc de apă a început să curgă un lichid albicios, asemănător laptelui[9]. Preoții au interpretat acest fenomen ca o minune, văzând în el semnul hrănirii divine a poporului lipsit de resurse. Chiar dacă elementul narativ poate fi explicat natural prin prezența unor izvoare minerale calcaroase, în mentalitatea populară fenomenul este categoric integrat în sfera miraculosului.

Apariții ale sfinților și semne cerești. În tradiția orală vâlceană există numeroase relatări despre apariții miraculoase ale sfinților sau ale Maicii Domnului, care vin în ajutorul celor credincioși.

Legenda Sfântului Calinic la Frăsinei. Pe lângă blestemul asupra femeilor, legenda spune că Sfântul Calinic a fost văzut de mai mulți călugări plutind deasupra pământului în timpul rugăciunii[10].

Această imagine vizuală, păstrată în relatările orale, amplifică caracterul sacru al locului și îi conferă statutul de spațiu privilegiat pentru manifestările supranaturale.

Semnele cerești la Hurezi. În apropierea Mănăstirii Hurezi circulă o poveste despre „o stea luminoasă" care ar fi stat nemișcată deasupra construcției în timpul ridicării ei, ca semn divin al binecuvântării lucrării"[11]. Prezența semnelor cerești este o temă frecventă în legendele legate de ctitorii mănăstirești, indicând legătura directă dintre planul ceresc și cel pământesc.

Tămăduiri miraculoase. Miracolele de vindecare ocupă un loc central în narațiunile populare vâlcene. Spre deosebire de elementele de fantastic, unde puterea magică este adesea atribuită unor obiecte vrăjite, în legendele cu caracter religios tămăduirile sunt rezultatul credinței și rugăciunii.

Vindecarea orbilor la Olănești. Olăneștiul, renumit pentru izvoarele sale minerale, este înconjurat de povești despre „oameni orbi sau paralizați care și-au recăpătat vederea sau mersul după ce s-au spălat cu apa „izvorului cu ochi"[12]. În relatările populare, aceste tămăduiri sunt văzute ca minuni divine, mai ales pentru că ele aveau loc în urma participării la slujbe religioase sau după ce bolnavii făceau făgăduințe înaintea icoanei Maicii Domnului.

Blestemele și profețiile. Blestemele apar în nenumărate legende locale ca forme de pedeapsă divină asupra celor care încalcă poruncile sacre sau trădează credința. În multe cazuri, acestea iau forma unor profeții care se împlinesc după generații.

Blestemul mănăstirii din Valea Oltului. O poveste culeasă de etnograful Valeriu Stoica menționează o mănăstire dispărută, aflată cândva pe malul Oltului, despre care se spune că a fost scufundată în pământ ca pedeapsă pentru păcatele preoților[13]. Conform tradiției, în anumite nopți senine, cei ce trec pe mal ar auzi clopotele din adâncuri. Acest tip de legendă are corespondente în întreg spațiul românesc, însă varianta vâlceană pune accent pe ideea de pedeapsă divină iminentă, însoțită de semne auditive supranaturale.

Funcțiile elementelor miraculoase. Elementele de miraculos din legendele vâlcene nu îndeplinesc doar o funcție estetică sau narativă, ci una profund pedagogică și morală. Ele întăresc sentimentul apartenenței comunitare, legitimează importanța locurilor sacre și propagă valorile religioase tradiționale. Din punct de vedere structural, miraculosul servește adesea ca punct culminant al narațiunii, marcând intervenția providenței asupra destinului uman, acolo unde eforturile proprii nu mai sunt suficiente.

În concluzie, miraculosul, în contextul legendar vâlcean, este o formă de articulare a relației omului cu divinitatea. Fantasticul pune accentul pe excepțional și pe ieșirea din ordinea firească a lumii, miraculosul întărește ideea de ordine morală și de protecție a celor credincioși. Prin aceste narațiuni, comunitățile vâlcene și-au construit o identitate profund marcată de convingerea în intervenția directă a sacrului în viața lor de zi cu zi.

DETERMINISM AND CHANCE IN THE PROSE OF I.L. CARAGIALE

Abstract: The following article intends to demonstrate how determinism is an integral part of I.L. Caragiale's thoughts and prose. Drawing on testimonies, critical exegesis, and philosophical contextualisation, the study aims to prove that I.L. Caragialeț's thinking was profoundly shaped by beliefs in causality, chance, as well as the illusion of free will. Through close readings of selected prose, the article identifies a coherent fictional universe governed by deterministic forces, in which entropy governs over all, residing in the interaction between chance and necessity. This analysis cares to show that I.L. Caragiale's characters, whether conscious or unaware of the mechanisms that constrain them, are ultimately subjected to social and biological forms of determinism. By focusing on the pessimistic dimension of I.L. Caragiale's prose, this study aims to reposition the writer's works into philosophical inquiries into human limitation. As such, I.L. Caragiale's work lays the foundation for proving the illusory nature of freedom and the impossibility of escape from a universe ruled by causality and hazard.

Keywords: philosophy; determinism; pessimism; darwinism; hazard

There are few testimonies and studies that explore the deterministic sphere of I.L. Caragiale's thinking, but even so, certain testimonies reveal that determinism was an integral part of his moral code. With this understanding, the universe of I.L. Caragiale's work takes on greater significance, becoming more confined to the reality of the prose writer's contemporaneity and his sphere of understanding. Caragiale's exegesis has meticulously gathered all the relevant testimonies about I.L. Caragiale's character, this work implicitly facilitating this study. Undoubtedly, when discussing the psychological profile of I.L. Caragiale in relation to the sphere of thought around which he revolved, in connection with his philosophical aspirations, we can glimpse a sufficient number of testimonies behind which we can formulate the following point of view: I.L. Caragiale's thinking was influenced by beliefs in causality, determinism and chance.

In an anthology of memories compiled by Ștefan Cazimir, we find a testimony from Luca I. Caragiale, one of I.L. Caragiale's children. In this testimony, Luca I. Caragiale insists on his father's perfectionism in relation to the final form of his work: "He hesitated over the position of an adverb, over the exact meaning of a word and even over the necessity of a comma."[1] . What is revealed here is I.L. Caragiale's hesitant nature in his role as an artist and creator. It is a nature that is aware of the implication of causality even within the written sentence. I.L. Caragiale is aware of how, from a linguistic point of view, each word determines another and how their inappropriate placement could change the entire meaning of the work. Open to interpretation, we could consider this memory of Luca I. Caragiale to be just a simple observation about his father's typical nature. Without Luca I. Caragiale's next observation, we would be inclined not to glimpse the deterministic conviction that I.L. Caragiale actually held. In this sense, Luca I. Caragiale continues with the following relevant statement: "I once spoke to him about this and he replied: 'Well, don't you understand that if I make a small mistake today, forget a comma tomorrow, and the day after tomorrow the audience has the right to boo me and I have to swallow it?'"[2] . This testimony reveals the essence of the deterministic thinking that filled I.L. Caragiale's mind. Contemplating a phrase in order to distil it to perfection and thus achieve artistic fulfilment did not come only from an exaggerated perfectionism, but from a consciousness that glimpsed causality and its effects. I.L. Caragiale, in his capacity as an artist, opposed determinism, fought against it, tried to glimpse the possibilities of the future, and thus the causes and effects that lay before him. Through the attention he paid to his revised sentences, I.L. Caragiale defended himself against determinism, against a future in which causality came back in the form of an error, a mistake he himself had made. If I.L. Caragiale had allowed himself an error in his works, he would have found himself forced to lie in a permanent causality caused by his mistakes. In short, I.L. Caragiale sought to avoid these cause-and-effect relationships that underlie the deterministic philosophical system.

If the previous analysis convinces us that I.L. Caragiale viewed his craft of writing through a deterministic filter, the following testimony from historian V.A. Urechia will convince us that this deterministic vision that I.L. Caragiale seems to hold also reflects on his theorising about what humour is. In a dialogue on humour with I.L. Caragiale, V.A. Urechia recalls the following statement made by I.L. Caragiale: "Is that all you have to say about humour? Do you reduce a way of living your life to simply considering or describing it?"[3] . In these rhetorical questions that I.L. Caragiale throws at V.A. Urechia, we see the certainty of a humour theorist. The historian V.A. Urechia cannot understand, he could not have known humour in its distilled form as I.L. Caragiale did. There is no doubt that I.L. Caragiale had his own system, his own codes of understanding and formation when it came to humour. However, the question remains: what kind of philosophical or moral system influenced I.L. Caragiale's understanding of humour? This question is also answered by V.A. Urechia through the subsequent affirmation of these rhetorical questions he asked. Thus, according to V.A. Urechia's testimony, I.L. Caragiale theorises the following about humour: "Humour is par excellence a philosophy, and its sense determines the actions of those who possess it."[4] . Once again, I.L. Caragiale uses a statement taken from the philosophical system of determinism. I.L. Caragiale understands humour in a deterministic dimension, in the sense that the humour he advocated was a humour laden with causality, where his humour was the cause and, implicitly, the promoter of the effect. The verb chosen by I.L. Caragiale is important , as it is not a coincidence. Inevitably, such a deterministic understanding of humour is reflected in the universe of I.L. Caragiale's work, reinforcing the belief that he consciously applies deterministic philosophy in his works. Basically, I.L. Caragiale's perspective here is one of determinism, we could say, in which the humour consciously applied by the author serves as an external force that will determine the reader and the actions they will take. If I.L. Caragiale's vision of comedy remains one in which he seeks to save man from hypocrisy, then it is clear that this is in fact the determining character of humour, a determining character through which I.L. Caragiale wishes to correct morals.

Numerous volumes containing testimonies from prominent figures who were active in the Junimea society affirm the active involvement in the society of both I.L. Caragiale and the deterministic philosopher Vasile Conta. However, volumes such as Iacob Negruzzi's Amintiri din Junimea (Memories of Junimea) or George Panu's Amintiri de la Junimea (Memories from Junimea) do not discuss possible dialogues that I.L. Caragiale may have had. Nevertheless, we cannot overlook the fact that the "philosophical poet"[5] Vasile Conta and I.L. Caragiale were essentially active in a circle where, above all, they discussed ideas relevant to their contemporaneity. Despite the absence of any clear evidence, we cannot dispute the fact that the Junimea society engaged in debates and discussions on topics such as determinism, chance, existence (or, according to Vasile Conta), the absence of free will, Darwinism, etc. As a result, we cannot rule out the possibility that I.L. Caragiale took part in discussions on such topics, which may have subsequently led him to adopt or deepen a deterministic conviction. In one of the most in-depth studies on the biography of I.L. Caragiale, Șerban Cioculescu discusses the influence that Mihai Eminescu had on I.L. Caragiale. Recalling Mihai Eminescu's studies at the University of Vienna, we are led to reinforce the conviction that the debates within the Junimea society were not directed towards a philosophical basis. In this regard, Șerban Cioculescu provides the following relevant information: "Eminescu established his doctrine with perfect coherence. He also revealed an extensive general culture with a philosophical substratum, which gave Caragiale the opportunity to acquire new knowledge."[6] . What Șerban Cioculescu manages to glimpse here is an extensive source of philosophical knowledge to which I.L. Caragiale was open. Understanding Mihai Eminescu's predilection for Immanuel Kant, who debated the subject of determinism, we can turn to a possible debate on free will on that Mihai Eminescu could have had with I.L. Caragiale, influencing his thinking.

Moving on to the impression left by I.L. Caragiale on posterity, we observe how G. Călinescu's position as a historian and critic brings a new dimension to I.L. Caragiale's biography. Basing his investigation of the great prose writers on testimonies and lengthy studies, in G. Călinescu's History, we find another depiction of I.L. Caragiale's moral portrait. This time, from a philosophical point of view, G. Călinescu concludes as follows: "Caragiale feared the evil eye, bad luck, he believed in the predestination of character."[7] . The portrait that G. Călinescu will outline here about I.L. Caragiale seems, on the surface, to be that of a superstitious I.L. Caragiale, but the fallibilist foundation of determinism is, in essence, a superstition, as G. Călinescu will also point out. We will continue with another study by G. Călinescu, this time on the philosopher Vasile Conta. Regarding Vasile Conta's deterministic philosophical system and its influence on the Junimea society, G. Călinescu states the following: "it must nevertheless be considered in part as a sombre irradiation of Junimism, fallen into the superstition of a shallow and confused materialism..."[8] . If, according to G. Călinescu, the philosophical atmosphere of the Junimea society was reduced to the field of materialism, the connection between determinism and materialism must also be clarified. Vasile Conta's philosophical beliefs are close to the materialistic beliefs of the Junimea society in the sense that, if materialism claims that everything is based on physical laws and matter, this thinking implicitly suggests a deterministic perspective.

Finally, all these testimonies, as stated and detailed above, attest to several aspects relevant to the critical understanding of I.L. Caragiale. First, they confirm the biographical doubt that we raised earlier. We can see how I.L. Caragiale's thinking, in many instances, was guided by a deterministic philosophy, strongly influenced by thinking based on an awareness of the causal relationship in the universe. In other words, we cannot ignore the sphere of thought promoted by the Junimea society, within which I.L. Caragiale was active for a long time, I.L. Caragiale's contact with Mihai Eminescu and his philosophical debates reinforce the belief that I.L. Caragiale could have come into contact with determinism through members who were active in the Junimea society at the time when he was also actively participating. Let us not limit ourselves to Vasile Conta, but also remember Titu Maiorescu, whom G. Călinescu, in a comparison with Vasile Conta, polishes as a superior philosopher: "Romanian thought is older, and Bălcescu and Maiorescu are much more philosophers th ."[9] . Ultimately, it is difficult to deny the high probability that I.L. Caragiale had contact with determinism. It is even more difficult, given the testimonies of the Romanian playwright and prose writer's contemporaries, to deny that his thinking was strongly influenced by deterministic beliefs.

When discussing the universe of I.L. Caragiale's work, the statement of literary critic Florin Manolescu is relevant. Florin Manolescu observes, in the case of I.L. Caragiale's work, an atypical and even contested mixture of genres in the author's contemporaneity: "the mixture of forms and, implicitly, of literary styles, which is achieved in all stages and at all levels of the literature he wrote, represents for Caragiale a central principle of creation and organisation of a literary text."[10] . Florin Manolescu observes what literary criticism has commented on, strictly at the level of literary reception, as a disoriented and confusing universe. Florin Manolescu extends this statement and demonstrates that the reason for the lack of homogeneity in I.L. Caragiale's universe is the very foundation on which the work is built. Not only is the content of the prose laden with an air of misunderstanding, but so is the stylistic approach from which I.L. Caragiale starts. In other words, it is a universe that literary critic Iulian Boldea understands as: "the motley universe of the Balkans."[11]. This adjective attached to Caragiale's universe completes the idea of heterogeneity, but it is not a heterogeneous universe in the sense that there is an absence of ideas; rather, the heterogeneity stems from the multitude of ideas, opinions and thoughts which, once consciously superimposed, generate this state of confusion, of loss of self, both for the reader and for the characters. It is hard to believe that the author of O scrisoare pierdută (The Lost Letter) is the author of Temă și variațiuni (Theme and Variations) and, equally, of (Inspection). I.L. Caragiale's consciousness absorbed, as Florin Manolescu's previous quote suggests, a multitude of styles. We see how I.L. Caragiale's artistic mind incorporated into his intellect not only various styles, but also various ideas and principles. In other words, it is a process that literary critic Florin Manolescu notes as: "The process of crossing forms and establishing minor variants"[12]

Aware of this mixture of styles and ideas, Mircea Tomuș captures what he calls, in the case of I.L. Caragiale: "The text constructing itself from itself"[13]. I.L. Caragiale's work constructs itself in the sense that the expressiveness of the language and the uniqueness of the style make a Caragiale text, in its essence, a Caragiale work. Caragiale's work becomes a structure that is defined by its own internal mechanisms from which it is constituted. What is interesting about Caragiale's work is its power to undermine the audience's expectations. After his success in the field of drama, contemporaries would not have expected I.L. Caragiale to publish the volume Momente și schițe (Moments and Sketches), nor would they have expected to find, within this volume, works such as Inspecțiune (Inspection) or Grand Hotel Victoria Română (Grand Hotel Romanian Victory). The universe that I.L. Caragiale outlines is one that often speaks about the author, where, as Mircea Tomuș observes, "the author begins to become a character"[14] . With his distancing from drama, we find in I.L. Caragiale's universe a polymorphic narrator. Depending on the text, he is sometimes heterodiegetic and detached (Păcat, O făclie de Paște - Sin, An Easter light), sometimes homodiegetic (Vizită - Visit), or even autodiegetic (Grand Hotel Victoria Română). What is certain is that, as Mircea Tomuș observes, we find more of I.L. Caragiale in his prose than we would find in his dramaturgy. We see the author's pluralism of perspectives, his convictions. If his dramaturgy told us more about Romanian society, then his prose reveals more about the member of this Romanian society, I.L. Caragiale. We see I.L. Caragiale as an author-character who is concerned with hypocrisy, conceited people, upstarts, the prefigurations of the spiritual and moral decadence of Romanian society, and, ultimately, philosophical concerns.

Returning to the subject, we see how the universe of I.L. Caragiale's work is divided according to the genre he addresses. In his role as a playwright, I.L. Caragiale comes with the hope of correcting the morals of society by identifying them. When we find him as a prose writer, I.L. Caragiale becomes sometimes nocturnal, sometimes solar, revealing truths about his identity, about his true convictions, because in certain instances, the author approaches and identifies more and more with the narrator character. I.L. Caragiale's universe is, as Iulian Boldea observes: "one of 'clusters', non-homogeneous..."[15] , precisely because of the immense wealth of information possessed by the creator of this universe. I.L. Caragiale's prose reveals not only a mixture of styles and themes, but also the sprinkling of personal beliefs and the effective insertion of the author as a character within his works. Through these observations of the critics, we understand the universe of I.L. Caragiale's work as one dominated by feelings of loss, disorientation, and confusion. We enter the flow of the authorial consciousness, an ideational world transposed into the light of print.

Throughout this flow of authorial consciousness in I.L. Caragiale's prose, we distinguish certain particularities, in the sense that the universe remains an amalgam only in its image as a whole. A classification of I.L. Caragiale's prose could easily clarify this amalgam. In other words, I.L. Caragiale's prose can be and has already been classified according to its thematic approach. Beyond the space of sketches, specialist critics have also noted the naturalistic dimension of I.L. Caragiale's prose, but the subject of interest is those works which, as Nicolae Manolescu points out, "have in common with naturalist short stories only, perhaps, the idea of luck, fate, fatality, but which cannot be grouped together with Momentele. They have another peculiarity: they have given commentators a hard time."[16] .

In other words, the works we wish to focus on in this study are: Inspecțiune, Două loturi, Păcat, Cănuță, om sucit and O făclie de Paște. In this configuration, these works constitute a universe unified around deterministic beliefs, a universe based on the relationship between determinism and chance. A universe in which, depending on the case, certain characters become aware of the deterministic forces in whose clutches they find themselves (Anghelache in Inspection, Father Niță in Sin, and Lefter Popescu in Two Tickets) or who live unconsciously, deprived of any epiphanic manifestation (the eponymous character in Cănuță, om sucit and Leiba Zibal in O făclie de Paște). What these characters have in common is, as we mentioned, their place in a universe dominated by causal relationships that reign supreme over their existence. They are characters who are subject, again, depending on the case, either to social determinism (as in the case of Anghelache), biological determinism (as in the case of Cănuță), or even stylistic determinism, such as nominative determinism (the etymology of the names Anghelache and Lefter Popescu).

The engine of this universe of certain Caragiale prose is fuelled by what Maria-Ana Tupan calls, in her study of Cănuță, om sucit (Cănuță, silly man): "that combination of chance and determinism that physicists call 'complexity'."[17] . Determinism and chance become complementary elements and promoters of the characters' degradation. Faced with determinism and ill-fated chance, the characters never succeed, ending up losing their minds, dying, committing suicide, going mad, etc. I.L. Caragiale's universe is an unforgiving one, driven by Darwinian beliefs where weak individuals, unable to survive, fail to escape the tide of society that wants to swallow them whole. This world of I.L. Caragiale's prose is, according to Ion Roman: "shrouded in suffocating fog..."[18] . Ion Roman's vision is relevant in this sense, because I.L. Caragiale's characters navigate this fog, they have the impression that, since it is not a literal physical space, a wall, there is a chance to overcome, to prevail. First and foremost, a particularity of these characters is the illusory experience they initially live, unconsciously. I.L. Caragiale emphasises this idea of an illusory, false experience, an experience like a nightmare from which they cannot wake up or, if they do wake up, from which they cannot escape.

Based on this understanding, I.L. Caragiale's work takes on the meaning of a macrocosm, where each Caragiale universe coincides with another biographical aspect of the author. In our study, we are interested in a universe that literary critic Iulian Boldea has described as "homogeneous and entropic, chaotic and disjointed by Caragiale, in which the background, as if non-existent, is expressed through the extension of proliferating forms, any desire for individualisation is illusory..."[19] . This gloomy universe created by I.L. Caragiale is, as literary critic Iulian Boldea observes, one marked by entropy, where the trivial is the random factor, the hazard that always manages to destroy the paradigm in which the situation of the characters in the opening is presented to us. This universe is one in which hope is an illusion, in which triumph is, as in Două loturi, also an illusion. It is a belief that is close to that of his contemporary, Vasile Conta, who, as we recalled in the previous chapter, sees free will as nothing more than an illusion. As readers, traversing this universe constructed by I.L. Caragiale based on deterministic theses, we cannot help but ask ourselves the same question: does free will exist? In Anghelache and Father Niță, we see two individuals who come to realise the causal relationships that dominate them, but in trying to fight them, they lose themselves. What does all this actually mean? That Caragiale's universe is marked by the absence of free will? That, in the struggle with causal relationships, the already fragile mind will inevitably be lost? These rhetorical questions only serve to deepen the mystery, the mystery of the human psyche in this universe, a universe that includes Anghelache's suicide, which is best described by literary critic Șerban Cioculescu: "the author of The Inspection himself took pleasure in maintaining the secret in all its integrity."[20] . In short, this universe that I.L. Caragiale constructs is not meant to be revealed. It is a universe of shadows, fog, illusion and, above all, damnation.

Finally, I.L. Caragiale leaves his own characters as testimony, allowing the reader to see the effects of an already unstable psyche in the face of social phenomena, in the face of society, in the face of a clear vision that everything that happens to him is predetermined. The reader is not expected to find solutions ; I.L. Caragiale's universe shows the impossibility of escape precisely because of the entropic element mentioned by Iulian Boldea, due to this randomness. Like his characters, the reader can only lament this tragic fate. Like Anghelache's friends, the reader will never be able to reach a conclusion. I.L. Caragiale's desire is undoubtedly to render a universe of a different kind of labyrinth, a labyrinth not of the nocturnal space of Bucharest in which the characters in his plays often get lost, but a labyrinth of ideas, hopes and disappointments. This is the universe of I.L. Caragiale, outlined with the help of certain prose works, a counterpoint to his dramaturgy, because if, as a playwright, I.L. Caragiale wanted to correct certain problems, as a prose writer, I.L. Caragiale appears in his pessimistic guise, demonstrating that, in fact, it is impossible, that the labyrinth is not only physical, but also mental.

THE FANTASTIC FILM AND THE PLASTIC ART: THE ORDINARY MAN AND THE FANTASTIC HERO IN THE LITERARY AND CINEMATIC CREATIONS

Oana Bădăluţă
PhD Student, University of Bucharest

Abstract: As far as the transcendence of the fantastic in art is concerned, the concept under discussion is cautious and speculative, opting for certain domains of reference: literature, cinematography or the arts of the performance.

In the modern fantastic art, the forms of expression produce an existential estrangement that tends to anihilate the human personality, through the exacerbation of the human being's states of crisis.

Unlike the earlier epochs, the contemporary arts of fantastic inspiration, gradually impose the acceptance of the abnormal feature as it results from the spreading of such notions as: horrible, monstruous in the creations film adaptations of the cinematography, even in those of animated cartoons.

Starting with the XIXth century, the painting and the photography facilitate the development of the fantastic category by means of technology and the images from the cover pictures, subsequently culminating with the film art.

In the second half of the XIXth century, the aesthetic category of the fantastic adds a new dimension, that of the deviant and pathologic behaviour, generating horror and terror.

În ceea ce priveşte transcederea fantasticului în artă, conceptul discutat este prevăzător şi speculativ, optând pentru anumite domenii de referință: literatură, cinematografie sau artele spectacolului.

În arta fantastică modernă, formele de expresie produc o înstrăinare existenţială, care tinde să anuleze personalitatea umană, prin exacerbarea stărilor de criză ale fiinţei. Acest fapt îl determină pe eseistul și criticul literar român Edgar Papu să observe faptul că în secolul al XX-lea cititorul este interesat mai degrabă de efectele artistice, decât de conţinutul operelor fantastice. Criteriul estetic domină epoca fantasticului modern, mai ales la nivelul creaţiilor cinematografice, unde interesul pentru tehnologii, pentru efectele generatoare de senzațional, de tipul 3d, 4dx, afectează personalitatea umană. Astfel se explică fenomenul de înstrăinare a creatorului, fie el prozator sau regizor, de fantastic, și prin aceasta, de propria-i natură umană, mergând până la identificarea sau suprapunerea cu personalitatea personajelor, ceea ce atrage, în mod inevitabil, efectul dezumanizării. Un rol similar este cel al actorului Adrien Brody, din filmul The Pianist, în regia lui Roman Polanski (2002), care, pentru a interpreta rolul lui Władysław Szpilman, un supraviețuitor al Holocaustului, s-a înfometat şi a făcut schimbări majore în viaţa personală. Actorul a afirmat că s-a simțit captiv într-o asemenea măsură, în rolul jucat, încât nu s-a putut desprinde de personajul interpretat, riscând să atingă limitele nebuniei. Cauza acestui transfer de personalitate, de autor-personaj, poate fi explicată prin selectarea următoarelor puncte de referință: climatul contextual, mentalul social sau experienţele individuale, cum ar fi reveriile nocturne sau imaginarul oniric, asociat subconştientului.

Efectul negativ al oniricului asupra fiinţei umane este neutralizat prin cunoaştere. Este cunoscut faptul că visele se pot transforma în obsesii, pot avea un efect traumatizant şi pot afecta omul, prin influența lor negativă, de aceea se recomandă evitarea interpretării acestora și eliminarea gândurilor asociate acestor stări iluzorii.

Spre deosebire de epocile anterioare, artele contemporane de inspiraţie fantastică impun, în mod gradat, acceptarea anormalului, aşa cum rezultă din vehicularea noțiunilor de oribil, inuman, monstruos, în realizările cinematografice, chiar şi în cele de tip desene animate.

Începând cu secolul al XIX-lea, pictura şi fotografia favorizează dezvoltarea categoriei fantasticului prin intermediul tehnicii şi a imaginilor ilustraţiilor de pe coperte, culminând, ulterior, cu arta filmului. Suprarealismul activează conotaţiile negative ale fantasticului, explorând deopotrivă stările vulnerabile ale fiinţei, respectiv angoasa, spleenul, din perspectiva unei existenţe paradoxale, absurde, ilustrată plastic, prin tendinţe destructurante, groteşti, caricaturale.

Iniţial, fantasticul cerceta relaţia cosmos-antropos, misterul religios, miracolul creaţiei, culminând cu dorinţa omului de acceptare a oricărei modalități de receptare a absolutului divin. Multiplicarea formelor de expresie ale fantasticului se datorează creaţiilor plastice aparţinând artiştilor Giorgio de Chirrico, Enrico Baj, Dino Buzzati și Salvator Dali, care încearcă să asimileze conceptul de fantastic, asociindu-l experimentului, observaţiei, gândirii de tip geometric, fiind preocupați, totodată, de cunoaşterea ştiinţifică.

Critica de artă promovează interesul pentru categoria estetică a fantasticului, aşa cum rezultă din scrierile: Arta fantastică, de Marcel Brion, Artele fantastice, de Claude Roy, Arta fantastică, de René de Solier. Mişcarea suprarealistă activează imaginarul fantastic, uzând de tehnici plastice variate, cum ar fi acuarela, pentru a explora zonele abisale ale fiinţei umane, generând stări nedefinite, confuze, uneori angoasante. Profunzimea imaginilor portretizate şi a materiei explorate este captată de artistul plastic, tentat să proiecteze modelul real într-o dimensiune ireală, aşa cum este cazul tablourilor aparţinând artistului Giorgio de Chirrico.

Dacă arta plastică modernă propune interogaţii în legătură cu atitudinile şi categoriile estetice de tip negativ, arta anterioară oferă un demers ideatic, orientat spre dimensiunea antropos-cosmos, uman-divin, după modelele lucrărilor artiştilor din cultura picturii universale: Michelangelo, Raphael şi Botticelli. Dimensiunea inefabilă a imaginarului fantastic pare a fi accentuată de artiştii romantici, care intuiesc semnificaţiile miturilor, depozitate în subconştientul colectiv. Prin intermediul psihanalizei se încearcă descoperirea unor noi metode de creaţie, cum ar fi dicteul suprarealist, pentru a releva faptul că în esenţa artei fantastice există elemente comune cu fondul de gândire primară. Numai în acest context se poate forma un substrat nealterat al artei primitive. În ansamblul de figuri realizate în arta rupestră se regăsesc fiinţe fantastice, uneori cu formă hibridă, de om și animal, de pe coloanele peșterilor sau ale stâncilor, datând din perioada preistorică. Provenind din perioada artei rupestre, desenele reprezintă imagini codate, pe cât de real transpuse, în mod surprinzător asimilate, aproape supranatural, al unor timpuri ancestrale, care creează confuzie privitorilor slab informați. În adâncurile eului primar descoperim rădăcinile artei fantastice, prin mesajele receptate cu privire la energia spirituală, inspiraţia, forţa creatoare, necesare desfășurării procesului de creaţie.

Rezultatele artei fantastice au fost concretizate în forme şi specii literare variate, spre exemplu în prima jumătate a secolului al XIX-lea literatura fantastică engleză se exprimă prin intermediul povestirilor romantice, străbătute de anxietate, aşa cum este cazul scrierilor lui Hoffman, denumite Fantezii (Fantasiestücke), sau a celor patru volume, intitulate Scrieri fantastice în maniera lui Callot. Creaţia acestuia este apreciată şi promovată în epocă de Jean-Jacques Ampère, în paginile ziarului Le Globe.

În a doua jumătate a secolului al XIX-lea, categoria estetică a fantasticului adaugă o nouă dimensiune, cea a comportamentului deviant, patologic, generator de oroare şi teroare, cum se întâmplă în cazul scrierilor lui Edgar Allan Poe sau ale autorilor suprarealişti. S-ar putea afirma faptul că literatura science-fiction are ca punct generator proza scriitorului american menţionat mai sus, producătoare de spaimă, violenţă, anxietate, cu personaje imprevizibile, oscilante, confuze, care suferă de boli psihice grave. Această stare, asociată unui rău existenţial, dezvoltă sentimentul senzaționalului prin fantastic și construieşte un imaginar al temerilor inexplicabile şi incontrolabile, greu de fixat la nivel textual, sugerat prin tehnicile artei cinematografice. Printre filmele ecranizate după nuvelele scriitorului Edgar Allan Poe, remarcăm preferința pentru folosirea anumitor motive, cum este filmul The Raven, din anul 2012, al cărui subiect tratează cazurile de crimă ale unui psihopat, care acţionează printr-un joc morbid al omorurilor pe care le săvârşeşte în diferite moduri. Oroarea acestei minţi bolnave, maniera în care operează, este creionată într-un mod sumbru în scrisoarea pe care criminalul i-o trimite logodnicului iubitei răpite, Emily Hamilton.

Tematica redundantă a prozei lui Poe vizează stări obsedante, morbide, dar şi înclinaţia pentru dimensiunea intuită a altor existenţe. Caracteristicile acestui univers ar putea fi exprimate cu ajutorul unui câmp lexical al descompunerii, al obsesiei dublului, a spaţiilor nesigure, oscilante, în care persistă o atmosferă tulburată de rău. Florina Rogalski defineşte proza lui Poe ca fiind acea: „lucire fantasmagoreică, ce-i luminează figurile nedesluşite, dar înspăimântătoare."[1]

Toposul fantastic mediază trecerea dinspre spaţiul real, al lumii fenomenale, spre cel intuit, invizibil, dinspre lumea materială, spre o existenţă atemporală şi aspaţială. Funcţia subversivă a fantasticului este evidenţiată cu ajutorul efectelor cinematografice, deoarece se poate observa un transfer între elementele realului şi cele ale imaginarului, ceea ce conduce la obţinerea unor sugestii şi stări generatoare de straniu, mister şi tensiune. Printre recentele ecranizări de tip mystery sau science-fiction, oferim ca exemplu filmul Arrival, în regia lui Denis Villeneuve, din anul 2016, care tratează contactul cu alte civilizaţii, prin decodarea mesajelor primite din spațiul cosmic. Filmul se inspiră din nuvela scriitorului Ted Chiang, Story of Your Life.

Având în vedere evoluţia genului, putem observa fenomenul clasicizării treptate, urmată de modernizarea fantasticului, prin stilizarea efectelor și prin acutizarea tendinței dezumanizante.
Artele plastice sunt concentrate într-o antologie a imaginilor, provenind din domenii variate, cum se întâmplă în studiul lui Roger Caillois, În inima fantasticului, care conține o selecție de reproduceri tematice ale autorilor, după picturi, gravuri și ilustrații.

Sincretismul artistic transmite energia de bază, prin revenirea la forma de cunoaștere primară, pornind dinspre tradiţional, printr-un proces tranzitoriu, înspre tiparele artei fantastice. Arta dublează experienţele inefabile ale eului creator, care comunică sau se justifică în mod involuntar.

Într-o formă sau alta, creaţiile omului modern sunt replici ale interogaţiilor dintâi. Artistul actual încearcă să imite Creatorul, fiind încântat de încadrarea în tiparul de geniu al propriei lumi, chiar dacă rezultatul operelor este unul destructurant, de cele mai multe ori. Arta reprezintă expansiunea umană, prin care universul, extras din zona realului şi proiectat în zona obscură a inconştientului, se transformă. Aceste procese ale spiritului liber creator sunt activate în perioada romantică.

În construcția fantasticului, subconștientul rămâne activ, astfel încât teritoriul naraţiunilor fictive este alimentat, în mod constant, de fluxul conştiinţei şi de memoria involuntară. Creaţiile fantastice exprimă ritmul sensibilităţii sufleteşti, prin care complexitatea emoţională se exteriorizează, se defulează, sub forma constructului estetic, imaginar, asociat categoriilor de bizar, straniu, inuman, la care se adaugă și alte registre lexicale: ambiguitate, angoasă, anxietate, bizar, ciudat, contradictoriu, coşmar, frică, teamă, teroare, nevroză.

Instanţele textului fantastic resimt nevoia echilibrării emoţionale, încercând să se salveze din punct de vedere psihologic, prin situarea într-un spaţiu purificat, cu deschidere spre înalt. Autorii operelor fantastice, literare şi cinematografice, propun familiarizarea treptată a receptorului colectiv, cititor sau spectator, cu termeni utilizaţi frecvent, aparţinând câmpului lexical al unui univers antiuman.

În opinia scriitorului Adrian Marino, o altă trăsătură a definirii fantasticului o reprezintă categoria numită antiestetic. Roger Caillois consideră că există o sobrietate a fantasticului, impusă de stările de neliniște și de ruptură, de care se lasă cuprinși atât personajul, cât și cititorul, prin trăirea acelui sentiment care induce frica, nedumerirea, imposibilitatea de a verbaliza percepţia evenimentelor care se derulează aproape panoramic, subiectul afectat lăsând impresia unui compus din ceară, păstrându-și, în mod sugestiv, trăsăturile chipului și gesturile. Stările de scindare sunt generate de receptarea fidelă, deloc critică, a unor mituri, creaţii folclorice, basme, legende, texte şi ritualuri idolatrice. Totodată, senzația de chin interior este asociată unei fantezii debordante, aflată în proximitatea celei de alienare a personajului. Mentalul dus la extreme, descompus, dezechilibrat, evidențiază consumul psihic al personajului, care își neagă propriile repere ontologice. Acestea îi produc consumatorului de artă fantastică, cititor sau cineast, pierderea simţului critic și percepţia obiectivă asupra existenţei, riscând astfel să devieze către mecanismele infraumane, prezente în mentalul colectiv, într-un mod latent, după cum afirmă scriitorul Sfântul Ignatie Briancianinov, cu privire la această formă de înșelare: „Starea oamenilor aflaţi în înşelare demonică e foarte felurită, potrivit cu patima de care a fost omul amăgit şi înrobit, şi potrivit cu măsura în care omul a fost înrobit de patimă. Toţi însă, care au căzut în înşelare demonică, adică au intrat, prin dezvoltarea amăgirii de sine, în comuniune cu Diavolul şi în robie faţă de el, se află în înşelare, sunt temple şi unelte ale demonilor, jertfe sortite morţii veşnice, petrecerii în închisorile iadului."[2]

Dublul fantastic se produce în momentul în care apare starea de nesiguranţă, când nu se primesc răspunsuri adecvate la întrebările existențiale, când receptorul este marcat de inconsecvenţa propriilor explicaţii, legate de binomul cauză/efect, ale fantasticului. Teroarea cosmică, generatoare de frustrare, apare în momentul în care realul este invadat de pătrunderea nejustificată a supranaturalului în cotidian, care nelinişteşte fiinţa umană.

Fantasticul este perceput ca o destructurare a eului, prin starea de criză instaurată la nivelul personajului, cât şi a cititorului, însă această indispoziție patologică, acest exces nu afectează dimensiunea estetică a operei, fiind vorba despre un comportament maladiv, exprimat într-o formă plastică, seducătoare, dar pe atât de înșelătoare, a anomaliei fantastice. Prin urmare, fantasticul propune o gamă variată de afecte, trăiri interioare, intense stări febrile, emoţii puternice, tulburări excesive, confuzii, la nivel senzorial. Subiectul intuiește, prevede, chiar dacă nu își explică în mod logic, rațional, ştiinţific, o posibilă răsturnare de situaţie, în sensul că reperele cronotopice, fundamentale, privind percepţia existenţei, sunt modificate. Timpul este receptat în inversul său, suferă transformări de fond: îngheaţă, se dilată, se suspendă, iar spaţiul este permisibil. În acest moment critic, toate senzaţiile şi viziunile anunţă o profunzime a temerilor, prin provocarea unui dezechilibru major. Dacă emoţia estetică din arta tradițională, îndeosebi cea a poeticului, oferă o stare de armonie cu sine şi cu universul, cea a operei literare fantastice acţionează în sens opus, producând disoluţii la nivel mental şi moral. Menţionăm faptul că fantasticul nu se relevă întotdeauna cititorului într-o formă care șochează, optând pentru modalități de expresie aparent inofensive, ceea ce creează un surplus de dificultate pentru lectorul care trebuie să apeleze la propriul discernământ şi la cunoştinţele acumulate, pentru a se proteja de riscurile la care se expune. Sentimentul fricii devine un criteriu în structurarea fantasticului, astfel încât jocul cu emoțiile negative implică mai multe trăiri: straniul şi neliniștea, coşmarul, nevroza, anxietatea, care, odată reunite la nivel textual, se intensifică. Pentru a se activa caracterul persuasiv al discursului, pentru a se anima, jocul de tip fantastic incită, deoarece teroarea cosmică şi cea terestră nu sunt esenţiale, părând afectate de banalitate. În legătură cu relaţia care implică atât actul ludic, cât şi cel fantastic, Marina Cap-Bun, în lucrarea intitulată Între absurd şi fantastic. Incursiuni în apele mirajului, susţine faptul că acest joc al coşmărescului se referă la criteriul de amuzament, chiar dacă operează cu elemente neludice, care sperie, tulbură, zdruncină interiorul ființei. Howard Phillips Lovecraft, scriitor american de la începutul secolului al XX-lea, relatează, în lucrarea Supernatural Horror în Literature (Fantasticul horror în literatură), informații despre existenţa unei atmosfere necesare, care generează producerea fantasticului, minimalizându-se, astfel, mecanismul narativ, fapt pentru care intriga devine una insignifiantă. În aceeaşi direcţie se situează observaţiile lui Eugen Simion: „Atmosfera e, deci, elementul cel mai important al literaturii fantastice şi el mizează pe iraţionalitatea raţionalului, pe supranaturalul, straniul, misterul lumii reale."[3]

Există o dinamică subtilă a posibilităților de sintetizare a fantasticului în operă, prin intermediul proceselor oponente, de apariție-dispariție, intensificare-diminuare, evoluție-regres. În momentul când reuşeşte să genereze angoasă, teamă, frică, fantasticul își împlinește menirea. Se retrage şi revine mecanic, având un impact pronunțat asupra receptorului. Având în vedere capacitatea acestuia de a se adapta la gândirea modernă, la cerințele, aspirațiile publicului, dar și intereselor de tip comercial, metamorfozele fantasticului pot fi sugerate prin intermediul mitului păsării Phoenix.

În studiul intitulat Omul. Tratat de antropologie creştină, Petre Țuțea proiectează ființa umană într-o altă dimensiune, într-un univers metafizic, în care acționează legi diferite de cele ale fantasticului. În viziunea filozofului, proiecția omului în transcendent, gândirea teocentrică, îl ajută să-și recâștige condiția, să restabilească conexiunea cu planul divin, prin intermediul religiei. Este acceptată ideea salvatoare a adevărului etern, prin care este recunoscut singurul Creator al materiei, Dumnezeu: „(…) teologia se situează în lumea transcendentă a adevărului unic, al cărui mod de a crea lumea și viața depășește înțelegerea umană, acest adevăr unic - Dumnezeu - nefiind demiurg, ci Creator ex nihilo."[4]

Prin starea lui de reflecție omul își reface natura alterată, datorată prăbușirii morale. Astfel, se reface legătura dintre Creator și creația Lui. Metafizica presupune conexiunea cu lumea absolută a ideilor, ceea ce îl apropie pe om de existența imediată, spre deosebire de fantastic, care îl îndepărtează de realul absolut, de latura divinului.

Literatura şi cinematografia de inspiraţie science-fiction sau fantasy propun omului modern scheme narative, clişee verbale, toposuri comune, familiare, des utilizate, care aparţin laturii tehnologice, fapt care conduce la eliminarea autonomiei de gândire și comportament ale ființei, mai ales în cazul unor tineri a căror formare intelectuală prezintă carenţe. În Dicţionarul de idei literare, Adrian Marino consideră că fantasticul are o funcţie distructivă, acţionând negativ asupra stării de echilibru, preexistent ontologice. Orice vector de direcție ar deține fantasticul, tinzând chiar spre categoria estetică a comicului, nu își neagă natura originară, deoarece, în caz contrar, s-ar autoanula. Ruptura din contextul fantastic nu poate fi un proces satisfăcut în totalitate, astfel că iluzia prin care lectorul nu ar mai avea acces la misterele descoperite, s-ar spulbera. Este propus conceptul de iluzoriu, fiind respins de adevărul revelat.

Există o diferenţă sesizabilă între tipologiile umane cu care se identifică lectoratul, în funcţie de epocile istorice şi curentele culturale parcurse, de exemplu o parte din consumatorii de artă aparţinând societăţii contemporane empatizează cu arta fantasticului, tinzând să copieze sau să mimeze reacţiile personajului din proza sau filmul science-fiction, mai mult decât ar alege să-și înțeleagă propria existență: „Cititorul, dacă se identifică cu personajul, se exclude el însuşi din real."[5]

Cititorul acceptă, astfel, scenariul propus, cu riscul de anulare a stării de echilibru, de armonie anterioară și, implicit, de amplificare a dezacordului ontologic. Atitudinea şi reacţiile spectatorilor aflați în faţa ecranelor sălilor de cinema sunt, o parte dintre ele, de acomodare, ajungând, la un moment dat, la o stare de dependenţă cinefilă privind trăirile induse de personajele şi evenimentele fantastice, iar altele exprimă dezacordul sau incompatibilitatea cu mesajul primit, prin intermediul acestor ecranizări: „Cititorii reacţionează ambiguu: uneori fac impresia că preferă tipul de operă cu care s-au obişnuit, alteori că aleargă după noutate."[6]

Altfel, povestirea fantastică combină două tipuri de mentalităţi, două categorii binare, respectiv cei care participă la fuziunea fantasticului cu realul, iniţiaţii, şi cei care vor să înţeleagă procesul, scepticii, deci receptarea fantasticului este diferită, pe cât de complexă este această categorie. Tocmai de aceea fantasticul este considerat un locus, un concept care descentrează și anulează legile fizice ale spaţiului real. Autorul concret al operelor fantastice manifestă o atitudine reținută în momentul când concepe universul fictiv, deci trebuie să aibă conştiinţa sinelui și să păstreze distanţa afectivă faţă de instanţele textuale, respectiv narator, personaje, cititor. Autorul este pus în conjunctura de a imagina secvenţe terifiante, cu personaje înspăimântătoare, spectre şi vampiri, istorii teribile, însă trebuie să se ferească a-și construi un crez fondat pe baza existenţei lor, păstrându-şi luciditatea. Scriitorul devine creatorul propriei lumi fantastice, preferând, în plin real, echidistanţa afectivă faţă de constructul artistic de tip fantastic. Cititorul se lasă absorbit de mecanismele fantasticului, după care intervine inevitabila cădere în gol, de pierdere a eului. Umanul nu se poate împotrivi în totalitate fantasticului, după o anumită limită fiind absorbit de acesta, ajungând până la eliminare. Fantasticul este, în acest mod, receptat cu o anumită suspiciune, iar conştiinţa lectorului riscă să fie afectată până la seducţie, cu un aer extrem de firesc. Există situaţii în care lectorii informaţi resping mesajul fantastic şi încearcă să îi demonteze mecanismele generatoare de fals. Fantasticul intrigă cititorul, probând o stare de rivalitate sau dispută cu acesta. Se anulează, astfel, transferul de informaţie dinspre autor spre receptor, mai ales în situaţia în care autorul unui nucleu narativ fantastic se substituie pe sine, ca pe un posibil cititor al propriei creații, în așteptarea cititorului abstract.

THE CASTLE. THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE CASTLE IN FILM ADAPTATIONS

Oana Bădăluţă
PhD Student, University of Bucharest

Abstract: The Black castle vs the White castle (Mordor vs Minas Tirith, the novel and the film adaptation of the Lord of the Rings): the castle can be associated with a bipolar image, equally edenic and infernal. The road to the black castle outlined through the desolated imaged of the towers and the constructions from Mordor, a place of damnation, cannot be identified precisely, more than that, the movement through an acvatic place (the marshes or the swamps) having a role of demarcation from the other lands, which becomes practically impossible, because there is not a fixed line (bridge or foot-bridge) that should make accesible the traversal of this route. This is the prototype of the deserted castle, where there is no other possibility of freedom and where there are unhappy, captive human beings, who have lost their hope of being forgiven or set free.

The white castle, represented in the same novel, through the image of the castle Minas Mirith, is exactly the opposite because it attracts and reflects the solar light, becoming thus a cronotop with beneficial functions.

The tower of the castle, the world's axis – Cair Paravel, the series The Chronicles of Narnia: both in the novel and in the film adaptations of the Lord of the Rings and also in the narnian land, there are edifices with a symbolic value, which include the motive of the tower (the one in Mordor, where the Big Eye is watching, represented by Sauron's spirit or the towers from the castle Cair Paravel).

Imaginea castelului, transpusă în plan oniric, poate schița o sublimare a primei cetăți a Edenului, supranumită Epithumia [(ἐπιθυμία, care înseamnă dorință, dor[1], un topos de lumină liniștit, sau poate face trimitere la sentimentul de armonie și echilibru, o stare de mulțumire, așa cum o numește Iisus în momentul când le comunică ucenicilor săi faptul că aceasta va fi ultima adunare, cu sensul de masă sau cină, la care cu toții vor participa, în vremea sărbătorii creștine a Paștelui (Noul Testament, Evanghelia după Luca, Sărbătorirea Paștilor, 22:15-16)].

În legătură cu semnificația polisemică a diferitelor construcții de acest fel observăm faptul că în scrierea alegorică intitulată Istoria Ieroglifică, Dimitrie Cantemir amintește de simbolul cetății eterne, construcție care își găsește justificarea prin trecerea anotimpurilor, a timpului repetitiv și ciclic.

Prima imagine a castelului medieval se regăsește în creația cinematografică Robin Hood (1922), aparținând regizorului Allan Dwan, avându-l în rolul principal pe Douglas Fairbanks.
În legătură cu simbolistica substantivului castel ca formă de înălțare a spiritului uman, Dicționarul cultural al Bibliei menționează următoarele precizări: „În tradiția lumii occidentale, care își are rădăcinile în Grecia antică, termenul desemnează creația tipică geniului uman. (…) În semnificația lui teologică, cuvântul se referă nu la opera omului, ci la aceea pe care Dumnezeu a pregătit-o pentru lume, prefigurată de Ierusalim."[2]

Cetatea lui Dumnezeu, simbolizată prin imaginea Ierusalimului, reprezintă cea mai veche formă de atestare a termenului, care putea fi confundat cu templul: „Și am văzut cetatea sfântă, noul Ierusalim, pogorându-se din cer de la Dumnezeu, gătită ca o mireasă, împodobită pentru mirele ei."[3] (Noul Testament, Apocalipsa Sfântului Ioan Teologul, 21:2)

Cu timpul, cetatea sau templul lui Dumnezeu, în termenii actuali biserica, și-a pierdut semnificația de bază, în zilele noastre existând o separare a celor două sensuri, care poate fi descrisă

în felul următor: castel sau cetate vs catedrală, biserică, capelă. Cetatea mai poate însemna acurateţea sufletului, partea bună şi pozitivă din om, care învinge întotdeauna, după cum Iisus afirmă, în Noul Testament, Evanghelia după Matei, Sarea pământului şi lumina lumii, şi anume faptul că omul, căruia Domnul i-a dat lumină şi forţa de a stăpâni pământul, trebuie să-şi exprime judecata şi să-şi arate măreţia în tot ceea ce întreprinde, folosindu-se de calităţile cu care a fost învestit.

Sensurile cuvântului castel au fost corelate cu puterea politică a timpului sau cu simbolul coroanei. Castelul reprezintă acel tip de construcţie care evocă expansiunea socială, manifestată prin dorinţa de înălţare şi de păstrare a puterii. Există situaţii în care cei izgoniţi din castel, implicit de pe tronul regal, se întorc pentru a reface echilibrul şi pentru a corecta nedreptatea. Castelul devine, astfel, un cronotop al mărturiilor, proiectat într-un univers dominat de mister sau care ascunde secretul unui personaj enigmatic, care poposeşte în acest loc pentru o anumită perioadă de timp, cu scopul de a-şi reface forţele sau a restaura ordinea. Castelul reprezintă un tărâm utopic, situat la limita dintre reverie şi coşmar, spre exemplu imaginea castelului în ruină exercită o formă de atracţie asupra oricărui vizitator care este, astfel, tentat să pătrundă în edificiu. Simbol polisemic, acest tip de construcţie reprezintă proiecţia aspiraţiilor, fiind deopotrivă atrăgător sau respingător, tenebros sau luminos, accesibil sau greu de cucerit, un loc dezolant sau care inspiră speranţă.

Din punct de vedere simbolic, imaginea unui castel, cu toate elementele de arhitectură specifice, poate sugera aspiraţia către înălţime, dorinţa evaziunii, a depăşirii propriilor limite, fiind totodată expresia voinţei de putere a structurii politice, aferente monarhiei, ca formă de organizare statală.

Imaginea castelului, în plan oniric, poate varia, în funcţie de amplasament, de cele mai multe ori apărând ca o construcţie în ruină, dacă se află pe pământ, ceea ce ar sugera idealul neatins al fiinţei umane, neîmplinirea, sau poate fi un edificiu luminat, aproape orbitor, în care se remarcă culoarea albă, care exprimă: „ (…) viaţa liniştită, lupta spirituală şi o interiorizare puternică.”[4]

Acestea reprezentări ale construcţiei, fie pozitive, fie negative, sunt forme aproape ireale, care pot duce la deteriorarea morală a fiinţei umane, fapt pentru care înţelepciunea patristică dezavuează orice încercare de a ne încrede în mesaje înşelătoare, precum sunt visele şi vedeniile. După cum Sfântul Ignatie Briancianinov ne informează, în studiul intitulat Fărâmiturile ospăţului (Cluj-Napoca, Editura Renaşterea, 2014), visele reprezintă o necesitate pentru sufletul care poate cădea cu uşurinţă într-o stare de înşelare, în a cărui capcană nu este bine să ne lăsăm atraşi, deoarece această neatenţie poate înseamna încrederea în forţele malefice şi îndepărtarea de adevărul absolut, pe care numai Dumnezeu îl deţine. La rândul său, Sfântul Părinte Ilie Cleopa delimitează perimetrul viselor, care include apariţiile ireale, înşelăciunile, de semnele manifestate de Creator, pe care le numeşte daruri binecuvântate. (Despre vise şi vedenii, Bucureşti, Editura Anastasia, 2002)

Imaginea castelului este asociată unei lumi fictive, cât şi unei gândiri profunde, marcată de abundenţa unor reverii fluide, schimbătoare şi repetitive. Acest tip de construcţie reprezintă mai mult decât o locuinţă, este spaţiul în care se pot manifesta cele mai stranii şi inexplicabile vise.

Motivul castelului sugerează o formă inconştientă a desprinderii de terestru, deoarece poate fi situat fie într-o zonă înaltă, munte sau deal, fie în adâncime, între depresiuni şi păduri ascunse, proiectată sub formă de ziduri, care permit o interpretare semiotică. La polul opus seriei de construcţii circumscrise imaginarului filmic se situează construcţiile de mici dimensiuni, numite colibe sau căsuţe, lipsite de atributele grandorii, ale opulenţei şi ale fastului.

Motivul pădurii şi al căsuţelor sunt elemente recurente atât la nivelul textului scris, cât şi al scenariului de film, cu ajutorul procedeelor proprii viziunii estetice a regizorului. Pentru tinerii cinefili, pădurea reprezintă un tărâm al posibilităţilor, al aventurii şi al aspiraţiilor. De cele mai multe ori, copiii sunt atraşi de spaţiile inacesibile din vecinătatea lor, misterioase, dorindu-şi a fi iniţiatorii unor călătorii exotice, întreprinse în adâncul unui locuri care presupun probe, încercări, cum ar fi marea sau pădurea. Rătăcirile personajului central într-un spaţiu silvestru sunt considerate firești, chiar necesare maturizării protagoniştilor poveştii. Pădurile sunt în general atemporale, astfel că personajul, intrând în acest spațiu, are acces la eternitate, datorită faptului că în acest loc indicii cronotopici își pierd coordonatele terestre. Pădurea implică o căutare a sinelui, care se realizează într-un singur sens, linear, drept. Această cercetare interioară se produce mai cu seamă în interiorul personajului, în funcție de opțiunile pe care le are la dispoziție, dar și de experiența acumulată. În labirintul pădurii personajul se desprinde de spațiul și timpul cărora le-a aparținut, pe măsură ce se afundă în imensitatea locului.

Structura labirintică a pădurii permite acumularea unei polisemii simbolice, deoarece devine un centrum și un axis mundi, loc al opțiunilor și al nesiguranței, care declanșează spaimele ancestrale, proiectate pe fundalul unui peisaj sumbru. Odată ajuns în pădure, personajul filmului trăiește sentimentul izolării, al separării de restul comunității, ceea ce impune o nouă rânduială a lumii și, implicit, a existenței acestuia.

Plasarea castelului presupune o apropiere de comunitățile care i se subordonează, astfel că, în funcție de formele de relief, castelul poate fi edificat pe o stâncă, un munte sau pe țărmul mării. Viziunea spațiului castelului este una bipolară, în funcție de persoana care îl stăpânește, spre exemplu castelul poate fi privit din afară, de la înălțime, din turn sau dintr-un spațiu plat, cum ar fi țărmul mării sau zonele din apropiere. După lunga domnie a lui Denethor, care conducea cetatea Minas Tirith alături de fiii său, Boromir și Faramir (romanul Stăpânul Inelelor), cât și în urma stâpânirii ținutului narnian de către Vrăjitoarea Albă (romanul Cronicile din Narnia), pământul devine arid, lipsit de fecunditate, Copacul Alb este afectat, fiind distrus de o ființă centrată pe sine și nu pe oamenii sau tărâmurile de care ar fi trebuit să se îngrijească. Regatul cunoaște o stare de sărăcie, care presupune atât manifestarea unui declin moral, cât și material, prin urmare cele două spații, transpuse în filme, impun o percepție ambivalentă, în funcție de atitudinea și comportamentul celor învestiți cu autoritate, cărora le revine întreaga responsabilitate cu privire la menținerea sau distrugerea locului respectiv. Astfel, legătura dintre ființă și teritoriul pe care aceasta îl stăpânește devine una contradictorie, astfel încât locuitorii acestor regiuni, conștienți de pericolul în care se află, încearcă să înfăptuiească binele, în numele regelui lor.

La nivel cromatic, jocul de lumini și umbre corespunde conflictului dintre cele două principii antinomice. Inițial, castelul alb, luminos, având rolul unui centrum mundi, este condus de un rege respectat de către supușii săi, însă, prin delăsarea acestuia, locul se va transforma într-un spațiu carceral, sufocant, din care mulți vor încerca să se sustragă (Aragorn ia drumul pribegiei, dar și Faramir, care este marcat de indiferența și aparenta lipsă de iubire a instanței parentale).

Castelul negru, amplasat în ținutul Mordor, este perceput asemenea unui loc în care predomină forțele negative, compus din cenușă și material ars, care nu se încadrează în tipologia celor patru construcții de acest fel, specifice basmelor populare: de cleștar, de aur, de argint și de aramă. În finalul ecranizărilor, echilibrul existențial se va restabili, deoarece elementele primordiale ale creației se întorc împotriva falsului conducător al Pământului de Mijloc sau al Narniei, care vor sfârși tragic, în timp ce Aragorn, respectiv cei patru copii Pevensie, își vor dobândi tronul regal, aflat în centrul lumii.

Palatul locuit reprezintă un topos al grandorii, opus celui abandonat și pustiu, care tinde să se tranforme într-o ruină. În romanul Stăpânul Inelelor, acest spatiu, reprezentat prin imaginea castelului Minas Tirith, cândva echilibrat, ordonat, se transformă într-unul al nefericirii, al neîmplinirii, în care predomină stările dezolante, involuția și neîncrederea în viitor.

Spațiul utopic devine unul al distopiei, cauzată de indiferența și delăsarea stăpânului castelului (Denethor) atât față de loc, cât și față de cei care îi traversau pragul sau se adăposteau aici (exemplificatoare este vizita lui Gandalf și a lui Peregrin Took).

Imaginea Iadului se suprapune castelului din ce în ce mai solitar, al cărui stăpân se aseamănă, în mod straniu, cu animalul scăpat de sub control, cu ochi sângerii (edificatoare este nuvela Metzengerstein, a scriitorului Edgar Allan Poe). Flăcările care cuprind castelul, odată cu apariția cuplului format din ființa monstruoasă (calul) și monstrul (călărețul), transformă spațiul terestru într-unul supranatural, în fața căruia slujitorii manifestă uimire: „Când flăcările au răbufnit, putând fi văzute, focul cuprinsese aproape întregul palatul, încât orice efort de a salva o parte a lui ar fi fost cu totul zadarnic. (…) De-a lungul întinsei alei de stejari bătrâni, care ducea din pădure până la intrarea principală a palatului Metzengerstein, un cal purtând pe el un călăreț cu capul descoperit și cu hainele în neorânduială se apropia în galop, mai cumplit decât Demonul Furtunii."[5]

Transformarea spațiului sugerează ideea imperfecțiunii, astfel că cel care se lasă cuprins de haos sfârșește prin a nu se putea desprinde din această stare de neîmplinire și epuizare, fiind considerat o ființă căzută, atât moral, cât și fizic. Personajul masculin Denethor, fiu al lui Ecthelion, conducătorul acestui oraș, deși trăiește într-un spațiu luminos (reprezentativ rămâne arborele regesc Copacul Alb, amplasat în centrul acestui ținut), îl resimte ca fiind unul întunecat, ceea ce îi provoacă un sentiment al involuției și al nesiguranței, deși acesta este în continuare respectat de slujitorii palatului.
Existența castelului și a sufletelor captive în acest areal, care mediază între cele două lumi, este una precară, condiționată de evoluția ulterioară a personajelor. Acestea primesc șansa izbăvirii de forțele răului dacă apelează la instanțe protectoare, care slujesc binelui, cum ar fi apariția luiGandalf cel Alb, care va sosi la palat însoțit de hobbitul Peregrin Took.

Denethor reprezintă un personaj care eșuează lamentabil, care se lasă învins prin faptul că acceptă îndepărtarea de planul divin, în care nu mai crede. Comportamentul conducătorului inadaptat dezvăluie faptul că acesta nu este o ființă dezumanizată în totalitate, fapt care se proiectează asupra spațiului în care trăiește, respectiv castelul, care poate fi considerat un simbol axial ce face legătura între terestru și cosmic. În plan simbolic, acest tip de castel este asociat inconștientului, memoriei confuze, dar și stării de reverie, de aspirație și de elevație a călătorului care ajunge în acest spațiu. Asemenea personajului feminin din poemul romantic Luceafărul, de Mihai Eminescu, castelul sugerează un spațiu al solitudinii, al așteptării și al dorinței de împlinire nu numai erotice, ci și spirituale, care are nevoie de o completare, de un echilibru în plan superior. Dacă în poemul menționat palatul reprezintă spațiul ideal: „Colo-n palate de mărgean/Te-oi duce veacuri multe,/Și toată lumea-n ocean/De tine o s-asculte"[6], în ecranizarea Stăpânul Inelelor acest edificiu este asociat tenebrelor, necunoscutului, fiind consacrat ca un loc concentraționar, în care atât conducătorul, cât și curtenii vor fi încercați, în permanență, de o stare de neliniște și de tumult interior.

Ulterior momentului deteriorării ținutului și a castelului, urmat de căderea în dizgrație a locuitorilor, locul respectiv devine unul sumbru, arid, neprimitor, generator de angoasă și suferință reprimată.

Castelul negru vs castelul alb (Mordor vs Minas Tirith, romanul și ecranizarea Stăpânul Inelelor): castelul poate fi asociat unei imagini bipolare, deopotrivă edenică sau infernală. Drumul spre castelul negru, prefigurat prin imaginea dezolantă a turnurilor și a construcțiilor din Mordor, loc al damnării, nu poate fi identificat cu exactitate; mai mult, trecerea unui spațiu acvatic (mlaștinile sau smârcurile), cu rol de delimitare de restul ținuturilor, devine imposibilă, deoarece nu există nicio linie fixă, pod sau punte, care să facă accesibilă parcurgerea acestui traseu. Acesta este prototipul castelului pustiu din care nu există nicio posibilitate de eliberare, în care se află ființe nefericite, captive, care și-au pierdut speranța de a fi iertate sau eliberate. Un topos similar toponimului analizat este drumul în Infern, pe care îl urmează Dante, în care castelul Limbului va reprezenta, în acest caz, un spațiu al nefericirii și al absenței divine: „Sosirăm la o nobilă cetate/cu șapte ziduri 'nalte-mprejmuită,/de o frumoasă gârlă apărate. Mulțimi de umbre cu privire gravă erau aici; păreau de vază mare, vorbeau arar cu vocea lor suavă."[7] (Infernul, Cantul IV, 105-111)

Castelul alb, reprezentat, în același roman, prin imaginea castelului Minas Tirith, reprezintă opusul, deoarece atrage și reflectă lumina solară, devenind un cronotop cu funcții salutare.

Castelele misterioase, poziționate în locuri tainice, necunoscute oamenilor, nu sunt accesibile oricui sau sunt greu accesibile, imposibil de cucerit. Unele dintre acestea dezvoltă proprietatea de a deveni invizibile, au o funcție fantomatică, de aici rezultând caracterul lor supranatural, apărând sau dispărând ca un miraj, fiind observabile de la distanță sau de pe marginea drumului, locuri în care ajung eroii, spre exemplu Aragorn, Legolas și Gimli (romanul și ecranizarea Stăpânul Inelelor), care reușesc să treacă de poarta interzisă celor vii, în locul numit Împărăția Morților. În aceeași situație se află personajele care aleg o cale mai puțin cunoscută, ceea ce presupune existența unui risc, datorită faptului că, intrând în labirintul pădurii, cei doi hobbiți, Meriadoc Brandybuck și Peregrin Took sunt urmăriți de orci. Cei care traversează etapele purificării și ale inițierii, parcurgând spațiul dintre cele două tipuri de castel, sunt transportați într-un plan superior de cunoaștere, fiind asistați, în căderea și înălțarea lor, de către o forță divină (spre exemplu vrăjitorul Gandalf cel Sur, care, în urma confruntării cu balrogul din Minele Moria, adoptă un nou statut, devenind Gandalf cel Alb).

Turnul castelului, axă a lumii – Cair Paravel, seria Cronicile din Narnia: atât în romanul și ecranizarea Stăpânul Inelelor, cât și în ținutul narnian există edificii cu valoare de simbol, care includ motivul turnului (cel din Mordor, de unde veghează Marele Ochi, reprezentat prin duhul lui Sauron, sau turnurile castelului Cair Paravel). În plan simbolic, diferența dintre turn și pământ subliniază relația axială, transpusă între orizontal și vertical, terestru și cosmic, sugerând, totodată, intersectarea sincroniei cu diacronia. Turnul poate fi comparat cu arborele drept, trunchiul de copac, butucul sau bușteanul, indici care au rolul de a centra coordonatele lumii și de a-i asigura eternitatea în plan cosmic, prin rădăcinile viguroase, stabile și fixe, adânc înfipte în pământ. Personajele claustrate în acest topos al încercărilor sugerează un blocaj interior, un refuz al evaziunii către planul cosmic, fără a implica aderența corpului uman (Sauron). Totodată, cei care sunt ținuți prizonieri în turn apelează la conștiință, la capacitățile vizionare ale sinelui, abandonându-și atributele fizice în favoarea celor morale sau imorale, în cazul personajelor negative, care îi vor ghida corespunzător. Simbolistica și rolul turnului, al închisorii sau al locurilor tăinuite sunt polisemice, aparent paradoxale, comportând funcții contrarii, pozitive sau negative.

În mod normal, turnul, considerat un axis mundi, face legătura între planul terestru și cel cosmic, sugerând un nivel superior de trăire, deoarece în interiorul acestei construcții sunt primiți cei puternici, care pot suporta condițiile claustrării, dar și cei aleși, în scop purificator, în general ființe inocente, care vor urma un detaliat proces al inițierii. Putem dezvolta puncte de vedere referitoare la teoria luminii, asociată personajului Arwen din romanul și ecranizarea Stăpânul Inelelor, a cărei prezență este sugerată în film în momente critice, de cumpănă, spre exemplu atunci când hobbitul Frodo este atins, în confruntarea cu călăreții negri, de un pumnal Morgul. Dacă personajul feminin apare învăluit într-o lumină puternică, acest simbol sugerează, în primul rând, identificarea sau atracția către obiectul sau persoana aflată în această stare specială.

Lumina elfilor, care pare că se împrăștie în eter pe timpul nopții sau chiar pe timpul zilei, reușind să alunge spaimele și angoasa, corespunde momentului în care aceștia întreprind călătoria spre Limanurile Cenușii, tărâmuri ale nemuririi. Această lumină devine una corespondentă înaltului sau înălțimilor, atunci când omul se încrede în planul cosmic, dar și a desăvârșirii ființei, care va fi ascultată, iertată și va primi răspunsul la toate căutările și întrebările sale. Oricare ar fi caracteristicile luminii, acest fir călăuzitor salvează personajul aflat în dificultate, așa cum se întâmplă și cu hobbitul Frodo Baggins, care va fi vindecat de leacurile elfilor de pădure, odată cu deplasarea lui Arwen, care îl poartă pe hobbit pe calul său, către ținutul Lothlórien.

Abstract*: The rapid advancement of artificial intelligence (AI) presents profound epistemological challenges for the humanities, particularly regarding the relationship between knowledge and interpretation. Traditional humanistic scholarship relies on reflexive, context-sensitive, and hermeneutic approaches to understand cultural and social phenomena. In contrast, algorithmic knowledge is reductionist, data-driven, and formalized, capable of identifying large-scale patterns but unable to apprehend intentions, values, or the nuanced ambiguities inherent in human experience. This epistemic divergence raises critical questions about the role of interpretation and the potential for AI to reframe cultural understanding.*

Moreover, the integration of AI introduces ethical and epistemic concerns related to bias. Algorithms, dependent on preexisting datasets, can inadvertently reproduce or reinforce existing power structures and cultural hierarchies, necessitating a critical-reflexive stance from researchers. Despite these challenges, AI offers opportunities to construct hybrid epistemologies that integrate computational analysis with hermeneutic interpretation. Such approaches allow researchers to formulate novel questions, validate hypotheses rigorously, and extend perspectives on cultural phenomena without sacrificing interpretive depth.

By combining algorithmic efficiency with humanistic reflection, researchers can navigate the tensions between quantitative analysis and qualitative meaning-making, ensuring that AI functions as a transformative tool rather than a reductive substitute. This synthesis redefines the role of the humanistic researcher as both interpreter and analyst, fostering epistemic innovation in the digital era. Ultimately, AI can enrich humanistic inquiry by enhancing methodological rigor, expanding analytical scope, and supporting nuanced interpretations that respect the complexity of cultural and social realities.

Introduction

Artificial Intelligence (AI) represents one of the most transformative technologies of the twenty-first century, with profound implications for the ways in which knowledge is produced and validated. In the humanities disciplines characterized by qualitative, interpretive, and hermeneutic approaches the emergence of AI generates significant epistemological challenges. Whereas traditional humanistic inquiry relies on the contextualized interpretation of texts, culture, and history, AI introduces a statistically driven and algorithmic mode of knowledge production rooted in patterns, predictions, and large-scale data analysis (Floridi, 2014).

This divergence raises fundamental questions: Can a machine perform hermeneutic interpretation? What role remains for the humanistic researcher? The purpose of this paper is to explore how AI reshapes the relationship between knowledge and interpretation within the humanities, highlighting emerging epistemic tensions, potential benefits, and the risks inherent in this technological transition.

In this context, the humanities traditionally grounded in interpretive, hermeneutic, and reflexive methodologies encounter new epistemological pressures as computational systems are increasingly used to analyze texts, cultural artifacts, and social phenomena (Floridi, 2014). While humanistic knowledge is constructed through the contextualized interpretation of meanings and cultural values, AI offers a form of knowledge grounded in statistical patterns and large-scale information processing. This shift prompts essential questions: How does AI transform the nature of interpretation, and what epistemic authority remains with the human scholar?

1. The Traditional Epistemological Paradigm of the Humanities

The humanities have historically developed under the assumption that meaning and knowledge are situated and contextual, dependent on the interpreter's experience (Gadamer, 2004). Unlike the natural sciences, where reproducibility and variable control are central, humanistic knowledge is interpretive and subjective, grounded in the analysis of meaning, intentionality, and cultural values. Hermeneutics, in particular, has functioned as a core epistemological model, highlighting the circularity of interpretation: understanding a part of a text depends on understanding the whole, while the whole becomes intelligible through its constituent parts (Gadamer, 2004). Such an approach requires empathy, reflection, and sensitivity to authorial intent and cultural context dimensions that AI does not naturally possess.

The humanities thus constitute a distinctive epistemic field devoted to understanding human complexity through philosophical reflection, cultural analysis, and historical inquiry. Over the centuries, the traditional paradigm has provided a stable conceptual framework oriented toward interpretation, continuity, and universal values. This paradigm foregrounds authority, textuality, hermeneutics, and the evaluative study of cultural and moral phenomena.

1.1.Authority and Textual Tradition

One of the foundational pillars of the traditional paradigm is the valorization of authority and canonical sources. In Ancient Greece, the works of Plato and Aristotle were not merely objects of study but epistemic foundations offering methodological and conceptual principles for philosophical inquiry. Plato (1894) emphasized the distinction between doxa (opinion) and episteme (truth), establishing a cornerstone of classical epistemology.

During the Middle Ages, scholastic thinkers such as Thomas Aquinas integrated Aristotelian philosophy with Christian doctrine, maintaining that reason was subordinate to theological authority (Aquinas, 1920/1947). In this framework, knowledge validation involved not only intellectual rigor but also fidelity to tradition and universal truth.

1.2.Hermeneutics and Contextual Interpretation

The traditional paradigm strongly relies on hermeneutic methodology. Initially developed for the interpretation of sacred and literary texts, classical hermeneutics expanded in the seventeenth through nineteenth centuries to encompass historical and cultural analysis. Schleiermacher (1998) described hermeneutics as the "art of understanding the author" and recovering the original meaning within its context. Dilthey (1989) argued that understanding human experience requires empathetic, context-dependent interpretation. Knowledge in the humanities thus becomes a reflexive, active process of uncovering the deeper meanings embedded in cultural phenomena.

1.3.The Axiological and Teleological Dimensions of Knowledge

The traditional paradigm is also characterized by its orientation toward universal values and aesthetic, moral, or ethical judgments. Literature and art function not merely as subjects of study, but as vehicles for understanding human existence and reflecting on cultural values. Dante Alighieri's Divine Comedy (2006), for example, synthesizes knowledge, morality, and human experience, presenting the text as a means of apprehending universal order.

In philosophy, Kant (1781/1998) emphasized that human experience is mediated through universal conceptual structures, granting knowledge a normative and reflexive character. Humanistic inquiry thus diverges from the natural sciences by foregrounding value-laden interpretation and teleologically oriented understanding.

1.4.The Axiological Dimension of Knowledge

Axiology the philosophical study of values occupies a central place in the humanities. Knowledge is not value-neutral; the selection of research topics, analytical frameworks, and interpretive strategies inherently reflects normative, cultural, or ethical perspectives. Ricoeur (1990) argued that interpreting cultural phenomena requires evaluating meanings and prioritizing them according to symbolic or social relevance. This dimension also involves acknowledging the researcher's own assumptions and values, reinforcing critical reflexivity as a prerequisite for interpretive legitimacy.

1.5.The Teleological Dimension of Knowledge

Teleology in the humanities implies that knowledge is inherently goal-oriented. The aim of humanistic inquiry extends beyond data accumulation to include understanding meanings and assessing their cultural, social, or existential impact. Knowledge becomes an intentional act aimed at clarifying social values, fostering critical reflection, and informing ethical or cultural decisions. This teleological orientation integrates normative, educational, and civic dimensions into scholarly practice.

1.6.Integrating Axiological and Teleological Dimensions

These two dimensions are mutually reinforcing: orienting values shape research goals, while research goals can reaffirm or revise underlying values. As a result, humanistic knowledge cannot be reduced to descriptive or explanatory tasks; it possesses normative and formative roles, contributing to the complex understanding of cultural and social phenomena. Historical or literary studies, for instance, not only recount events but also examine the meanings communities assign to them and the implications these meanings have for present and future social life.

1.7.Limitations of the Traditional Paradigm

Despite its merits, the traditional paradigm has significant limitations. Emphasis on authority and historical continuity can generate methodological rigidity and marginalize alternative perspectives. Classical hermeneutics risks excessive subjectivity, relying heavily on the interpreter's intuition. Foucault (2002) and Derrida (1976) demonstrated how power structures and cultural discourses condition interpretation, challenging the notion of absolute truth. These critiques stimulated modern paradigms including structuralism, poststructuralism, and cultural studies, which promote interpretive plurality and critical engagement with tradition. The traditional epistemological paradigm thus remains foundational for the humanities, providing a reflective and nuanced approach to human experience. Despite its limitations, it continues to play a crucial role by balancing interpretive continuity with the need for methodological innovation and critique.

2. Algorithmic Knowledge and Epistemic Differences in the Humanities

Recent technological advancements—particularly the development of artificial intelligence have dramatically reshaped the production, interpretation, and application of knowledge across disciplines. In this context, algorithmic knowledge refers to the capacity of computational systems to process, analyze, and generate outputs based on formal rules and large datasets, independent of traditional forms of human reasoning. In contrast, humanistic epistemology has long emphasized reflexive, hermeneutic, and value-based modes of inquiry.

This section examines the nature of algorithmic knowledge, its impact on humanistic epistemology, and the tensions arising between computational and interpretive methodologies, with examples from literary studies, history, and philosophy (Floridi, 2014; Berry, 2012).

2.1.Algorithmic Research in the Humanities: The Need for Reflexivity and Critique

Algorithmic research in the humanities represents a significant methodological development, offering tools capable of handling large sets of cultural, linguistic, and social data, as well as detecting patterns and connections that would be difficult or impossible to identify through traditional methods. However, integrating algorithms into humanistic research also raises epistemological and ethical concerns that demand reflexive and critical engagement. Algorithmic tools are not neutral; they operate on predefined models that embed assumptions, values, and conceptual limitations capable of shaping research outcomes (Berry, 2011).

Reflexivity requires scholars to understand the conditions under which data are collected, processed, and interpreted. In the humanities, data are not neutral objects but culturally and socially constructed entities laden with meaning. For instance, a text-mining algorithm that calculates term frequencies in a literary corpus may yield quantitative results, but without contextual interpretation such data remain culturally and symbolically impoverished. Reflexivity therefore demands both technical and interpretive awareness, including examination of how algorithms may amplify biases, omit marginalized perspectives, or reshape complex cultural meanings (Kitchin, 2014).

Critique involves evaluating the limitations and potential errors inherent in computational models. Algorithms process datasets that may contain historical or cultural biases; ignoring this fact risks reinforcing stereotypes or generating misleading interpretations. Transparency and methodological accountability are essential for ensuring the scientific validity of digitally assisted humanistic research (Gitelman, 2013). The humanistic researcher must thus act not merely as an algorithm operator but as a critical interpreter of the epistemic implications of computational tools.

Without reflexivity and critique, algorithmic research risks devolving into a depersonalized technical process that sacrifices interpretive depth and cultural meaning in favor of quantitative efficiency. Integrating reflexive and critical perspectives allows scholars to transform algorithmic power into genuinely humanistic knowledge.

2.2.Algorithmic Knowledge: Definition and Characteristics

Algorithmic knowledge refers to a form of procedural knowledge derived from the application of logical or statistical rules to large datasets. It includes the ability of algorithms to identify patterns, generate predictions, and produce results with high levels of consistency and efficiency (Mayer-Schönberger & Cukier, 2013). Unlike humanistic inquiry, algorithmic knowledge does not engage with meaning, value-based interpretation, or historical contextualization; it prioritizes formal correctness, reproducibility, and speed.

A representative example is the use of text mining algorithms in literary analysis. These tools enable researchers to detect term frequencies, correlations, and lexical patterns across extensive textual corpora, offering insights unattainable through conventional methods (Jockers, 2013). However, such analyses cannot replace critical interpretation of literary meaning or authorial intention, which remains central to humanistic scholarship.

2.3.Epistemic Differences Between Algorithmic Knowledge and the Humanities

Traditional humanities rely on the interpretation of human phenomena within their cultural, social, and historical contexts. Dilthey (1989, p. 22) emphasizes that understanding human experience requires a hermeneutic approach involving empathy and contextual analysis. In contrast, algorithms operate on quantifiable data and formal patterns, lacking the capacity to access the intentions, emotions, or cultural meanings of social actors (Berry, 2012, p. 34). This epistemic divide reflects two fundamentally different modes of knowing: a reductionist, data-driven, formal paradigm, and a reflexive interpretive one grounded in the understanding of meaning. In practical terms, algorithmic knowledge excels at identifying large-scale patterns and trends, yet it cannot account for why certain cultural or social phenomena hold significance or value for individuals and communities.

Reflexive–interpretive knowledge constitutes one of the foundational dimensions of the humanities, marking a clear contrast with the predominantly empirical or experimental methods used in the natural sciences. At the core of this approach lies an active awareness of the cognitive process and the cultural, social, and historical context in which research unfolds. This form of knowledge requires not only the observation and description of cultural or social phenomena but also a critical examination of how interpretation is shaped by the researcher's assumptions, epistemological positions, and contextual environment.

This reflexive interpretive orientation is grounded in hermeneutic and phenomenological traditions, which argue that understanding human reality can never be fully objective but is mediated by subjective experience and by the systems of meaning produced within cultural communities. In this sense, knowledge is not limited to the accumulation of facts or data; it involves interpreting them within a conceptual framework that values nuance, ambiguity, and complexity. The humanities researcher is therefore engaged in a dual process: on the one hand, describing and explaining phenomena, and on the other, reflecting on the conditions of their own knowledge production and how these shape research outcomes.

Methodologically, reflexive interpretive knowledge is expressed through qualitative techniques such as textual analysis, case studies, semi-structured interviews, and participant observation. These methods enable the investigation of the meanings and values attributed by cultural or social actors to the phenomena under study and facilitate the understanding of the complex processes through which knowledge is produced and circulated. Furthermore, reflexivity involves a critical sensitivity to discourses of power, social structures, and cultural paradigms, highlighting the relationship between knowledge and its ethical and social context. The importance of this perspective lies in its capacity to generate a deep and nuanced understanding of cultural, social, and symbolic phenomena. It allows for the identification of interpretive diversity, conflicting meanings, and the mechanisms by which knowledge is produced, transmitted, and legitimized. In an era marked by data proliferation and the digitalization of research, reflexive–interpretive knowledge remains a crucial foundation, ensuring that humanistic analysis preserves its connection to the subjective, ethical, and symbolic dimensions of reality.

In conclusion, reflexive–interpretive knowledge constitutes an epistemological and methodological framework that defines the humanities through its sustained attention to meaning, context, and perspective. By integrating critical reflection and nuanced interpretation, humanistic research becomes able not merely to describe the world but to understand it in the depth of the relations, values, and meanings that constitute it. This approach reaffirms the central role of reflexivity and critical interpretation in knowledge production, consolidating the epistemological distinctiveness and relevance of the humanities in the face of contemporary research challenges.

2.4.The Example of Digital Literature

Digital literature provides a concrete example of the intersection between algorithmic knowledge and humanistic epistemology. Quantitative text analysis, conducted through algorithmic methods, enables the detection of thematic or stylistic evolutions across extended historical periods (Jockers, 2013, p. 137). Yet, quantitative analysis cannot identify stylistic subtleties, irony, or cultural nuances that contribute to a text's deeper meaning.

For instance, algorithmic analysis of Shakespeare's poetry may reveal the frequency of specific words or syntactic structures, but it cannot replace the critical interpretation of dramatic motifs, symbolic elements, or the aesthetic effects experienced by readers. This limitation underscores the need to combine algorithmic methods with hermeneutic approaches so that raw data can be integrated into a meaningful and value-oriented interpretation.

2.5.Implications for the Epistemology of the Humanities

The integration of algorithmic knowledge into the humanities generates both opportunities and challenges. Algorithms enable the quantitative analysis of cultural phenomena such as the distribution of literary themes, social networks, or linguistic evolution thus expanding researchers' capacity to manage complex data (Berry, 2012, p. 78). However, there is a risk that cultural experience will be reduced to statistical models, thereby marginalizing the axiological and subjective dimensions essential to humanistic epistemology (Floridi, 2014, p. 91).

To reconcile these epistemic differences, scholars argue for the development of a hybrid epistemology that combines algorithmic efficiency with hermeneutic reflection. In such a framework, algorithms may serve as tools for preliminary analysis and pattern discovery, followed by contextualized critical interpretation by the humanist researcher, thus preserving the semantic and value-oriented integrity of the object of study (Jockers, 2013; Berry, 2012).

2.6.Limits and Challenges

Despite its advantages, algorithmic knowledge exhibits significant limitations. Its reliance on structured data can exclude marginal or non-standard perspectives, and algorithms may reproduce or amplify biases embedded in the datasets (Floridi, 2014, p. 104). Moreover, reducing cultural complexity to numerical metrics risks diminishing the understanding of human phenomena as subjective and value-laden experiences.

Contemporary critics such as Foucault (2002) and Derrida (1976) remind us that all systems of knowledge including algorithmic ones are conditioned by structures of power and cultural discourses. Consequently, algorithmic research in the humanities must be reflexive and critical, avoiding the reduction of complex human knowledge to simplistic computational models.

Conclusion

Algorithmic knowledge represents a methodological revolution in the humanities, offering new tools for analyzing and uncovering cultural and historical patterns. The epistemic differences between algorithmic methods and traditional humanistic inquiry highlight the tension between formal efficiency and value-oriented interpretation. Rather than replacing reflexive and hermeneutic knowledge, algorithms should be integrated into a hybrid paradigm that values both quantitative analysis and qualitative interpretation. Such an approach enables the humanities to benefit from digital technologies without compromising epistemological depth or their essential role in understanding the human condition.

In light of the arguments presented, algorithmic knowledge can be considered not merely an auxiliary instrument but an active agent of epistemological transformation in the humanities. This methodological revolution manifests through algorithms' capacity to process vast quantities of cultural, linguistic, and social data; detect subtle patterns and invisible relationships; and generate novel interpretive perspectives. By introducing computational methods, humanistic research moves beyond the constraints of physical archives and close reading, enabling systemic and multidimensional approaches to cultural phenomena. Nonetheless, the adoption of algorithmic knowledge requires a critical reassessment of the relationship between human and machine, between interpretive judgment and algorithmic objectivity. Each model or algorithm carries implicit epistemic assumptions and limitations that shape data interpretation and, consequently, knowledge construction. The humanities researcher must therefore cultivate reflexive awareness of computational parameters and biases, transforming the use of algorithms into both an analytical and critical practice. This intersection between humanistic interpretive sensitivity and the methodological precision of digital technologies confers a distinct epistemic value upon algorithmic knowledge, positioning it as a vector of interdisciplinarity and scientific innovation.

Ultimately, the algorithmic revolution signals a paradigmatic shift in the humanities: a transition from linear, qualitatively centered research methods to integrated approaches capable of synthesizing complex data and exploring deep connections among texts, practices, and cultural contexts. Algorithmic knowledge redefines the role of the researcher, who becomes simultaneously an interpreter, analyst, and architect of digital structures of understanding. In this way, the future of the humanities emerges as a space where human and computational intelligence intersect, generating knowledge that is broader, more systematic, and more profoundly attuned to the complexity of cultural and social realities.

TEACHING ROMANIAN LANGUAGE IN MULTICULTURAL CONTEXT. WORKSHOPS FOR ROMANIAN AND FOREIGN MEDICAL STUDENTS

Simona Nicoleta Staicu
Assoc. Prof., PhD, "Victor Babeș" University of Medicine and Pharmacy, Timișoara

Abstract: The current research is focused on one fundamental aim of foreign language teaching (Romanian language for foreign students, in our case), which is to develop student's ability to communicate effectively and appropriately in different situations. Thus, teaching culture is needed because 'language use has its own social grammar of roles, settings, rules of speaking, and norms of interpretation' (Kramsch, 1998). Moreover, foreign language learners need to be aware of the norms and social meanings of the language used. The foreign medical students need to use the Romanian language as a mean to achieve communicative needs, that is to say, that functional effectiveness and appropriateness of the language are needed more than structural accuracy and correct grammar rules. Besides, in order to be able to communicate inter- culturally, the learners must know about some historical and geographical facts of the target society. There is a tradition in our university to organize workshops and conferences for Romanian and foreign students and to enhance cultural communication and motivate them to acquire cultural knowledge regarding the country where they are going to study for the next 6 years.

Interferențe lingvistice și culturale în învățarea limbii române

Trăim într-o lume diversă și diversitatea este cea care ne face atât de interesanți ca specie. Diversitate de nații, limbi, culturi, obiceiuri, stiluri de viață. etc., există și în universitatea noastră, Universitatea de Medicină și Farmacie 'Victor Babeș' din Timișoara unde învață studenți din toate colțurile lumii în cadrul secțiilor cu predare în limba română, limba engleză și limba franceză.

Învățarea limbilor străine constituie, prin excelență, domeniul în care cunoștințele sunt abordate dintr-o perspectivă diversă, interculturală. Fără excepție, învățarea limbii române de către studenții străini este locul ideal pentru a achiziționa și înțelege cultura românească.

În afara cursurilor practice de limba română pentru studenții străini, au fost introduse cursuri de mediere culturală în cadrul cărora studenții se familiarizează cu diverse aspecte culturale ale țării în care au venit să se formeze ca viitori medici. Cu siguranță medicul are nevoie de o cultură vastă și pe lângă atribuțiile și calitățile strict profesionale, pentru care se formează de-a lungul unui drum lung, este nevoie de o comunicare fluentă, corectă și avizată cu pacienții, cu personalul din spital, cu colegii în cadrul conferințelor și congreselor medicale.

Scopul acestei lucrări este de a demonstra că învățarea unei limbi străine, în cazul de față, a limbii române, nu trebuie făcută doar după regulile tipizate de predare și învățare generate de didactica predării limbilor străine, se pot intercala elemente de cultură și civilizație prin metoda de predare comunicativă prin intermediul căreia se introduc aspecte gramaticale dar și celelalte competențe lingvistice pe care un student trebuie să le dobândească și facem referire la tehnicile de ascultare, comunicare, scris, citit. Procesul de predare a unei limbi străine nu a inclus mereu această componentă culturală, deși, așa cum afirmă Brown (2000: 177), „limba este parte a culturii, iar cultura este o parte a limbii. Cele două se întrepătrund atât de complex încât nu pot fi separate fără a se pierde semnificația uneia dintre ele".

Grigorian, Bekaryan și Melkonyan (2018: 2861) întăresc această ideea conform căreia actul comunicării nu va avea succes decât în situația în care competențele lingvistice se bazează și pe cele culturale, pentru a evita astfel neînțelegerile care pot apărea în timpul conversației. Trebuie avut în vedere că, în cultura interlocutorului, o propoziție, chiar dacă este corectă din punct de vedere lexical și gramatical, poate fi interpretată într-un mod diferit față de ceea ce se dorește a fi transmis. Rolul profesorului care predă o limbă străină nu se limitează numai la formarea deprinderilor de citit, scris, înțeles și vorbit prin prisma aspectelor gramaticale, fonetice și de vocabular, ci și la dezvoltarea abilităților de interacțiune interculturală, a spiritului respectului pentru diversitatea culturală.

Întâlniri interculturale. Scop și adresabilitate

Necesitatea aplecării din punct de vedere științific asupra aspectelor culturale în predarea limbii române ca limbă străină derivă din diversitatea culturală a colectivului de studenți. Dacă la programele de studii în limba română studenții internaționali sunt integrați unui colectiv alcătuit preponderent din studenți români, în secțiile străine participanții la procesul de predare-învățare au fiecare un profil cultural diferit, care presupune o mai mare atenție acordată modalității prin care sunt livrate aspectele culturale în procesul predării limbii române.

Scopul organizării de-a lungul timpului a unor manifestări destinate studenților medicinești este de a promova multiculturalitatea dar și valorile naționale, de a se cunoaște și altfel, de a-și testa aptitudinile de comunicare într-o limbă străină, limba română fiind limba pe care o învață în țara în care au venit să studieze, într-un cadru mai puțin formal, de prietenie, colegialitate, lucru în echipă, de susținere reciprocă. Aceste workshop-uri și conferințe studențești au un scop primordial de a aduce împreună studenții străini și cei români, de a se forma o punte de comunicare și relaționare între aceștia, limbile română, engleză sau franceză fiind folosite ca mijloace de cunoaștere într-un cadru instituțional.

Obiective propuse. Participanți în cadrul workshop-urilor

Prin organizarea acestor activități se urmărește îmbogățirea noțiunilor de limbă română pentru studenții străini care studiază în secțiile cu predare în limba română (studenți din Republica Moldova, Serbia) de la Medicină dentară în anul I și Medicină generală în anii I și II. Din secțiile cu predare în limba franceză au participat studenți de la Facultatea de farmacie din anul I din țări precum, Maroc, Tunisia sau Algeria, sau cu predare în limba engleză am avut participanți studenții de la Medicină dentară din anul I și Medicină generală din anul I și anul al II-lea, din Italia, Franța, Germania, Turcia, Grecia, Palestina, Siria, Nigeria, Egipt, Irak, Iran, Canada, Iordania, Emiratele Arabe, Israel. Aceste manifestări se adresează, deopotrivă, atât studenților străini, cât și studenților români care beneficiază de oportunitatea de a conversa în limbile engleză și franceză cu vorbitori nativi (C2) sau cu vorbitori cu un nivel avansat de limbă străină (B2-C1), îmbogățindu-și, astfel vocabularul achiziționat în cadrul cursurilor practice de limbă străină. Astfel, au posibilitatea de a învăța tehnici noi de comunicare, de a valorifica și a pune în practică ceea ce au achiziționat în anii preclinici la cursurile de limbă sau de participa activ și a relaționa cu studenții străini veniți din toate colțurile lumii.

Descrierea evenimentelor adresate studenților medicinești

Crossing Cultural Boundaries este un workshop internațional care se derulează anul în cadrul Conferinței naționale studențești Conference and Workshops for students and academics, care se adresează studenților străini și români, un eveniment cu o tradiție în Universitatea de Medicină și Farmacie „Victor Babeș" din Timișoara care a debutat în anul 2006 și anul acesta a marcat cea de-a X-a ediție. În acest an conferința s-a bucurat de participarea studenților din alte doua centre universitare din țară, și anume, Universitatea de Medicină și Farmacie „Iuliu Hațieganu", Cluj-Napoca și Universitatea din Craiova.

La această ediție aniversară au participat studenți medicinești din 17 țări din cadrul facultăților de Medicină, Medicină Dentară și Farmacie, din secțiile cu predare în limba română, engleză și limba franceză, înregistrându-se un număr record de participanți, peste 350 de studenți străini și români din cele trei universități.

Am pornit împreună într-o călătorie de cunoaștere și chiar de autocunoaștere, studenții participanți propunându-ne proiecte extrem de interesante, captivante despre cultura țărilor lor (Italia, Tunisia, Maroc, Algeria), traversând un pod peste timp, ne-au încântat cu lecții de istorie (Iran, Turcia, Serbia, Iordania), incursiuni în civilizații vechi (Egipt), ne-au descris tradițiile și obiceiurile din țările lor (România, Siria, Iran, Maroc), ne-au plimbat într-o călătorie imaginară în cele mai frumoase locuri, insule, golfuri, plaje, atracții turistice unice (Grecia, Italia, Turcia, Tunisia, Franța) și nu în cele din urmă, ne-am imaginat gusturi, mirosuri și arome, privind imagini din gastronomia fiecărei țări.

Am asistat chiar și la adevărate lecții de etimologie, studenta de la medicină dentară din secția engleză ne-a amintit de renumitele sarmale pe care le-au menționat și studenții de la secția română atunci când au prezentat regiuni din țara noastră, specificând faptul că sarmalele fac parte din gastronomia românească. Etimologia cuvântului sarma este un împrumut din limba turcă sarmak unde are sensul de a înfășura, a învelii. Pe parcursul prezentărilor l-am identificat și în mai multe țări din bazinul Mării Mediterane: Serbia, Palestina, Iordania, Grecia, Siria.

Am aplaudat studenții străini care s-au pregătit temeinic să vorbească în limba română, de exemplu, studenții din Serbia ne-au încântat cu o română aproape de perfecțiune, iar prezentările lor au avut o mare încărcătură emoțională, pe care am resimțit-o cu toții, vorbind cu patos și fiind foarte mândri de originile lor. Studenții din Republica Moldova ne-au încântat cu o limbă moldovenească autentică, cu accente tipice regiunii, presărată cu multe arhaisme și regionalisme care au necesitat o căutare a sensurilor, exercițiu semantic benefic pentru studenții români.

Prezentări în limba română au realizat și studentele de la medicină generală, din anul I, care ne-au plimbat prin Iordania, au vorbit cursiv pe baza imaginilor extrem de edificatoare despre orașe antice, precum Petra, orașul de piatră și una dintre cele 7 minuni ale lumii. Ne-au informat despre rolul femeilor în societate, lecții importante despre stilul de viață, cultură și civilizație, despre vestimentația acestora, am învățat despre semnificația unui hijab, burka și niqab, dar și despre modelele tradiționale ale vestimentației femeilor din cultura arabă.

Un alt proiect care ne-a tăiat respirația, la propriu, a fost acela despre Egipt, prezentat în limba română de două studente de la Medicină dentară. Au susținut o lecție de istorie, cultură și civilizație, abordând moștenirile culturale din Egiptul antic prin oglinda invențiilor și inovațiilor utilizate în mod regulat în zilele noastre. Și făcând o trecere spre medicină, au enumerat faptul că egiptenii au inventat periuța și pasta de dinți, menta pentru respirație și deodorantul sub formă de tămâie. Stomatologia a fost dezvoltată și de egipteni, la fel și practica medicului de a lua istoricul pacientului în vederea diagnosticării bolii.

Workshopu-ul cu studenții din secția franceză de la Facultatea de farmacie a fost unul memorabil pentru că am traversat un pod spre o lume tradițională, autentică, plină de iubire și implicare din țările francofone. Am învățat că în Maroc tradiția conduce țara, marocanii țin foarte mult la cultura și tradițiile lor, iar ca semn de patriotism studenții au adus steagul cu ei și l-au afișat cu mândrie în fața tuturor. Ne-au vorbit despre faptul că marocanii beau mult ceai iar prepararea acestuia este o adevărată artă. Studentele au cântat și ne-au încântat cu piese vestimentare specifice de o frumusețe inimaginabilă.

Studenții din Tunisia ne-au predat o adevărată lecție de marketing turistic, invitându-ne să vizităm aceste locuri mirifice, o țară a culorilor și contrastelor, a parfumurilor și aromelor. Ne-au plimbat prin Sahara, ne-au povestit despre istoria tulburătoare a Cartaginei, am admirat colosseumul din El Jem, o variantă mult mai completă și mai bine păstrată decât cu cel din Roma.

Studenții români, la rândul lor au excelat prin prezentări video și chiar audio despre România, susținute în limba română sau engleză, purtându-ne într-o călătorie inițiatică pe care studenții străini au primit-o cu mare entuziasm, acumulând informații utile despre istoria, tradițiile și obiceiurile țării în care vor studia în următorii ani. Au învățat despre legenda lui Vlad Țepeș, au călătorit pe tărâmul magic al Maramureșului, au luat Iașul la picior, au fost drumeți prin Munții Apuseni și au urcat pe Bucegi, chiar și o plimbare cu barca pe canalele Deltei le-a trezit interesul de a vizita țara noastră. Sub titlul România culturală, studenții de la medicină generală din anul al II-lea ne-au furnizat informații neprețuite într-o engleză de nivel avansat (B2-C1) despre nume emblematice în arta și cultura românească, prezentând operele lui Brâncuși în imagini. Amintim câteva din titlurile care au încântat publicul din sală: – Tracing the Mystery of the Castles, The beautiful and historical places of Hunedoara County, Iulia Hașdeu Castle. How a father's devotion to his daughter bridged the gap between Life and Death, The legacy of C-tin Brâncuși, Traditions from Oltenia, World's famous Romanian people, Romanian film and art, Romanian women who made history, The Land of the Merry Cementery, Bucovina, the magnificent realm, The stone land, Corvin Castle, Hunedoara

Castle, Queen Mary of Romania, People living in the forrest land, Traditional Romanian costumes, The land beyond God's bridge.

Și după zece ani povestea continuă...

În cadrul acestor întâlniri studenții medicinişti au acumulat astfel, informații lingvistice valoroase, au pus în practică tehnici de comunicare într-o limbă străină, au colaborat cu alți colegi pentru a elabora un proiect bine documentat și nu în ultimul rând s-au simțit minunat într-un cadru extrem de prietenos. La prima vedere pare un proces complex și extrem de elaborat, însă o dată aplicată, metoda de învățare prin comunicare oferă atât profesorului, cât și studentului, o libertate în exprimare și o diversitate de comunicare care conduc spre îmbogățirea vocabularului, dobândirea de cunoștințe interculturale. Metoda de predare comunicativă promovează interactivitatea, interacțiunea între cursanți fiind una productivă din punct de vedere al achizițiilor lingvistice, culturale și gramaticale. Studenții nu se simt forțați să învețe reguli sau să își rememoreze tabele sau liste de cuvinte, ei au posibilitatea de a înmagazina informații gramaticale, fonetice, sintactice sau stilistice prin intermediul discuțiilor cu caracter cultural. Această abordare presupune implicit și schimburi culturale, ajutând astfel participanții la dialog să dobândească nu numai abilități de comunicare, ci abilități de comunicare interculturală. Ne-am bucurat de un feed-back pozitiv din partea studenților participanți și suntem motivați să continuăm aceste evenimente și în anii următori.

ROMANIAN AND HUNGARIAN FOLK TERMINOLOGY RELATED TO THE NAMES OF THE MILKY WAY

Imola Katalin Nagy
Assoc. Prof. PhD, Sapientia University

Abstract: In this study, we will review the folk names of the Milky way in Romanian and Hungarian, attempting to identify phenomena of parallelism or interference. We attempt to make a synthesis of international research in the field, then we take a look at the list of folk names accounted for by Romanian and Hungarian specialists. We also emphasize the fact the Hungarian specialists have delved into the matter of Romanian cosmonyms in the early 19th century. Different semantic phenomena are identified, among which calque translations play a significant role. We spot the main differences but also the mutual influences between the denominational practices in the two languages, as far as the folk names of the Milky way are concerned.

Introducere

Studiul denumirilor populare ale stelelor și formațiunilor cosmice a fost și a rămas un subiect de cercetare pentru pasionați și lingviști deopotrivă. În acest sens amintim contribuțiile lui Otescu (1907), Pamfile (1915), Bojan (1970), Fochi (1976), Mladenova (1998), Ioniță (2005, 2006) sau Florescu (2023). Același interes se observă și în cultura maghiară, printre autorii preocupați de această temă îi menționăm pe Kálmány (1893), Kabos (1897), Erdődi (1970), Szabó T. Attila (1957), Bödök (1997) și alții.
